The READER.

THE length and quality of this inſuing trouble, will ſeem to have been given the Reader ſomewhat impertinently, if a brief account be not firſt rendred of the occaſion thereof.

The ſad effects of the preſent differences, and diviſions of this broken Kingdom, having made peace, and unity, and infallibility, ſuch pretious deſirable things, that if there were but one wiſh offered to each man among us, it would certainly, with a full conſent, be laid out on this one treaſure, the ſetting up ſome Catholick Umpire, or Daies-man, ſome viſible infallible Definer of Controverſies; the Pretenders to that Infallibility, having the luck to be alone in that pretenſion, have been lookt on with ſome reverence, and (by thoſe who knew nothing of their grounds, or arguments) acknowledged to ſpeak, if not true, yet ſeaſonably; and having ſo great an advantage upon their Auditours (their inclinations, and their wiſhes to find themſelves overcome, going along with every argument that ſhould be brought them) and ſo a fair probable entrance, by that inlet of their affections, to their minds, they began to redouble their induſtry, and their hopes; and inſtead of the many particulars of the Romiſh doctrine, which they were wont to offer proof for in the retail, now to ſet all their ſtrength upon this one in groſs, and by the compendiouſneſs of that courſe, to expect a more eaſie reception, than formerly they had met with; the very gains, and conveniences, that attend this doctrine of theirs, if it were true, being to fleſh and bloud (which all men have not the skill of putting off) mighty Topicks of probability that it is ſo.

To diſcover the danger of this ſweet potion, or rather, to ſhew how far it is from being what it pretends, and ſo to exchange the ſpecious for the ſound, the made-diſh for the ſubſtantial food (allowing the Univerſal Church the authority of an irrefragable teſtimony, and the preſent age of the Romiſh Church, as much of our belief, as it hath of conformity with the Univerſal of all ages) but not a privilege of not being able to ſay falſe, whatſoever it ſaith; and ſo to ſet us in the ſafer though longer way, thereby to whet our induſtry in the chaſe of truth, inſtead of aſſuring our ſelves that we cannot err, (which is not a virtue, but an excellency, not a grace to be crown'd, but a great part of the crown it ſelf, reſerv'd for another world, a felicity, but not a duty) this Diſcourſe of the Lord Viſcount Falkland's was long ſince deſigned; as alſo to remove the great ſcandals, and obſtacles, which have obſtructed all way of hope to that univerſal aim of all true Chriſtians, that Καθολικὴ ἁρμονία, Catholick harmony which Iamblicus talks of in the ſpheres above, but would ſound better in this vault (this arch to bear up thoſe ſpheres) the Church below, the Univerſal peace of Chriſtendom; for to this, nothing is more unreconcileably contrary, than pretenſions to Infallibility in any part of it; all ſuch, making it unlawfull either for themſelves to mend, or others to be endured, ſhutting out all poſſibility either of compliance, or charity, or reformation in their own, or mercy to other mens errours. What was thus by his Lordſhip deſigned in all juſtice, was by an intire lover of peace and truth publiſhed in all charity, to reſiſt and check a threatning tempeſt, which riſing from our preſent evils, was apt (if it did not begin) to ſhake ſome. The printing of this Tract, preſently provoked an Aſſertour of that Infallibility, to take upon him the anſwering of it, and to complain that an Anſwer which had been by the ſame hand given it formerly, was not permitted to attend it into publick. This then being a ſecond Care, was probably to have arrived to a higher degree of perfection; and indeed among the Favourers of that perſuaſion, was cried up for ſo ſatisfactory a piece, that it was delivered to a Member of the Church of England, as unanſwerable. From him it came to thoſe hands, which returned it to the Authour with this enſuing Rejoynder, withall intimating, that ſince in his, he ſeemed to wiſh the ſame freedom of the Preſs, which his Lordſhip had found, both the Anſwer and the Reply ſhould be recommended thither, if he pleaſed.

After he had detained the Reply ſome weeks, he was pleaſed to return it with a proteſtation, That he neither intended, nor would permit his to become publick, pretending (that I may give you his own words) his Treatiſe to have been no finiſh'd work, but onely a firſt draught, or inchoation, ventured abroad, to explore the judgments of one or two intelligent Adverſaries, that ſo the Authour by his ſecond (he might have ſaid third) thoughts, might be better able to underſtand, what was to be altered in it, what added or what taken away, either as ſuperfluous, or offenſive, and till that act was done, and withall till an approbation and licence given by thoſe, to whom it belonged, neither the work, nor any line of it, is to be acknowledged or vouched by the Authour. And ſo both were returned with ſome few alterations and additions in his Anſwer, and marginal Notes on the Reply, and one ſheet at the end of them, containing a new Scheme of probation, of the pretended Infallibility, and a præloquium to it, wherein the paſſage juſt now mentioned, is in terminis recited.

This the Replicant (to avoid all appearance of ſeverity) was content to accept for ſad earneſt, and therefore freely expreſt his willingneſs to give the Authour leave to provide a new Anſwer to his Lordſhip's Treatiſe, which he might be willing to own in publick, which when he ſhould doe, promiſe was made to prepare a ſpeedy Anſwer thereunto, and on thoſe terms to be content to lay aſide the former.

That this ſhould be done, was affirmed on one part, and on the other expected ſome months with patience; till at length the Anſwerer's pleaſure was made known, that that reſolution was put off, and that inſtead of ſo mean a combat either with his Lordſhip, or this Replicant, he was pleaſed now to deſign a full diſcourſe on that Subject, without taking notice of either, any farther, than he ſhould think fit to take in his way any thing by them objected againſt his poſition, and that this ſhould be printed beyond the Seas.

When this will be performed, I cannot tell. Onely this is now diſcerned (ſomewhat contrary to expectation) that what hath been diſclaimed by him, is extolled by others, and the weakneſs of the Replicant ſufficiently deſpiſed; Wherein though he hath not much temptation to think himſelf injured, being ready to acknowledge the emptineſs of theſe Papers (and more than ſo, to render a reaſon of it, viz. the fate which they were under, by a neceſſity of attending this Apologiſt κατὰ πόδα, which yielded them occaſion of little variety, unleſs they would extravagate.) Yet could he not reſiſt the Reaſons which charged it on him as a duty, thus confidently to importune the Reader with the view of the whole matter, as far as it hath paſt between them; ſetting down that Anſwer to, and this Vindication of his Lordſhip's Arguments by Chapters, and then (not doe him the leaſt injuſtice) adding in the end of all, the Anſwerer's marginal Replies, and that concluding Sheet (that even now was mentioned) with a Rejoynder to that alſo.

By all this, endeavouring to lay grounds, for all men to judge, how little truth there is in that ſo Epidemical perſuaſion, that there is no middle, betwixt aſſerting an Infallible Judge, and the falling headlong into all the Schiſms and Hereſies of this preſent age.

My Conſcience aſſuring me, that the grounds on which the eſtabliſh'd Church of England is founded, are of ſo rare and an excellent mixture, that as none but intelligent truly Chriſtian minds can ſufficiently value the compoſition, ſo there is no other in Europe, ſo likely to preſerve Peace and Unity, if what prudent Laws had ſo long ago deſigned, they now were able to uphold; For want of which, and which onely, it is, that at preſent the whole Fabrick lies polluted in confuſion and in bloud, and hopes not for any binding up of wounds, for reſtauration of any thing, that looks like Chriſtian, till the faith of the reformed Engliſh have the happineſs to be weighed prudently, and the military Sword being timely ſheathed, the Power and Laws of Peace be returned into thoſe hands, which are ordained by GOD the Defenders of it.

OF

OF THE INFALLIBILITY OF THE CHURCH of ROME.

A DISCOURSE

Written by the Lord Viſcount Falkland.

Section 1. TO him that doubts whether the Church of Rome have any errours, they anſwer, that She hath none, for She never can have any. This being ſo much harder to believe than the firſt, had need be proved by ſome certainer arguments, if they expect that the belief of this one, ſhould draw on whatſoever elſe they pleaſe to propoſe: Yet this is offered to be proved by no better ways than thoſe by which we offer to prove She hath erred: Which are, arguments from Scripture, Reaſon, and Ancient Writers; all which they ſay themſelves, are fallible; for nothing is not ſo, but the Church; which if it be the onely infallible determination, and that can never be believed upon its own authority, we can never infallibly know that the Church is infallible: for theſe other ways of proof (they ſay) may deceive both them and us; and ſo neither ſide is bound to believe them.

Section 2. If they ſay, that an argument out of Scripture is ſufficient ground of Divine faith, why are they ſo offended with the Proteſtants for believing every part of their Religion upon that ground, upon which they build all theirs at once? and if following the ſame Rule with equal deſire of finding the truth by it, (having neither of thoſe qualities, which Iſidorus Peluſiota ſays, are the cauſes of all Hereſies; ἀυθάδειαν καὶ πρόληψιν, pride and prejudication) why ſhould God be more offended with the one than the other, though they chance to err?

Section 3. They ſay the Church is therefore made infallible by God, that all men may have ſome certain Guide; yet though it be infallible, unleſs it both plainly appear to be ſo, (for it is not certain to whom it doth not appear certain) and unleſs it be manifeſt which is the Church, God hath not attained his end; and it were to ſet a Ladder to Heaven, and ſeem to have a great care of my going up, whereas unleſs there be care taken, that I may know this Ladder is here to that purpoſe, it were as good for me it had never been ſet.

Section 4. If they ſay we may know it, for that general and conſtant Tradition inſtructs us in it; I anſwer, that ignorant people cannot know this, and ſo it can be no Rule for them; and if learned people miſtake in this, there can be no condemnation for them. For ſuppoſe, to know whether the Church of Rome may err, (as a way which will conclude againſt her, but not for her; for if She hath erred, certainly She may; but though She hath not erred hitherto, it follows not, that She cannot err) I ſeek whether She have erred; and conceiving She hath contradicted her ſelf, conclude neceſſarily, She hath erred; I ſuppoſe it not damnable, though I err in my judgment: becauſe I try the Church by one of thoſe Touch-ſtones her ſelf appoints me; which is, Conformity with the Ancient. For to ſay, I am to believe the preſent Church that it differs not from the former, though it ſeem to me to doe ſo, is to ſend me to a Witneſs, and bid me not believe it.

Section 5. Now to ſay the Church is provided for a Guide of faith, but muſt be known by ſuch marks as the ignorant cannot ſeek it by, and the learned may chance not to find it by, though ſeeking it with all diligence, and without all prejudice; can no way ſatisfy me.

Section 6. If they ſay, God will reveal the truth to whoſoever ſeeks it in theſe ways ſincerely; this ſaying both ſides will (without means of being confuted) make uſe of; therefore it would be as good that neither did.

Section 7. When they have proved the Church to be infallible; yet, to my underſtanding, they have proceeded nothing further, unleſs we can be ſure which is it; for it ſignifies onely, that God will always have a Church which ſhall not err; but not that ſuch or ſuch a Succeſſion ſhall be always in the right; not that the Biſhop of ſuch a place, and the Clergy that adheres to him, ſhall always continue in the true faith. So that if they ſay the Greek Church is not the Church, becauſe by its own confeſſion it is not infallible; I anſwer, that it may be now the Church, and may hereafter err, and ſo not be now infallible; and yet the Church never err, becauſe before their fall from truth, others may ariſe to maintain it, who then will be the Church; and ſo the Church may ſtill be infallible; though not in reſpect of any ſet perſons whom we may know at all times for our Guide.

Section 8. Then if they prove the Church of Rome to be the true Church, and not the Greek, becauſe their opinions are conſonant either to Scripture or Antiquity, they run into a circle, proving their tenets to be true, firſt, becauſe the Church holds them, and then theirs to be the true Church, becauſe it holds the truth: which laſt, though it appear to me the onely way, yet it takes away its being a Guide which we may follow without examination, without which, all they ſay beſides, is nothing.

Section 9. Nay, ſuppoſe they had evinced, that ſome ſucceſſion were infallible, and ſo had proved to a learned man that the Roman Church muſt be this, becauſe none elſe pretends to it; yet this can be no ſufficient ground to the ignorant, who cannot have any infallible foundation for their belief, that the Church of Greece pretends not to the ſame; and even to the learned it is but an accidental argument, becauſe if any other company had likewiſe claimed to be infallible, it had overthrown all ſo proved.

Section 10. Nay, it is but an arbitrary Argument, and depends upon the pleaſure of the Adverſary; for, if any ſociety of Chriſtians would pretend to it, the Church of Rome could make uſe of it no longer.

Section 11. The chiefeſt reaſon why they diſallow of the Scripture for Judge, is, becauſe when differences ariſe about the interpretation, there is no way to end them; and that it will not ſtand with the goodneſs of God, to damn men for not following his will, if he had aſſigned no infallible way how to find it. I confeſs this to be wonderfull true, ὃ δ' ὅπου πάλαι ἐγὼ ὡς ἕτερα λέγειν παῤ ὃ φρονῶ, and let them excuſe themſelves that think otherwiſe. Yet this will be no argument againſt him, who believes that to all who follow their reaſon in the interpretation of the Scriptures, and ſearch for Tradition, God will either give his grace for aſſiſtence to find the truth, or his pardon if they miſs it: and then, this ſuppoſed neceſſity of an infallible Guide, with this ſuppoſed damnation for want of it, fall together to the ground.

Section 12. If they command us to believe infallibly the contrary to this, they are to prove it falſe by ſome infallible way, (for the concluſion muſt be of the ſame nature, and not conclude more than the premiſſes ſet down,) now ſuch a way, Scripture and Reaſon, or infuſed faith cannot be, (for they uſe to object the fallibility of them, to thoſe that build their Religion upon them) nor the Authority of the Church, for that is part of the queſtion, and muſt be it ſelf firſt proved, and that by none of the former ways, for the former reaſons.

Section 13. The Pope's infallibility can be no infallible ground of faith, being it ſelf no neceſſary part of the faith; (and we can be no ſurer of any thing proved, than we are of that which proves it) and if he be fallible, no part is the more infallible for his ſiding with them. So if the Church be divided, I have no way to know which is the true Church, but by ſearching which agrees with Scripture and Antiquity, and ſo judging accordingly. (But this is not to ſubmit my ſelf to her opinions as my guide, which they tell us is neceſſary.) Which courſe if they approve not of, as a fit one for a learned man, they are in a worſe caſe for the ignorant, who can take no courſe at all, nor is the better at all, for this Guide, the Church; whilſt two parts diſpute which is it, and that by arguments he underſtands not.

Section 14. If I granted the Pope, or a Council by him called, to be infallible, yet I conceive, their Decrees can be no ſufficient ground (by their own axiomes) of Divine faith. For firſt (ſay the moſt) No Council is valid not approved by the Pope, for thus they overthrow that held at Ariminum) and a Pope choſen by Symony, is ipſo facto no Pope. I can then have no certainer ground for the infallibility of thoſe Decrees, and conſequently for my belief of them than I have that the choice of him was neither directly nor indirectly Symoniacal; which to be certain of, is abſolutely impoſſible.

Section 15. Secondly, Suppoſe him Pope, and to have confirmed the Decrees; yet that theſe are the Decrees of a Council, or that he hath confirmed them, I can have but an uncontradicted atteſtation of many men, (for if another Council ſhould declare theſe to have been the Acts of a former Council, I ſhould need again ſome certain way of knowing how this declaration is a Councils) which is no ground (ſay they) of faith, I am ſure not ſo good and general a one, as that Tradition by which we prove that the Scripture is Scripture, which yet they will not allow any to be certain of, but from them.

Section 16. Thirdly, For the ſenſe of their Decrees, I can have no better expounder to follow than Reaſon; which if, though I miſtake, I ſhall not be damned for following, why ſhall I, for miſtaking the ſenſe of Scripture? Or why am I a leſs fit interpreter of one, than of the other, where both ſeem equally clear? And where they ſeem ſo (I mean equally clear) and yet contradictory, ſhall I not as ſoon believe Scripture, which is, without doubt, of at leaſt as great authority?

Section 17. But I doubt whether Councils be fit deciders of Queſtions; for ſuch they cannot be, if they beget more, and men have cauſe to be in greater doubts afterwards (none of the former being diminiſhed) than they were at firſt.

Section 18. Now I conceive there ariſe ſo many out of this way, that the learned cannot end all, nor the ignorant know all. As (beſides the fore-named conſiderations) Who is to call them, the Pope, or Kings: Who are to have voices in them; Biſhops onely, or Prieſts alſo: Whether the Pope or Council be ſuperiour; and the laſt, need the approbation of the firſt, debated among themſelves: Whether any Countries not being called, or not being there (as the Abiſſines, ſo great a part of Chriſtianity, and not reſolvedly condemned by them for Hereticks, were abſent at the Council of Trent) make it not general: Whether if it be one not every where received (as when the Biſhops ſent from ſome places have exceeded their Commiſſion, as in the Council of Florence) it be yet of neceſſity to be ſubſcribed to: Whether there were any ſurreption uſed, or force, and Whether thoſe diſanull the Acts: Whether the moſt voices are to be held the Act of the Council, or thoſe of all are required, (as Canus ſaith, All the Council cannot err, the moſt may; which never yet agreed) or Whether two parts will ſerve (as in the Tridentine Synod,) a conſiderable doubt, becauſe Nicephorus Calliſtus relating the reſolution of a Council at Rome againſt that of Ariminum, makes them give three reaſons; One, That the Biſhop of Rome was not preſent. The ſecond, That moſt did not agree to it. Thirdly, That others thither gathered were diſpleaſed at their reſolutions; which proves, that in their opinions, if either moſt not preſent agree not to it, or, all preſent be not pleaſed with it, a Council hath no power to bind. All theſe doubts, I ſay, perſuade me that whatſoever brings with it ſo many new queſtions, can be no fit ender of the old.

in

Ἔτεροι δὲ ὁ Νικηφόρος Καλλίστος κἂν συνόδῳ φησὶ γενέσθαι τῶν μὲν μὴ παρόντων τοῖς δὲ ἀγωνιῶσιν ἄπιστα ῥήσκοντα. Tom. 2. p. 272.

In thoſe things in which, before a General Council have defined, it is lawfull to hold either way, and damnable to doe ſo after; I deſire to know how it agreeth with the Charity of the Church, to define any thing, and ſo beſtow upon the Devil one path more for us to walk in to him? Section 19.

If the infallibility of a General Council be a point of faith, I deſire to know why it is ſo? Scripture and Tradition ſeem to me not to ſay ſo: But if they did, ſo, I ſuppoſe, you will grant they do of this doctrine, [That the ſouls of the Bleſſed ſhall ſee God before the day of judgment, and not be kept in ſecret Receptacles:] For, elſe the doctrine of prayer to Saints cannot ſtand: and yet for denying this, doth Bellarmine excuſe Pope John 22. (of which belief they know he was not alone) becauſe the Church (he means, I doubt not, a General Council) had not then condemned it. I deſire to know, why ſhould not he be condemned as well without one, as many Hereticks that are held ſo by their Church, yet condemned by no General Council? which if he makes to be the rule of Hereſie, it had been happy to have lived before the Council of Nice, when no opinion had been damnable, but ſome againſt the Apoſtles Council at Hieruſalem, becauſe there had yet been no other General Council: Section 20.

At leaſt, why ſhall not I be excuſed by the ſame reaſon, though I believe not a Council to be infallible, ſince I never heard that any Council hath decreed that they are ſo? Neither, if it have, can we be bound by that Decree, unleſs made certain ſome other way, that it ſelf is ſo. Section 21

If you ſay, we muſt believe it, becauſe of Tradition; I anſwer, ſometimes you will have the not believing any thing, though not declared by a Council, to have power enough to damn; that is, when it makes againſt us:) at other times, the Church hath not decreed, unleſs a Council have, and their errour is pardonable, and they good Catholicks. Section 22.

Next, (as I have asked before) how ſhall an ignorant man know it? for he, in likelihood, can ſpeak but with a few, from whom he cannot know that all of the Church of Rome's part do now, and in paſt Ages have believed it to be Tradition ſo certainly as to make it a ground of Faith, (unleſs he have ſome revelation that thoſe deceive him not.) Neither indeed can thoſe that ſhould enform him of the opinions of former times, be certainly enformed themſelves; for truly if (as they would perſuade us) the relation of Papias could coſen ſo far all the prime Doctours of the Chriſtian Church into the belief of the doctrine of the Millenaries, ſo as that no one of thoſe two firſt Ages oppoſed it, (which appears plain enough, becauſe thoſe that after roſe up againſt this opinion, never quoted any for themſelves before Dionyſ. Alexandrinus, who lived at leaſt 250 years after Chriſt.) Nay, if thoſe firſt men did not onely believe it as probable, but Juſtin Martyr ſays he holds it, and ſo do all that are in all parts orthodox Chriſtians, ἐγὼ καὶ ὅσοι τινὲς ὀρθόδοξοί εἰσιν πάντα χριστιανοί. * Irenæus ſets it down directly for a Tradition, and relates the very words that Chriſt uſed when he taught this; (which is plainer than any other Tradition is proved, or ſaid to be (out of Antiquity) by them.) If (I ſay) theſe could be ſo deceived, why might not other of the Ancients as well be by others deceived in other points? And then, what certainty ſhall the learned have, when after much labour they think they can make it appear that the Ancients thought any thing Tradition, that indeed it was ſo? and that either the folly, or the knavery of ſome Papias deceived them not? I confeſs it makes me think of ſome that Tully ſpeaks of, who (arcem amittunt, dum propugnacula defendunt) loſe the fort, whilſt they defend the out-works; for, whilſt they anſwer this way the arguments of Tradition for the opinion of the Chiliaſts, they make unuſefull to themſelves the force of Tradition to prove any thing elſe by. For which cauſe it was rather wiſely than honeſtly done of them, who before Fevardentius ſet him forth, left out that part of Irenæus which we alledge (though we need it not much, for many of the Fathers take notice of this belief of his:) Yet he juſtifies himſelf for doing it, by a worſe blow to them than this it ſelf, which is, ſaying, that if they leave out all Errours in the Books they publiſh, that is, I ſuppoſe, all opinions contrary to the Church of Rome) bona pars Scriptorum Patrum Orthodoxorum evaneſceret, a good part of the writings of the Orthodox Fathers muſt vaniſh away. Section 23.

Dial. cum Tryph. p. 307. * l. 5. c. 33.

But the Tradition that can be found out of Ancients (ſince their witneſſing may deceive us) hath much leſs ſtrength when they argue onely thus; Sure ſo many would not ſay this is true, and joyn in opinions, if there were no Tradition for them. I would have you remember, they can deliver their opinion poſſibly, but either before the controverſie ariſe in the Church (upon ſome chance) or after. If before, it is confeſt that they write not often cautiouſly enough; and ſo they anſwer all they ſeem to ſay for Arius and Pelagius his faith, before themſelves, and ſo conſequently, their controverſie (though it may be not their opinion) aroſe. If after, then they anſwer often (if any thing be by them at that time ſpoken againſt them) that the heat of diſputation brought it from them, and their reſolutions to oppoſe Hereticks enough: I deſire it may be lawfull for us to anſwer ſo too, either one of theſe two former ways; or that it is (as often they ſay too) ſome Hyperbole, when you preſs us in any thing with the opinions of Fathers. At leaſt, I am ſure if they may deceive us with ſaying a thing is a Tradition, that is not, we may be ſooner deceived if we will ſay and conclude it for a Tradition, when they ſpeak it onely as a Truth, and (for ought appears) their particular Opinion. Section 24.

For beſides, if when Salvian, comparing the Arians with evil Livers, (and that after they were condemned by a Council) extenuates, (by reaſon of their believing themſelves in the right) with much inſtance the fault of the Arians, and ſays, How they ſhall be puniſht for it in the day of judgment, none can know but the Judge: If (I ſay) they confeſs it to be his opinion, they muſt alſo confeſs the doctrine of their Church Section 25.

Church to be different from that of Salvian's times; becauſe he was allowed a Member of that, for all this ſaying; whereas he of the Church of Rome that ſhould ſay ſo of us, would be accounted Seſqui-hæreticus, a Heretick and a half: Or elſe they muſt ſay (which they can onely ſay, and not prove) that he was ſo earneſt againſt ill men, that for the aggravation of their crime, he leſſened that of the Hereticks, and ſaid, what at another time he would not have ſaid; which if they doe, will it not overthrow wholly the authority of the Fathers? Since we can never infallibly know what they thought at all times, from what they were moved to ſay at ſome one time by ſome collateral conſideration.

Section 26. Next to this certain and undoubted damning of all out of the Church of Rome, which averſeth me from it; comes their putting all to death, or at leaſt pains, that are ſo, where they have power: which is an effect, though not a neceſſary one, of the firſt opinion; and that averſeth me yet more; for I do not believe all to be damned whom they damn, but I conceive all to be killed whom they kill. I am ſure if you look upon Conſtantine's Epiſtle, written to perſuade concord upon the firſt diſagreement between Alexander and Arius, you will find that he thought (and if the Biſhops of his time had at firſt thought otherwiſe, he would have been ſure better informed) that neither ſide deſerved either death or damnation, (and yet ſure this queſtion was as great as ever roſe ſince:) For having ſpoken of the opinions as things ſo indifferent, that the Reader might almoſt think they had been fallen out at Spurn-point or Ketle-pins, he adds,

Niceph. Tom. 1. pag. 555. Τὸ δὲ ἀναμάχητον ἐν ἔᾳ, ἀεὶ τὰ θείας προνοίας συμφωνεῖν πάντας καὶ τὴν αὐτὴν πίστιν, For that which is neceſſary is one thing, that all agree and keep the ſame faith about divine providence. I am ſure in the ſame Authour, Moſes, a man praiſed by him, refuſing to be made Biſhop by Lucius becauſe he was an Arian, and he anſwering, That

Tom. 2. p. 206. he did ill to refuſe it before he knew what his faith was; Anſwered, ἡ γὰρ πίστις δείκνυσι τὴν ὅπου κόπων ἀφορεία, The baniſhing of Biſhops ſhews Enough your faith. So that it is plain, he thought puniſhing for opinions to be a mark which might ſerve him to know falſe opinions by.

Section 27. I believe throughout Antiquity you will find no putting any to death, unleſs it be ſuch as begin to kill firſt, (as the Circumcellians or ſuch like:) I am ſure Chriſtian Religion's chief glory being that it increaſed by being perſecuted, and having that advantage of the Mahumetan (which came in by force) methinks, De Regno. (eſpecially ſince Syneſius hath told us, and reaſon told men ſo before Syneſius, that τοῖς ἐναντίοις, τὴν συνεξάνλων ἕκαστον φθορέα, Every thing is deſtroyed by the contrary to what ſetled and compoſed it:). It ſhould be to take ill care of Chriſtianity, to ſeek to hold it up by Turkiſh means: at leaſt, it muſt breed doubts, that if the Religion had always remained the ſame, it would not be defended by ways ſo contrary to thoſe by which it was propagated.

Section 28. I deſire recrimination may not be uſed: for though it be true that Calvin hath done it, and the Church of England a little, (which is a little too much) for, Negare manifeſta non audeo, & excuſare immodica non poſſum, yet She, confeſſing She may err, is not ſo chargeable with any fault, as thoſe which pretend they cannot, (and ſo will be ſure never to mend it:) and beſides, I will be bound to defend no more than I have undertaken, which is, to give reaſons why the Church of Rome is fallible.

Section 29. I confeſs this opinion of damning ſo many, and this cuſtom of burning ſo many, this breeding up thoſe who know nothing elſe in any point of Religion, yet to be in readineſs to cry, To the fire with him, and, To Hell with him, (as Polybius ſaith in a certain furious Faction of an Army of ſeveral Nations, and conſequently Languages, μόνον τὸ ῥῆμα τοῦτο κοινῇ συνίεσαν, τὸ Βάλλε, All of them underſtood onely this word, Throw at him) this I ſay in my opinion, was it chiefly which made ſo many ſo ſuddenly leave the Church of Rome, that indeed, to borrow the Authour's phraſe, ὑ παρακλήσεως δεῆς ἔπραξαν, ἀλλὰ ἀγγέλε μόνον ἐδεήθεσαν —— They needed not perſuaſion to doe it, but onely news that others had begun: For, as this alone, if believed, makes all the reſt be ſo too; ſo one thing alone miſ-liked, (where Infallibility is claimed) overthrows alſo all the reſt.

Section 30. If it were granted that, becauſe it agrees not with the goodneſs of God to let men want an infallible Guide, therefore there muſt be one; and that the Church of Rome were that one; yet if that teach any thing, to my underſtanding, contrary to God's goodneſs, I am not to receive her doctrine, for the ſame cauſe for which they would have me receive it, (it being as good an argument; This Guide teaches things contrary to God's goodneſs, therefore is not appointed by God; as to ſay, It is agreeable to his goodneſs there ſhould be a Guide, therefore there is one.) And ſure it is lawfull to examine particular doctrines, whether they agree with that principle which is their foundation; and to that (methinks) to damn him that neither with negligence nor prejudication ſearcheth what is God's will, though he miſs of it, is as contrary as the firſt can be ſuppoſed.

Section 31. I would know, whether he that never heard of the Church of Rome, ſhall yet be damned for not believing her infallible. I have ſo good an opinion of them, as to aſſure my ſelf they will anſwer, he ſhall not. I will then ask, whether he that hath ſearched what Religions there are, and finds hers to be one, and her infallibility to be part of it, if his reaſon will not aſſent to that, ſhall he be damned for being inquiſitive after truth? (for he hath committed no other fault greater than the other) and Whether ſuch an ignorance (I mean after impartial ſearch) be not of all other the moſt invincible?

Section 32. Nay, grant the Church to be infallible, yet, methinks, he that denies it, and imploys his reaſon to ſeek if it be true, ſhould be in as good caſe as he that believes it, and ſearcheth not at all the truth of the propoſition he receives: for I cannot ſee why he ſhould be ſaved, becauſe, by reaſon of his Parents belief, or the Religion of the Country, or ſome ſuch accident, the truth was offered to his underſtanding, when had the contrary been offered, he would have received that; and the other damned that believes falſhood, upon as good ground as the other doth truth; unleſs the Church be like a Conjurer's circle, that will keep a man from the Devil, though he came into it by chance.

Section 33. They grant that no man is an Heretick, that believes not his Hereſie obſtinately; and if he be no Heretick, he may ſure be ſaved. It is not then certain damnation for any man to deny the infallibility of the Roman Church: but for him onely that denies it obſtinately, and then I am ſafe; for I am ſure I do not.

Section 34. Neither can they ſay, I ſhall be damned for Schiſm, though not for Hereſie; for he is as well no Schiſmatick, though in Schiſm, that is willing to joyn in communion with the true Church, when it appears to be ſo to him; as he is no Heretick, though he hold heretical opinions, that holds them not obſtinately, that is (as I ſuppoſe) with a deſire to be informed if he be in the wrong.

to

Why, if it be not neceſſary always to believe the truth, ſo one believe in general what the Church would have believed, (for ſo they excuſe great men that have held contrary opinions to theirs now, before they were defined, or they knew them to be ſo) why (I ſay) ſhall not the ſame implicit aſſent to whatſoever God would have aſſented to (though I miſtake what it is) be ſufficient? When indeed, to believe implicitly what God would have believed, is to believe implicitly likewiſe what the Church teacheth, if this doctrine be within the number of thoſe which God commands to be believed. Section 35.

I have therefore the leſs doubt of this opinion, that I ſhall have no harm for not believing the infallibility of the Church of Rome, becauſe of my being ſo far from leaning to the contrary, and ſo ſuffering my will to have power over my underſtanding, that if God would leave it to me, which Tenet ſhould be true, I would rather chooſe that that ſhould, than the contrary. For they may well believe me, that I take no pleaſure in tumbling hard and unpleaſant Books, and making my ſelf giddy with diſputing of obſcure queſtions, and dazled ὥσπερ οἱ ἐκ πυρὸς ὑφηλῆς ἀκροωτείας εἰς ἀχανὲς καταπίπτοντες πέλαγος, If I could believe, there ſhould always be (whom I might always know) a ſociety of men, whoſe opinions muſt be certainly true, and who would ὑφ' ἑαυτῶν ἅπαντα ἀγχινόως ἁλίσκεσθαι, labour to diſcuſs and define all ariſing doubts, ſo as I might be excuſably at eaſe, and have no part left for me but that of obedience, which muſt needs be a leſs difficult, and ſo a more agreeable way, than to endure endleſs volumes of commentaries, the harſh Greek of Epiphanius, and the as hard Latin of Irenæus, and be pained by diſtinguiſhing between different ſenſes and various lections; and he would deſerve not the loweſt place in Bedlam, that would prefer theſe ſtudies, before ſo many, ſo much more pleaſant; that would rather employ his underſtanding, than ſubmit it; and if he could think God impoſed upon him onely the reſiſting temptations, would, by way of addition, require from himſelf the reſolving of doubts. I ſay not that all theſe Books are to be read by thoſe who underſtand not the Languages; for them, I conceive, their ſeeking into Scripture may ſuffice. But if I have, by God's grace, skill to look into them, I cannot better uſe it than in the ſearch of his will, where they ſay it is to be found; that I might aſſent to them, if there I find reaſon for it; or if I do not, they may have no excuſe for not excuſing me. Section 37. Cæſarius. Syneſius.

For whereas they ſay, it is pride makes us doubt of their infallibility; I anſwer, that their too much lazineſs and impatience of examining, is the cauſe many of them do not doubt. Section 38.

Next, what pride is it, never to aſſent before I find reaſon for it? (ſince they, when they follow their Church as infallible, pretend reaſon for it, and will not ſay they would, if they thought they found none:) and if they ſay, we do find reaſon, but will not confeſs it, then pride hinders not our aſſent, but our declaration of it; which if it do in any one, he is without queſtion, αὐτοκατάκριτος, condemned by himſelf, and it muſt be a very partial advocate that would ſtrive to acquit him. Section 39.

One much prevailing argument which they make, is this; that whoſoever leave them, fall into diſſention between themſelves, whereas they in the mean while are always at unity. I anſwer, firſt, in this whereof the queſtion is now, they all conſent. Secondly, when there is fire for them that diſagree, they need not brag of their uniformity who conſent. Thirdly, they have many differences among them (as whether the Pope be infallible; Whether God predeterminate every action; Whether Election and Reprobation depend upon foreſight;) Which ſeem to me as great as any between their adverſaries; and in the latter, the Jeſuits have ancienter and more general Traditions on their ſide, than the Church of Rome hath in any other queſtion; and as much ground from reaſon for the defence of God's goodneſs, as they can think they have for the neceſſity of an infallible guide; yet theſe arguments muſt not make the Dominicans Hereticks, and muſt us. Section 40.

If they ſay, The Church hath not reſolved it (which ſignifies onely, that they are not agreed about it, which is that we object) I anſwer, It ought to have done, if conformity to the ancient Church be required; in which all that ever I could hear of before Saint Auſtin (who is very various I confeſs in it) delivered the contrary to the Dominicans, as not doubtfull; and to ſay, it is lawfull for them to diſagree whenſoever they do not agree, is ridiculous: for they cannot doe both at once about the ſame point. Section 41.

And if they ſay, they mean, by the Church's not having concluded it, that a Council hath not; I anſwer, Section 42. firſt, that they condemn ſome without any, and why not theſe? Next, I ſay that the opinion of the Diffuſed Church is of more force than the concluſion of a Repreſentative (which hath its authority from the other) and therefore if all extant for the firſt four hundred years taught any thing, it is more Hereſie to deny that, than any Canon of a Council.

But may not, howſoever, any other company of People (that would maintain themſelves to be infallible) ſay as much, that all other Sects differ from one another, and therefore ſhould all agree with them? Would thoſe not (think they) aſcribe all other mens diſſentions, and learned mens falling into divers Hereſies, to their not allowing their infallibility? to their not aſſenting to their Decrees? and not ſuffering them, διδασκάλους τῶν ζητουμένων καθίζεσθαι, τοὺς δὲ ἄλλους ἐν μαθηταῖς ποιεῖσθαι ὑπακούσεσθαι ἔχειν, to ſit as teachers of thoſe things that come in queſtion, and to have all others in that place of Diſciples obedient to them? which is that which Nilus, a Greek Biſhop, profeſſeth, that becauſe the Greeks would not allow the Romans, was the chief cauſe of ſeparation between them. Section 43.

They uſe much to object, How could errours come into the Church without oppoſition, and mention both of them, and the oppoſition to them in Hiſtory? I anſwer, they might come in not at once, but by degrees; as in the growth of a Child, and the motion of a Clock, we ſee neither in the preſent, but know there was a preſent when we find it paſt. Next, (ſo many Authours being loſt, who can make it certain to me, that from none of thoſe, we ſhould have had notice of this oppoſition, if they had come to us?) Next, I ſay, there are two ſorts of errours, to hold a thing neceſſary, that is unlawfull and falſe, or that is but profitable and probable: Of the ſecond ſort that errours ſhould come in, it appears not hard to me, and eſpecially in thoſe Ages where want of Printing made Books, and conſequently learning not ſo common as now it is; where the few that did ſtudy, buſied themſelves in School-ſpeculations onely; when the authority of a man of chief note had a more general influence than now it hath, and ſo (as Thucydides ſaith, Section 44.

the Plague did in his time, διέξῃ διὰ παντὸς τοῦ σώματος τὸ ἐν τῇ κεφαλῇ πρῶτον ἱδρυθὲν κακὸν, the diſeaſe that firſt ſetled in the head, eaſily paſſed through all the body] conſidering how apt all men are to deſire that all men ſhould think as they do, and conſequently, to lay a neceſſity upon the receiving that opinion, if they conceive that a way to have it received: And then if it were believed generally profitable, (as for example, Confeſſion) who would be apt to oppoſe their calling it neceſſary, for the ſame cauſe for which they called it ſo? Beſides, if this errour were delivered by ſome Father in the hot oppoſition of ſome Heretick, it may be, none of his ſide would oppoſe it, leſt the adverſaries might take advantage by their diſſention, and he that diſputed for the Orthodox ſide, might loſe by it much of his authority.

Section 45. The word [neceſſary] it ſelf is often uſed for very convenient; and then, from neceſſary in that ſenſe, to abſolutely neceſſary, is no difficult change, though it be a great one. The Fathers uſe *Heretick*s ſometimes in a large ſenſe, and ſometimes in a ſtricter, and ſo differ in the reckoning them up; Some leaving out thoſe that others put in (though they had ſeen the precedent Catalogue:) and ſo the doubtfulneſs of the ſenſe of thoſe words might bring in errour. Names alſo, as [an] Altar, Sacrifice, Maſs, may have been uſed firſt in one ſenſe; and the name retained, though the thing ſignified received change; which may have been the art of the Church of Rome, as it was once of an Emperour of Rome, Cui proprium fuit nuper reperta (I leave out Scelera) priſcis verbis obtegere, whoſe property it was to cover things newly found out, with ancient terms. And the ſame Authour tells us, that the ſame State was as it were cheated out of her liberty, becauſe there did remain, Eadem Magiſtratuum vocabula, The ſame titles of Magiſtrates; and I believe, that if the Proteſtants beyond the Seas would have thought Biſhops as good a word as Superintendents, (and ſo in other ſuch things) many, who underſtand nothing but names, would have miſſed the ſcandal they have now taken.

Section 46. Theſe ways (I think) things may have come, without much oppoſition, from being thought profitable to be done, and probable to be believed, to be thought neceſſary to be both: and how many things little by little may have been received under old names, which would not have been ſo at once under new ones it is not hard to conceive. (The firſt of theſe being no ſuch ſmall fault, but that part of the Montaniſts hereſie was, thinking uncommanded faſting-daies neceſſary to be obſerved, which without doubt might lawfully have been kept, ſo that no neceſſity had been impoſed.)

Section 47. But my main anſwer is, that if for an opinion to be in the Church without known precedent oppoſition, be a certain note of being received from the beginning; let them anſwer, how came in the opinion of the Chiliaſts, not contradicted till two hundred years after it came in.

Section 48. To conclude, if they can prove that the Scripture may be a certainer teacher of truths to them than to us, ſo that they may conclude the infallibility of the Church out of it, and we nothing; If they can prove the Churches infallibility to be a ſufficient Guide for him that doubts which is the Church, and cannot examine that (for want of learning) by her chief mark, which is conformity with the Ancient; If they can prove that the conſent of Fathers long together (if they had it) is a ſtronger argument againſt us, than againſt the Dominicans; If they can prove, that though the firſt of them affirm that ſuch a thing is Tradition, and believed by all Chriſtians (and this aſſertion till a great while after uncontradicted) yet they are not bound to receive it, and, upon leſs grounds, we are; if indeed any can prove by any infallible way the infallibility of the Church of Rome, and the neceſſity under pain of damnation for all men to believe it, (which were the more ſtrange, becauſe Juſtin Martyr, and Clemens Alexandrinus among the Ancients, and Eraſmus and Ludovicus Vives among the Moderns, believe ſome Pagans to be ſaved) I will ſubſcribe to it, And

Sophoc. Ὅστις εὔνους τῇδε τῇ πόλει, θανὼν
Καὶ ζῶν ὁμοίως ἐξ ἐμοῦ τιμήσεται.

Section 49. If any man ſhall vouchſafe to think either this, or the Authour of it, of value enough to confute the one, and enform the other, I ſhall deſire him to doe it with proceeding to the buſineſs, and not ſtanding upon any ſmall ſlip of mine, (of which ſort this may be full) and with that civility which is fit to be uſed by men that are not ſo paſſionate, as to have the definition of reaſonable Creatures in vain; (remembring that truth, in likelihood, is where her Authour God was, in the ſtill voice, and not in the loud wind; And that Epiphanius excuſeth himſelf, if he have called any Hereticks in his anger, Deceivers, or Wretches, εἰ παροξυνόμενός τι λέγω ἀπατεῶνας καλῶν ἢ ἀθλίους) and I requeſt him alſo to help to bring me to the Truth, (if I be out of it) not onely by his Arguments, but alſo by his Prayers: which ways, if he uſe, and I ſtill continue on the part I am of, and yet do neither ἑκὼν ψευδώνυμον, nor ὁρῶν ἀναισχυντεῖν, neither am wilfully blind, nor deny impudently what I ſee, then I am confident that neither he will have reaſon to be offended with me in this world, nor God (for that) to puniſh me in the next.

FALKLAND.

A VIEW

A VIEW of the EXCEPTIONS, Which have been made by A ROMANIST TO THE L. Viſc. Falkland's Diſcourſe OF THE INFALLIBILITY OF THE CHURCH of ROME.

SEPTEMB. 11. 1645.

THIS day there came to my hands, A Treatiſe Apologetical, touching the Infallibility of the Church Catholick, in anſwer to another of the like argument lately publiſhed. And although I have no temptation to ſpend any more time upon it, than a ſingle reading hath coſt me; nor to think it ſo dangerous a piece, that I ſhould not venture it abroad with the weakeſt Sons of my Mother, without an appendant antidote, or defenſative againſt the poiſon of it, eſpecially being not obliged (in any other notion, than that of the reſpect I bear to the honour and memory of that noble Lord) to vindicate his Diſcourſe from the exceptions here offer'd; yet being not ſure, that I can excuſe the ſo exceſſive thrift of a few hours (which yet I could very gladly otherwiſe employ, than in drawing one end of a ſaw in a controverſie of this nature) I ſhall give the Authour of the Exceptions or Apology, (in as few words as is poſſible) the reaſons why I am not moved by them, much leſs perſuaded that they are ſo extraordinarily lucky, as to give, as is pretended, full anſwer, to all that Maſter Chillingworth's large Book hath ſuperſtructed on this foundation. And this I ſhall doe in ſuch a manner, that it may appear, that I deſire onely to ſatisfie his reaſon, and not make him payment of his ſcoffs or triumphs, in that ſpirit of meekneſs, which is proper for the reſtoring of one overtaken in an errour, (hoping in charity that he is ſuch) of an infirm, not a malicious miſtaker. And the firſt thing we have to view, is that which is entituled. A

A Note upon the Title of the Adverſary's. C. 1.

We againſt whom this Enquirer writes, or rather to whom he propounds his difficulties, with a pretending deſire of procuring a ſatisfaction, are defenders of the Catholick Churches Infallibility; which Churches chief Paſtour, or Metropolitan, though he be particular Biſhop of Rome, as of ſome one place or other he muſt be, yet nevertheleſs from that one portion of it, is not the whole and universal Church aptly to be styled the Church of Rome, as in the Enquirer's Title it is called, no more than the Church of England can be rightly termed the Church of Canterbury, or the Protestants of England the Canterburians, as the Scotch Puritans have called them, onely because the chief Bishop and Primate of the whole Kingdom hath his seat at Canterbury. By the self same reason then cannot we justly be called Romanists, as it hath pleased some Protestants to entitle us. The reason of this assertion, is, That Rome and Canterbury are but small, and onely material portions of either Church, and therefore no way sufficient to give a denomination to the whole. As then the Church of England is wrongfully called the Church of Canterbury, so, in like manner is the Church Catholick wrongfully styled the Church of Rome, or as such, controverted to be fallible, or infallible, forasmuch as this perfection of being infallible is not claimed by her as she is Church of Rome, but as she is the Catholick, and, according to the appointment of Christ, governed by St. Peter, and his Successours. For this cause we have altered the Title, and stated the question in terms more proper and formal, enquiring not whether the Roman Church, but whether the Catholick be infallible, and this ought to be the Title.

But before we enter upon the examination of particular difficulties, the Reader may please to know, that this same Enquiry was written by the Authour diverse years agoe, in his Catholick Mother's life-time, and was by her mediation forthwith answered at large, and the answer sent unto the Enquirer fairly bound up; in whose hands, though it rested long, yet had it never any reply made unto it, though it was sometime threatned it should. At that very time Chillingworth's Book began to be in moulding, and it may be, that same new labour diverted the Enquirer, and altered his design. Now at length in a time most unseasonable, by the frivolous officiousness of I know not whom, these old papers are forced to see the light, and to leave their answer behind them. After so mean and creeping a fashion do they appear now unto the world. But although no notice hath been taken of any answer made already, or of giving licence for any other to be made hereafter, or, if made to be published in print, and have the advantage to be dispersed abroad in many Copies; yet are we not by this discouraged from composing one; for, though for want of the Printer's help, it shall lie concealed, and in much restraint, yea, and be in danger to perish, as the other did before it, yet may this small labour fall, at least, into some few hands, and remove out of their way such dangerous stumbling-blocks as have been cast into it by this Enquirer, who, by his casting of doubts, about the method of resolving faith, hath thereby, amongst all those who are not much versed therein, endangered the stability and safety of the whole fabrick, not of Catholick Religion onely, but of Christian in general.

As for the Papers themselves, and their particular contents, they, in a word, are Chillingworth's Book in little, and an Embryo of his large volume grown up after, made big and bolstered out with many new materials borrowed from Baron the Scotch Minister, and that impious Authour Volkelius, the veins of whose poisonous doctrines and discourses, are observed to run branching throughout all Chillingworth's work. Wherefore this small collection containing the substance of the other larger Book, the confutation of this Enquirer's allegations, cannot but in substance contain a confutation of all Chillingworth's delated errours and sophistications, wherewith so many souls have been perverted, or brought into great troubles and perplexities.

C. 1. Answer to C. 1.

To the Exceptions made against the Title of the Lord Viscount Falkland's Discourse, I answer, by saying these few things,

Section 1. First, That it is no news to hear of the Catholick Roman Church; it hath frequently been used and avowed by your own Writers, and, as I conceive, is by your self acknowledged, when you say, the perfection of being infallible is not claimed by her (i. e. the Church Catholick) as she is the Church of Rome, but as she is the Catholick; which words by the rules of discourse must suppose you to think the Catholick Church to be capable of a double appellation, Roman and Catholick, though the perfection there spoken of, belong to it onely under the second notion. And beside, you say in another place, that the Roman Church is the Catholick;

B. whence it will follow, that the Catholick is the Roman; And if this be not propriety of speech, his Lordship is not to be blamed for it, but you, whose dialect he is fain to use.

Section 2. This then being presumed to be granted by your Writers, and, as I conceive, also by you, that the Roman Church is the Catholick Church, or that the Roman and Catholick are two names for the same Church, it will certainly follow, that he that affirms the Catholick Church to be infallible, must affirm the Roman Church to be so too, though not quatenus Roman. For any particular man being affirmed to be a Christian, whatsoever will be true to be said of this Christian, will be true to be said of this man (by the

C. rule of quicquid prædicatur de prædicato, prædicatur de subjecto) if this Christian have a promise made, a privilege instated on him, this man hath so also, and if any that yielded the former, shall deny the latter, it will never be sufficient ground or authority for such denying, to affirm, that it was made to him as a Christian, and not as a man; for the whole man being a Christian, and not onely some part of him, even that which belongs to him onely for Christianities sake, doth as truly belong to him, as that which his humanity gives him title to.

Section 3. Or secondly, If you have sprang a subtlety, and by help of that, mean to disclaim the expression of other your friends, and therefore will not allow the Roman Church to be, in propriety of speech, the Catholick Church, and yet will agree with them in all but in the expression; truly you have revealed no great mystery to the world. And as long as you define (as you do) the Catholick Church, (as it is the subject of the pretended Infallibility) to be that which is governed by Saint Peter and his Successours, we that mean no more by the Roman Church than that which is so governed, shall assoon believe the Roman Church to be infallible, as the Catholick under your notion of it.

Section 4. The short of it is, we shall never agree upon any thing till the equivocal terms be explicated, and one single sense of this, as of all other phrases, agreed on betwixt both parties. Tell us then plainly, that by the Catholick Church you mean the Universal all the world over, without any kind of restriction, and not that onely which is governed by the Pope of Rome, which is a great restriction of the word Catholick, (and must be not onely affirmed but proved by you to be none) And then I shall thus far consent with you;

First,

Section 5. First, That the Universal Church is in fundamentals infallible (not from any thing inherent in it self, but by a prerogative acquired, i. e. by the promise of Christ, that his spirit shall lead them into all truth, and that he will be with them to the end of the world, and the like;) but then this Infallibility must signifie no more, or be no farther extended, than that Christ doth and will so defend his Church, that there shall be for ever, till the end of the world, a Church Christian on the Earth, i. e. that the whole Church shall not at once make an universal defection, err from the foundation, or doe any thing by which there shall cease to be a Church on earth.

Section 6. But then secondly, I say that this very Universal Church, though it be in this sense infallible in fundamentals, is not yet a Rule, or Canon, or Guide, or Judge infallible, even in fundamentals; visible it is, infallible it is, but 'tis not a visible Judge, or rule infallible. And the reason of this assertion is this, that its Infallibility, explained as we have explain'd it, is all that can be certainly inferred from Christ's words, (and that belongs not at all to judicature) and so any other Infallibility that shall be pretended to belong to judicature, must be inferred from some other tenure, or else it will not be inferred.

Section 7. If you cannot be thus liberal to us, and tell us that by Catholick in this question, you mean that Catholick without restriction; Tell us then secondly, that you mean a representation of that Catholick, i. e. a Council General, Oecumenical, and then I shall acknowledge many privileges to belong to that; An humble, though not an absolute obedience, and in a word, that nothing is to be preferred before it, but the Word of God, or the Church truly Universal. Yet after all this, that it is not infallible, or inerrable, I have the judgment of Panormitan, and shall add his reason also to back it; Because, saith he, * the General Council is not truly, but onely by representation, the Universal Church, and supposing such a Council to err, it would not yet follow, that the Universal Church or multitude of all Christian's do err, because 'tis possible that some out of the Council do not err, yea, and in the Council too, though a major part overcome the better. In this I have the concurrence of Occam. dial. p. 3. tr. 1. l. 3. c. 5. Cardin. Cameracensis, *c.*1. Waldensis Doctrin. fid. l. 2. artic. 3. c. 26. & quest. vesp. arg. 3. ad lit. O. Antoninus, *to.*1. de sacram. l. 2. c. 19. Card. Cusanus in summarum par. 3. tit. 23. de concil. general. c. 2. sect. 6. l. 2. Concord Cathol. c. 4. Et Nic. de Clemangis, Collat. 2. p. 64, & 73. with this farther confirmation of it from the opinion of the † Ancient Fathers, evidenced by their practice; In that (saith he) it was solemnly accustomed by them at the beginning of such a Council, by fasting and praying to implore the assistence of the Spirit, which had been a piece of useless diligence, if they had been before assured, that they could not be deceived or fail in those things for which they were assembled. Which argument, if it do not infallibly induce the conclusion to those that pray for those things which they are sure of; yet is it an evidence, that they that use it, are of the opinion which they infer by it, and will be of force to those, that from the mention of some of the Ancients praying for the dead, conclude them to be in a mutable state; as I conceive some of your friends are wont to do. To this assertion of ours I might also cite the Concordance of the Jesuits generally, who that they may fasten all infallibility in the Pope alone, attribute nothing at all to a Council but this, that the errour of a Council cannot be confirmed by the Pope, which is in effect no more, than that Councils begin to be infallible, when the Pope confirms them, i. e. when the Council is at an end, (which kind of Infallibility they will afford, I presume, to every Heretick (and to me while I thus write) that my errour cannot be confirmed by the Pope) unless they will be so bountifull to add also, that such a Council cannot err, if it follow the instructions of the Pope, which will also be acknowledged true of any the meanest Lutheran, or Calvinist, as well as of that Council.

* Licet concilium generale repræsentet totam ecclesiam Universalem, tamen in veritate ibi non est verè Universalis ecclesia, sed repræsentativè, quia Universalis ecclesia constituitur ex collectione fidelium, & ista est ea ecclesia quæ errare non potest. C. significasti. ext. de Electio.

† Antiquis patribus concilium celebraturis solenne fuit jejuniis, orationibus, spiritus assistentiam implorare; inutili sanè diligentiâ, si exploratum habebant se non posse falli aut deficere in his propter quæ fuerant congregati.

Section 8. If neither of these two be it you mean, then be ingenuous, and tell us, you either mean the Pope of Rome, as the Jesuits do, or else that you mean those parts of the Catholick that are governed by him, and then as we shall tell you, that it is the very thing which we learn't from you to mean by the Roman Church, so you that affirm that to be the notion of the Catholick Church, must acknowledge to affirm the same thing to be Infallible, which we say you do affirm, when we propose the Question of the Roman Churches Infallibility; and in this there is no matter of deceit or difficulty, but that that Church under the government of the Pope, which we affirm to be fallible, even in the highest degree, fallible in fundamentals, you undertake and contest to be infallible. 'Tis true, this we call the Roman Church, conceiving it to be your Dialect, and if you say it is not, we will consent to you, and in obedience to your example, call it so no more; on condition you will be but as reasonable, and give it some other title; whether that of the Western Church, which were a good large Province, (and yet of that Saint Basil complains in no lower style than this, That they neither know nor endure the unity of Faith) Ep. 10. or any other title, besides that of the Catholick Church, which we are sure cannot properly be allow'd it, unless it appear, First, that all Christians ought to be govern'd by the Bishop of Rome; and Secondly, that all they which are not so governed, are no longer members of the Catholick Church; and if you affirm both these, we profess to deny them, and then that must be the matter of debate; and till that be agreed, there will be no other question seasonable, to be proposed in this matter, and when it is, there will be no other needfull.

Section 9. And for the parallel of the Canterburians, which you use to prove the unfitness of the question under these terms, it is but a thin fallacy, (easily seen through) if it be thought to conclude any thing. To the clearing of which, be pleased to observe, that the Bishop of Canterbury may be considered in a three-fold relation: First, to his particular Diocess of Canterbury, of which he is Bishop; Secondly, to the whole Province of Canterbury, of which he is Metropolitan; Thirdly, to the whole National Church of England, of which he is Primate; his two former relations are terminated in Canterbury, under the two significations of the word, but the third is terminated not in Canterbury, in any notion of that word, but in all England; and thence it follows, that the Church of Canterbury (whether as a Province, or a Diocess, which are the onely two Notions we in England have of it) being not of the same latitude with the Church of England, it will be improper to call the Protestants of England, Canterburians: But then on supposition that there were a third notion of it, whereby the Church of Canterbury, and the Church of England were of the same latitude, or to him that were confidently persuaded that they are so, it were no impropriety at all to call all Engliſh Proteſtants by that denomination; and if to prove it were improper, it ſhould be affirmed that 'tis but an accident that he that is Primate of all England ſhould be Biſhop of the particular See of Canterbury, there would be no force in that proof; Firſt, becauſe that which is true per accidens, is nevertheleſs true, and denominations being ad placitum, are many times accidental, yet for all that, denominations as much, as if they had been by nature or per ſe; and Secondly, becauſe we are now upon a ſuppoſition (though it be but a ſuppoſition) that there is a National Church of Canterbury, as well as a Province and Dioceſs. And therefore I ſay, on this ſuppoſition, if it had ſo happened, or been agreed on, that all that are under the Primate of Canterbury, ſhould be called the Church of Canterbury, as it hath been agreed on, that all that are under the Metropolitan of Canterbury, ſhould be called the Province of Canterbury, we ſhould never challenge any man of improper ſpeaking, that ſhould call us Canterburians. As for the Scotch Puritan you ſpeak of, that calls us ſo by way of reproach; you cannot be ignorant of his meaning, or think it pertinent to the purpoſe, to which you apply it; It was uſed by him onely in relation to the preſent doctrines of the then Biſhop of Canterbury, (and onely ſome men ſcoffed at under that title, as followers of his (as they erroneouſly conceived) particular, or perſonal doctrines) which is quite another notion of the word, than that which you have occaſion to ſpeak of.

Section 10. From all this it will conſequently appear to be as unreaſonable for you, who acknowledge a notion of the Roman Church equipollent with Catholick, and affirm the whole Catholick Church to be govern'd by the Primate, or Pope of Rome, and urge the neceſſity of Chriſt's precept, that the Church which you pronounce infallible, muſt be ſo governed, (or elſe that it is no longer Catholick) to make any difference between the ſtyle of Catholick, and of Roman Church, or of Catholicks and Romaniſts; no man among us fetching the denomination of Roman, or Romaniſt (when he thus ſpeaks) from the relative Dioceſs of Rome, as the Pope is a Biſhop, or from the relative Province of Rome, as he is a Metropolitan, but from the relative Church of Rome, the whole number of thoſe Chriſtians who acknowledge the Pope their Primate or Patriarch, which you that affirm him to be Primate of all Chriſtians by full right and ſucceſſion from Saint Peter, muſt acknowledge him to be of the whole Catholick Church; In which acknowledgment becauſe we agree not with you (but contend that his Patriarchate is limited as well as his Dioceſs or Province) as we cannot therefore ſpeak throughout in your language, and call that the Catholick Church, which is but a part of the Catholick, or debate the Infallibility of the Catholick Church with them, that mean by that phraſe onely thoſe that are under the Roman Communion, or government of the Pope of Rome, whilſt we mean Catholick without any reſtriction, (or if we ſhould ſo ſpeak, ſhall be guilty of leaving a main equivocation in the words of the queſtion, which ought of all things to be avoided by diſtinguiſhing, before we go about to debate any thing; and after diſtinction made and greed on, that by Catholick is to be meant onely thoſe which are in obedience to the Pope, we will then debate it under that title alſo;) ſo may we very reaſonably uſe your dialect, when we agree in the meaning of it, as in the phraſe [Roman Church] we do (meaning both of us, all thoſe who are govern'd by the Pope) of which Church in that notion we now enquire, whether that be infallible or no? And ſo much for the phraſe of the Queſtion, or Title of that Treatiſe.

Section 11. And then I ſhall add no more to the ſecond part of the firſt Chapter, than by acknowledging the Treatiſe of that excellent Lord to have been written many years ſince, and now not unſeaſonably publiſh't at a time when ſome arts were uſed (though, bleſſed be God, improſperouſly) to pervert unſtable minds, and this pretended Infallibility a main auxiliary call'd in for that purpoſe; As for any anſwer long ſince framed to it, I am perſuaded that that Lord thought it not ſuch, as that his reputation ſhould be concerned in providing an anſwer for it; And for the Publiſher 'tis very poſſible that he might never hear of any ſuch, (which I gueſs alſo by my ſelf, who had long ſince a copy of the one, but till I read it here, never heard of the other,) or if he did, had reaſons which he could juſtify to any ingenuous man, why he did not publiſh it alſo. Which being now ſaid to you (and which you had before no ground of thinking to be otherwiſe) you will hardly give a civil account, why you ſhould charge (and now not ask pardon for charging) on the Publiſher a frivolous officiouſneſs, by which that anſwer is forced to ſtay behind (though it were alſo ſufficient to tell you, that when you ſet out all your Books at Rome or Doway, with our anſwers annext to them, we will then publiſh this of yours at Oxford) or on the Edition, the ſtyle of a mean and creeping faſhion of appearing to the world; which words being ſo contrary to truth, (which is punctually this, the Book was licenſed by the Vicechancellour; Printed by the Printer to the Univerſity; The Authour's name put in the Title page; and all this proclaimed on every wall and corner of the City, on purpoſe that every one that had kindneſs to the Roman Church might reade it) if they ſignifie any thing, have onely this interpretation of which they are capable, that he that wrote them cared not how abſolutely groundleſs his accuſation was, but onely was willing to accuſe.

Section 12. What you mean by the next words, [that no notice hath been taken of giving licence for any other anſwer to be made hereafter, or if made to be publiſhed in print, and have the advantage to be diſperſed abroad in many copies.]

D. I profeſs I cannot tell; and yet was inſolent enough to think, that I could have conſtrued a piece of Engliſh, of which I underſtood every word ſingle; but now find, I had overvalued my own abilities, and ſhould be more modeſt hereafter, but that by finding in the * ſixth line of the Book the nominative Metropolitan without any verb after it, I am inclined to think that it is part of your ſtyle to neglect thoſe vulgar rules in which they had been inſtructed.

* The place to which theſe words reply, are upon this admonition mended by the Apologiſt in his reviſal, by putting in after the word [Metropolitan] theſe words [is the Pope, who] and two lines after inſtead of [it] [His Dioceſs.] He might as reaſonably have mended the other alſo.

Section 13. E. As for the ſad news that you acquaint us with, [that this other anſwer of yours ſhall lie concealed, and in much reſtraint, yea and be in danger to periſh] Though that be a heavy aggravation of the miſery of theſe wicked times, yet ſure this Paper is not the onely ſufferer in that kind, and may both be thought to have deſerved it as well, and be as able to bear it with ſome patience, as many other good ſons of the Church Catholick have been; and yet if it will but ſue out its habeas Corpus, I doubt not but the law will be open for its plea, and in the mean I have deſigned this preſent Paper to offer it bail, and obtain its enlargement through through this City, ſo it will promiſe faithfully not to go farther, than its ſurety is ready to attend it. By this means, if it be accepted, it ſhall have leave to viſit all its Catholick friends, and others to whom it deſires to perform any civility, or from whom to receive any kindneſs.

In the mean, how his Lordſhip's Treatiſe [hath caſt dangerous ſtumbling-blocks, which may endanger the ſtability and ſafety not onely of Catholick Religion, but of Chriſtian in general] I ſhall promiſe to conſider with you, when you proceed to any proof of it; and till then, onely adviſe you and all my fellow Chriſtians, to conclude no more againſt any Creature, than you produce premiſſes to juſtify; For by ſo doing, you will appear not onely injurious to him with whom you deal, (in raſh cauſeleſs anger and cenſure) and ſecretly reproachfull and contumelious to the Reader (by conceiving him ſo tame, ſo unworthy of the reaſonable ſoul, which God hath given him, on purpoſe to diſtinguiſh betwixt reaſon and no reaſon, betwixt proof and libel, betwixt argument and confidence) but withall you will teach others an evil leſſon againſt your ſelves. If you pleaſe I ſhall give you an Example of each of theſe. Section 14.

That which you add in the bottom of the Chapter concerning Maſter Chillingworth's Book, beſides that it is utterly impertinent to the confuting of this, which is the preſent buſineſs (nay it is an argument on this ſide, both for the ſeaſonableneſs of publiſhing it (as an Epitome uſefull and gainfull to ſuperſede the trouble of reading the larger Book) and for the leaving the former anſwer behind, if the Publiſher had known there had been any; becauſe, as you before intimated, the publiſhing of Maſter Chillingworth's Book then, was conceived to have taken away all force and conſiderableneſs from that anſwer) is firſt, very unjuſt to Maſter Chillingworth, in ſaying without any proof, that he borrowed his new materials from Baron and Volkelius. Secondly, it is contumelious to the Reader's judgment, who is ſuppoſed to be ſo eaſy, as to conclude that to be an ill Book, which is affirmed to borrow materials from a Scotch Miniſter, and an impious Authour; from which contumely I conceive he is able to vindicate himſelf, by telling you, Firſt, that what is ſuppoſed to be borrowed from the Scotch Miniſter, is very authentique Engliſh Divinity; and indeed, that Baron is content to profeſs himſelf to have borrowed (and that in this particular) from our Writers, eſpecially (if my memory fail me not) from Biſhop White, and the firſt edition of the Biſhop of Canterbury's Book under his Chaplain's name, from whom alſo Maſter Chillingworth might borrow, if he were in any want, and not from him; and yet, I believe, would not, if he were alive, be aſhamed to have profited by ſo worthy a Scotchman as Baron was. Secondly, that Volkelius his being an impious Authour, cannot extend to every part of his work, nor conclude, that that which is ſuppoſed to be borrowed from him, is therefore impious or poiſonous (if it be, let it be produced and proved to be ſo, by ſome other proof, than that of the impiety of the Authour) but rather, that Maſter Chillingworth had the skill of diſcerning, and took nothing but balſome, and antidote, where if he had been apt to miſtake, he might have faln on poyſon. Thirdly, this will teach others, if they be apt to learn, an evil leſſon againſt your ſelves; I mean not that of repaying evil with evil (God forbid that any injuſtice in others, ſhould ſo provoke us, ἐξομοιοῦσθαι, to be like them) but onely this particular leſſon, which hath coſt us little pains to peirce or conſtrue, that if this Tract of yours be a ſatisfactory anſwer to all Maſter Chillingworth's Book, then a ſatisfactory anſwer to this your Treatiſe, will be ſufficient anſwer alſo to the three great Latin Volumes, which they ſay, you have written againſt Maſter Chillingworth. And this I ſhall be more glad to have obtained by your own rule of concluding, than patient to try by reading them over, whether it be truly ſo, or no; eſpecially if thoſe that have taſted them, paſs a right judgment upon them. Section 15.

Thus far I have given my ſelf ſcope to take up almoſt every word you ſay in your firſt Chapter, but am unwilling to think, that thereby I am engaged to doe the like in all that follows, Truly upon reading on, I ſee the ſubtilty of compoſure, and the particulars incident are not of ſuch weight, as that I can promiſe my ſelf patience to examine it ſo ſtrictly; I mean not patience, as it is oppoſed to anger or paſſion (for by God's help I ſhall not yield to any temptation, that ſhall bring me into that) but as it is oppoſed to wearineſs and laſſitude; and I muſt be pardon'd, if I think I could ſpend my time better to my ſelf and the benefit of others, than in following the Exceptions line by line, and giving them a large anſwer; for that any man may be patient to doe ſo, or to reade it when 'tis done, it is neceſſary, that the Text, which muſt bear that Comment, muſt have ſomewhat either of difficulty, or ſubtilty, or profit in it; either of which, whenſoever I can find, I profeſs I ſhall be moſt ready to enlarge upon it, (and now acknowledge it an obligation from the Authour, if he will point out to me, where I ſhall have fail'd) and in other particulars be more mercifull to the Reader, and my ſelf. Section 16.

To the firſt Section Chap. 2.

True it is, and we grant it willingly, that every proof that is ſolid and good, muſt be, à notioribus, and that every ſure concluſion muſt alſo be deduced from no other premiſſes or principles, than ſuch as be known, and, at leaſt, be as certain as we deſire the concluſion ſhould be. Nevertheleſs we do abſolutely deny, that this aſſertion of ours touching the Churches infallibility, is by us offered to be proved by ways no better than our Adverſaries offer to prove that ſhe hath erred, as this Inquirer pretends we do; for we affirm that our Churches infallibility is proved by reaſons which are real and true, and that on the other ſide, the Adverſary offers to prove the contrary, onely by ſuch as be no more than ſeeming and pretended. Now true reaſon or authority is a way quite different from pretended, and much better than it, and therefore the Inquirer's charge is falſe, or, at leaſt, light and ineffectual. Muſt all controverſies in Philoſophy be undecidable, becauſe both ſides pretend reaſon; or no ſuits of Law be judged, becauſe both ſides pretend Law? Certainly, whatſoever both ſides do pretend, yet there is but one ſide that hath it, as namely, but one ſide of Philoſophers have true reaſon, and but one ſide of contendents have true Law, and ſo in like manner but one ſide of contending Chriſtians have true reaſon for them, Scripture, or Tradition, howſoever both may pretend it, and therefore we do not go about to prove the Church is infallible by the ſelf-ſame ways that you go about to prove that ſhe hath erred, but by ways that are quite different from them, and the ſame but in name onely, and no farther; By which it follows, that, either you are deceived, or we, and it is not neceſſary that both. And ſo much for this great and principal difficulty which troubled the Inquirer ſo much as he writ to London for the ſolution of it, which thing, ſurely, was more Section 1.

than needed, for it might have been done at Great Tue without conſulting London about it, or either of our two Univerſities.

We do not maintain, as he falſely ſuppoſes, that Reaſon, Scripture, and Fathers be all fallible, univerſally ſpeaking, but, in ſome caſes onely, as, namely, reaſon is not fallible in ſuch verities as be evident, but in other that be not ſo, it is. Again, Scripture is a moſt certain rule whenſoever it is certainly expounded, otherwiſe it is not. Laſtly, the Fathers be aſſured and undoubted witneſſes of the Doctrines which were held in their time, though not undoubted definers of them. And, by this anſwer, all the three main props of this Authour's diſcourſe are overthrown, and fall unto the ground *.

* In this place the Apologiſt in his reviſal put in theſe words [So that in fine all theſe three be infallible] I muſt a little wonder, to what purpoſe. For if they belong to the words immediately precedent, they will then ſignify, that the three props of his Lordſhip's diſcourſe are infallible. But if to the former part of the Section to ſignify Reaſon, &c. to be infallible, they are then either to be underſtood, that they are infallible in all caſes, and then that is point-blank contrary to what he had ſaid [that they were fallible in ſome] or elſe that they are infallible onely in ſome; and then that he had ſaid diſtinctly before, and needed not to have again anew repeated.

Chap. 2. Anſw. to the ſecond Chapter.

Section 1. To the ſecond Chapter, I need onely to put you in mind, that when his Lordſhip ſaith [the ways of proof that the Church of Rome can never have any errours, are no better than thoſe by which we offer to prove ſhe hath erred, and nameth three heads of Arguments, from Scripture, Reaſon, and ancient Writers, and proveth you to affirm all theſe are fallible, becauſe nothing is in your opinion infallible but the Church; and from thence concludes that we can never infallibly know that the Church is infallible, becauſe all the means propoſed to induce that knowledge, being of neceſſity ſomewhat elſe beſide that onely infallible, muſt needs be fallible] it will be very inſufficient in you to reply, that his Lordſhip hath not ſaid true in the firſt particular, upon no other ground of proof, but onely becauſe you [affirm that the Churches infallibility is proved by Reaſons which are really true, and that the contrary is by us offered to be prov'd onely by ſuch as be onely ſeeming and pretended] for this very thing that you affirm, viz. that thoſe your Reaſons are real and true, is a part of the very queſtion in hand, and as much denied by us, as the infallibility of your Church, and therefore, by your own rule of proceeding à notioribus, cannot be proper means to conclude, that his Lordſhip erred, to him that will far more eaſily be brought to believe, that your Reaſons are not real, than that his Lordſhip erred in this particular, and that will as readily confeſs he errs, as that thoſe Reaſons are real.

Section 2. It appeared ſtrange to me that you ſhould begin with ſuch a petitio principii, untill by reading on, I diſcerned that this one mean Sophiſm hath run through moſt Paragraphs of your following Treatiſe, which is a ſhrewd infirmity in a confutation, to take that for a principle granted, and ſo beſtow no proof upon it, which is by you known to be denied by us, and yet to conceive that this will be able to ſatisfy our other importunities.

Section 3. Secondly, You muſt obſerve that his Lordſhip had ſaid onely this, [that your Churches infallibility is offered to be proved by no better ways, than thoſe by which we offer to prove ſhe hath erred] which is an undertaking of his Lordſhip, and not a bare aſſertion, and ſure you cannot ſay he offers to prove it by reaſons onely ſeeming, for you as yet know not particularly, what thoſe reaſons are, any farther, than that they are from the ſame heads, by which you offer to prove the contrary.

Section 4. And thirdly, if the Arguments which he offers, be onely ſeeming on his ſide, yet if you mark it, they are ſo ſeeming to him, and as long as they ſeem to him to conclude that the Church hath erred, the very ſame Arguments, or thoſe that are no more ſeeming, cannot aſſure him, that ſhe is infallible; for by your own confeſſion, every ſolid proof muſt be ex notioribus, i. e. not onely by media which are more true, but which are more known to him, to whom this proof is offered; and, if you mark, that is it to which his Lordſhip's argument drives, that the reaſons by which you prove the infallibility of your Church, are ſuch as you confeſs your ſelves to be fallible: Mark, not which you confeſs to be falſe, but fallible; your confeſſing them fallible is enough to his Lordſhip's turn, though they ſhould have the luck to be true, becauſe the infallibility of your Church, on which, as on a foundation and principle, you muſt build in many after-difficulties, had need be infallibly aſſerted and known, or if it be but fallably, will it ſelf be fallible (no concluſion aſcending higher, than the premiſſes have aſcended) and ſo, though it were true, yet not fit to commence a principle of all other truths.

Section 5. Now that theſe reaſons or premiſſes of yours are fallible and by you acknowledged to be ſo, his Lordſhip was not content to affirm, (and ſo is himſelf far enough from giving you example of begging the queſtion) but proves it by this argument, becauſe with you nothing is not infallible but the Church. This may be diſſolved into an hypothetical ſyllogiſm, whereof you muſt deny one propoſition, or elſe the concluſion in forfeited. If with you the Church be the onely infallible, then with you any other reaſons, by which you prove the infallibility of the Church, are not infallible; but with you the Church is the onely infallible; therefore with you any other reaſons by which you prove the infallibility of the Church are not infallible. Now if you look over your anſwer again, you ſhall find that your onely exception cometh not home to any part of this ſyllogiſm, for you do not ſo much as ſay, that any thing is infallible but the Church; Or, if now you will ſee your want, and make additions to your anſwer, then ſay diſtinctly, is any other thing beſide the Church infallible, or no; If it be, let it be named; if it be not, the concluſion is granted us And till this addition be thus made (i. e. for this preſent anſwer of yours) 'tis, I conceive manifeſt, that you have ſaid no ſyllable to the prime part of his Lordſhip's firſt Section.

Section 6. As for your inſtances of Philoſophy and Law-ſuits, they can prove nothing againſt his Lordſhip, unleſs you can name ſome ſect of Philoſophy, that hath not onely truth, but infallibility, and tell us which it is, and prove that by arguments which are confeſt to be infallible; till you have done that, your inſtance is not pertinent; and if ever you ſhall doe it, 'twill not be concluding againſt us, unleſs you produce the like arguments for the infallibility of your Church againſt us, which muſt be ſome other than are yet propoſed.

As

As for Law-ſuits, that they are determined to one ſide by the Judge, doth not prove that that Judge is infallible (which is the onely matter of debate,) and if the contenders are bound to ſtand to his award, it is, becauſe the Law and ſupreme Magiſtrate have commanded them to do ſo, and becauſe this is evident and infallible, that they have done ſo, by the commiſſion which the Judge hath from them. And when the like is produced for your Church, I hope all your Subjects will ſubmit to it; but then it muſt be moreover proved, that all Chriſtians are ſuch Subjects, or elſe we hope we ſhall not be involved under that obligation. Section 7.

As for your long deduction from whence you conclude that either we are deceived, or you, and that it is not neceſſary that both ſhould, we grant it, and profeſs our opinions, that though both you and we are fallible, yet onely you are, or can be deceived in this particular, (which we conceive is clear, becauſe onely you pretend Infallibility, which we not pretending, but affirming that we are not ſo, cannot in this be deceived, unleſs we be infallible) but ſee not what it concludes againſt his Lordſhip, whoſe argument depends not on any ſuch aſſertion, that both parties are deceived, but onely that your pretended Infallibility is by you proved by no other arguments, than thoſe which you confeſs are fallible. Section 8.

What you add by way of triumph and ſcoff, I muſt not anſwer, but by yielding you free leave thus to pleaſe your ſelf, and (if this recreation tend at all to your health) to adviſe you to doe ſo ſtill, and (whenſoever it may be for your divertiſement) to reckon up the names of London, Great Tue, and the two Univerſities. Section 9.

After the ἐπινικον ſang, you at length bethink your ſelf that his Lordſhip had affirmed, that Scripture, Reaſon, and Fathers, are by you maintained to be all fallible; and to this you anſwer by a diſtinction of univerſally ſpeaking, and in ſome caſes onely, and acknowledge that you affirm them all to be fallible onely in ſome caſes. Now firſt you ought to have given anſwer to his Lordſhip's proof for what he ſaid, which was this, that you affirm that onely the Church is infallible; from whence it is a concluſion, that therefore Reaſon, and Scripture, and Fathers, are by you affirmed to be fallible; whereas you letting the premiſſes alone, apply anſwer to the concluſion, which is as much againſt Logick as to deny it, without denying the premiſſes, or ſhewing the falſeneſs of them. But then ſecondly, that which is fallible in ſome caſes onely, is by that acknowledged to be fallible, and by that, is proved unſufficient to prove another thing to be infallible in all things, for if it be fallible in any caſe, it may be fallible in this, that it pronounces that other to be infallible; and till there be ſome infallible argument produced that it is infallible in that particular pronouncing, its Infallibility in other things will avail nothing; or if it do, it may avail alſo for us to prove what we offer to prove from it, that your Church hath erred. Section 10.

There is no poſſible avoiding of this, but by ſaying and proving it infallible in inducing your concluſion, and falſe as well as fallible in inducing ours, (for if it be true, though it be fallible, it will ſerve our turn; but it muſt be both, or will not ſerve yours, you being obliged to prove the Infallibility of your Church by ſomething which is it ſelf infallible, becauſe it muſt be matter of faith with you, which nothing is, but what is infallibly induced; but it is ſufficient for us to believe you and your Church fallible, though we ſhould make it no matter of faith that you are ſo) which becauſe you endeavour not to doe in this place, it will be impertinent to examine the truth of what elſe you add (concerning the caſes wherein you affirm Reaſon, and Scripture, and Fathers to be infallible) any farther than thus, that by your own explication of the diſtinction, and enumeration of caſes, I ſhall conclude, that Reaſon doth not prove infallibly that your Church is infallible, becauſe the Infallibility of your Church is not an evident verity; Scripture doth not prove it ſo, becauſe it is not certainly expounded to that probation; Fathers do not prove it ſo, becauſe it was not a doctrine held in their time, and affirmed by them to be ſo. Each of which negations of mine, though they were as ſufficient proof as what you have offered to the contrary, yet I ſhall undertake to make good againſt you, if you ſhall think fit to call me to it, by ſetting down your reaſons to the contrary. Section 11.

And ſo, if on your ſuppoſition, his Lordſhip's three main props were fallen to the ground (which is another boaſt that had no more relation to the preſent matter, than ground in truth; and therefore I beſeech you leave out ſuch exceſſes hereafter) yet your ſuppoſition being not ſo much as endeavoured to be proved, the props ſtand as firmly as is deſired. Section 12.

To the ſecond Section, Chap. 3.

The Enquirer is here much miſtaken, for we are not at all offended with Proteſtants for their alledging Scriptures, but for their doing of it after a way which is fallible and uncertain; in which caſe we ſay Scripture can be no foundation of faith. Wherefore though they alledge Scripture and we alſo, yet doth it not follow thence that the Proteſtants diſprove the infallibility by the ſelf-ſame media or means, by which we endeavour to prove the ſame. It is true, they attempt to do ſo, but that they doe it, is denied. The Scripture when ſurely ſenſed or expounded, is a different medium from the ſame Scripture ſenſed unſurely or expounded falſely. Now he that takes an unſure way, which no reaſon or diſcretion commends unto him, and leaves the ſure, which reaſon does perſuade him to be ſuch, if that man chance to err, it is eaſy to underſtand why God ſhould be more offended with him, than with others that do not ſo, but hold a prudent and contrary courſe.

The ſumme is, that holy Scripture, after ſuch time as it comes to be known certainly for Canonical, and ſhall be expounded according to the interpretation of the Church, foundeth an argument ſtrong and invincible; but when otherwiſe, one that is probable onely, or ad hominem; and this latter we ſay is your caſe, and out of this give a reaſon why your reſolves are temerarious and preſumptuous, and, in fine, ſuch wherewith God may be diſpleaſed juſtly, foraſmuch as no man ought to go about this work unadviſedly, or expoſe his ſalvation without all need, to chance and uncertainty, as if he meant to build upon the ſand.

C. 3. Anſwer to the third Chapter.

I anſwer, that through this whole Chapter the ſame fallacy returns again, of ſatisfying his Lordſhip's argument by a bare affirming (but not proving) a thing which is as much denied by his Lordſhip, viz. that Section 1.

your alledging of Scripture for the infallibility of your Church, is by an infallible and certain way, but our alledging of it for every part of our religion, is by a fallible and uncertain.] (For though you in terms affirm onely the latter of theſe, that which is againſt us, yet in charity to you I ſhall ſuppoſe you imply the former; or if you will ſay you do not, I ſhall then anſwer, that the granting of what you ſay, doth not vindicate your Infallibility, but onely accuſe us, not clear your ſelves) or if that which you add by way of explication, may paſs for a proof of it, viz. that holy Scripture when it ſhall be expounded according to the interpretation of the Church, foundeth an argument ſtrong and invincible, but when otherwiſe, onely probable, and ad hominem.] I anſwer, that this being applied to the matter in hand to you and us, muſt, if it ſignify any thing, have this importance, that the places of Scripture which you bring for the infallibility of your Church, are expounded according to the interpretation of the Church, but the places which we bring for the ſeveral parts of our Religion, are not ſo expounded. And then I anſwer, that by the Church you may (and I conceive ought to) mean the Univerſal Church truly ſo called, without your ordinary clog or reſtriction; and then all that we require of you is to make your affirmation good, and produce the places of Scripture which that Univerſal Church hath ſo expounded to the aſſerting the infallibility of your Church, (which till you do produce, 'tis petitio principii again) and then we ſhall ſhew our ſelves ingenuous and (though we might reply ſomething, which ad homines might be anſwer) yet ſhall we part with all other advantages of defending our ſelves, and in plain ground yield you the cauſe, and contend no longer with you.

Section 2. But if you mean by the interpretation of the Church, the interpretation of the Church in the notion wherein we enquire, whether it be infallible, viz. that ſociety of Chriſtians which have been govern'd by the Pope; Though then we might deny, that you have any ſuch interpretation of Scripture for your infallibility, and juſtify the denial, (for if you pleaſe we will undertake to ſhew that ſome eminent perſons in the Church of Rome, perhaps Popes themſelves, never interpreted any Scripture to the aſſerting the infallibility of your Church, and that many other differ among themſelves, what is that Church which they affirm from Scripture to be infallible, and that will amount to the ſame alſo) yet we ſhall content our ſelves with this other anſwer, that the interpretation of that Church, unleſs Saint Peter himſelf, or ſome other acknowledg'd to be inſpired, joyn in it, is not infallible, and for you to ſay it is, and not to prove it, is a petitio principii again; And for any other notion of the Church which ſhall be ſaid ſo to interpret, when you ſhall faſten on it, we ſhall undertake to make good either that it doth not interpret the Scripture to the aſſerting the infallibility of the Church, or elſe that the Church in that notion is not infallible.

Section 3. As for the other part of your aſſertion, which you principally inſiſt upon in this Chapter, that our caſe is contrary to yours, i. e. that we found not our Religion on Scripture expounded according to the interpretation of the Church, we utterly diſclaim it, (and for you to affirm it without proof, is petitio principii again) and to put it to a fair iſſue, we make this offer, that whatever propoſition we affirm without ſhewing Scripture for it, and that expounded according to the interpretation of the ancient Church, we will preſently forgo, on your firſt inſtance; and if you will pay us the like offer, and your party make it good, I doubt not but as turbulent a Sea as the ſtate of Chriſtendom is at this time, the whole Church might quickly be at peace, or at leaſt, the diſſentient party not be conſiderable. I remember a paſſage in Saint Hilary, depredicating the Biſhops of France as very happy men, quòd aliam non cognoviſſent confeſſionem, &c. that they knew no other confeſſion than that ancient and moſt ſimple which through all Churches from the Apoſtles age had been received. And I am a little confident, that that which firſt made, and hath ever ſince fomented the breaches of that pretious body, is the multiplying and impoſing of new confeſſions and articles of belief from the ſuggeſtion of private or leſs publick ſpirits, and that hath made the body like Ariſtotle's inſectils, which for want of bloud run out into a multitude of legs; every ſuch new article ſo multiplied (above the number of thoſe which Scripture in the truly Catholick interpretation of it, will authorize, not onely as true, but neceſſary to be ſo acknowledged) being an effect of ſome want of bloud, I mean charity in the Authours, (for though to teach any man any certain truth, be an act of charity; yet to make an article, i. e. to require every man to believe whatever we conceive to be truth, is a great uncharitableneſs) and a cauſe or occaſion of more; the adding to the neceſſary truths, ordinarily being a forerunner of the abatement of the inventory of the neceſſary performances, I mean of thoſe which are indiſpenſably required of us under Chriſt. Theſe laſt few lines I confeſs to be a πάρεργον, which I hoped might not be unwelcome to you; If they be, I am ſorry you were troubled with it; the ſeeing that there was nothing more in your Chapter, which wanted anſwer, gave me temptation and liberty for it.

To the third Section Chap. 4.

The third Section is all true, but concerns us nothing, becauſe amongſt ours there is care enough taken for ſhewing which Church it is that is the true and infallible, and on the other ſide much negligence and partiality in the enquirers after it, in many of them, at leaſt, though not in every one.

Chap. 4. Anſwer to the fourth Chapter.

Section 1. In your fourth Chapter, though you are juſt in acknowledging the perfect truth of his Lordſhip's third Paragraph, yet muſt you not be believed on your bare word, that you are not concern'd in it. For, I conceive it clear that you are, becauſe that argument from Reaſon (for ſuch is that which is mentioned there, as in the ſecond Paragraph the argument from Scripture, and in the fourth the argument from Fathers or Tradition) which you uſe to prove the infallibility of your Church, viz. that it is therefore ſo made by God (or that it is reaſonable to think that God therefore ſo made it) that all men may have ſome certain Guide] can never be able to conclude any thing, unleſs it be made known by God as certainly (or ſo offered by God to our knowledge, that 'tis our fault if we know it not) both that there is ſuch an infallible Church, and which it is. Now that God hath ſo made known theſe two, it being impoſſible for reaſon to aſſure us, any otherwiſe than by ſhewing us ſome ſure word of prophecy, I mean ſome revelation from God, with ſufficient evidence that it is revelation, and this being not by you pretended to be ſhewed, it avails little that you tell us, that among yours there is care enough taken to ſhew which Church it is that is the true and infallible; for if by [ſhewing] you mean demonſtrating any way that it is ſo, this

you

you know we deny, and saying it again without proof, is petitio principii; but if by shewing you mean the pointing us out that for the true and infallible, of which you are a member, we have little obligation or encouragement to believe you say true, being a witness in your own cause; I am sure no evidence that (if you speak according to your judgment) you are infallible in that shewing or telling; For if we had, we must be supposed to have that evidence of your infallibility without (because before) your shewing, and so to stand in little need of it.

To the fourth Section, Chap. 5.

The answer is, that people illiterate may have evidence sufficient whereby to resolve and satisfy themselves without making any search into Histories, Fathers, or Scripture; and therefore this Enquirers supposition is false, and indeed it were a hard case, if no man might be able to understand what he was to believe, without looking into all these; and yet as hard as it is, doth this Enquirer impose it upon all, if not in expres terms, yet by the consequence of his doctrine. As for our selves alone, what need can we have for seeking out the true sense of Scripture, and a conformity of doctrine with the Ancient, more than other Christians have? Surely according to this method of his, all true Religion, whether in our Church, or any other, would be impossible to be learned by the illiterate, and very hardly by any other men.

But what evidence can the illiterate have, or rather from whence? Out of the present face, condition, and visible practice of religion in the Church, out of the ancient monuments yet remaining that give in their depositions, out of common fame and unsuspected testimonies, out of the manifest perfections and excellencies both of the Church and Religion; out of all which, as from so many clear signatures and characterisms of truth, ariseth an evidence of credibility, that this Church and this religion are the true, and whatsoever is once so creditable, cannot possibly be false, because for the verity of that, the veracity of God doth stand engaged, as Ric. Victorinus hath long since declared. For it is a clear case that all such things be true, which God makes evidently credible and worthy of acceptance by the publick acts of his own providence; for otherwise that providence should publickly entangle and deceive us by obliging us, or, at least, publickly and potently inducing and persuading us to believe that which were false; and so by following that way which God hath signed out for us, we should go astray; which thing can neither be done, nor yet permitted to be done, without imposture, as all the ancient Schoolmen do observe. By this means then are prudent publick motives able to make a certainty, though not by their own virtue, yet at least by the virtue of the Supreme veracity which goes annexed with them.

Moreover, this measure of evidence perceptible by the illiterate and weak, though it be not so ample as others have, or stand in need to have, yet is it sufficient to sway their understanding, and to call in the divine assistence for the supplying of whatsoever by reason of ignorance or incapacity, is wanting in them. Cum simplicibus est sermocinatio mea, saith the Wiseman. Therefore it is false and injurious to say, as this Enquirer seems to do; namely, That such men as these do assent to truth upon no better grounds than others do to falshood. Prov. 3. 32.

The Enquirer's inference against the Church is this. We think she hath erred, therefore she may: The inference is good, but the antecedent is infirm, and ought not to have been made, because he cannot have so great reason to judge she hath erred, as on the contrary that she hath not; in regard that it is far more likely he himself erred in making that judgment of the Church, than that the Church erred in making that judgment of the truth, or that she hath contradicted her self; it being far more probable, that a private man should be deceived, than a whole Church. Wherefore it is a great act of presumption and temerity in any single man, though never so intelligent, to judge the whole Church hath erred, rather than himself.

The Enquirer saith, that he tries the Church by her conformity with the Ancients, as she her self appoints. But what then? Doubtless she is not that way to be convinced, forasmuch as every intelligent man will suppose that no particular man is able to examine that so well as she her self hath done before him, and therefore may be pleased to understand that this pretended non-conformity of hers ought to be discovered very clearly and perfectly before he adventure to condemn her; and this great discovery having yet not been made and manifested to the world, may justly be thought an act impossible, and be judged in such as make pretensions of it, a work rather of a strong apprehension, than of any solid judgment. If then our Enquirer in this case should be rejected, let him not complain of us, as if we sent him to a witness, and after bid him not believe it, but rather bid him not believe himself, and his own judgment more than the Churches; that is to say, more than he ought; nor suffer himself to be misled by the testimony of a witness to whom we did not send him, I mean himself, in hearkning unto whom self-love too much inclines him, and made him over-credulous, as to their great grief it hath made very many.

Now for the better understanding this point of conformity with the Ancients, of which this Enquirer, and Chillingworth his confederate do talk so much, and seek to urge against us; the Reader may please to know, that they themselves are bound to solve this knot, as well as we; for it will be both as necessary and as hard for them to find out the conformity of their doctrines with the Ancients, as it is for us to find out ours; and again, the conformity of this modern Scripture with the ancient; and these present copies of the Greek and Hebrew with the Original, or Archetype of the same languages, as it is to find out a conformity of this Church and her Doctrines with the Ancients; and so these Authours have made a rod wherewith to whip themselves, as commonly wrangling people do.

Secondly, That there be other notes of truth besides this conformity, and therefore the enquiry after it, is not necessary for any man.

Thirdly, That we may know this conformity by the truth a great deal easier, than the truth by conformity; because truth may be known by the present notes, and such as are before our eyes; but conformity must a great way off, and through a thick mist of many Ages, if it be sought after by examination of particulars.

Fourthly, That the enquiry after conformity by examining the ancient rites, and the innumerable dark passages and decisions of Antiquity cannot be a general method for the instruction of all, or of the greater part of Men; for it is a long business, and so cannot be ready at all times, but rather after divers years: it is also so difficult, that few have learning or ability to go through with it; for the passages of Antiquity be very intricate, and require a great light of understanding for their discovery. You see the Enquirer, Sect. 37. confesseth he was much vext with the harsh Greek of Evagrius, and the hard Latin of Irenæus, and with distinguishing between different senses, and various lections, &c.

If this learned Gentleman found ſo much difficulty in the ſearch; what muſt become of the greater part of Men, if there were no way but this? for in compariſon of the reſt, few have ſo much wit as he, or ſo much leiſure; few underſtand Greek or Latin either, whether harſh or pleaſant, few ſo painfull. Muſt no man that is not acquainted with Evagrius or Irenæus, come to the knowledge of the truth? nor any man be able to know the Creation of the World, and the Old Law, without he can reade in Hebrew, or learn the New Law without reading the New Teſtament in Greek? Theſe were very hard conditions, and certainly ſuch as God never impoſed upon us.

Doubtleſs we are not obliged to find out the Original Copies of Scriptures and Fathers, of which ſort, as I ſuppoſe, there be none extant, nor trouble our ſpirits with judging about various lections; we are not bound to impoſſibilities for our inſtruction and ſalvation, but have a ready way aſſigned us, which is the conſpicuous body of the preſent Church, which body is like a City built upon a hill, and that hill is a rock not to be undermined.

It will be therefore ſufficient that we can any ſure way come to the knowledge of the truth without taking care whether it be conform unto the Ancients or no; for ſure we are, all truth is conform to that it ſhould be, abſtracting from the conſideration either of Ancient or New, and this alone may be ſufficient to content any man.

Yet if he would know conformity, I will ſhew him a readier way than examination of places; let him but take the voluntary confeſſion of the Magdeburgians in their ſeveral Centuries, and he need ſeek no further; for they acknowledge all that we deſire, and this acknowledgment of theirs cannot but ſatisfie, for they make it neither out of ignorance of the truth, nor out of affection to us.

Chap. 5. Anſwer to the fifth Chapter.

Section 1. Your fifth Chapter is a very long one, and by that length and the contents of it, puts me in mind of him that owing his Fellow Sixpence, being not able to pay him, offered him a hundred Counters one after another in a ſudden motion of his hand, in hope that at length his eyes might dazle, and take ſome one of them for coyn, or if not, yet rather chuſe to loſe his Sixpence, than to venture ſo many cheats by awaiting that payment. For I am perſuaded that when I have but repeated to you his Lordſhip's Argument in the fourth Paragraph, you will ſpare me the pains of ſhewing that you have not anſwer'd it, by confeſſing you have not ſaid one word to the τὸ κομψὸν, or rational importance of it.

Section 2. The intent of the Paragraph is to prove that Tradition or Authority of the Ancients is not a proper means to prove the infallibility of the Church. The means of inferring the concluſion are, Firſt, the diviſion of men (to whom this Argument is ſuppoſed to be brought) into ignorant and learned. Secondly, the inſiſting on the propoſition in relation to each of them, to the ignorant becauſe they cannot know, to the learned becauſe they cannot infallibly know, that Tradition doth prove this Infallibility.

Section 3. Firſt, To the ignorant, proving that Tradition cannot prove the Infallibility to them, becauſe the ignorant cannot know what is the voice of general and conſtant Tradition; Which if it be true, is an infallible argument to induce the concluſion; (for that, Tradition cannot prove another thing till it ſelf be proved, which it is not to him at leaſt, who neither doth nor can know it) and that it is not true, you do not ſo much as pretend, but rather help to prove it more plainly, than his Lordſhip thought neceſſary to do. And this is all that you do return to the firſt part of the proof, ſave onely by pretending that this knowledge or trial of Tradition cannot be neceſſary to the ignorant; which as it is true, ſo is it nothing againſt his Lordſhip, who had no uſe of ſaying that it was neceſſary, but rather the contrary; and by ſaying it is impoſſible, implies he cannot think it neceſſary; and therefore when you affirm of his Lordſhip, that by conſequence of his Doctrine he impoſes this impoſſible task upon the illiterate, and do not ſo much as pretend to mention that conſequence, this is ſo clear a prevarication, that you cannot take it ill at any friend's hands, to call upon you to confeſs and retract it; and of that nature is that other ſuggeſtion here, that his Lordſhip ſeems to ſay, that ignorant men do aſſent to truth on no better grounds than others do to falſhood,] there being no ſuch ſyllable here affirmed, (and if afterwards there be, we ſhall there meet with it.)

Section 4. The ſecond part of the Argument is in relation to the learned, proving that Tradition cannot to them infallibly prove the Infallibility of your Church, or be a rule by which to ſquare your belief in this particular, ſo far at leaſt, as to make it to them neceſſary to be believed, (as your friends do and muſt ſay it is) becauſe it is poſſible they may miſtake in it, and that miſtake will not be damnable in them, if they fall into it with a good conſcience, as poſſibly they may (i. e. if they uſe their beſt diligence to find the truth by Tradition, and are not kept from it either by prejudice or paſſion) though it ſhould fall out they do not find it.

Section 5. This Argument thus drawn out at length, his Lordſhip confirms by a clear and pertinent inſtance; ſuppoſe me in my inqueſt, whether the Church may err, to enquire whether it ever hath erred, and in that inqueſt ſuppoſe me to meet with ſome motives which really perſuade me that the Church hath contradicted her ſelf, (which if ſhe hath done, ſhe hath certainly erred, becauſe both branches of a contradiction cannot be true, but one of them muſt needs be falſe) in this caſe it follows, that I believe ſhe hath erred; Wherein though it is poſſible that I may err (becauſe the premiſſes which I believed true, may be falſe) yet becauſe it is but an errour in my judgment that did ſo think (and that being reconcileable in this caſe with ſincerity, will not be damning to me) it will follow, that it will be pardonable in me, though never ſo learned, that Tradition doth not convince me of the truth of that, which I did really conceive it ſhewed me to be falſe; it being as pardonable in the learned to believe that errour which they conceive Tradition tells them, as it was impoſſible for the unlearned to know what is Tradition.

Section 6. The whole weight of this part of the Argument lies in this, that whatever is neceſſary to be believed, muſt be offered to be proved by a means wherein the learned at leaſt cannot err pardonably, and therefore the Infallibility of the Church offered to be proved by Tradition (that Tradition being a thing wherein the learned may err pardonably) is not proved by that means to be neceſſary to be believed. Or in a Syllogiſm thus; That wherein the learned may err pardonably, is not a means to prove the Infallibility of the Church to be neceſſary to be believed; but Tradition is a means wherein the learned may err pardonably; therefore Tradition is not a means to prove the Infallibility of the Church to be neceſſary to be believed.

This

This is the ſumme of what his Lordſhip ſaith in the other part of that Paragraph; and to no part of this Syllogiſm, or of the materials there, out of which I have formed it, do you return the leaſt anſwer or denial, but rather confirm the Minor, Firſt, by uſing Arguments to prove, that it is a difficulty and knot, common to Papiſts with Proteſtants, to find out the conformity of their doctrine with the Ancients; which difficulty being granted, will prove, that in that matter the learned may err pardonably. Secondly, by aſſerting that there be other notes of truth beſides this of conformity with the Ancients, and therefore that enquiry after that, is not neceſſary to any man; which ſeems a diſclaiming of that as of an unfit Argument. Thirdly, by ſaying that we know the conformity by the truth, much eaſier than the truth by conformity. From whence it will follow, that conformity is a very ill Argument, and the worſe the Argument, the more pardonable the errour in it. And fourthly, by the profeſſed unfitneſs of this Argument, at large dilated on by you, with this concluſion, that the conditions for the underſtanding of Tradition are ſo very hard, that certainly God never impoſed them on us. On which grounds you offer us another means of proving it, (which ſhews that this was unſufficient in your opinion) viz. the conſpicuous body of the preſent Church; which if it be not a very fallible means alſo (as in many reſpects I might prove it were, particularly by this, that the compaſs of Chriſtians that are of that Church of yours, is not by common computation a third part of the Chriſtian world) is certainly very diſtant from Tradition; which that it is not a means infallible in this matter, is all that his Lordſhip now contends in that preſent Argument. Section 7.

The onely thing that is by you produced againſt this difficulty of uſing this means, (and ſo pardonableneſs of erring) is the laſt period of the Chapter, which commends the reading of the Magdeburgians as a readier way to know conformity, than examination of places. Section 8.

To which I anſwer, that if they have voluntarily confeſſed that there is conſtant Tradition for the infallibility of the Roman Church, then have you fitly cited them; if they have not, or if upon my preſent inſtance you do not ſhew that they have either directly, or by certain conſequence, then have you wronged them in this your affirmation, and left your ſelf no means to prove your concluſion by that medium. Section 9.

This is all I ſhall ſay to that long Chapter, and in that I have ſhewed, that through it you much miſtook the Argument propoſed in the title of the Chapter, the confutation of the fourth Paragraph, of which there being two parts, you ſpake no word againſt either of them; and therefore if I ſhould allow every word of that Chapter to be true, though you would be beholding to me, yet would it be no advantage to you againſt his Lordſhip's preſent reaſoning, to which all you ſay, is very extrinſecal and impertinent. But that I may not lay too great an obligation on you by ſo liberal a grant, I will mention to you ſome infirm parts in that your diſcourſe. Section 10.

I have touched on three already; and your evidences (that your Church and Religion is the true) which you mention for the illiterate, and are no one of them evidences, may be added to the number; which I need not prove, becauſe you have not attempted to prove, but onely aſſert the contrary. And ſo alſo your Divinity cited out of Ric. Victorinus, if applied to your purpoſe: [that whatſoever is once ſo creditable (as you have there made the Infallibility of your Church) can never be falſe] Which beſide other falſities, muſt infer other things to be infallible, beſide that onely infallible; for 'tis ſure that other things may by you be made ſo creditable, and as ſure, that whatever elſe cannot be falſe (God's veracity ſtanding engaged for it) is infallible alſo; and (not to mention your proofs of that Divinity) ſuch is your aſſertion, that the Enquirer's inference againſt the Church is, [we think ſhe hath erred, therefore ſhe may err] for his inference is onely this; if ſhe hath erred, certainly ſhe may; which I ſhould ſay is another great injuſtice, by changing his Lordſhip's words, but that it is repaired and expiated with another act of more kindneſs to us, though of as little force of reaſon; that the inference is good, but the antecedent is infirm; whereas in truth the Inference had been nought, but the Antecedent either true, or onely in the power of the Searcher of thoughts to diſprove in him; ſo again, that the diſcovering the non-conformity of your Church with the Ancients, may juſtly be thought impoſſible; when if we had not actually done it, yet hereafter we might; and when in the preſent buſineſs we affirm (and you go not about to diſprove) that your pretending to the Infallibility of your Church, is inconformable to the Ancients, becauſe they did not ſo pretend; and ſurely ſuch is your affirmation, that to ſend one to a witneſs, and yet bid him not believe himſelf in what he conceives that witneſs tells him, is not as bad, as to ſend him in like manner, and bid him not believe the Witneſs; there being no poſſibility of believing what the Witneſs ſaith, but by believing himſelf, affirming that that Witneſs ſaid it: For if you ſay it be by believing of you (i. e. another Witneſs) that that Witneſs ſaid it; I anſwer, that that will include a believing himſelf alſo, viz. himſelf affirming that you teſtified that the other Witneſs ſaid it. Section 11.

I ſhall trouble you with no more at once, leſt you count me uncivil; one thing onely more I ſhall let you know I take notice of, that in the compaſs of very few words you caſt off much of the reſpect due to Antiquity, by ſaying, that it is ſufficient, if we can by any ſure way come to the knowledge of the truth (mentioning at that time onely the conſpicuous body of the preſent Church for ſuch) without taking care whether it be conform to the Ancients, or no, &c. By which as you acknowledge your preferring the conſpicuous body of the preſent Church (for the finding out of truth) before Antiquity, which is the ſtrangeſt ſpeech I could have look'd for from a defender of Tradition; ſo I confeſs I ſee the reaſon, why a Section that undertook to prove that Antiquity was no infallible proof of your Churches Infallibility, had in a long Chapter of anſwer to it, never a word ſaid in confutation of it; and ſo I very friendly take leave of it. Section 12.

To the fifth Section, Chap. 6.

Out of that which hitherto hath been ſaid, it appears plainly how the concluſion which the Enquirer would infer in this fifth Section, is no way applicable to our manner of probation of the Churches Infallibility: for we do not, as he ſurmiſeth, maintain that our Church the Guide of Faith, is to be known by ſuch marks by which the Ignorant cannot ſeek it, and the Learned may chance to miſs, although with all diligence and without prejudice they enquire after it; for we affirm that our firſt principles of probation are certain and manifeſt, and out of them, we with certainty, though not with evidence, evict the Church. By which manner of proceeding it is clear, that our probations are logical and conformable to the rules prescribed for the hunting out of truth by Aristotle in his Analytiques, and the Philosophers in general.

Some peradventure will deny our Churches verity to be evidently credible: If any do it: the matter must be remitted to an equal trial between us. But, say you, who must be the Judge? I am no Socinian, nor inclining to that sort of mis-believers, yet nevertheless, I say, right reason must be he, and every man's own conscience; and of these Judges, I hope all men will allow, and it is reasonable sure they ought to doe so, because reason is in all questions the last and the interiour Judge, without whose assent and approbation, no exteriour is sufficient and compleat. For exteriour Judges be as spectacles to the eyes; and as spectacles, be they never so good, cannot see without eyes, so cannot revelation, be it never so manifest, give the last sentence about any doctrine, nor be sufficient without reason.

It may be farther replied, that these principles of ours are also question'd. Admit they be, yet nevertheless may they be certain and evident, otherwise we should grant nothing to be certain; for there is no one thing so evident, which is not question'd by some or other.

Chap. 6. Answer to the sixth Chapter.

Section 1. That which you say to the fifth Section, is in effect the denying the conclusion, when the premisses are either not deny'd, or not confuted; for that which his Lordship saith in that Section, you acknowledge to be a conclusion, and is so indeed of all that went before; all directly tending to this, That the Church provided for the guide of faith, is offered by you to be known by such marks, as the ignorant cannot seek it by, and the learned, though never so honest in his search, may chance not to find it by. This then being the conclusion of all the discourse, you profess to deny, upon no other proof but by affirming, that your principles of probation are certain and manifest, i. e. by saying the direct contrary to his conclusion, but not thinking needfull to prove it; And so beside that other absurdity in Logick, there is petitio principii again.

A.

Section 2. In doing this you were, I conceive, very much resisted by your own spirit; for the satisfying of which you are fain to say this strange thing, that your principles of probation are certain and manifest, and out of them you evict the Church with certainty, though not with evidence: where either you must affirm to think that [evident] and [manifest] are not all one, or else that the conclusion is not evident, when the premisses are; either of which you shall have free liberty to take the choice of, and maintain in your reply. And when you have shewed your skill in so doing, you then shall have leave to boast, that your probations are Logical and conformable to the rules of Aristotle in his Analytiques, and the Philosophers in general; but till then 'twas to no more purpose to say that of your self, than 'twill be to the edification of any that I have repeated it to you.

Section 3. Having thus confirm'd the conclusion with that great popular argument (that prevails with so many)

B. a bare confidence of affirming it, it is very remarkable what your next attempt is; why, instead of that hard task which lay so heavy upon your shoulders, to get an easier, if 'twere possible; and therefore you foresee that some may peradventure deny your Churches verity to be evidently credible. Good Sir, what is this but to suborn a weaker adversary to challenge you, that you may be excused from fighting with the stronger? we desire plain dealing, that you will prove your principles of probation to be certain and manifest (which is the thing you affirm'd) and not to think to put us off with more obscure and less containing terms of your Churches verity being evidently credible. For first, your Churches verity (i. e. I conceive its being the true Church, for I hope you speak not now of its Metaphysical verity, or its being truly a Church; for so it may be, and be very fallible, and very corrupt) is an equivocal phrase, and, in whatever sense, is not so much as your Churches infallibility; for it may be a true Church, and not be infallible; i. e. upon supposition, that whatever now it taught, were actually true, 'twere yet possible it might err, even when it doth not; nay, if its verity should signify that it were a true Church (as perhaps you mean) exclusively to all others, i. e. that the Catholick Church were the Roman Church, and the Roman the Catholick; yet speaking of the present state of the Church, i. e. of the present Roman Church, though it were supposed to be the present Catholick Church, yet may that be fallible again, because those that are now in the truth, may fall into errour, and others rise up, as they fall, to be defenders of the truth, and so the promise of God of keeping his Church from final or total falling, be made good still.

Section 4. As for that other largest notion of the Catholick Church (under which we confess it to be infallible) that of the Universal Church all the world over, without any restriction; I conceive it impossible, that by your Church (which is the Church with an eminent restriction) you should mean that; and upon that ground it was, that I affirm'd, that the verity of your Church, in whatever sense, is not so much as its infallibility.

Section 5. Then again your phrase of evidently credible, is not sure so much as certain and manifest; for though evidently credible sound strangely, (and if it have any sense in it, hath also some obscurity) yet I shall suppose you mean by it, that which is credible, or may be believed, and of which it is evident that it may; the words grammatically can bear no other sense than this, that it is evident that they are credible; now certainly to be evident and certain, is much more than to be credible, though it be never so evident that it is credible. For suppose me actually to acknowledge that you have some probable arguments that your Church is the true Church; nay, suppose it is so evident that you have such arguments, that every man that hath common understanding will be ready to acknowledge you have so, doth it thence follow, that I, or all others, do and must acknowledge that you have demonstrated it? this is to make no difference between the two sorts of Arguments in Logick, topical and demonstrative; or in a word, to conclude that to be infallible, which you durst not say was any more than credible; for as for the word [evidently] added to it, it cannot have such an influence on the word, credible, as to make that quite another, or higher sort of things than it was; Credible in the cleerest or highest degree, is but credible still, as the eminentest or excellentest man in the world, is a man still; and therefore in brief, if we should help you to fewer adversaries than you have, and take off that suborn'd enemy of yours, whom you suppose to deny your Churches verity to be eminently credible, you would have gain'd by it but little peace from his Lordship, who would still require you to make good your pretension of infallibility, which will be a much harder harder Theme to declaim for popularly, (I am ſure Logically) than the credibility of the verity of your Church.

Section 6. As for your way of anſwering that objection, becauſe the objection is not needfull for us to make, Any reply, or confutation of your anſwer, will be as unneceſſary. I ſhall onely report to other men from your own pen, one notable deciſion of yours, that in a trial of huge importance, concerning the credibility of the verity of your Church (I muſt be fain to uſe your phraſe) right reaſon and every man's own conſcience muſt be the Judge; which being ſo great an act of compliance and favour both to thoſe which aſſert reaſon, and to thoſe that maintain the private ſpirit to be the Judge of Controverſies, i. e. to two ſorts of men, which have hitherto been believed oppoſite enough to your infallibility, it will be but gratitude to reward ſo great a bounty, with a favourable interpretation of a good meaning, and he ſhould be very rude and uncivil, who would not grant upon ſuch your demand, that you are no Socinian, nor inclining to that ſort of miſ-believers; for ſure he that makes right reaſon the Judge of his very principles, muſt needs be ſo rational, and ingenuous, that he can never be an Heretick, though he ſay the very things that Hereticks do.

Section 7. As for your very excellent ſimilie of the eyes and the ſpectacles, I ſhall not have a word to ſay to it, ſave onely this, that although you have gotten the incloſure and monopoly of ſpectacles, (I mean of impoſing of an exteriour Judge upon us) yet other men may be allowed to have eyes, as well as you, i. e. to have reaſon and conſcience to judge of your Judge, and then the iſſue (according to your premiſſes being granted to you) will be this, that they whoſe reaſon and conſcience tells them, that 'tis not evidently credible, that your Church ſhould be the true Church, excluſively to all others, ſhall not be obliged to believe it is ſo (for their own reaſon, ſay you, and conſcience is to be judge) that they whoſe reaſon, &c. tells them it is ſo credible, may believe it, if they pleaſe; nay, if they have no arguments as credible to the contrary, and upon impartial ſearch can find none, it is very reaſonable for them to belive what to their conſcience is ſo credible; but if they have ſuch arguments to the contrary, or if it be their fault that they have not, they are ſure no farther bound to believe it (if they are not Subjects of your Church) than thoſe dictates of their conſcience do extend to oblige them, or (if they are Subjects, yet) no farther than the doctrine of obedience rightly ſtated (which will be too long a work for a parentheſis) hath influence on mens opinions; but then ſtill, whatever their caſe be for believing the verity of your Church, they can no way from thence be obliged to believe your infallibility.

Section 8. You confeſs there may farther reply be made to you, that theſe principles of yours are alſo queſtion'd, but take no notice upon what grounds of reaſon or Scripture they are queſtion'd, and ſo think you can deal with ſo unarm'd an adverſary, as you pleaſe, by telling him they may be certain and evident, though they be queſtion'd; and perhaps I ſhall confeſs to you, that if they were onely queſtion'd, and no reaſon that were not by you eaſily anſwered, brought to juſtify ſuch queſtioning, it were ſufficient which you ſay, that queſtioning doth not diſprove certainty; (and yet if every man's conſcience be the Judge, as you acknowledge, then unleſs you can make it evident that that man's queſtioning is againſt conſcience, you will have no way to keep it from being certain, and evident to him) but when there be arguments produc'd to back that queſtioning, which you have no way to anſwer, but by ſaying they may be certain and evident for all that; he that diſputes with you, will be excus'd to think he hath more reaſon to ſay (and that, you ſay, muſt be judge) that it may be otherwiſe.

To the ſixth and ſeventh Sections, Chap. 7.

No doubt there can be, but God will reveal his truth to all ſuch as ſeek it with ſincerity of heart; and though both ſides, as the Enquirer objecteth, may make uſe of this for an exteriour allegation, yet not as of interiour help and preparation; and therefore this ſincerity is not a diſpoſition unprofitable, though it be a proof inefficacious, and thus much we grant willingly, neither do we challenge it as an argument of truth.

We grant him alſo, that before ſuch time as we can believe the Church, we are to acquire ſufficient principles for informing us which is ſhe; and alſo before we can believe upon her determinations, we muſt have principles of knowing ſhe is infallible, and all this we make profeſſion we do, de facto, know. Neither do we take this Church to be a Proteus, that is to ſay, ſometimes of one ſhape, ſometimes of another, but a conſpicuous body conſtantly adorned with the robes of truth, and annexed to a ſucceſſion of Paſtours legitimate from one age to another.

Chap. 7. Anſwer to Chap. 7.

Section 1. A. Your anſwer to the ſixth Section is by giving a diſtinction to tell us how both ſides make uſe of the pretence of ſeeking truth ſincerely] and concludes, that ſincerity is not a diſpoſition unprofitable, though it be a proof inefficacious; which becauſe you are willing to grant, I will contain my ſelf from ſpringing any game or recreation for the Reader at this time (of which he that were playſomely diſpoſed, would find aboundant matter in the review of your diſtinction here applied) and give you preſent payment for your favour, by acknowledging, that that which you grant, is all that is begg'd from you, viz. that God's promiſe of revealing of truth to thoſe who ſeek it ſincerely, is not at all an argument, that they that pretend to the benefit of that promiſe, muſt have real title to it; or conſequently, that they that have no other arguments to prove their Churches Infallibility, but that they ſeek truth ſincerely, and yet after that ſincere ſearch, are of that opinion, are to be heeded in their pretenſions. This juſtifies his Lordſhip's ſixth Paragraph, as fully as if you had ſubſcribed it without your diſtinction.

Section 2. His Lordſhip's ſeventh Paragraph conſiſts of two things; Firſt, a reſuming of a part of his former argument, which had been onely mentioned, but not inforc'd before, that [ſuppoſing the Church were proved to be infallible, yet were not that ſufficient to give any man certain knowledge which were it:] Secondly, a ſolid proof of this affirmation, by plain reaſon, becauſe the granting the Infallibility of the Church, did onely conclude, that God would always have a Church that ſhould not err, but not that this was appropriated to any particular Church, to ſuch a Succeſſion, to the Biſhop and Clergy of ſuch a place, &c. Thirdly, by a lively lively inſtance of the Greek Church, which though it were now in the right, might hereafter err, and ſo the Greek Church be now fallible, and yet at the time that that erred, another Church might ariſe the Champion of truth, and ſo ſtill the Church be infallible.

Section 3. To theſe two parts of the Paragraph your diſpatch is ſhort, (and annext to the nothing that was replied to the former Section) to the firſt, a liberal Grant of that which no man thanks you for, (that it is as neceſſary to know which that infallible Church is, as that the Church is ſo) but then ſaying and profeſſing, that you do, de facto, know which is the Church, and that ſhe is infallible; which (beſide that it is your old
B. beloved petitio principii, to ſay you know it, and offer no proof for it, but your profeſſion and a latin word, (when the very thing that his Lordſhip was juſt a proving, was, that you neither did nor could know it) comes not at all home to his Lordſhip's matter of ſhewing that the acknowledgment of the Infallibility of the Church doth not evict, which is ſhe: For if 'twere acknowledged that you did know it, yet might it be by ſome other means, and not by proving and confeſſing the Church to be infallible.

Section 4. As for his Lordſhip's proof and inſtance added to his propoſition, 'twas ſo deſpicable a thing, that 'twas not worth taking notice of; but inſtead of any ſuch thing, you give us a declaration of your own opinion, that the Infallible Church was not a Proteus, but a conſpicuous body conſtantly adorned with truth, &c. which is again the meaneſt begging of that which was juſt then denied, and diſproov'd; and muſt ſo ſtand, till you can annex reaſons to your opinion, and anſwers to his Lordſhip's reaſons.

To the eighth Section, Chap. 8.

We never go about to prove our Church to be the true, therefore, becauſe it holdeth with the truth, or teacheth true doctrine, as this Enquirer ſeemeth to ſuppoſe we do; but rather contrariwiſe, becauſe it is the true Church of Chriſt, therefore we infer it teacheth true doctrine; but that it is the true Church, we prove firſt of all and originally by Pſal. 104. 27. real revelations, called in the Scripture, Verba Signorum, that is, by ſigns, oſtenſions, or motives of credibility; which motives for a great and ſufficient part of them, are the ſame by which we prove to Infidels the truth of Chriſtianity it ſelf. For theſe ſame motives, though when they are conſidered but in general, and as it were afar off, do perſwade Chriſtianity but in general, without deſigning out in particular this or that individual Chriſtianity; yet nevertheleſs the ſelf-ſame being underſtood diſtinctly, do deſign out a diſtinct and individual Chriſtianity, and are applicable to none elſe; as for example, the ſame ſpecies which ſhew me a man in general afar off, the ſelf-ſame afterwards, when he comes nearer, being diſtinctly perceived, do ſhew me that man is this individual; as Plato for example, and no other: For real ſpecies do not repreſent unto us, Entia rationis, or Individua vaga, but determinate Individuals, namely as often as thoſe ſpecies are diſtinctly and compleatly underſtood. As for the Circles into which both this Enquirer and Chillingworth would caſt us, and make us dance within them whether we will or no, they are but Chymerical conceptions of fidling and trifling diſpoſitions, which love to have toys wherewith to entertain themſelves, and in this point of reſolution, as we have declared it already, have no ſemblance of reality.

Chap. 8. Anſwer to the eighth Chapter.

Section 1. His Lordſhip ſuppoſing in charity that you had attempted to prove the Roman Church to be the true Church, by its agreement with Scripture and Antiquity, which is in effect, by holding the truth, You plainly tell
A. him he is miſtaken in you. It ſeems you deſie ſuch mean ways of proving yours to be the Church, as accordance with Scripture or Truth; you muſt have it by ſome more noble way of demonſtration; and if you would ſtand to this piece of gallantry, and never urge Scripture or Fathers to prove your opinions, but content your ſelf with your being the true Church, to prove all after it, as I confeſs I ſhould not charge on you that Circle which his Lordſhip doth in this particular (ſuppoſing, as he thought favourably to you, that you had proved the truth of the Church by the truth (and conſonancy to Scriptures and Fathers) of your doctrines) ſo I ſhould have two quarrels more againſt you, inſtead of that one compoſed. Firſt, that you would diſclaim Scriptures, and fly to Miracles, (for ſuch are your real revelations, as you
B. interpret them by the verba ſignorum, in the Pſalm, the ſigns being there interpreted by the wonders that follow) that you would fly to God's extraordinary providence, when I preſume you conceive his ordinary would have ſerved your turn; for ſure if at another time a man ſhould have asked you, is not your accordance with the Scriptures and Fathers a prime proof that you are the true Church? I doubt not but you would be ſo well natured as to confeſs it; and why now ſhould the Devil's infirmity, the fear of a Circle, make you ſo cowardly, as not to dare to own ſo popular an argument? eſpecially when your fire comes down ſlowly, or your bath Col the voice from Heaven, (which is the onely proper notion that I know of a real revelation) is not very audible to us that are afar off: nor if we were to be put upon the rack, do we know, or can confeſs at this day, that we or any of our Fathers ever heard that 'twas ſo ever revealed, that the Roman Church is the true, or the infallible Church. And beſides, when you know, we Proteſtants are a little hard of belief, and dare not credit your own report, that you have ſuch oſtenſions, and revelations, and ſigns, when you neither produce witneſs, nor tell us, when or what they were, but give us farther ground of jealouſie, by an odd phraſe let fall by you, that thoſe real revelations of yours are motives (no more than) of credibility, whenas true miracles acknowledged to be ſuch, are grounds of Faith, and he is an Infidel that believes them not; and to be but a motive of credibility, is but a petty thing that every topical argument will take place of, probable being more than credible in the ordinary notion of the words.

Section 2. The ſecond quarrel that your words have brought upon you, is your telling us (without proof, that it is ſo, but onely by giving a ſimilitude to ſhew that it may be ſo, and ſo, in your phraſe, to be a motive of which we meet with in Scripture, and not those other in your Legends; and upon a strict survey and recollecting of all them (and so coming as near to them as can be) I must profess I cannot see your Churches being the true Church in those miracles, near so clearly and distinctly, as I can see the man afar off, to be one of my acquaintance, when he comes near me, which you undertook I should, and made me try; and therefore I hope, will recompence me for the loss of my labour, by giving me your reasons next time for your assertion, that I may try again, whether your proofs are more lucky than your experiments.
C. no more than credibility, which in him that concludes it is ſo, is petitio principii again) that the ſame motives you uſe to prove the truth of Chriſtianity againſt Infidels, will prove yours to be the true Church; which being confidently ſaid, we are ſo vile in your eyes, as not to be vouchſafed ſo much as the mention what they are (unleſs by your former words we conclude you mean miracles) much leſs any evidence concerning them; And yet by the way, the miracles by which we prove the truth of Chriſtianity to Infidels, muſt be thoſe which

Section 3. D. But then I cannot see why you should be scurrilous upon both his Lordship and Master Chillingworth, for thinking you were in danger of the Circle, in which sure Baron had deprehended your Friend Turnhull, and in which you had been engaged infallibly, if you had but gone about to prove your Church the true Church, by the truth (or consonancy to Scriptures and Fathers) of your opinions; which way of proving methinks 'tis possible you may stand in need of, before you come to the end of your answer. In the mean, as the calling down Hercules upon the Stage, was wont to be a Character of a Tragick Poet, i. e. of a fabulous, wonderfull undertaker, Cum fabulæ exitum explicare non potuerit, so to fetch us in miracles and ostensions, to E. prove that divine truth that you confess must not be proved by the Scripture, will pass for a piece of Poetry, I fear, instead of a motive of credibility; and those that are chearfully disposed, will be apt to tell you, that you were fain to conjure hard, and doe, or pretend miracles, or else you had been enclosed in that Circle.

To the ninth and tenth Sections, Chap. 9.

To these I answer in a word, that neither the Greek, nor any other Church can pretend the primacy or principal succession of Pastours, that is to say, from the President of the Apostles, Saint Peter; none, I say, besides Rome, can pretend this; and without this one, none can be authentical or sufficient to prove a Church, or a succession of Pastours Ecclesiastical; and so the Enquirer's starting-hole in the Greek Church, into which he always makes his retreat is prevented and shut up against him.

By this also is the tenth Section answered; for whatsoever Churches claim unto succession shall be alledged, it can no way evacuate that of Rome, as hath before been shewed.

Chap. 9. Answer to the ninth Chapter.

Section 1. Your answer to the ninth and tenth Sections, signifies a great deal, viz. that you were so put to it by the conviction of his Lordship's argument, that to disintangle your self you have ventured to vent a piece of very severe divinity, which my charity to you makes me hope you will not justify; and if you will, yet your no argument produced, gives me nothing to answer, nor otherwise to reply, than by denying as mercifully and obligingly to the world, as you do cruelly affirm; viz. that without succession [sufficient] from Saint Peter, there is no succession sufficient to prove a Church, or a succession of Pastours Ecclesiastical] and this is so strange a news to our ears (who were confident, that whatever you deem of the other two parts of three of the Christian world at this present, you had allowed liberty to Apostles to ordain Churches, as well as (and without succession from) Saint Peter; and indeed, that that which in the second and eighth line of your Chapter, you call the Greek Church, might have been acknowledged to be a Church in the seventh) that had you not said it in the most evident terms (None beside Rome can pretend this; and without this one, none can be sufficient to prove a Church, &c.) and had there been any way imaginable but this, to answer his Lordship's argument, I should never have thought, this had been your meaning; till I see you again own this severe doctrine, I shall not take pains to confute it; and when I see that, I must say, that his Lordship presumed you had not been so bloudily minded, when he proposed to you the argument in those two Sections.

Section 2. And yet after all this, I doubt not but with a little change, his Lordship's argument will still hold against you, even after you have ventured on such strange practices, to secure your self from it, Thus; suppose you had evinced that the succession from Saint Peter were infallible, and so proved the Roman Church to be so, because none else pretended to succeed Saint Peter, yet this can be no sufficient ground of belief to the ignorant, who cannot have any infallible foundation of belief, that the Greek Church doth not pretend from Saint Peter, whether by Saint Mark at Alexandria, who might be ordained by Saint Peter, whose right hand, they say, he was in the penning of the Gospel; or by Evodius at Antioch, where Saint Peter was Bishop seven years (as your own Baronius) or by any other, or (to the ignorant it matters not) by no other known way; and even to the learned, it is but an accidental argument, because if any other company had likewise claimed succession from Saint Peter (as they of * Antioch do) it had overthrown all that probation; nay, it is but an arbitrary argument, which the Adversary can confute by but denying; for if any society of Christians so called, would pretend to be from Saint Peter some other way, than by succeeding him at Rome, or submitting to his government, your Church could make use of it no longer.

* Euseb. hist. l. 3. κεφ. λε.

Section 3. As for that which you add in a word of answer to the tenth Section, that whatever Churches claim unto succession, shall be alledged, it can no way evacuate that of Rome; if it be applied to his Lordship's argument, it is absolutely false; for if Rome's claim to Infallibility together, and to succession to Saint Peter, be to be proved by this, because none else pretends to it (which is the argument which his Lordship here confutes) then sure any other Churches claim, or pretending to it, will evacuate that claim or title, that by that argument is pretended; and contrary to this there is yet nothing shewed.

To the eleventh Section, Chap. 10.

What mercy God will use in pardoning the errours of those men who do seek sincerely and yet miss, makes nothing at all against the ordinary provision and necessity of a guide, because those misses or mistakings be cases extraordinary. Besides, I would know why any pardon should need for such innocent errours which be defects involuntary, and so can be no crimes; wherefore methinks the discourse of our Enquirer in this Section is not coherent.

Chap. 10. Anſwer to the tenth Chapter.

Section 1. His Lordſhip's argument Sect. 11. is very ſtrong againſt the collecting a neceſſity of an infallible Guide for the interpreting of Scripture, from the topick of God's goodneſs, by propoſing another way of reconciling God's providence with his goodneſs in this matter, (which if it may be done, concludes that other unneceſſary) viz. by mentioning a doctrine of more Evangelical œconomy; in which, errours may be reconcileable with mercy, when God doth not give grace to the diligent ſeeker to find out truth; or by this dilemma, that without ſuch an infallible Guide, upon the uſe of Reaſon in the interpretation of Scripture, and ſearch for tradition, God will either give grace to find what is ſo ſought, or pardon if he miſs; and ſo, though it ſtand not with God's goodneſs to damn him for every errour, to whom he hath aſſigned no infallible way to find out all truth; yet to him that is confident, that God will not damn any man upon ſuch terms, as the ſervant laid to his charge, when he told him he was an auſtere man, &c. to him that teaches not ſuch legal bloudy doctrine againſt God, this argument of the Romaniſts will not be preſſing at all; this expedient of the Goſpel-grace or Goſpel-mercy being as fit for the turn of infirm Souls, as an infallible Guide would be; as indeed the ſtate of imperfection wherein we are placed, is as fit for our turns, when the ἐπιείκια of the Goſpel is revealed, and proportioned to it, as Adam's Paradiſe, of ſupernatural all-ſufficient ſtrength, and innocence would be.

Section 2. To all which, all that you return is onely this, that all this is nothing againſt the ordinary proviſion and neceſſity of a guide; becauſe thoſe miſſes or miſtakings are caſes extraordinary: To which I anſwer, Firſt, that if it were ſuppoſed, that againſt the ordinary proviſion of a guide, the argument were not of force, yet ſure it might againſt the neceſſity of it; and then, that is all that is pretended to by his Lordſhip, and that which alone is deſtructive to you; and therefore 'tis ſtrange you ſhould couple them together as ſo ſocial things, which are ſo diſtant and ſeparable; for ſure, though Evangelical grace and mercy do not exclude an ordinary proviſion of an infallible way, but leave it in medio, that God may if he will, make that ordinary proviſion; yet notwithſtanding this, it follows not, that ſuch a proviſion is required, or neceſſary; There is a wide diſtance betwixt [poſſible if God pleaſe] and [neceſſary to the vindicating of God's goodneſs:] now againſt the latter onely it is that his Lordſhip argues, and is not at all concern'd in th'other, and therefore I ſhall not need to examine whether the firſt be true, it being ſo clear, that the ſecond hangs ſo looſe from it, and will alone ſerve our turns as well.

Section 3. B. But then ſecondly, I profeſs not at all to underſtand what you mean by that reaſon of your aſſertion, [becauſe the miſſes or miſtakings be caſes extraordinary] for firſt, how can it be denied in this imperfect infirm ſtate of mortality, that now we are in, but that errours and miſtakings are very ordinary? That they are common, there is no doubt; and as little, that they are agreeable to that order or courſe that is now among men; and to you that ſay in the next words, that you know not why ſuch defects ſhould need any pardon (and to us that acknowledge that they that reform all other, and pray daily, dimitte debita, ſhall through Chriſt have pardon of courſe for theſe) ſure they cannot paſs for extraordinary caſes in either ſenſe; for that would imply, that now under the Goſpel it ſhould be ordinary, or regular to puniſh involuntary errours (which you ſay can be no crimes) and extraordinary either for us to commit, or for God to pardon them.

Section 4. But then ſecondly, if it were true that theſe miſſes, &c. were caſes extraordinary, yet can I not ſee how theſe words can be annext to your former, as a proof of their being anſwer to his Lordſhip (becauſe how extraordinary ſoever the miſſes may be, the pardon for miſſes, may doe as well for you, as an infallible Guide) unleſs you mean ſomewhat elſe by ordinary caſes, than what my capacity hath reacht to, and till you pleaſe to inſtruct me better, I ſhall ἐπέχειν, and by exerciſing my charity in not judging what I do not underſtand, invite yours to inſtruct me that I may.

Section 5. As for the coherence of his Lordſhip's diſcourſe, you have little temptation to doubt of that, when you have ſaid that he conceives that ſuch errours or miſſings ſhould need pardon, for to that, all that he ſaith is coherent; It ſeems you are not of his opinion for the truth of that; and whether is in the right, I ſhall not now examine, or enlarge to any ſo accidental and extrinſecal diſcourſe, but onely tell you, that believing as you do, you ought to have ſaid [not true] when you miſtook, and ſaid [not coherent.] C.

To the twelfth Section, Chap. 11.

To this charge we anſwer, that our proofs of a ſure guide, are themſelves alſo ſure; and what proofs thoſe are, we before have ſignified, Chap. 8. and Sect. 8. and before Chap. 5. Sect. 4.

Chap. 11 Anſwer to the eleventh Chapter.

Your next Chapter being but a reference to what you had before ſaid (and that before examined by us) my anſwer ſhall be anſwerably onely a reference alſo, without taking more pains, to put you in mind, how unfit your Verba ſignorum (which you there affirmed to be motives of credibility) are now to proceed or commence infallible proofs, for thoſe are they which his Lordſhip's argument requires in his twelfth Section.

To the 13, 14, 15, 16, Sections, Chap. 12.

The infallibility of Popes or Councils is no point of doctrine neceſſary to be known diſtinctly, before any reſolution of faith can be made, becauſe it is ſufficient to learn out of Catechiſms and the common practice of the Church, what is to be believed: Neither is there any more probable fear of miſſing which is the See Apoſtolick, and which the Churches living in communion with it, than there is of a Subject's being ignorant to what Kingdom he belongs; and, as for doctrine of belief, it is found out as readily, and as ſurely as the other, by thoſe means of inſtruction which we have ſignified already.

ready. As for the Simony objected, Sect. 14. it is no impediment of his power, ſo he be received peaceably by the Church, and not called in queſtion for it. The like may be ſaid of the decrees and definitions of Councils, together with the ſenſe or meaning of them. And by this the 15, and the 16 Sections are anſwered.

Chap. 12. Anſwer to the twelfth Chapter.

His Lordſhip in queſt after your infallible ground of faith, took into conſideration the Pope's Infallibility, Section 13. the Infallibility of a Council by him called, Section 14. and produced arguments, I conceive, convincing againſt each. Section 1.

To theſe your onely anſwer is, that neither of theſe Infallibilities are neceſſary to be known diſtinctly before any reſolution of faith can be made; and you give your reaſons for it, becauſe, &c. which is in plain terms to grant and prove the thing which his Lordſhip deſires, and proves; for if they were the ground of faith, they would be neceſſary to be known diſtinctly before any reſolution of faith, the foundation being abſolutely neceſſary to the ſuperſtruction in material edifices; and in intellectual, the diſtinct knowledge of a ground of faith being as neceſſary to a diſtinct reſolution of faith, as the ground it ſelf, which works not upon any man's underſtanding (the ſeat of this Faith) any further than it is known. This conceſſion of yours being all that is demanded of you at this time, we ſhall not need inſiſt on, nor debate farther, what influence the caſe of Simony may have upon the Pope's Infallibility; If he be infallible at all, He, or He and a Council, you ſay 'tis not neceſſary to ground faith, (which is the onely uſe we have of it in this preſent enquiry) for it ſeems the Catechiſms, or common practice of the Church, are ſufficient to teach what is to be believed. Section 2.

What? Is the Pope's and Councils Infallibility made unneceſſary? and is a Catechiſm and common practice of the Church ſufficient for the grounding of faith infallibly? Certainly we are grown very low, and are ſuppoſed men of very moderate deſires, if it be thought we ſhall thus be content with the infallibility of a Catechiſm: For whatſoever is ſufficient for the grounding of faith infallibly (remember [infallibly] muſt come in, for otherwiſe 'tis not to his Lordſhip's diſcourſe) muſt it ſelf be acknowledged infallible. Which if you ſhall pleaſe to affirm of any of your Catechiſms, as I ſhall firſt deſire to be directed which Catechiſm it is, that of Trent, or what others, (that I may not miſtake in the choice of my Guide) ſo I ſhall make bold to demand whence this Infallibility, or authority of this prime guide of faith is to be fetcht? It will be ſure from the authority of the Pope (or Council) of that time when 'twas compiled and confirmed, and then ſtill we fall back to the infallibility of the Pope, or Council, which it ſeems, in the laſt reſolve, is become neceſſary again to the grounding of Faith, and ſo again, muſt be known before any reſolution of Faith be built (even upon the Catechiſm) which was the thing you juſt now denied: As for the common practice of the Church, that that ſhould be a ground of faith, or ſufficient for us learn by it, what is to be believed (beſides that this is a weaker ground than Catechiſms, as much as errours are more likely to get into the practice of the many, than into the Books of the Learned, or Authentick Writings of the Church; and accordingly 'tis obſervable in the particular of images, that the common practice of men is much more groſs, than the Writings of the Learned) 'tis impoſſible that that ſhould ever be a guide, quâ eundum, which way we are to go, till it be ſome other way proved, that we ought to go that way. Section 3.

For the improbability of miſſing the See Apoſtolick, and which be the Churches that live in communion with it, we have no obligation lying on us to deny it; his Lordſhip's words gave you no occaſion to aſſert it; nor can we ſee what at this time you can get by it, when you acknowledge the infallibility of Pope or Council unneceſſary to be known before any reſolution of faith can be made. Section 4.

You add [and as for doctrine of belief, &c.] This I ſhould conceive you had ſpoken of before in thoſe words [what is to be believed] and then your memory was ſhort, to put it in again within five lines, as if it had been a new matter. Section 5.

I told you 'twas not neceſſary, after you had confeſſed the cauſe, to inſiſt on the matter of Simony, which was an argument of his Lordſhip's to defend it. Yet that you may not complain that any word of yours is neglected, or loſt upon us, I have conſidered that alſo, and ask you whether it be not true what his Lordſhip ſaith, that a Pope choſen by Simony is, ipſo facto, no Pope, you (durſt not, I conceive, becauſe you) did not before deny it; and if now you will take more courage, let your mind be known, and we ſhall not doubt to bring as Claſſick Authours as your ſelf againſt you. If it be true, then is your anſwer of no validity, becauſe of no truth; for either that infallibility, or whatever other power, muſt be annex'd to him as a man (which he may be indeed, though he be not Pope) or under ſome other relation, which infallibly belongs to him, (neither of which, I conceive you will affirm, for then ten thouſand to one, ſome other will communicate with him in that claim) or elſe he muſt be Pope, when he is, ipſo facto, no Pope; or elſe that power muſt be annext to him by ſome body, that may think him Pope when he is not, and then either God muſt run the errour, or that power be given him from ſome other, for that God ſhould know him to be no Pope, and yet give that power of infallibility (for if you ſpeak of any other power, it is not pertinent) to him, as long as he is peaceably received, muſt, Firſt, conclude that a no-pope may be infallible; And ſecondly, that whoſoever is ſo received by the Church, is ſo; which unleſs there be ſome promiſe of God's to aſſure me that he hath promiſed it to the Churches blind reception, will, for ought I yet ſee, conclude again, that either the chair or the peoples errour gives him that prerogative. Section 6.

To the fifteenth and ſixteenth Sections, you reply no one word, but refer it to your former anſwer; whither, if I knew which part of your anſwer it were (for that immediately precedent I conceive 'tis not, for I hope the Simoniacal election hath nothing to doe with the decrees of Councils) I ſhould attend it, but the ſcent being cold, I am at a loſs, and ſo muſt be content to give over the game. Section 7.

Yet ſeeing I am on this matter of the Pope's Infallibility (becauſe you have wholly avoided that queſtion, and by a kind of ſtratagem diverted it, and ſo not given me any occaſion to defend his Lordſhip in that matter) I ſhall a little conſider the Reader, (to whom I am much obliged, if he ſhall have had patience to reade thus far, i. e. to endure the penance of ſo much Nothing) and give him a few collections of my Section 8.

own, to this purpoſe of the Pope's Infallibility; not that I conceive they will from me find any better entertainment than his Lordſhip's reaſonings had done, but becauſe they are for the moſt part the conceſſions of your own men, from whence I here tranſcribe them.

Section 9. That the Pope is not onely fallible, but even judicially ſubject to errour, deviation, defection, and (in Ocham's phraſe, hæreticabilis) to Hereſie, Apoſtacy, Atheiſm, and in his practice to ſin of any the moſt hainous kind, and conſequently to damnation irreverſible; I ſhall aſſert no farther than theſe honourable Names will avow and authorize me. Among your own Writers, (I mean Pontificians) Lyra in Matth. 16. Waldenſis, l. 2. doctrin. fidei antiq. Gerſon. de exam. doct. conſid. 1. 2. 3. Section 10. To this purpoſe is it that we reade of Childebert King of France, that he ſent Ruffinus his Legate to [a] Rome, to enquire of Pelagius the Pope, whether he had violated the Faith, as [a] Baronius teſtifies; the ſame was ſuſpected of him by the Biſhop of Tuſcia, and other Biſhops of Italy, to whom he ſent his Apology, ſaith the ſame [b] Baronius. So Gregory the Firſt, being under the like ſuſpicion, wrote his [c] Apology to Theodolinda Queen of the Longobards. So the Popes generally laboured to approve themſelves to the Emperours, and purged themſelves before them; Sixtus before Valentinian concerning the crime laid to his charge by [d] Baſſus, Symmachus upon an accuſation of forgery, ſaith an [d] Authour in Goldaſtus; all which are arguments that the Pope's Infallibility was in thoſe days unknown to the world, and the Popes themſelves were not very perfect in it; if they had, they would have been more confident than to have made Apologies.

Section 11. Farther yet, the Biſhops of Germany met at Brixia, the Biſhops of France at Mentz, condemned the Pope for a diſciple of Berengarius. Or if the condemnations of ſuch will not be of value againſt the Pope, you gave Reaſon even now leave to be the Judge, and that, and common ſenſe may be ſo in this matter, if you will but reade the * Epiſtle of Pope Zachary to Boniface, è Cathedra, a Papal and definitive reſcript, wherein he condemns one Vergilius for an Heretick, for affirming that there were Antipodes; which whether it were an errour in him, I leave you to judge, and profeſs my ſelf to be of opinion, that though it were, 'twas yet more tolerably diſcreet and pious, than that of [f] Gregory the Seventh, that there is but one name under Heaven, that of the Pope, to whoſe Seat whoſoever paid not obedience, became preſently an Idolater and a Pagan; and if you will undertake to defend this, I will reward you by adventuring to juſtify the other. That ſpeech of Gilbert, Biſhop of Rhemes, that after was Pope, ſhall with me be ſufficient to expiate for either; Audaciter dicam, &c, I ſhall boldly ſay, that the Biſhop of Rome himſelf, if he have offended any Brother, and will not hear the admonitions of the Church, ought to paſs for an Heathen and a Publican.

Section 12. But all theſe are but trifles, if they be compared with other known paſſages of ſtory, how Stephanus was reprehended by Cyprian, Liberius by Athanaſius, Honorius almoſt by all Chriſtians, of no leſs crimes than Hereſie it ſelf. Or becauſe that is but one piece of carnality, and there be many others beſide that, as probable, and conſiderable errours, and carnalities, I beſeech you review either in your memory, or in Onufrius, and Platina, the lives and manners of the Popes, the inceſts, and ſorceries, and cruelties of Alexander the Sixth, the idolatrous Sacrifices of Marcellinus, Caleſtin's uſing the help of Magicians and Devils to come to the Papacy, and then tell me your opinion, whether Popes may not err; and when you have replied, by way of diſtinction of manners from doctrines, be then pleaſed to anſwer [g] Nilus (by ſome more ſatisfactory way than by calling him pratling Greek) this queſtion, πῶς ἔχρις ἐνδείκνυται ὁ Πάπας ἀρνεῖσθαι Θεὸν, λόγοις ὃ ἔργοις οὐ δύναται; how it falls out that the Pope can deny God in his works, but cannot by any means in his words? (what charm or amulet kept his tongue inerrable, when his whole body was ſubject to thoſe darts of Satan) and when you have done that, I beſeech you to fanſie to your ſelf what kind of crimes you conceive thoſe Popes would have committed, if they had been fallible.

Section 13. I ſhall not enlarge this ſupernumerary trouble any farther, or expect your anſwer to every of theſe paſſages in Books; if I have wronged any by miſciting, I ſhall be glad to hear of it; and if they make not all together one probable argument or proof of the fallibility of the Pope, I beſeech you pardon me for this unneedfull importunity.

To the ſeventeenth and eighteenth Sections, Chap. 11.

I noted before, that the knowledge of all theſe particulars recited by the Enquirer, are no way neceſſary to the Believer, and therefore both this Authour and Baron the Scotch Miniſter ſtruggle in vain, whenas with ſuch care and vehemency they preſs them againſt us. I conclude then, that in the Church of God, Councils do not multiply doubts, but diminiſh them.

Chap. 11. Anſwer to the eleventh Chapter.

Section 1. To the ſeventeenth and eighteenth Sections, the anſwer is a reference again to a note dropt from you before, which truly I ſhould not have been likely to apply to this buſineſs in hand, if you had not given me that ſeaſonable admonition. Your note, I conceive, refers to your diſcourſe in the precedent Chapter, how Catechiſms, and the common practice of the Church teach all, what is to be believed. And (as then the Pope's Infallibility, ſo now) that of Councils is unneceſſary to be known, and by that means all theſe particulars alſo; for if the infallibility of Councils were neceſſary to be known (as it muſt be, if they were deciders of queſtions) then all theſe particulars mentioned by his Lordſhip, would be neceſſary to be known alſo, becauſe they are incident to every Council, and the knowledge of its infallibility (becauſe of its deciſions, and even being it ſelf) depends on theſe.

Section 2. And the fitneſs of Councils to decide Controverſies being the thing his Lordſhip had now in hand, and which Baron treats on, when he uſes the like arguments, ſure neither of them ſtruggle in vain; but you rather rather (who 'twas thought in reaſon would have been no wiſer than your fellows, and ſo would have aſſerted that fitneſs of Councils) have become a very ſlippery Wreſtler, gliding out of their hands, when their arguments began to lay hold on you; and after ſuch an eſcape as this, I confeſs 'tis matter of wonder to me, how you could think fit to end with a θριαμβευτικὸν, triumph preſuppoſing victory, and victory reſiſtence, and none of theſe here are to be heard of, but onely a concluſion, that what his Lordſhip had ſaid and proved, he had ſaid falſely (a petitio principii again) that Councils do not diminiſh doubts, but multiply them. Which propoſition and proof of his Lordſhip's, having no need of defending any farther, I ſhall onely interpoſe one caution, which I deſire may be obſerved in his Lordſhip's diſcourſe, that it being ſuppoſed, that Councils are not deciders of controverſies, (meaning thereby infallible ones) they be yet of good authority and uſe in the Church, to help to decide them, and (notwithſtanding all the doubts that his Lordſhip ſaith they do multiply) be onely denied by us the privilege of infallibility, not that other of being very uſefull and venerable in a lower degree, and (ſuch the Council may be) even next to the Word of God it ſelf.

To the ninteenth Section, Chap. 13.

He maintains here a ſtrange paradox, and one very improbable, namely, that to define any thing of new, is to beſtow upon the Devil one path more for us to walk in towards him. If you ask why, he tells you, becauſe, before the definition made, it was lawfull to hold either ſide, but after, it is damnable. Belike then with this Authour the manifeſtation of divine truths is the high-way to damnation; but I ſuppoſe few men are of his mind. Certainly moſt are of opinion, that every ſuch verity we learn, had rather been a new ſtep towards Heaven, becauſe knowledge of things divine do enable men for the attaining of ſalvation; and therefore the Apoſtles by their inſtructing our underſtandings in them, ſhewed the world ſo many more paths to Heaven. It may be indeed that by accident minds blown up with ſelf-conceit, may by their reſiſting ſuch revealed truths, take an occaſion to tranſgreſs, but that is their own faults, not the fault of them that teach, or of the verities that are declared, and therefore this cavil of the Enquirer's againſt the definitions of Councils was very frivolous. It ſhould ſeem he had a great mind to be quarrelling with Councils, that was content to take ſuch a frivolous exception as this againſt them.

Chap. 13. Anſwer to the thirteenth Chapter.

Section 1. Your great quarrel to his Lordſhip's ninteenth Section, comes now to be conſidered; wherein the paradox in, and improbability of his Lordſhip's concluſion, will not be ſo great, if you obſerve but one thing, that the matter of definitions of Councils, which he ſpeaks of, is not divine truths, (as the following words ſuppoſe them, and upon that preſs them with abſurdity) but, as I conceive, ſuch things as have been defined by Councils, being not before defined by Scripture, and ſo though affirmed to be truths, yet not as divine truths, at leaſt of which it is not infallibly true, that they are ſo: of which nature I might inſtance at large in your Councils of Lateran, Conſtance and Trent; for to the ancient general Councils I confeſs to bear ſuch reverence, that I ſhall challenge any of you to exceed me.

Section 2. Now to clear his Lordſhip from the guilt of a frivolous quarrel at this time, I muſt add, that in ſuch deciſions of Councils, the worth of the matter, and inconvenience of leaving it undecided, are the main things worth conſidering; and ſo it is poſſible that the deciſion may be ſuch, that it may tend, Firſt, to ſome publick end, whether the clearing of obſcure Scripture, or the recovering of ſome venerable and uſefull practice, or doctrine of the Church. Secondly, to the ſetling and eſtabliſhing of peace, by interpoſing ſuch a judgment which may probably ſway with both pretenders; And in theſe, and the like caſes, the advantages being ſo intrinſecal to the deciſion, and withall ſo great, the inconvenience mentioned by his Lordſhip ought not to prevail to the diſparaging of Councils, becauſe though it be an inconvenience, yet is it over-weighed with other conveniences, and therefore the argument I confeſs is not infinitely or unlimitedly true.

Section 3. But then the caſe may be, that the matter of the definition is of no ſuch great weight or uſe, that there is no ſuch aſſurance acquirable from Scripture, that either ſide is true, (nay, it may be audacious and untrue) and as little from any other κριτήρια, that either ſide will peaceably ſit down and acquieſce in the deciſion, (but in matters of opinion probably prove opiniatour) and ſo the deciſion will then rather widen the breach than compoſe it.

Section 4. In this caſe, or when indeed in other reſpects the ballance is even ſet, the good of defining counterpoiſed with the ill, then there is place for his Lordſhip's argument, and 'tis true that then, upon that preſent ſuppoſition (that before deciſion 'twere lawfull to hold either way, and damnable after) it were uncharitable to define; my reaſon is, becauſe when charity doth not move to doe a thing, i. e. when no advantage ſhall ariſe to mankind by it, but on the other ſide, charity ſhall adviſe to abſtein; ſome one, (though accidental) hurt, being foreſeen to ariſe on the other ſide, there to doe that thing, is uncharitable.

Section 5. Thus have we heard of an expreſſion of Biſhop Tunſtall of Durham, who died in your communion, that if he had been Chaplain to Pope Innocent the Fourth, he would have begg'd on his knees, that he would not define Tranſubſtantiation, as knowing it would tend to the breach of the peace of the Church; and thus in matters of controverſie about Predeſtination, &c. you know the Pope hath in charity abſtein'd to define, and the Apoſtles (or whoſoever elſe were the compoſers of it) in their Creed defined but a few things; and generally thoſe Churches that have avoided multiplying of Articles, have by wiſe men been thought the moſt Chriſtian, becauſe the moſt charitable; and even in matters of rites and humane laws, the rule is, that they muſt not be multiplied unneceſſarily; and the reaſon is, becauſe they would conſequently multiply ſnares on mens conſciences, as unneceſſarily; which is juſt his Lordſhip's reaſon in this place.

Section 6. Which you will rather gueſs, becauſe 'tis clear his Lordſhip ſpeaks of thoſe things in which before a Council hath determined, it is lawfull to hold either way, perfectly lawfull, (not excluding alſo that other circumſtance that I have added, viz. when there is no real gain expectable by defining) And when the [thoſe things] are by his Lordſhip ſo limited and reſtrained, I know not how (to make up your paradox) you could think fit to change the phraſe from [thoſe things, &c.] to [any thing] and after, to [divine truths] and [things divine] and [verities] in general, when 'tis improbable that he did (I am ſure very poſſible and probable that he did not) ſpeak of any ſuch, as are new ſteps toward Heaven, but ſuch as onely fill mens brains, puff up their fancies (and oft make men to think themſelves pious men for being of ſuch opinions, and to neglect works of piety and charity, as not near ſo conſiderable) and ſo are to them even that believe them, accidentally paths to damnation, much more (if the doctrine of deciſions of Councils be to be extended to whatſoever uſeleſs definitions) to thoſe that do not believe them.

Section 7. Having ſaid thus much for defence of this ſuppoſed paradox of his Lordſhip's, I muſt deſire, (once for all) theſe two things from the Reader, which Equity will require of him to grant me; Firſt, that his Lordſhip's arguments be not extended infinitely, but onely be ſuppoſed to undertake to conclude as far as is neceſſary to the preſent matter; and no farther, (an example of which this Chapter hath afforded you.) Secondly, that his arguments being by him brought onely to enervate the Infallibility of the Roman Church, be ſo cautiouſly taken, as that they be made uſe of onely to that end, and not at all inclined, or wreſted to the leſſening the authority of the Church or Councils univerſal; for this would be very unjuſt, and ill inferred, there being a wide difference betwixt authority and infallibility, as alſo betwixt Univerſal and Roman, though (by reaſon of the manner of his Lordſhip's diſcourſe, being, according to the deſign, wholly deſtructive of the one, and not aſſertive of the other) the Reader may perhaps be tempted to think otherwiſe; and therefore I thought it not impertinent thus to fortify him againſt this prejudice.

To the 20, 21, 22, Sections, Chap. 14.

It is true, we condemn ſome doctrines which general councils have not condemned, and we have great reaſon for it, becauſe though Councils be one rule of faith, yet not the onely. Again, theſe we hold to be infallible, becauſe they are the Compendium and quinteſſence of the Church, and the body repreſentative thereof, as a King and the three States be of the whole Kingdom.

The cauſe of Pope John XXII. is cleared ſufficiently by Ciacconius in his life, by Coeffeteau in his learned anſwer to Pleſſy*'s iniquity, and by many others, and therefore needs not be argued any more. I grant it a point of faith that the ſouls of the juſt ſhall ſee God before the laſt judgment, and do deny that this doctrine was generally contradicted at any time. Nevertheleſs I do not know it to be of faith that all of them ſhall enjoy the ſame viſion before that great day, and that none of them ſhall be detained in ſecret receptacles, as the Ancients hold, till they, together with their bodies, ſhall be compleatly purged in the great fire of the worlds conflagration, as I have treated elſewhere.*

It was not needfull that Councils ſhould define in terms their own immunity from errour, becauſe a Council both in ſubſtance and ſemblance is the Church, who needs not define her own infallibility, and therefore needs not, becauſe that ſame is to be preſuppoſed to all her definitions as a thing known without them, before hand; for otherwiſe ſhe would not be believed in any of them at all, either touching her ſelf, or any other matter. Nevertheleſs though this definition be not in terms, yet it is virtually done, and in actu exercito, as often as a Council defineth any thing, by the pronouncing of Anathema againſt ſuch as do not ſubmit, and counting them as Hereticks; It is done again in the uſing continually this old form, Viſum eſt Spiritui Sancto & nobis.

For a concluſion I demand of theſe eager impugners both of Church and Councils, what thing it is muſt regulate our belief, and keep us in diſcipline and unity; for if they let all men looſe upon themſelves, and make all men Judges in the Court of faith, as they, de facto, do, controverſies will multiply apace, and no means left to reconcile them; and while all men have authority of deciding, no man hath it. Reaſon always did teach us, that confuſion would be the effect of this new licence; yet could we never underſtand it, till that now coſtly experience, the miſtris of the improvident, hath laid it open before our eyes. And now at length we ſmart for our leaving the venerable decrees and definitions of Church and Councils, and do behold all brought to miſery and ruine, both Church and State; yet ſuch is our blindneſs as we are not able to diſcern the true cauſes of all theſe evils. The daily growing up of new and new devices inſtead of the old faith, and the continual diſcords and diſſentions thereupon enſuing, evict unanſwerably the weakneſs and inaptitude of the rule of faith, and our young and preſuming wits may ſee how far ſhort they come of their forefathers wiſedom, and how much more unhappy than thoſe who were governed by Church and Councils.

C. 14. Anſwer to the fourteenth Chapter.

Section 1. The firſt part of this Chapter in the Apologiſt, is anſwer onely to one of three or four proofs of his Lordſhip's argument, Section 20. viz. to that againſt the Councils being a rule of hereſie, [when ſome paſs for Hereticks that are not condemned by any Council] To this I confeſs it were ſatisfactory (if it were proved) to ſay that Councils are a rule, but not the onely rule. But then, Firſt, there is no other rule ſpecified. And ſecondly, this argument of his Lordſhip's is complicated with three others, being joined with which, it is of force to ſtrengthen one of them (though of it ſelf it were not ſufficient to conclude) and then neither of thoſe are taken notice of. Thirdly, 'tis meant but as a proof againſt this rule, not againſt any other. And yet fourthly, his Lordſhip's method being to confute every one of them ſingle, as they lie; all others being diſproved, this muſt be concluded the onely one, or none at all; and however, no more can here be required, than that here he diſprove this from being the rule, not that he diſprove all others in this period.

Section 2. For your way of proof [that Councils are infallible] Firſt, that is not anſwer to the contrary proof; And ſecondly, it is by a medium as much denied, as it ſelf (the Infallibility of the Church whoſe quinteſſence it is) and ſo your old acquaintance, petitio principii again.

Section 3. Your ſecond part about John XXII. puts us off to Ciaconius and Coeffeteau, whom in obedience to your direction I ſhould advice with, but that I ſee from what you have learned from them, that either you have proved an ill Scholar (and 'twere inſolence in me to hope to be better) or elſe that their reſolutions are not pertinent to his Lordſhip's argument; for the three things that you add (I conceive from their Writings) are nothing at all to it.

Firſt,

Firſt, not that which you grant, for his Lordſhip grants it. Secondly, not that which you deny, for his Lordſhip had not affirmed it (unleſs from theſe words, [he was not alone] you conclude, that that which he contradicted, was generally contradicted; and then what his Lordſhip ſaid, may be as truly ſaid to be generally granted, for he is not you ſee alone in ſo ſaying.) Thirdly, not that which you ſay you do not know, for his Lordſhip knows it as little, and indeed ſays never a word of it. Whereas the onely thing wherein the force of that part of his Lordſhip's argument conſiſted, viz. Bellarmine's excuſing Pope John (in his denying of that which you believe) from the no-Council that had defined againſt him, hath no tittle ſaid to it, but continues in great ſecurity, to make good the argument, [that you doe amiſs (and withall either you or Bellarmine are very partial) to condemn thoſe that are condemned by no general Council.] Section 4.

Your Anſwer indeed to the twenty firſt Section, is nearer to the mark, but yet it hits it not; The argument is, that no Council ever decreed a Council to be infallible, therefore as far as the argument is drawn for belief, from the infallibility of the Council, I am not bound to believe it infallible. To this you anſwer, 1. That for Councils ſo to define, was not needfull, becauſe a Council is the Church, and the infallibility of that, is a præcognitum in all her definitions, otherwiſe it would not be believed in any. Section 5.

Here is excellent contrivance, 1. For Councils to define that Councils are infallible is not needfull; which ſure is needfull, if nothing be to be believed, but what the Council defines to be ſo; and that muſt be granted, 1. if the Council be the rule of belief; and 2. if the Council be the Church (as you ſay it is) for that is the onely rule infallible, if you be not deceived. 2. That the Council is the Church in ſubſtance.] I thought it had been in repreſentation onely, and that nothing is the Church in ſubſtance, but the Church in its full extent, of which you ſaid before, the Church is onely the quinteſſence, which ſure is not the ſame in ſubſtance with that whoſe quinteſſence it is, but onely the repreſentation of it. 3. That the Infallibility of the Church is a præcognitum; if ſo, then it is a principle; and if ſo, then I am ſure I muſt not look to ſee it prov'd, and then as long as we deny it, (as we do, you know) that is petitio principii again. 4. That unleſs the Church were preſumed infallible before its determination, it could never be believed in any: this ſuppoſes men very hard-hearted, that never will believe any thing, but what ſome preſumed infallible tells them. Section 6.

There is a belief (as well as a certainty) cui non ſubeſt dubium, of which a man doth not doubt, as well as cui non poteſt ſubeſſe falſum, in which there can be no falſity; and the Schools have told you of a certainty of adherence, where there is none of evidence; and let me tell you, this is the difference betwixt belief and knowledge; the latter onely is infer'd demonſtratively, or by premiſſes that cannot be otherwiſe, the former being content with probable arguments, ſo they be ſtrongly probable, and ſuch as have not any the like, or of as conſiderable weight to be ballanced againſt them. And this ſure is the reaſon that Faith is by God thought fit to be rewarded, as being an act of the Believers choice, (and knowledge not, becauſe it is neceſſarily and irrefragably induced) and yet ſuch, as that it will be all obſtinacy and perverſeneſs to reſiſt, when it comes well provided with arguments extremely probable. Section 7.

For, if you mark it, the moſt weighty actions of our lives, and thoſe which we doe moſt conſtantly, and moſt confidently, are founded no deeper than on probabilities. We eat and drink for the ſtrengthning and refreſhing of our bodies, and yet conceive not our ſelves to have any certainty of evidence or demonſtration, that every bit we eat, or drop we drink, may not choak, or poyſon us; yet having probabilities, on which to ground a belief, that they are wholſome, and no ſtrong contrary probability, that our Table ſhall become a ſnare, or death unto us, we doubt not to feed as ſecurely, as if Euclid had been our ſurety by one of his Demonſtrations. Section 8.

So in every piece of land I buy, or eſtate I enjoy from my Anceſtours, 'tis poſſible, (and the contrary not demonſtrable, or certain in that ſenſe) that there may be ſome flaw which may undoe me, and yet when I have ſearcht my evidences, and have the opinion of wiſe men upon the matter, I ſit down, and trade, and live ſecurely, and all this but upon probabilities, without the παρρησία, or full armour of infallibility or demonſtration. Section 9.

And ſo in all matters of fact, which we ſee or hear not with our own eyes or ears, but as with perſpectives and otacouſticks, I mean where we are fain to truſt the relations of others, be it that there was a Julius Cæſar, or a Henry the Eighth, the ground of our belief is but a probability, viz. the topick ab authoritate, the argument taken from the authority of the relatours; which though it be never ſo ſtrengthened by the univerſal concurrence and nondiſſenting of all witneſſes, cannot yet aſcend higher, than to be extremely probable, and yet ſure is as firmly believed of us; and although it may poſſibly be otherwiſe (the contrary implying no repugnance, or contradiction in nature, and he that ſhould be ſo mad to affirm it, being not confutable either by rational, or ocular demonſtration) yet as little doubted of by any man in his right wits, and as little liable to any ſcruple, or matter of doubt, as what is moſt viſible before our eyes. Section 10.

This I have ſaid perhaps ex abundanti (yet ſhall not repent of it becauſe it is uſefull to be conſidered in order to other difficulties) to ſhew you the falſeneſs, and inconſequence of that argument, that unleſs the Church were preſumed infallible before its determinations, it could never be believed in any. For hereby it hath appeared, that that may be believed, nay cannot ſometimes without pertinacy and ſin be not believed, (as in caſe the arguments, though but probable, be exceſſively ſo) which brings not with it demonſtration, or any thing of equal power or force with it, and ſuch is infallibility. Section 11.

And from thence you will eaſily diſcern, how poſſible it may be for us Proteſtants to believe the univerſal Church in all things, wherein the teſtimony appears to be univerſal; nay to believe the Church of Rome in many things, wherein the arguments produced by her, do actually perſuade with us, (ſuch are her conſonancy with antiquity, and the like) and yet to remain conſtant to our preſent undertakings, that ſhe is not infallible. Section 12.

But it now appears that I might have ſpared this pains, in preſſing theſe inconveniences on that firſt anſwer of yours. For it ſeems by what follows, that all that anſwer was needleſs; For now upon better conſideration, 'tis true (with a diſtinction) that the Council doth virtually, and in actu exercito, define its own infallibility; and that you prove, Firſt, becauſe it pronounceth anathema's againſt thoſe that ſubmit not; Secondly, it doth it by ſaying [Viſum eſt Spiritui Sancto, &c.] Section 13.

Not

Section 14. Not to examine your phraſe of actus exercitus, as 'tis here applied; To your arguments we anſwer, Firſt, that our Councils denounce anathema's too, yet you know, do not pretend to infallibility.

Section 15. That form, I conceive, ſignifies not, that all are damned that believe not what we believe, but that all they that ſhall diſ-believe may be excommunicated, if they be refractory; and that again, onely in reference to thoſe that are under dominion; but not that all others that are not under us, ſhould by us be ſo handled; or that thoſe that are not excommunicate, are in that other danger; or if theſe are, yet not for the ſin of diſ-believing an infallible doctrine, but for not believing our lawfull ſuperiours; which may be a damning ſin, though they be not infallible, their being in the truth, when they make ſuch conſtitutions, is ſufficient for that. Secondly, the form of [Viſum eſt Spiritui Sancto] is onely a form tranſcribed
A. from the Acts, arguing it their opinion (that uſe it) that this particular is the dictate of the Holy Ghoſt, not at all their belief, that the Holy Ghoſt was bound to aſſiſt irreſiſtibly: which he muſt (as well as aſſiſt) to make the infallibility; for otherwiſe when he aſſiſts, we may poſſibly not make uſe of his aſſiſtence. In plain, 'tis an evidence that they think they are in the truth, not that they cannot be in the wrong.

Section 16. To the twenty-fecond Section, though you anſwer not a word, yet you are as diſcreet as if you did, you doe another thing inſtead of it, you aske a queſtion, and harangue upon it at large; the Queſtion is pertinent enough (though not to this Section, yet) to the buſineſs in groſs, and we anſwer it in a word, that the Word of God muſt regulate our belief, and reaſon, in the uſe of all the means that you will commend to us, and you have given us a pledge already, that you will not quarrel with us for this anſwer; as for diſcipline, and keeping in unity, we had, bleſſed be God, means very ſufficient to that end, till the ſword wreſted them (as all other our lawfull poſſeſſions out of our hands; and I believe the Infal-
B. libility of the Church is not weapon-proof, or able to keep Reſiſters in obedience, or Schiſmaticks in unity.

Section 17. As for your uncharitable judgment, that want of an Infallible Church (which muſt be but want of that inſolence to undertake our ſelves to be infallible) is (that and no other) the * cauſe of all our preſent miſeries; and his Lordſhip's doctrine in this Book, (although never ſo remote) the cauſe of his death: This is but to let us ſee your change or variety, that you can uſe non cauſa pro cauſa, and not deal onely in petitio principii; thus was Tenterden Steeple the cauſe of Goodwin Sands, and that is all I ſhall return to your State-obſervation; the cauſe of our preſent calamities, I conceive, came not out of the Church, but when it was infamous, it fled to it for a Sanctuary, to give it an honeſt Name, and a protection together; and I could tell you that the League in France was once pretty parallel to ours, and then 'twas the obſervation of a knowing man, that if a true ſtory of the cauſes of that War ſhould be written, the buſineſs would be traced into ſuch or ſuch a brothel houſe, that made as if it came out gravely from the Church; a competition or animoſity, the αἰτία, or true cauſe, when religion was onely the πρόφασις, or the pretended. Beſides, let me tell you, that deciſions and anathematizings have ſometimes done as much hurt toward occaſioning of breaches, as licence and acknowledgment of fallibility hath done; (and if you mark, the onely colour of charge at this time againſt our Church, hath been the impoſing too much) and truly whatever your opinion is, I conceive meekneſs hath the promiſe of this life, and I never knew that pretending to Infallibility is the onely Symtome of that.

* That paſſage in the Apologiſt to which this was returned, is by him in his laſt thoughts held better to be omitted, and accordingly I have left it out there.

To the 23, 24, and 25 Sections, Chap. 15.

The argument of theſe three Sections is, how an ignorant illiterate man cannot be able to trace out all traditions which be truly Apoſtolical: and this is ſought to be perſuaded and made good, by ſundry intricate diſcourſes, all which I willingly do pretermit, and onely ſignify that they all fall wide of the mark; for, in a word, our anſwer to them is, that private men ſtand in no need at all of having any particular information of them, but, that it is ſufficient for them if they do learn what is the common doctrine of the preſent Church, without looking any higher to the Primitive and elder times: becauſe this doctrine now taught is credible and perſuaſive enough for ſatisfying of any wiſe man's underſtanding, and the ſetling of his judgment upon it: as for example, it is ſufficient for any man deſirous of knowing which is the River Thames, to ſee it at Graveſend or London, without any laborious aſcending by it higher and higher, and tracing the ſhoars thereof, till he come unto the ſprings; and more than this would not be needfull for the diſtinguiſhing of it from Severn, or Trent, or any other River. For if this kind of aſſurance might not be ſufficient, then certainly few or none could ever have come to know which water was the famous River Nilus, of which few have ever ſeen the ſprings, and which, as it is very likely, do lie conceal'd in Æthiopia, and wholly undiſcovered even to this day.

Againſt the poſſibility of ſearching out Traditions Apoſtolical, and diſcerning them from others that be ſpurious and falſe, his principal inſtance, and that in which he moſt confides, is the doctrine of the Chiliaſts or Millenaries; and the ſame example is vehemently preſſed and repeated often by his friend Chillingworth. The ſubſtance of all they ſay conſiſts in this, namely, that their doctrine, although now generally received to be erroneous, was received in the firſt 200 years with one conſent, as a Tradition Apoſtolical. For making of this charge good, they both of them do jointly alledge Saint Juſtin as their witneſs. But that we may judge moſt favourably of this their allegation, we needs muſt tell them they are miſtaken groſly, for Saint Juſtin ſpeaking there of three ſeveral ſorts of Chriſtians which were in his time, af-
Juſtin. in Dial. cum Tryphone. firms, that of thoſe three but one of them held the doctrine of the Chiliaſts: The firſt of theſe three ſorts was, as he deſcribeth, οἱ κατὰ πάντα ὀρθογνώμονες, Thoſe, who as he conceived did in all points hold aright. The ſecond claſs conſiſted of ſuch other, who although they did not, like the former, in all things hold aright, yet nevertheleſs were, ἁπλοῦς καὶ εὐσεβεῖς γνώμης men of pure and pious judgment or belief, for ſo he expreſly ſtileth them; the third and laſt ſort were ſuch as denied the reſurrection, and were therefore cenſured by him to be Chriſtians rather in name than in reality, and juſtly to be compared with the Sadduces amongſt the Jews. Thoſe of the firſt ſort he telleth did hold the doctrine of the thouſand years. The ſecond ſort, as he expreſly witneſſeth, although they were orthodox and good, yet did not hold that doctrine. Thoſe of the third ſort, as he ſaith, were Chriſtians, but feignedly, and in name alone, and reſembling the Sadduces, yet not for their denying the errour of the thouſand years, for what relation could that have unto the Sadduces? But, contrariwiſe, for their denying the reſurrection, as the Sadduces did, and all this appears clearly, within the compaſs of a few lines, in the Greek text of Saint Juſtin; Beſides, if all at that time had been perſuaded of the truth of the Millenaries fancy, what needed Saint Irenæus have laboured ſo much, as he did, and ſpent ſo many Chapters in the proving of it? This being ſo, it appears as plainly that the Enquirer and alſo his Partner

Maſter

Maſter Chillingworth, were both of them deceived in ſeeking to father upon Saint Juſtin, that all Orthodoxal Believers of his time received the doctrine of the Chiliaſts, and that ſuch as did not, were held as Sadduces, or Hereticks; for, in the Text of Juſtin, there is no ſuch matter, but rather the quite contrary to it, as may appear fully by the Text it ſelf, and partly by the words before recited out of him; for, without all doubt, Saint Juſtin's many of pious and pure judgment or belief, and were no Chiliaſts, muſt needs be Orthodox, and could not be Hereticks, nor as the Sadduces amongſt the Jews, unleſs we will ſay that with one breath, he called them by both contrary names. Again, if, as theſe men ſay, all the whole Church were Chiliaſts during the firſt, ſecond or third hundred years, how could or durſt Dionyſius of Alexandria have oppoſed them, either without forcing his own Conſcience, or incurring the blame of Hereſie? Now, it is certain he was not counted an Heretick; and again, very unlikely he would ſtrain his Conſcience, by oppoſing any doctrine, received as orthodoxal by the whole Church. Again, it is probable Saint Dionyſe the Areopagite oppoſed that doctrine, therefore it cannot be certain, that during the firſt 200 years, it was not oppoſed: that Saint Dionyſe did it, appears by the works now extant bearing his name; and, that theſe works be his, is very probable, firſt, becauſe they are received for ſuch by the major part, both of the Weſtern and the Eaſtern Church; ſecondly, becauſe they were cited for his a thouſand years ago, and numbred amongſt the reſt of the Fathers ancient and undoubted Monuments, by an intelligent Authour, Philoponus, l. 2. de Operib. Creat. c. 21. & l. 3. c. 9. & 13.

The like may be ſaid of the pretended tradition of the Quartodecimanes touching the celebration of Eaſter after the manner of the Jews, which was wholly rejected and forbidden in the firſt Nicene Council, and before that time oppoſed by many, and principally by Pope Victor, who, as Ciacconius conceives, did not cut Polycrates and his Aſſociates from the body of the whole Church, but onely threatned it, or, as Euſebius ſeems to ſay, did doe it, but, yet at the inſtance of Saint Irenæus, and ſome others, if he had once paſt it, did not proſecute the cenſure againſt them, but let it fall; and, that it was ſo, is very probable, becauſe there is no memory made how the ſentence was received, whether with obedience, or otherwiſe; which particular, doubtleſs, would never have been omitted by Hiſtorians, no more than the ſentence it ſelf; or the intention of it was, if there had been any thing to regiſter; and beſides, becauſe we find not by any record, but that all proceeded with thoſe Aſian Churches, as formerly it had done, without any note or alteration. And, by this, is ſolved all that Chillingworth with ſo much animoſity, objecteth againſt the learned Cardinal Perone.

Salvian, lib. 5. de Gubern. Dei, where he ſpeaks in excuſe of ſome Arian Goths, ſpeaks not at all in excuſe of their Hereſie, but ſuppoſing that ſundry of them might have been innocently miſ-led, conceiveth more hope of ſuch mens ſalvation, than of ſuch Catholicks, who lived careleſly and lewdly. Now, what can this make againſt the tradition, or definition of the Church? Onely this Enquirer muſt ſay ſomething to his Mother, and be making difficulties where none is.

Chap. 15. Anſwer to the fifteenth Chapter.

Section 1. To the three next Paragraphs, 23, 24, 25. you profeſs it needleſs for you to give any anſwer, and doe it ſo willingly, becauſe, as you ſay, the diſcourſes are intricate, i. e. ſuch as you cannot eaſily accommodate anſwer to; but eſpecially, becauſe it is ſufficient for private men to learn the common doctrine of the preſent Church; and therefore there will lie no obligation on me to reply any thing, ſave onely this, that his Lordſhip's arguments do ſtill prove ſufficient to the end, to which he deſigned them, to ſhew that Tradition is no infallible guide; which that you acknowledge, your diverſion ſeems to intimate, and your many proofs, that 'tis not needfull it ſhould be.

Section 2. But then it is in you a great injuſtice, not to take notice of his Lordſhip's deſign, to which his arguments are concluding, (but to impoſe another on him, to which he never thought himſelf engaged, nor could have foreſeen your pleaſure without the ſpirit of divination) and yet, to chide him for impertinence, and pretermit and deſpiſe all that he hath ſaid, upon this onely ground of diſpleaſure, becauſe he hath not proved what you now think fit to ſet him for his task.

Section 3. This onely you muſt pleaſe to note, that the appointing the ignorant to learn their belief from the common doctrine of the Church (as before you did from the Catechiſms) doth intimate your opinion, that your preſent Church is infallible, but is no ſhew of proof that it is ſo (and ſo petitio principii) nay, if your words ſignify, as they ſound [that your doctrine thus taught is credible and perſuaſive enough] I may conclude that your Church is not infallible; for whatever is taught by ſuch an one, is more than credible and perſuaſible.

Section 4. Your ſubtilty about the way of knowing the River Thames will as little come home to the buſineſs of Infallibility (though to Credibility it may) unleſs every Water-man on the River be as infallible as your Church, for of him it is that I learn it; and though his credit be great enough for a matter of this moment, and in it I would as willingly be ignorant or uncertain, as be at the trouble to ſeek out a better ſecurity; In matters of greater moment, I may be excuſed if I am not ſo credulous, if I chooſe not to believe them, whoſe intereſts are concerned, at leaſt if I think every Catechiſm on the ſtall, to be ſomewhat leſs than infallible.

Section 5. Having now ſufficiently diſclaimed Tradition (at leaſt ſhewn your opinion of it, that you have little need of it to ſuſtain your Churches infallibility) and ſo granted as much as his Lordſhip attempts to prove, yet for ſome former profeſſion of kindneſs to it, you will now take its part a little (rather than his Lordſhip ſhall be permitted to ſay any thing true) and vindicate it from the argument about the Chiliaſts. In which I muſt tell you, that what you here affirm of his Lordſhip and Maſter Chillingworth, is not true of his Lordſhip (whether it be of Maſter Chillingworth, is not tanti, as that, not having the book by me, I ſhould take the pains to examine it.)

Section 6. As firſt, this, that he ſeeks to father on Saint Juſtin, that all orthodoxal Believers of his time received the doctrine of the Chiliaſts, whereas all that his Lordſhip ſaith, is but the repeating of Juſtin's own words (wherein he cannot be deceived in your opinion, for you before recite the ſame) and tranſlating them (wherein he is not deceived, for he doth it ad literam) and in a word affirming, that Juſtin ſaith he holds it, and ſo do all that are in all parts orthodox Chriſtians, which phraſe [all that are (i. e. which he ſaith are) in all parts orthodox] that it differs from this other of yours [all orthodoxal believers] I ſhall appeal to no other judgment than that of your own conſcience, who in the former page affirm, that Juſtin ſpake of three ſorts of men; Firſt, Thoſe that did, as he conceived, in all points hold aright; the ſecond, which though they did not ſo in all things, yet were ἀ καθαρᾶς καὶ εὐσεβοῦς γνώμης, of a pure and pious judgment, (and thoſe which are ſuch, I ſhall ſuppoſe to be orthodoxal believers, though as it appears by your acknowledgment, they did not hold right in all things.) Or if your analyſing of the place do not ſufficiently convince you of this difference, (and the injury that conſequently you have done his Lordſhip) I ſhall then, (having long ago ſeriouſly weighed that place) Firſt, give you an account of it, ſuch as I doubt not will ſatisfy you; and when I have done ſo, Secondly, confeſs the weakneſs of that place to conclude any thing againſt Catholick tradition; and yet Thirdly, make it clear, that you have wronged his Lordſhip in your report of his citation.

Section 7. First, For the doctrine of the millennium, I profeſs to believe, that it appears not to be Juſtin's affirmation, that it was not oppoſed by his contemporaries, but rather the contrary, which I conclude from theſe

P. 306. C. words, Πολλὰς γὰρ οὖν καὶ πρὸ ἐ καθαρᾶς καὶ εὐσεβοῦς ὄντων χριστιανῶν γνώμης, τοῦτο μὴ γινώσκειν ἐσήμανά σοι. I have ſignified to you that many do not acknowledge this doctrine of the 1000 years, and thoſe many, Chriſtians that are of pure and pious opinion or judgment. And that you may be beholding to me, I ſhall alſo profeſs, that I am not of the opinion of thoſe learned men that have conceived that period falſe written; and that either οὖν ſhould be changed into οὐ, (which would be a ſtrange and bold Criticiſm, of very ill example, if it were admitted againſt the conſent of Copies; and then Secondly, it would leave a very perplexed period of it:) or that μὴ ſhould be left out; For firſt, this would be as dangerous a Criticiſm, and of as ill example, which would make Authours opinions mutable into the quite contradictory; and yet ſuch, as is not without example among you, witneſs the diſputation between the Regulars and Seculars in the controverſie about the neceſſity of having an Ordinary here in England, upon occaſion as I remember, of a Canon of a Council concerning Confirmation, one ſide contending that [non] ſhould be in, the other that it ſhould be left out, a controverſie about a word, nay a ſyllable, but yet that of ſome concernment. Secondly, if either of theſe emendations ſhould be admitted, the antecedents and conſequents would not naturally and in good ſtyle connect, but the ſenſe of this period would be juſt all one with that that went before immediately.

Section 8. A ſecond proof of what I ſaid, I ſhall fetch from this, that Trypho in that place (though Juſtin had told him that he denied not the Millennium, yet) ſuſpected that Juſtin had equivocated with him, on this ground, becauſe other Chriſtians were not of this opinion, and therefore begins with εἰπέ μοι ἀληθῶς, tell me whether you confeſs it ſincerely, ἢ ἵνα δόξῃς ἡδέως ἀκοῦσαι, &c. and Juſtin anſwers, that ſure he would not ſay it, if he had not thought it, and thereupon repeats, that he had confeſt to him, ὅτι ἐγὼ μὲν, καὶ ἄλλοι πολλοὶ ταῦτα φρονοῦμεν, and promiſes he would ſet out a Book of this diſputation, and profeſs it openly to others as well as him, and adds, that he means not to follow men and their doctrines, but God; all which argues his acknowledgment that the opinion was not uncontradicted by men, nor generally conſented to by Chriſtians.

Section 9. P. 307. A laſt proof ſhall be, that thoſe words which ſeem moſt to the contrary [ἐγὼ δ' οὐ καὶ πάνυ εἶσιν ὀρθογνώμονες καὶ πάντα χριστιανοί] will not come home to the proof of it, nor indeed of any more than this, that he was of that opinion, and ſome others in all things conſenting with him; for it being ſuppoſed that he was of that opinion, it cannot be expected of him, that he ſhould affirm any that hold it not (though never ſo orthodox in other things) to be καὶ πάντα ὀρθογνώμονες, of right opinion in all things: becauſe every honeſt man ſuppoſing his own opinions to be right, (for elſe he will change them) muſt alſo ſuppoſe, that they that differ from him in one of thoſe, are not in that, (and ſo not in all things) of right opinions.

Section 10. For the truth is, he ſpeaks of three ſorts of men (wherein I ſhall not differ much from you) the firſt, that denied the reſurrection and the 1000 years, and thoſe he calls λεγόμενοι χριστιανοὶ, ἄθεοι, ἀσεβεῖς, αἱρετισταί; nominal Chriſtians, Atheiſts, impious heretical leaders; the ſecond, thoſe that acknowledged the reſurrection and denied the Millennium, and thoſe are contained under καθαρᾶς καὶ εὐσεβοῦς γνώμης ὄντες χριστιανοὶ, Chriſtians of pure

P. 306. and pious opinions; the third ſort, thoſe that held both, as himſelf, ἄλλοι πολλοὶ, many others, and εἰ τινὲς καὶ πάντα

P. 307. ὀρθογνώμονες, if there were any that were orthodox in all things.

Section 11. This being ſet down (if you pleaſe) by way of compliance with you in the firſt place, I ſhall make no ſcruple to add in the ſecond, that by Juſtin it cannot be concluded, that the 1000 years was a matter of Catholick belief in his time, but onely favour'd by him, and many others; and conſequently, though that were after condemned in the Church, would it not be from this teſtimony inferr'd, that a Catholick doctrine, (much leſs a tradition) were condemned.

Section 12. And therefore (which was the third thing I promiſed you) you may obſerve, that his Lordſhip ſpake very cautiouſly, and (as any man will now conceive) very critically, according to the importance of Juſtin's words, that Juſtin held it, and ſaid, that all that were in all parts (that is in all particular points) orthodox Chriſtians did ſo too, but no more; which is much leſs than what you lay to his Lordſhip's charge, in the firſt place, that he fathers on Juſtin, that all orthodoxal believers of his time received the doctrine of the Chiliaſts; And infinitely leſs, than that which you lay to him in the ſecond part of the charge, that he fathers again

B. on Juſtin, that ſuch as did not receive that doctrine were held as Sadducees or Hereticks; To which I anſwer in a word, that ſure your memory of things is confuſed, and ſo apt to betray you to write things, which are apparently falſe, for ſo this particular is, his Lordſhip not ſaying one word to this purpoſe in this Paragraph.

Section 13. Which three things being thus cleared, I ſhall now proceed to view your dealing in that which his Lordſhip mentions from Irenæus in this matter.

Section 14. Of him indeed it is true, his Lordſhip ſalth, that he ſets down the doctrine of the Chiliaſts directly for a tradition, and relates the very words that Chriſt uſed, when he taught this. And to thoſe words of his Lordſhip's,

P. 497. I ſhall make bold to add the words of Irenæus on which they ſeem to be grounded: Preſbyteri qui Johannem viderunt, meminerunt audiſſe ſe ab eo, & hæc Papias Johannis auditor, Polycarpi contubernalis vetus homo, teſtata reliquit. The Preſbyters that ſaw John, remember that they heard this of him: and Papias, Saint John's Audi-

P. 498. tour, that dwelt with Polycarpus, an ancient man, left theſe things teſtified. This ſurely ſounds ſomewhat towards a teſtimony of Apoſtolick Tradition, and if it be capable of an anſwer reconcileable with your doctrine of Tradition, (as that Irenæus was miſtaken in him, and with him Saint Jerome, in taking him for one of Saint John's Auditours, when ſaith Euſeb. l. 3. c. 39. he himſelf confeſſes ἀκριβῶς μὲν ἢ ἀυτόπτου ἑαυτὸν γενέσθαι, παρεληφέναι δὲ τὰ περὶ τῆς πίστεως ἅπερ καὶ παρ' ἐκείνοις γνωρίμων διήκουεν) may yet certainly be acknowledged a difficulty worth your taking notice of. And yet you that were ſo large on that of Juſtin to little purpoſe, have not vouchſafed to take notice of this of Irenæus, but on the other ſide affirm, that Irenæus laboured very much, and ſpent many Chapters in proving of it. From whence, I confeſs you are willing to aſſume, that all at that time were not perſuaded of the truth of the Millenaries fancies; but as that is a ſtrange way of concluding, from his ſpending pains and Chapters to prove it, to infer that it was not generally believed in his age (when 'tis poſſible, his ſo large a proving did make all men then of that opinion, and his proving it poſitively, and not againſt any adverſary, though it doth not prove he had then no adverſary, doth much leſs prove that he had) ſo is there not added by you any other, or indeed, any tittle of anſwer to what is brought by his Lordſhip out of Irenæus.

His Lordſhip ſaith alſo in this Paragraph, that they that were after againſt the Millenaries, never quoted any for themſelves before Dionyſius Alexandrinus, who lived 250 years after Chriſt: this indeed ſounds ſomewhat toward concluding, that that was the doctrine of the firſt age, not oppoſed by any prime Doctour, and might be worth your pains in anſwering too, but you endeavour not that neither, but would make it improbable, that if it were ſo general a doctrine, Dionyſius ſhould dare to oppoſe it. This is very ill arguing againſt a matter of fact, to aſk how could or durſt he? there is nothing done ſo many years ſince, but ſome probability may, by a witty man, be brought againſt it; I confeſs I acknowledge my opinion, that there were in that age men otherwiſe minded (as out of Juſtin it appeared) and his Lordſhip ſaith nothing to the contrary out of any other evidences, (no more than we made it clear he did out of Juſtin) all that he ſaith is, that Papias had gotten the prime Doctours into the belief of it, and that no one of thoſe two firſt ages oppoſed it, that is, wrote or interpoſed in any conſiderable manner againſt it. Section 15.

And if I were apt to change my opinion in this matter, on eaſy terms, I ſhould go near to doe it upon the view of your proof of the contrary; ſo exceeding feeble and weak is it. For ſuppoſing all the eminent men for thoſe ages had been for it, upon the ſtrength of ſome places of Scripture, and Papias his report from Saint John; it would not yet be very difficult for a learned man, Dionyſius Alexandrinus (when no act of Council had interpoſed or bound up that doctrine) in the degree that he thought that thoſe places of Scripture were miſunderſtood, and that Papias had abuſed them, in the ſame degree I ſay, to declare his opinion and the grounds of it, and never force or ſtrain his own conſcience, or incur the blame of hereſie by ſo doing, Section 16.

For what think you of another opinion that Irenæus took up, juſt upon the ſame terms, of Chriſt's being betwixt 40 and 50 years old, for which he vouched Scripture, as he did for tother, and the authority of omnes ſeniores (larger than Presbyteri in tother) teſtantur qui in Aſia apud Johannem diſcipulum Domini convenerunt, id ipſum tradidiſſe eis Johannem, &c. All the Elders witneſs it, that were in Aſia with John, that he delivered it to them; & qui alios Apoſtolos viderunt, hæc eadem ab ipſis audierunt, & teſtantur de ejuſmodi relatione, they that ſaw the other Apoſtles, heard the ſame of them, and bear witneſs of ſuch a relation. This is as high an expreſſion of Apoſtolical Tradition (if we will believe Irenæus) as univerſally teſtified to be ſo, as any could be thought to be. And yet ſure you would not think it a ſin againſt conſcience, or obnoxious to the cenſure of Hereſie, for any man of meaner parts and authority than Dionyſius Alexandrinus, to have oppoſed this phanſy, and profeſt his opinion to the contrary; you muſt know, that there was not that perfect yoke of tyranny gone out upon all mens necks, as now your infallible Church doth glory of, that no man muſt oppoſe any the meaneſt aſſertion or opinion of the Doctours of the Church, (though not at all de fide) but preſently he muſt be an Heretick; at leaſt, divinity was not turn'd into ſuch an art, that it muſt receive no growth, or ſenſible change, but all go on in the ſame track, believe (nor underſtand) no more in Scripture, than the preſent Church underſtands, and ſo in effect have all their skill in tongues and fathers and even their judicative faculty, as ſo many unprofitable burthens upon them, that muſt not be made uſe of to the diſcovery of an errour, to the helping of the world to more light, reforming any thing that is amiſs in it. Adverſ. hær. l. 2. c. 39. C.

This which is one of the greateſt modern crimes in Chriſtianity, was not ſo ancient as thoſe purer days, wherein ill life was as cenſurable, as now falſe opinions, (I mean ſuch as though ſuppoſed falſe, are yet perfectly extrinſecal to the analogy of faith) wherein ἀσέβεια and εὐσέβεια, impiety and piety, divided the Church into erroneous and true members, and teaching of opinions not before embraced (ſo it were not with pride, or judging of others) could be well enough endured. And ſo (according to the old rule of diſtingue tempora) do but conſider how diſtant thoſe times are from theſe, amongſt you on one ſide, and your oppoſite extreme (that run from you ſo far, till they meet you again at the Antipodes) on the other, and you will give Dionyſius Alexandrinus leave to dare oppoſe that doctrine of the Chiliaſts, though it had (more generally than it did) prevailed amongſt them. Section 18.

Another argument you have againſt the general reception of that doctrine, [that 'tis probable Saint Dionyſius the Areopagite oppoſed it] I wonder one that aſſerts an infallible Church, ſhould deal ſo mightily in probabilities, juſt as if a profound Geometer ſhould uſe but topical arguments. Now to ſee how you prove this probability, 'Tis proved by the works now extant bearing his name. Section 19. D.

What works thoſe are, and how improbable to be his, I could give you a large account by ſome hints which I remember Photius in his μυριόβιβλον helpt me to, but I ſhall ſatisfy my ſelf onely with anſwering your argument out of Philoponus, briefly thus. That in the places by you cited, he mentions onely an Epiſtle of Dionyſius to Polycarpus, in which you know, or may know, there is no word of the Chiliaſts, and then that will be a very aliene teſtimony, and very unable to countenance the bulk of thoſe books under Dionyſius his name; which may all be ſpurious, (and in them the teſtimonies againſt the Chiliaſts) though that letter ſhould be canonical; and now ſee, I pray, what your probability is come to. E.

For your diſcourſe about the Quartodecimani, I will not divine how it came in here, but am ſure it hath no right to be taken notice of by me; his Lordſhip having not ſaid one word of them, nor of any friend of theirs whoſe intereſts lie common with them; and therefore ſhall I return no word to that part of your diſcourſe, till you ſhew how I am obliged to it. Section 20.

Section 21. F. What his Lordship ſaith out of Salvian, you confeſs to be true, but ſee not what it makes againſt Tradition; If you be not modeſt in concealing your knowledge in this matter, but really ignorant, I ſhall then tell you. His Lordſhip proves by this, that the Church that ſuffers Salvian to be a member of it, while he refuſes to paſs ſentence of condemnation upon Arians (after they were condemned by a Council) either differs much from your Church (that will condemn any man for an Heretick, that ſhall profeſs not to condemn all Proteſtants) or elſe muſt ſuppoſe and admit the plea for Salvian, that he was ſo earneſt againſt ill men, that for aggravating of their crime he leſſens that of Hereticks. And then if it may be accepted in one Father's behalf, that he could ſpeak hyperbolically, or paſſionately, why may it not be admitted in another, that one of thoſe, or ſome other collateral conſideration might have influence on any ſpeech that ſhould be cited from them, and then the authority of Fathers will ceaſe to be infallible.

Section 22. For this, by the way, you may pleaſe to obſerve of his Lordſhip's reaſonings about Tradition and authority of Fathers, (which before I gave warning of) that they are not deſigned, or fitted to the taking away all authority from them, to make them vile or mean to any, but onely to reduce them in ordinem, to prove them not infallible: the Topick à teſtimonio humano, is but a Topick ſtill; and though ſometimes, being heightened with circumſtances (of which it is capable) it is a very convincing Topick, yet is not for all this, a demonſtration; and ſo there is a difficulty which may exerciſe you inſtead of ſcoffing of his Lordſhip in the cloſe of the Chapter.

To the 26, 27, 28. Sections, Chap. 16.

The Enquirer ſeems to be troubled not a little, becauſe we will not ſay with him, that men may be ſaved in a falſe Religion, or becauſe we do not think our Religion falſe, or any other Religion true beſides our own; and in the ſame vein Chillingworth his Commentatour runs very fluently, and upon this ill-ſounding ſtring is harping continually. Yet for all this harping, it will not be eaſily underſtood what offence againſt Charity it can be for us to judge, either that Chriſtianity alone is the ſaving Religion, or that our Religion is the onely true Chriſtianity. For ſay we ſhould be deceived in making this judgment, yet this ſame at the moſt can be but a want in our ſelves of right underſtanding, and not any breach of charity towards others, or any matter of exclamation, as ſome frivolous men of late have made it. Wherefore, if we will ſtate the queſtion rightly, we are not to enquire whether we want charity in holding that none but Catholicks and true Chriſtians can be ſaved, or in our holding that we onely are of that ſort; or again, whether our Adverſaries for their accuſing us, want not wit and charity together, or at leaſt one of them; but the queſtion between us ought to be, whether there be more ſaving religions than one? or whether ours be not that one? and this is the old controverſie in Bellarmine and others, and may be diſputed without any anger, or without diſguiſing, or multiplying of controverſies on ſet purpoſe, done by theſe Novelliſts, as it ſeems, for making more buſineſs than needed, or cauſing more diſtaſte and alienation than was before.

The Enquirer is much diſpleaſed with us for damning, as he calls it, all that are not of the Church of Rome. But for pacifying of his angry ſpirit, I demand of any for him, what ſin he thinks it in us to judge that all who die out of the Church of God, die in an evil ſtate; or what other, to think that our Catholick Church, which he diminutively calls the Church of Rome, is the onely Church of God. Let him ſatisfy me in this, and I will eaſily ſatisfy him in the other. In the mean time we are not nice to declare, That there is but one ſaving Religion. That there is but one true Chriſtianity, and that one is the ſaving Religion. That there is but one Catholick Church, and that this one Church is, by the inſtitution of Chriſt, and according to the conſent of Antiquity, to be governed by the See Apoſtolick, and by the Succeſſour of Saint Peter, as chief Paſtour and Preſident of the reſt. Now what hurt is there in all this, or what want of Chriſtian charity? It is not uncharitable to ſay that ſome offenders ſhall be damned, and if any, then why not thoſe who are truly and really Sectaries and men obſtinate, for it is like that they deſerve it as well as any. There wanted not one of this Enquirer's confraternity, who fancied ſometimes to himſelf, that all the damnation that was to fall upon the wicked, was an annihilation of them and extinction, and not a perpetuity of torments; which conceit is ſo charitable, that it exceeds the charity even of God himſelf, and controlls his revelations made to the contrary in the Holy Scripture, and condemns them as guilty of too much rigour and ſeverity, and therefore no marvail though we poor mortals cannot eſcape their cenſure.

But now, leſt any man ſhould think our doctrine to be harſh and rigorous, he may pleaſe to be inform'd, that we do not hold every man for a Pagan and an Infidel who embraces Paganiſm, but onely ſo many of them as be guilty of their errour through affected, or culpable ignorance; which defect though it be a formal ignorance of the truth, yet it is a virtual knowledge of their errour, and an interpretative rejection of the truth, and alſo a reſiſtance to God and his divine veracity, manifeſted in his revelations; and therefore all theſe, whether Pagans or Hereticks, be hainous offenders, and αὐτοκατάκριτοι, that is to ſay, judged and condemned by their own Conſciences, of which doctrine it ſeems both this Enquirer, and after him his ſecond Maſter Chillingworth, were ignorant, by their inſinuating that no man is an Heretick, or ſelf-condemned, but onely ſuch as adhere to a doctrine which he formerly knows to be erroneous, that is to ſay, onely ſuch as doe that which is impoſſible to be done; which concluſion is a covert affirmation that there be no Hereticks at all, nor can be any; and ſo all is ſafe, whether ſound or no.

In like manner we do not hold to be an Heretick, or to be out of the Catholick Church every one who embraces an hereſie, but ſuch a number of them onely as doe it with an obſtinate mind, and without preparation to be reformed, or to hearken unto reaſon when it is told them. By which doctrine it appears, that we are not ſo ſtrict as we may ſeem, nor yet ſo large as ſome would have us. For on the one ſide, we do not maintain that Hereticks can be ſaved, or that hereſie is not a deadly or damnable ſin, as ſome Socinians and other Libertines would have us think: And on the other ſide, we dilate the ſpaces of the Church Catholick farther than every body conceives we do, and by that means comprehend within it many that in the eye of the world, ſeem aliens unto it; ſo that our charity is not irregular in judging Hereticks to be in good ſtate, but it is rather in concluding that very many are not Hereticks really and interiourly, though outwardly they ſeem to be. And thus you ſee we do not cry all men down to Hell, nor yet any more than we are compelled to do by the doctrine delivered to us about that point in Holy Scripture.

After this damning and firing men in the other world, of which the Enquirer hath wrongfully accus'd us, he proceedeth to blame us for ſending Hereticks to the fire in this, and therefore ſaith that he believes that throughout antiquity we ſhall not find the putting to death of any (for Religion) but onely of ſuch as began to kill firſt.

This provocation to antiquity, howſoever the matter be, can be of no force, unleſs antiquity did condemn that practice as unlawfull, becauſe antiquity did not all it might doe, but left divers things for poſterity to add as it ſhould ſee expedient.

Beſides,

Beſides, foraſmuch as concerns puniſhment of impious men and innovatours both by death and other ways, if the Authour had lookt better into antiquity, he could not but have believed otherwiſe, as our Authours do ſhew at large; for it is clear that amongſt the Jews it was the practice to puniſh impious people very ſeverely, and all ſuch as with new doctrines ſought to infect others, puniſhing according to the preſcript of Moſes's law, ſome with death, other-ſome by other temporal puniſhments.

The Canon-law alſo and the Imperial Decree the ſame, to all which the practice of the Church accords; and laſtly, reaſon her ſelf, and the common rules of equity and juſtice do permit, yea and preſcribe the ſame: and theſe ſuffrages are ſo powerfull and prevailing, as they ſuffice, not onely for the juſtification of the Churches preſent practice, but alſo for the condemnation of high preſumption and arrogance of all who ſhould be ſo hardy as to impugn or queſtion it.

Nevertheleſs this ſame practice of infliction of temporal puniſhments upon offenders againſt Religion, is not general without any limitation or reſtraint, as ſome may imagine it to be, as if forſooth none of a different Religion from ours could be exempted from them; but contrariwiſe it admits exception in many caſes, as we are about to declare preſently.

Know therefore that whereſoever any Kingdom or Commonwealth is ſettled in a juſt and a peaceable poſſeſſion of Catholick Religion, without any notable commixture of contrary profeſſions, as for example, in Italy or Spain, at this preſent; In this caſe it is no cruelty or rigour to inflict temporal puniſhments upon all ſuch as ſhall adventure to diſturb that ſetled peace by introducing thither any new doctrines upon pretence of whatſoever reformation; and that this may be done, ſtands with ſo much reaſon as cannot be probably contradicted. Neither is this courſe of ſeverity any defence unneceſſary, foraſmuch as vitious and over-weening ſpirits are moſt efficaciouſly repreſſed and withheld from evil by fear of temporal puniſhments in this life, becauſe their chief aim is at temporal contentments in the ſame, being moved more with the preſent, than with thoſe other that are ſpiritual and to come, Conſcience and Religion having little influence into what they doe. In fine, they are governed more with ſenſe than reaſon, with ſtripes than with Philoſophy, inſomuch, that neither the Schools of Philoſophers, nor the Temples of God, can work half ſo much with theſe worms of the Earth, as temporal Tribunals can. Nor though the enemy be never ſo deſpicable, is he therefore to be neglected, becauſe the meaneſt Seducer may doe miſchief, as we find by the effects of the Tubmen; and again, becauſe the groſſeſt errours, if they tend to liberty, or be but new, may be perſuaded to the multitude, as, by the ſucceſſes of Mahomet, it is manifeſt; and the rather in this caſe of ours, becauſe we experience daily, that our people having been once poſſeſt, that the Religion of the See Apoſtolick, and of their own Forefathers was ſuperſtition, they are eaſily perſuaded, that the farther they depart from that Religion, the more pure and reformed they ſhall be, and ſo will be forward to run blindly on, till they paſs all the bounds of Chriſtianity, and reform all to nothing; for with ſuch bewitched minds as theſe, every new nonſenſe will be more acceptable, and be received ſooner, than any old ſenſe, and this is the effects of thoſe raylings againſt Rome which they have heard continually out of the Pulpits now for ſo many years together, without any intermiſſion.

But, although this courſe of ſeverity be neceſſary for the preventing of diſturbances by innovation, yet nevertheleſs it is not to be extended unto all that any where amongſt us do teach, or profeſs erroneous doctrines, or Religions different from our own, but onely againſt corruptours or invaders, that is to ſay, ſuch as break in by fraud or violence, and diſturb the quiet of the Church. For, after ſuch time as the invaſion is paſt, and the invaders gone, and that they are ſucceeded by another generation, which is not guilty of making any irruption, but, with whatſoever errour they are tainted, it is contracted by the vice of education from their Parents and other ſuch inſtructours, and withall do behave themſelves peaceably, I ſay that againſt ſuch as theſe the Church doth not proceed, nor execute the ſeverity of the Laws in force againſt Hereticks; of this ſort be at this day, the deſcendents of firſt Proteſtants in this Kingdom, whoſe Anceſtours that were the invaders lived about King Edward and Queen Mary. Againſt theſe deſcendents the Church doth not preſs the Canon-law, though againſt the former ſort it did, and had juſt cauſe given ſo to doe. Conformable to this difference between Proteſtant and Proteſtant, do the Catholicks in France and Polonia ſuffer the Proteſtants to live with them, without moleſtation, and to enjoy the liberties and privileges of the Kingdom, as formerly they had done in Auſtria, Stiria and Carinthia, till ſuch time is they became ſeditious, and conſpired againſt thoſe who gave them freedom.

But now let it be noted and born in memory, that notwithſtanding theſe gentle proceedings of Catholicks towards the Proteſtants after ſo many loſſes and injuries ſuffer'd from them, the ſame Proteſtants being themſelves but juniours, and living by ſufferance, fall hotly upon perſecution of Catholicks whereſoever they grow to be the ſtronger ſide, and that alſo in moſt Provinces, after a very violent, mercileſs, and deſperate manner, ſlay, impriſon, rob, baniſh, defame, in fine, ſuffer Catholicks in no place where they are predominant, and this againſt all right and common equity. Which manner of proceeding I muſt tell the Enquirer, is much worſe and more unreaſonable than Turkiſh, for the Turks though Aliens, Barbarians and Conquerours, are ſenſible of the right the Chriſtians of their conquer'd Provinces have for the free exerciſe of their Religion, and therefore do not go about to reſtrain them from it, but let them continue quietly in that right of theirs, and ſo they do even to this day, to the great ſhame of Proteſtants and Puritans here in theſe Kingdoms, may it be ſpoken without offence, being, as all men ſee plainly, exceeded in juſtice, and civility by the Turks, "Wherefore "no marvail that our Enquirer is forced to confeſs that Calvin is to blame in this point, and the Church of England "a little: which is a little too much, for, addeth he, Negare manifeſta non audeo, & excuſare immodica non "poſſum. Sure this Enquirer came with very little indifferency to give his judgment here, when he ſaith, the Church of England is guilty but a little, I would know of him what is a great deal, if all that we have ſuffer'd from it be but a little, But it is well he would acknowledge thus much, for it is more than others have done, and more ingenuity appears in him, than in them, and perhaps he would have ſaid more, if it might have been well taken, though in confeſſing this little he inſinuates all. Doubtleſs, no manner of proceeding can be more unworthy than for a latter generation to forget from whoſe loyns they came, and to become harſh and contumelious to their own Fore-fathers children, and perſecute them with all rigour, as if they were enemies and invaders, and aliens, onely for their honourable continuing in that faith which their Anceſtours did leave them and commended to them as chief inheritance in that faith, which hitherto they which aſſail it have never been able by any argument to prove it falſe; nor yet on the other ſide, to evict by any unanſwerable demonſtration that their own new faith was true. Wherefore ſince, if any have more right one than another for the exerciſe of their Religion in this Kingdom, it is we, and this right cannot be taken from us by any power under Heaven; and again, were your reaſons never ſo good, yet you are not to ſchool us, or to be our Tutours, or to compell us unto change: Therefore the ſeverity that hath been uſed over us hath no warrant for it, no preſident or example, nothing wherewith to countenance it in the ſight of the World, or to juſtify it in the ſight of God, but is every way abominable and foul, ſuch, in fine, as neither the Chriſtians uſed to the Pagans their Predeceſſours, nor Catholicks to the deſcendents of the formoſt and invading Proteſtants, nor any civil man would offer to another.

" If the Religion, ſaith the Enquirer, had always remained the ſame, it would not be defended by ways ſo contrary " to thoſe by which it was propagated. But now what ways are theſe? he means force and violence, and ſaying, To the fire with him, and To hell with him, for theſe are the Enquirer's own expreſſions. To theſe I add the ſlanderous and diabolical charges of Chillingworth, who knew much of the Enquirer's mind, although in all things he did not follow his direction. " You profeſs, ſaith Chillingworth, c. 2. Sect. 101. that it is lawfull for you to uſe violence " and power whenſoever you can have it for the planting of your Doctrine, and extirpation of the contrary. Thus he, but becauſe he cites no Authour for this ſo hainous an accuſation, we may juſtly ſuſpect that you your ſelves hold it lawfull for you to ſlander and calumniate for the defence of your own bad cauſe, and the overthrowing of the contrary whenſoever other means of doing it does fail you, as indeed it falls out continually. The ſame heavy charge he in foul terms reiterates, c. 5. Sect. 96. " You, ſaith he, teach plainly you may propagate Religion whenſoever you have power, by " depoſing of Kings, and invaſion of Kingdoms, and think when you kill the adverſaries of it you doe God good ſervice.

For clearing of us againſt this malitious charge, I call into the Court Saint Thomas of Aquine and all his with him in 2. 2. q. 10. art 8. as witneſſes ſufficient to juſtify our cauſe, and ſhew our innocency, even againſt the Devil himſelf that great calumniatour of our Brethren, and to them I add Acoſta in his book De procuranda Indorum ſalute, and Mariana in his hiſtory of Spain in ſundry places, and might add many more ſufficient to confute the adverſary, and make him hatefull to every honeſt heart. Beſides though in ſome caſes we, as other profeſſions alſo doe, make uſe of penal Laws wherewith to keep off invaders, and yet not for any interiour preſervation or defence: In like ſort we ſeek, by the help of the ſword and force of Arms to keep the Turks out of Chriſtendom; ſhall we all be blamed for doing ſo, or ſhall it be ſaid therefore, that we defend the Chriſtian Religion by Arms and violence, and by other means than it was propagated at the firſt? nothing leſs, we uſe reaſons to perſuade and plant our faith, we uſe the like to defend it againſt Infidels, Socinians, and all other Sects, how then is our Religion planted, propagated, or defended by violence? It is one thing to be fenced exteriourly and afar off with Statutes of temporal ſeverity againſt invaders, which courſe is a thing expedient and avowed both by us and all, and it is another thing to defend it interiourly by the ſame means, that is to ſay, to juſtify the right and truth of Religion by them, and this we diſavow, neither do we practice it any where, as it is moſt manifeſt.

The Enquirer was very provident when he deſired that, in theſe accuſations of violence, no recrimination ſhould be uſed, for he muſt needs ſee there was more matter returnable, than either could be gratefull, or they could juſtify, yet ſince he will needs talk of killing, and caſt the blame upon our ſide, he muſt be content if we make ſome reflexion upon the miſdemeanours of the Adverſary, as well as upon our own innocency. I deſire therefore, the intelligent Reader to conſider, whether in this laſt age, the Catholicks have put to death more Miniſters or half ſo many, as the Proteſtants of England have done Prieſts, who it is well known they have ſlain and butchered with great barbariſm and immanity.

But ſetting aſide theſe heavy crimes of bloud deliberately ſhed, who is it have afflicted others more in their Eſtates and Fortunes, they, or we? and for proof of this, we will offer fair, let them reſtore all they have taken with a ſtrong hand from us in livelihoods, both ſpiritual and temporal in all the Provinces of Europe, and we will reſtore all we have taken from them, and in that go no farther than this ſeventeenth Age which is now paſſing, be it in this Kingdom, or in thoſe about it. It is well known that in all thoſe Provinces, where both Religions are profeſſed and live intermingled, none be on the ſuffering hand but we, none perſecutes but they; and it is we who are the Aborigines, as I may ſo term us, and thereby have as much right for all indemnity as our Anceſtours could divolve upon us. We are not inſenſible of the wrong we ſuffer daily by having it printed and pronounced in publick Aſſemblies, on purpoſe to countenance injuries, and to excite againſt us the ignorant multitude, that our Religion is deſtructive of all others, and that amongſt us it is a main principle or maxime, that all other are to be invaded and deſtroyed by us, and this is affirmed confidently, though againſt all probability and experience. It cannot indeed be denied but truth is deſtructive of falſehood by the own power, as light is of darkneſs, and one contrary of another, but for external coaction or violence, we leave that to the Accuſers, and do not own it.

Maſter Pym in the Parliament Houſe.

By this it is not hard to make a judgment who have been the encroachers, and who have propagated and maintained themſelves by violence, you, or we? and who are the deſtructive party and live by the ſpoils and oppreſſion of others; let not thoſe who poſſeſs other mens goods cry out of wrongs, or make any brags of juſt dealing, for neither of theſe can come well out of their mouths.

This Enquirer confeſſeth both ſides are in fault, but we in more, and for this aſſertion of his brings in ſome light ſophiſtry, becauſe forſooth Proteſtants hold that they may err, but we maintain we cannot, and ſo will be ſure never to mend. That Proteſtants may err is granted him, and needs no other probation than experience, whereby we find they have filled all this Kingdom with diſſentions, and theſe diſſentions with civil wars, ſo that by this that you have erred, we know you may. But ſo frequent poſſibility of erring doth not extenuate but aggravate your crime. For if you may err ſo foulely, how dare you undertake to tutour others? how preſcribe laws? with what face perſecute? If your rule be ſo weak as it cannot contain you all in one body, but lets you diſperſe into multitude of Sects, and fall in pieces as now you do; why do you not forſake it and ſeek a better for it, or elſe have none at all; if you can find out a ſurer, why do you not learn wit by experience, but wallow on ſtill in the ſame mire; If this Enquirer ſpeak ſo ill for his Clients, we will not entertain him for our Advocate. The Proteſtants ſide ſets down for a rule of religion every ones private judgment in the interpretation of Scripture, and ſo doth Maſter Chillingworth the diſciple of Volkelius. We doe all that, yet we do not pleaſe them; nay more, we muſt be puniſhed by them for the reſult; what is this but to bid us doe a thing, and then puniſh us for doing it? Is not this extreme perverſity? certainly if the rule they give be a ſufficient warrant for their receding from the faith of their Anceſtours, and for their breaking off from the Church, and ſtanding in defiance of her, then doubtleſs much more may it warrant us to continue on and to keep off from any new doctrines, either of the Proteſtants, or any other Innovatours whatſoever, and ſure this is great reaſon and cannot be gainſayed.

Beſides, if we were to yield, to whom were it to be done? There is a world of diſtracted Sectaries now in this Kingdom, all ſprung from the ſame root, or from the rule of faith which is common to you all, of which one ſort imagines there is no Papacy, and theſe were the firſt Ring-leaders of all the rout; another, that there is no Epiſcopacy; a third, that there is no Clergy, but that Lay-elders is all in all, and muſt rule the roaſt; a fourth, that there is no Church nor Church-government at all, but that the Church is like a School of Philoſophers, where every man may believe and doe what he pleaſes without being accountable to another, or any obligation of conformity; and peradventure the Enquirer was one of this number, together with his confederate Mr. Chillingworth; a fifth ſort, that there is no Trinity; a ſixth, that there is no Sacrament, or at leaſt none neceſſary, or effectual. Is it not fit think you that theſe divided Chriſtians ſhould come and write Laws to others, or puniſh any man for non-conformity? nothing more improbable. It is a Comedy to ſee Doctour Featly a Proteſtant, and Page a Puritan make Catalogues of Hereticks, and when they have done, can find no way whereby to exempt themſelves, nor give a reaſon why they themſelves ſhould not be of the number, as much Sectaries as any other of the Catalogue.

The Enquirer charges us that becauſe we pretend to be infallible we have leſs reaſon to preſcribe to others; but on the contrary, methinks we ſhould have more, for, as he who is really infallible is fitteſt to guide and govern others, ſo he that thinks himſelf to be, is at leaſt in his own judgment more fit than he that does not. He adds, that this pretence of infallibility makes us ſure never to mend, or as his Scholar Chillingworth ſpeaketh, makes us incorrigible. True if it were a mere pretended one, but that is not yet proved, either by him, or any, although he ſay here in this twenty eighth Section, he undertakes to give reaſons why the Church of Rome is fallible. But, if, on the other ſide, it be a reality, and that the Enquirer's reaſons are but pretended, then ſurely will not this infallibility keep us from mending, but contrariwiſe from erring or having any thing to mend, or, which is all one, from any errours to correct. And thus we ſee that our Religion is maintained by the ſelf-ſame arts that bred it, that is to ſay, not by force, or violence, but by reaſon, and revelation, and ſpiritual induſtries, contrary to the ſurmiſes of this Enquirer.

Chap. 16. Anſwer to Chap. 16.

Your doctrine of damning all that are out of the Church of Rome, you have enlarged much above the occaſion that invited you to it, for all that his Lordſhip had ſaid on that Theme was onely this, that your certain and undoubted damning of all out of the Church of Rome, averſeth him from it. Which if it be true, you cannot blame him; (for ſure they that hear the puniſhment of judging, Matth. 7. [being judged of the Lord] will have little love to that piece of ſenſuality, (or conſequently, to the religion that requires them to run upon this danger.) And that the charge is true of you, you do at firſt acknowledge, by labouring to prove that there is no uncharitableneſs in it. Secondly, that it is neceſſary for you to maintain, or that otherwiſe you muſt fall into ſome great abſurdity, particularly this, that there is any Church but that which is governed by the See Apoſtolick; which is a rare petitio principii again, and ſaves us the pains of ſaying one word more in defence of the truth and juſtice of thoſe true words of his Lordſhip. Section 1.

For indeed, that encloſure of the Church, Chriſtianity and Salvation, to thoſe that are under the Roman ſubmiſſion, is the uncharitableneſs that you are charged of. The envy of which, it ſeems (after all your confidence) you are willing to remove from you, and therefore add an handſome lenitive, to keep any from thinking that your doctrine is rigorous or harſh. And truly if you might be taken at your word, he were very unkind that would require more charity of you than you yield even to Pagans themſelves, whom you will not hold Pagans, unleſs they be guilty of their errour through affected or culpable ignorance; and then ſure you will be as good to us, (that would be a little above Pagans) and till you can prove us to be guilty of errour, and that through affected or culpable ignorance, with an obſtinate mind, without preparation to be reformed, or hearken to reaſon when 'tis told us, (which till your arguments are more convincing, undoubtedly this diſcourſe of yours will not evidence us to be) we are in full capacity of your charity, and therefore ſhall not follow you any further, (leſt we provoke you again) in this point. Section 2.

Eſpecially ſince you are at leaſt in ſo good humour, that you utterly diſclaim this damning and firing men in another world. I beſeech God to confirm you in this temper, and deſire you may be taken at your word, and that witneſs may be called of this charity of yours, for ſure there be others of your brethren that have not uſed to grant ſo much. Section 3. On occaſion of this or the like ſpeech of mine anſwer, the Apologiſt in his review thought fit to add theſe words at the end of his ſixteenth Chapter: [Three propoſitions there are which we maintain; Firſt, that none but true Chriſtians can be ſaved. Secondly, none but true Catholicks can be ſaved; for true Catholicks and true Chriſtians be all one. Thirdly, none be true Catholicks but ſuch as live under the obedience of the See of Peter, and many do ſo, that through ignorance do not ſeem to do. The Gentiles find fault with the firſt propoſition, divers Sectaries with the ſecond, and now the Proteſtants with the third. All theſe have been pretended by ſome or other to be falſe, but how to be uncharitable is very hard to be underſtood.] To all which ſaying onely ſaid, not attempted to be proved, I ſhall onely ſay that I am ſorry to ſee him out of his good mood ſo ſoon, and deſire he will not expect we ſhall be ſo tame as to think him charitable, that ſaith none of any other See but Saint Peter's can be ſaved.

As for that of burning men here for religion, you ſeem unwilling to be tried by antiquity in this point, becauſe, ſay you, Antiquity did not all it might, but left ſomewhat to poſterity to add; yet ſure this was a little unlucky, that your additions to antiquity ſhould be of this bloudy complection; Chriſt's addition to the Ancients was, to love, and bleſs, and pray for enemies, not to retaliate injuries upon any terms; and your ἄκρον φιλοσοφίαν, your improvement of the ancient doctrine and practice, is of ſomewhat a diſtant making, your Sermon on the mount (Ebal it ſeems) to your diſciples, is perſecuting and maſſacring of friends, which never provoked you but by not being entirely of your opinion. Section 4.

But it ſeems you mean to prove it too, that this bloudy doctrine is no ſtranger to antiquity; and your firſt proof is from the Jews, whoſe practice it was to puniſh impious people, and ſuch as with new doctrines ſought to infect others; To which I anſwer, that thoſe againſt whom thoſe Jewiſh ſeverities were in force, were Atheiſts, and Idolaters, and falſe Prophets, that would take men off from the acknowledgment of the one God to Gentiliſm, which is ſure ſomewhat a diſtant ſtate from that of Proteſtants at this day. Section 5.

Your ſecond proof is from the Canon, and your third from the Imperial law; of which ſeeing you give us no taſte in either, and yet becauſe ſome men may have appetite to ſee what grounds you had for ſuch affirmation, I conceived it a probable courſe to know your mind, by looking into Bellarmine your great Champion; from the view of whoſe Collections, l. 3. de laicis, c. 21. this will be the reſult. Section 6.

That for the Canon-law, the authorities are not fetcht from the ancient Canons of any of the firſt or general Councils, but onely c. ad abolendam; cap. excommunicamus ext. de hæret. & cap. ſuper. eo, de hæret. in 6. (all which is no more than if you had cited it from your Popes (who muſt not look to be ſo authentical in this caſe) and yet will hardly come home to the burning of your fellow Chriſtians, onely becauſe they will not ſubmit to the Pope of Rome, the onely thing for which we were even now to be damned) and from the Council of Conſtance; which beſides that it is of a ſhort ſtanding, about 200 years ago, is made infamous Section 7.

A. infamous in this matter, by that vile reſolution of the [no Faith to be kept with Hereticks] the groſneſs of which poſition may make it reaſonable to expect this bloudy doctrine from them, but withall, to deprive it of all authority with others.

Section 8. As for the Imperial law, theſe places he produces; Firſt L. Manichæos, cod. de hæret. and to this I anſwer, that that Law makes not hereſie capital, but at the utmoſt makes it capable of an action after death, ſuch is the action of infamy, &c. and ſo they that have died Hereticks, may for the warning of others, be proceeded againſt, (as you know Traitours after death are infamous, i. e. their Children deprived of their honour, though the Father died unpuniſhed, becauſe undiſcerned) but that comes not home to our preſent purpoſe of burning or killing. Then L. Ariani, Cod. eodem. where indeed death was the puniſhment of the Manichees, who you know were a high rank of Hereticks, making two principles (which is in effect two Gods) the good and the evil, God and the Devil. But for others, viz. Arians and Macedonians, though thoſe were Hereticks, condemned by the firſt general Councils, and are expreſly there named, there is yet no ſuch puniſhment appointed them; and laſtly, L. quicunque, cod. eodem, in which, ſaith Bellarmine, jubentur occidi omnes qui prava docere tentant, all are commanded to be put to death who attempt to teach wicked things. But you muſt obſerve that that law being againſt the Eutychians, many penalties are there aſſigned to the ſeveral degrees of the guilt of that hereſie; pœna exilii, ſi Epiſcopos & Sacerdotes conſtituerint; ſcripta eorum nemo habeat ſub pœna deportationis perpetuæ; nemo eos audiat ſub pœna 10 librarum auri; ultimo ſupplicio coerceantur qui illicita docere tentaverint. Baniſhment if they conſtituted Biſhops or Prieſts; perpetual baniſhment upon having any of their books; 10 pounds or libres of gold to any that heard them; and capital puniſhment to thoſe that attempt to teach unlawfull things. Which laſt clauſe (that cited by Bellarmine, and by him extended to all falſe doctrine) belongs peculiarly to the Eutychians, for of them onely before the diſcourſe was; and beſide, the rule is, odioſa reſtringenda, laws of puniſhments, &c. muſt always be taken in the moſt reſtrained ſenſe; and ſo the utmoſt that any of theſe extends to, is onely in theſe two hereſies of Manichæiſm and Eutychianiſm, and that in caſe of teaching the contrary to law, and abuſing the people, and that after fair warning and prohibition; and all this, if it were granted (as truly I know no obligation that lies on all Chriſtians to think themſelves regulated by the Laws of the Emperours) would amount to very little againſt Proteſtants, who may well paſs for as moderate Hereticks, as Arians and Macedonians, who were not puniſhed with death.

Section 9. 'Tis true indeed, there is ſomewhat of this nature to be found againſt the Donatiſts (though Bellarmine mentions it not) L. Si quis rebaptizare, C. ne ſanctum baptiſma iteretur; but this was not again for opinion, but onely in taking upon them to re-baptize any, and peculiarly on the Circumcellions, which were a bloudy kind of people, and their vileneſs of this nature, guilt enough to own that ſeverity; whereas, on the other ſide, we find that Idacius and Ithacius were condemned by the Biſhops of France for being authours of puniſhing ſome Pricillianiſts with the ſword; and in the Eaſt a whole Synod was condemned for conſenting to the burning of Begomyle; and ſo much for your authorities, or more whenſoever you pleaſe to produce them. From whence will appear the wide diſtance of your practices in theſe and other Kingdoms, from that, that the moſt Popiſh Canons or Imperial Conſtitutions were bloudy enough to determine; there, neither Arians, nor Macedonians, but that prodigy of Manichæiſm, and the Eutychians teaching, and that (as I conceive by prava & illicita) things contrary not onely to wholſome doctrine, but to the laws of the

B. Empire; This I ſay, becauſe if the crime were onely their opinions, I cannot imagine why the Arians and Macedonians ſhould fare ſo much better than the Eutychians, nay, why Apoſtates ſhould onely be fined, and Jews onely under ſome reſtraints (as from Polygamy) and payments, and not put to death, ſave onely in caſe of keeping their Purym (which was for the great contumely done to Chriſt in that feaſt, the hanging Haman in effigie, and Chriſt next to him) and I ſay, onely Eutychians put to death, unleſs there were ſomewhat elſe in it beſide there doctrine. And then if you will make the compariſon to go no farther, than our ſelves, what ſholes of poor perſons (far enough from the docere illicita & prava, teaching illegal things, even from teaching at all) were in Queen Mary's days πολὺς πολὺν, whole hecatombs at once offered up to your fury.

Section 10. So remarkable are your proceedings herein, that I fear it was not a jeſt of him that ſaid at Geneva, Servetus occidendus eſt, ne apud exteros Eccleſiæ noſtræ malè audiant; That Servetus was to be burnt, that their Churches might not hear ill abroad, i. e. that the Papiſts might not be ſcandalized; (and a * Friend of theirs of late juſtifying that act of Calvin's againſt the diſlikes of a learned Proteſtant, hath theſe words, At Pontificii ipſi, Jeſuitæ dico ipſi, Calvinum pro eo facto nunquam damnârunt. Servetum quinimo rectè damnatum confitentur) which if it were the conſideration that mov'd in that matter, then have you more bloud lying at your door, than what you have ſpilt, even that which in care and caution, thoſe whom you recriminate, ſhed by your example, and that you might not be ſcandalized at their mercy and lenity.

* Salmaſ. under the name of Simplic. Verinus de lib. poſth. Grotii.

Section 11. This were I confeſs an ill excuſe to them that were ſo carefull to tranſcribe that bloudy leſſon, (and which is worſe, if you will have mine opinion, they have no better) but yet will be an argument that you are not overfit to accuſe them for it. Eraſmus among you, and Caſtellio among us, were, about the beginning of the reformation, very bitter againſt ſuch dealing: the former, you may ſee his notes upon Saint Jer. Ep. ad Læt. t. 1. p. 39. where he can hardly allow them the name of Chriſtians that fight for religion (kill for religion) though againſt the Turk, as if war were wont to make Chriſtians, cum ipſi Turcam in pectore geramus, when the very uſing of this violence is a prime piece of Turciſm. The latter wrote a book on purpoſe againſt that practice; I wiſh the whole Chriſtian world of both parties would ſuffer themſelves to be repreſented by a couple of ſuch meek and honeſt proxies; be you pleaſed to convert as many as you can to the doctrine of neither killing nor damning, and I will promiſe you to doe the like, and that will be better employment for us than this debate. For ſure that of Lactantius was no unchriſtian divinity, Si ſanguine, ſi tormentis, ſi malo religionem defendere velis, jam non defendetur illa, ſed polluetur atque violabitur. Such are not the means of defending, but of violating and defiling religion.

Section 12. And becauſe examples are the moſt popular arguments, I will help you to one of this nature, and leave you to apply it; Nero went through Greece a contending in the Muſica certamina with all that pretended to that skill; if he had the better of it, he was crowned, if not, he took care that they that had the better better of him, were put to death. The iſſue of it was, that they that had skill did on purpoſe play as ill as they could; he conquered wherever he came, was crowned when he was there, and when he was gone, was counted a mad-man.

I ſhall onely add, what upon more exact enquiry upon that hint of the Canon-law I find, that the elder Canons or Decrees of Gratian as they never mention the putting Hereticks to death; ſo in many paſſages out of Saint Auſtin, they do diſſuade the Emperour from it, and onely mention ſome other mulcts and reſtraints for them. The new Canons or the Decretals of your Popes are generally for delivering to the ſecular arme, but name not pœnam mortis neither; but what that ſignifies the Chriſtian world now knows well enough; onely one piece of hypocriſie I heard of (and by requeſt or propoſal of Spalatenſis, L. 6. c. 5. Sect. 171. do gueſs the truth of the report) in your proceedings in this matter; your Spiritual Courts when they ſo deliver up, are wont to interpoſe [ita tamen ut non admittant pœnam mortis (or to that purpoſe) but ſo that they proceed not to death] when yet they knew well enough, that that is the meaning of your delivering. Nay the Canons that require that the ſecular hand muſt proceed with all rigour againſt Hereticks thus delivered to them, will ſoon excommunicate any that do not thus underſtand their meaning. Section 13.

Beſides theſe arguments ab authoritate, you have another drawn, as you ſay, from Reaſon, and the common rules of equity and juſtice, (but add not one word to prove what you ſay ſo very improbably, but onely condemn all of high preſumption and arrogance who ſhould be ſo hardy as to impugn or queſtion it) one would think you an inchanted Knight, that when you have never a weapon in your hand, nor Second near you, (but onely the names of ſo many men, and arms, to call for) it ſhould yet paſs for arrogance, preſumption and hardineſs in any to combat with you. Section 14. C.

That you did not fitly produce your teſtimonies to your purpoſe, 'tis plain enough by what follows, the limitations and reſtraints that this doctrine, you ſay, muſt be bounded with, whereas your citations were general without any reſtraint. Section 15.

Your reſtraint or exception is, that where a Kingdom is in a peaceable poſſeſſion of Catholick religion, there 'tis no cruelty to inflict theſe puniſhments on the Teachers of new doctrines. And for this you ſay there is reaſon, which cannot probably be contradicted, but are ſo very uncourteous and contemptuous to us, as not to think us worthy to partake of the leaſt ſyllable of ſuch reaſon, unleſs that muſt go for one, that wicked men aim at temporal contents, and are conſequently with-held by temporal puniſhments, which ſhall be acknowledged a reaſon, when difference in opinion appears to be an impiety of ſo much deſign, and all whom you call Hereticks, are by you proved to be worms of the earth, deep-worldly deſigners alſo. Section 16.

For truly I confeſs, to all thoſe things which are committed by any, who may juſtly be preſumed to commit them againſt conſcience, for ſome worldly intereſt, I ſhould give my willing ſuffrage that ſome temporal bitterneſs ſhould be apportioned; that ſo ſeeing their Errour, and finding temporal pains inſtead of temporal advantages to be their portion, they may be diſciplin'd to better and more honeſt thoughts; nay, if the doctrines tend to liberty, I mean either as Mahomet's did to all kind of voluptuous living, or that other liberty (that ſome of your friends, and ſome others that call themſelves reformed, but in my opinion are very far from it, have been guilty of) the ſhaking off the yoak of civil obedience to the Magiſtrate ſet over them by God, it is then lawfull to coerce ſuch innovatours, if the prudence of the State ſhall think fit. But difference in opinion (though it be in a Kingdom never ſo peaceably poſſeſt of the Catholick Religion) if it tend not to any of theſe dangers, nor be convincible of thoſe impieties and deſigns, will by no reaſon or conſequence be involved in that number. Section 17.

This you ſeem to be content with, when you add that this ſeverity muſt not be extended to all that any where teach or profeſs erroneous doctrines; but upon better conſideration of your following words, 'tis clear that your reſtraint or exception looks another way, viz. that againſt thoſe that are not the firſt invaders, but another generation ſucceeding them, whoſe errour is contracted by the vice of education, &c. the Church doth not execute the ſeverity of the laws. In which words, though we of this, and all other Proteſtant Kingdoms at this day, have ſo far our parts, as that, if it were never ſo much in your power, you ought upon theſe grounds not to hurt us, becauſe we are the progeny, and not the firſt invaders; yet ſeeing all the reſtraint is for the execution onely of the ſeverity of the laws, and thoſe laws are ſuppoſed by you to be in force againſt Hereticks, and ſo againſt us, whom you call by that name; we have great reaſon to think, there is little kindneſs in this preſent reſtraint of yours. Section 18.

For to the utmoſt of my underſtanding of your words, it remains ſtill free to you, after this conceſſion, to be as ſevere to any, as your power will enable you. And if by us at any time any claim of favour ſhould be put into your Conſiſtory, your anſwer probably would be by this dilemma; either you are invaders, (and ſeeing beginnings are always weakeſt, all that are not able to reſiſt or defend themſelves, ſhall go for invaders) and then you have no title to mercy by this tenure; or elſe you are a numerous off-ſpring and progeny of them (and ſo poſſibly able to reſiſt) and then you ſhall have mercy; If we ſtand on theſe terms with you, and your order for reſtraint of ſeverity hold no longer than our ſtrength to reſiſt you, then we ſhall ſcarce acknowledge the obligation, but think our enemies on the other extreme as kind as you; for both of you are good at being mercifull, when you are on the weaker party, but both very tyrannical when you begin to be ſtrong. Section 19. D.

If you were ſo conſtant to your articles of reſtraint, as that all the proſperities of war, advantages of place, and auxiliaries, could not tempt you to a maſſacre of any, ſave onely ſome one (ſingle corrupter and invader) or two in an age, I might then have reaſon to think I might have miſtaken your meaning; but certainly you have been as cruel on the cubs, as ever you were on the old foxes, and made as little ſcruple to put many thouſands to death in one night (whom you could not think to be all leaders in factions, or invaders) (as the ſtories of France will teſtify, and the very words of the bull of Urban the eighth, to encourage the King of France, to root out the quadrupedes in Galliâ ſtabulantes, &c. as any one John Huſs alone by himſelf at another time. And that you will have this latitude to let looſe your reſtraint again, when time ſerves, it may ſeem probable by what you add of Auſtria, Stiria and Carinthia, whoſe privileges it ſeems laſted no longer than you thought fit; For as ſoon as you thought it ſeaſonable, they were preſently pronounced ſeditious and conſpiratours, and ſo put to the ſword; and for France and Poland, I wiſh Section 20.

E. the names of Maſſacres had never been heard in either of them, or at leaſt that the Pictures of them with words of papal approbation, were not to be ſeen at Rome to teſtify what is the cauſe of your preſent kindneſs, (viz. the difficulty of the work) that the Proteſtants there at this time are not moleſted.

Section 21. As for your recrimination againſt Proteſtants, ſeeing it is very univerſal (ſuffer Catholicks in no place) and very ſharp, (that they perſecute Catholicks whereſoever they are ſtronger, after a very violent, mercileſs, deſperate manner, ſlay, impriſon, rob, baniſh, defame, &c.) I muſt beſeech you either to prove it againſt this your Country, or elſe to make it reparations, and remember when time ſerves, that when Proteſtants are thought to perſecute you, then preſently 'tis a proceeding much worſe and more unreaſonable than the Turkiſh.

Section 22. As for the truth of your ſuggeſtion, certainly the number and ſtrength of Proteſtants hath for many years ſurmounted that of Papiſts in this Kingdom; and yet I ſhall be confident you will be poſed to pro-

F. duce the example of any one ſince Queen Mary's days that in this Kingdom was put to death merely for religion, without being guilty of ſomething elſe, which by the known laws of the Realm is liable to the puniſhment of treaſon. And for the other penal laws in this Kingdom, which are not capital, but pecuniary mulcts, &c. I ſhall ſay that 'tis ſomewhat hard; that we muſt be thought worthy of all thoſe bitter invectives, which you yet farther add, becauſe I conceive there was never any Kingdom, that own'd any religion, but there was ſome difference made betwixt that, and all other, in reſpect of temporal privileges, and favours, and immunities; and any ſuch difference reaches near as high, and goes as deep as pecuniary mulcts. And beſide it is not irrational to ſay, that the inflicting ſuch mulcts may very probably tend to the quiet, and ſo to the advantage rather, than to the oppreſſion of ſuch ſufferers; it being not without example, that the ſuſpicions of the people, and jealouſies that the eſtabliſhed religion ſhall be diſcountenanced, (having no deeper ground than an imagination that the Prince may have inclined to give toleration to the other party, or but immunity from theſe puniſhments) hath brought ſuch odium upon the preſent government, and ſharpneſs on thoſe thus thought to be favour'd, that in compariſon with theſe ill accidents, a few pecuniary mulcts might paſs for a privilege, as the letting of bloud is to be eſteem'd by thoſe who are entring into a pluriſie for want of it.

Section 23. If upon theſe conſiderations ſuch mulcts as theſe may not be conceived ſupportable, I muſt confeſs 'tis an hard lot to be placed in a throne betwixt two contrary pretenders, and as unhappy for any ingenuous man, to make any confeſſion to you, who from his Lordſhip's acknowledgment, that the Church of Enggland is a little to blame in this point, conclude, that in confeſſing this, he inſinuates all. This 'tis to deal with men who cannot imagine it poſſible, that a man's words and thoughts ſhould be of the ſame latitude. Should I by the ſame Logick conclude, that you, by confeſſing that all invaders for Religion muſt be put to death, do intimate, that all kind of Proteſtants muſt be executed, I hope you would ſay you had wrong done you. And yet to tell you truth, the ſubtlety of your next diſtinction would give any man that obſerved it, great temptation ſo to conclude of you. For after your citation of S. Th. of Aquine, and the Schoolmen, you are pleaſed to communicate to us a notable Myſtery, [that you do uſe reaſons to perſuade, and plant your faith, (and truly the telling us you cannot err, and upon that bottom building all your moſt irrational concluſions, is no ſpecial exerciſe of the reaſonable faculty) and onely fence it exteriourly, and afar off, with ſtatutes of temporal ſeverity againſt invaders, which, ſay you, is another thing from defending it interiourly by that means, i. e. from juſtifying the right and truth of religion by them.]

Section 24. I ſhould never have been ſo uncivil as to have affixt ſuch a ſenſe to your diſtinction, had you not been

G. your own interpreter. It is, as if you had ſaid, you are not to be accuſed for planting religion by arms, becauſe your ſwords do onely force men to be of your minds, do not give them any reaſons why they ſhould. And truly I have not heard any man ſay, that your arms did fence religion interiourly, (being the unapteſt thing in the world, to juſtify the right, and truth of religion; and therefore you need not diſavow that ſo providently.) The great Turk could ſend a letter to your Pope, and anſwer and confute his bull of inciting the Princes of Chriſtendom, to take up arms againſt him, for crucifying their god, and tell him, that as 'twas a great falſity to charge on him what was proper to the Jews, the crucifying of Chriſt, (the Turk being deſcended from the Trojans, and therefore deſiring the Pope's aid againſt the Grecians, to avenge their murther of the Trojan Hector, a kind of god of theirs) ſo if the Pope were truly a worſhipper of Chriſt, he would never invade any nation upon quarrel of religion; ſo far is this kind of fighting (in the knowledge of all, even of Turks themſelves) from juſtifying of the truth, that it is a very great argument of the falſeneſs of any ſect of Chriſtian Religion; a plain demonſtration that they do not obey the Chriſt whom they worſhip.

Section 25. The uſing the ſword as an exteriour means of propagating your religion, is all that is laid to your charge, and that it ſeems you are content to yield us. Though, within a page or two more, you have forgotten your ſelf again, and ſay, that for publick coaction or violence you do not own it. I wiſh you did not.

Section 26. And that you may for the time to come deal clearly, and never have mind to ſuck in your words, and own it again, I ſhall in paſſing mention to you a narration concerning an honeſt Philoſopher in Valens his time; It was Themiſtius, who before his death turn'd from Ariſtotelian to Chriſtian, but I conceive was not yet converted, when this ſtory is related of him. Valens in Antioch, ſaith the [a] Hiſtorian, had vehemently perſecuted the Chriſtians that were not of his opinion, had not a book of Themiſtius the Philoſopher recall'd him, in which he perſuaded him, that he ought not to be cruel to any [b] for a difference of Eccleſiaſtical opinions, ſeeing among the Pagans themſelves there were more than 300 ſects differing all from one another; And perhaps this might be more [c] acceptable (at leaſt more pardonable) before God, becauſe God is not eaſily known, and is glorified in different manners, on purpoſe that every man may [d] fear the more, the more he wants of the integrity and perfection of that knowledge of him, either how he is, or how qualified, or how great he is. By the reaſons of Themiſtius, ſaith he, mitior factus eſt Imperator, the Emperour became more mild. It may not be unfit for your friends to conſider the example, and doe ſo to.

[c] Forte hoc deo gratum magis eſſet.

[d] Magis timeat, i. e. be more humble, as fear by Saint Paul is oppoſed to high-mindedneſs, and fear and trembling is by the Greek Fathers rendred humility.

As

As for your challenge to us, that if we will reſtore all we have taken from Papiſts in Europe, you will reſtorewhat you have taken from us, it is a good ſafe boaſt; you know that it is not in any replyer's power to ſtrike the bargain. Yet, if all the pecuniary mulcts under the reign of the three laſt Princes in this Kingdom be price enough to ranſom and fetch back the bloud ſhed by you in Queen Mary's days, I doubt not but I ſhall be as forward as you to accept that challenge. Section 27.

Mean while for the juſtification of our ſevereſt Laws in this point, you cannot but confeſs that in moſt Kingdoms ſtrong preſumptions have been thought ſufficient to make liable to puniſhment. In the Canon-law the proving of nudus cum nudâ, that ſuch a man and woman were taken naked together, is preſumption enough to bring the puniſhment of adultery on any. And when our Queen had run ſo many dangers by Prieſts, and thereupon Capital Laws were made, that no ſuch ſhould come into the Kingdom, or if they did, they ſhould be preſumed traiterouſly diſpoſed, and puniſhed accordingly; and this Statute thus legally made, conveyed to the knowledge of all ſuch, it hath been a very rational preſumption againſt any that ſhould be ſo found; Though as 'tis poſſible that nudus cum nudâ may be no adulterer, ſo ſuch a Prieſt may have no traiterous purpoſe. And yet if you mark it, (unleſs ſince theſe times of troubles) very few of you have ſuffered among us by this Statute. Section 28. H.

Sir, you had great leaſure, when you could enlarge ſo to triumph over us for acknowledging our Church fallible, and profeſs to diſcharge his Lordſhip from being your Advocate, if he ſpeak ſo ill for his Client. This you might have done long ſince, and unleſs your favour may be had upon ſome other terms, than undertaking the Infallibility of mere creatures, we muſt all be content to be diſcharged by you. Section 29.

Yet after all your turning away, and ſlighting, we ſhall never be ſo provoked, as to puniſh you for the reſult of what we preſcribe you. If your beſt uſe of reaſon in the interpretation of Scripture (and not any prejudice, or paſſion, or fault of yours) have ſincerely brought you to your opinions, and no light that is offer'd hath been neglected, and yet all prove unſufficient to convince you, I ſhall never ſeverely pronounce againſt you; and if you will ſay, and make good as much to me, our affections may meet, though not our brains, and both of us have charity enough to cover in eace other, a multitude of errours. Section 30. I.

Your catalogue of Sects in this Kingdom, I ſhall not go about to examine, but onely tell you, that your Infallibility hath been liable to ſuch miſadventures alſo, and had not the charm or skill of keeping all within its circle; if it had, there would then at this time have been no body to diſpute againſt you. Section 31.

In the cloſe of your long Chapter, I wonder you ſhould be ſo covetous or ambitious of lengthning it one page farther, by charging on his Lordſhip, that he charges you, that becauſe you pretend to be infallible, you have leſs reaſon to preſcribe to others; whereas his Lordſhip charges no ſuch thing upon you, but onely ſaith, that ſhe that confeſſes ſhe may err, is not ſo chargeable with any fault, as they that pretend they cannot; which is quite another matter. Section 32.

To conclude, when the buſineſs is thus laid by you, that your Infallibility is not yet proved to be onely pretended, and yet you have no other ground of ſaying ſo, but becauſe you ſay 'tis not, (though all his Lordſhip's arguments for ſo many Sections have driven all to that concluſion, and never a one of them is yet anſwered by you) it will be a moſt unreaſonable thing (and a ſound petitio principii again) to affirm without any one word of proof, that that Infallibility is a reality, and ſo will not keep you from mending, whereas nothing can keep you from mending, if this do not; this contemning of arguments againſt you, and affirming magiſterially without any. Section 33. K.

To the twenty ninth Section, Chap. 17.

This opinion, ſaith he, of damning ſo many, and this cuſtom of burning ſo many, this breeding up of thoſe who know nothing elſe in any point of religion, yet to be in readineſs to cry, To the fire with him, To hell with him. All theſe be empty words, as we have ſhewed before. As for our breeding up of men, I think we doe it as well as any of our neighbours doe; and by the way, muſt tell you that we do not take children from their parents onely to breed them up in our religion; we do not offer that hard meaſure either to Turks or Jews, but hold it an act flatly againſt the law of nature, an impious violation of parents right, which ought to be held ſacred; and laſtly, a way of propagation of religions wholly violent and Un-chriſtian, ſo far are we from propagating our religion by force; and if all others with whom we have to doe, had been of that mind, it had been better with them; for God hath not bleſſed that way, foraſmuch as by ſad experience we have found, that none have proved greater ſcourges to their King and Country, than ſuch as have had that ſort of breeding given them, and contrary to their parents will, been violently ſeduced in their youth; and this is no ſecret, but known to all the three Kingdoms to their coſt. But enough of this, for it is a diſtaſtfull buſineſs.

Chap. 17. Anſwer to the ſeventeenth Chapter.

To his Lordſhip's twenty ninth Paragraph you have no return, but that theſe are empty words as you have formerly ſhewed (and I fear we have ſhewed they are not, but ſhould be very glad to be miſtaken, and can truly ſay, that I wiſh vehemently that your judgment were right in this matter) But upon occaſion of his Lordſhip's mention of [your breeding up thoſe that know nothing elſe in religion. To cry to the fire, to hell with him] you are pleaſed to take occaſion of ſome liberty, in ſhewing what good breeding you beſtow upon men in your Church, and ſo divert to a complaint againſt thoſe that take children from their parents, &c. and are ſomewhat paſſionate and tragical on that ſubject; but this being nothing to his Lordſhip's words or argument, I deſire to ſee that better anſwered by you, before I will enter any new combat about ſo extrinſecal an impertinency. And ſo enough of this alſo, for whatever 'tis, 'tis nothing to the matter of preſent handling. Section 1.

To the thirtieth Section, Chap. 18.

" If it were granted, ſaith the Enquirer, that becauſe it agrees not with the goodneſs of God to let me want a guide " infallible, and that the Church of Rome were that one; yet if that teach any thing contrary to God's goodneſs, I am

" not to receive her doctrine, for the ſame cauſe they would have me receive it, it being as good an argument, This " guide teaches things contrary to God's goodneſs, therefore it is not appointed by God; as to ſay, it is agreeable to God's " goodneſs there ſhould be a guide, therefore there is one. So he.

The Enquirer ſeeks to delude us with a fallacy, by altering his terms; for in the firſt place, he ſpeaks of a thing contrary to God's goodneſs, not abſolutely, but according to his underſtanding. In the ſecond place he ſpeaks of it, not as it is in his underſtanding, but as it is ſimply in it ſelf, which is a thing quite different from the former; for many things may be in his underſtanding thus or thus, or as he ſaith, contrary to God's goodneſs, which in themſelves are not ſo, but rather, quite otherwiſe, for indeed it is no good conſequence to argue on this ſort, This in my underſtanding is contrary to God's goodneſs, therefore it is ſo, becauſe your underſtanding is ſubject to errour, and therefore ſome things may ſeem to it to be, which are not. Chillingworth, who followeth this Authour's footſteps, argues after the ſelf-ſame manner, and hath been anſwered elſewhere by himſelf. I grant then the conſequence when as he ſaith, this guide teaches ſomewhat contrary to God's goodneſs, therefore it is not appointed for a guide. But I deny the Antecedent; and afterwards when he proves it, ſaying, it ſeems ſo to my underſtanding, therefore it is ſo, I deny the conſequence, and admit the Antecedent.

At leaſt, ſaith he, if it ſeem ſo to my underſtanding, whether in the mean time it be ſo or not, I am not to receive it, becauſe I am to be guided by my own reaſon and underſtanding. If it ſeem ſo to your underſtanding after ſuch time as you have weighed all things as rightly as you can, I grant it; But if it ſeem ſo onely before you have done that, then I deny it, for then it is not to be followed but forſaken, or reformed if it be found erroneous, as in this caſe of yours it is. For in this caſe your underſtanding is to conſult other underſtandings wiſer than your own, if you can find any ſuch; and according to that, is to determine of the matter, and not to rely wholly upon your own ſingle underſtanding. But if you doe ſo, you will find your own ſingle underſtanding was deceived, and that the guide of which we treat, teacheth nothing that is againſt the goodneſs of God. For it is to be ſuppoſed her underſtanding is brighter and more capacious than yours, and therefore is to be thought knows much better what doctrines be agreeable to the goodneſs of God, than yours can do what is againſt it; and therefore your own reaſon and underſtanding teaches you, that the Churches underſtanding is to be preferred, and that yours muſt ſubmit; and again, that this is the rational way, and not the other: this the way of underſtanding, and that of errour. And ſo much in anſwer to this fallacy, wherein I perceive, both he and Maſter Chillingworth conſide very much.

As for particular doctrines, it is true, as you ſay, you may examine whether they agree with the Principle, that is foundation, yet nevertheleſs cannot you from thence conclude any thing againſt the doctrines or infallibility of the Church, but rather for it, and this for the reaſon before ſpecified. Neither do we, therefore, ſend you to a witneſs, and bid you not believe it, but rather, to believe it as far as in right reaſon you are to believe it, and not farther, that is to ſay, you are to truſt to your own particular diſcourſes, as to particular diſcourſes, and no farther, but to the reſolves of the Church as to the dictamens of a higher underſtanding, by the light of which you are to judge and cenſure of the reſt, and by doing thus, you are ſure you doe wiſely and ſafely, and, in fine, ſo, as although you ſhould chance to err, you might anſwer the buſineſs at the latter day, by ſaying, I did in this caſe what I ought to doe, for I followed what my reaſon taught me, and more than this was not required at my hands. But if I follow my own judgment, and in confidence of that do adventure to condemn the Church, In that I offend againſt my reaſon and true judgment, and ſhould not be able to make a good apology for my ſelf, or any way make it good that I followed my reaſon, which faculty is the rule that God hath ſet me.

For a concluſion of this diſpute, I anſwer in brief, that putting the Enquirer's argument as he ought to have put it, namely, thus as followeth, This guide, to my underſtanding, or, to my ſeeming, teaches things contrary to God's goodneſs, therefore it is not appointed by him for a guide; putting, I ſay, the argument on this manner, it is nothing ſo good, or ſo concluding an argument, as this other is, videlicet; This guide teaches ſuch and ſuch doctrines, therefore they are not againſt the goodneſs of God, and therefore again, my underſtanding was deceived in holding them to be ſo; and therefore laſtly, notwithſtanding all this, ſhe may be an infallible guide and appointed by God for ſuch: Note, that we infer hence ſhe may be, but not that ſhe is, as the Enquirer would impoſe upon us: for, we do not ſay that the Church is appointed a guide therefore, becauſe it is agreeable with God's goodneſs to make her ſo, but becauſe we for other reaſons know he hath ſo made her: becauſe we are not now to learn but that many things are agreeable to God's goodneſs to be done, which yet are not done, nor peradventure ever will be. Wherefore, when we are to judge what is, or will be, we are to conſider, not what his goodneſs may admit, but what his will determines ſhall have a being, for of that laſtly depends the exiſtence of things, and not of the other.

Chap. 18. Anſwer to the eighteenth Chapter.

Section 1. In your report of his Lordſhip's argument, Section 30. you leave out thoſe words [therefore there is one] and ſo make nonſenſe of that period, which in his Lordſhip's ſetting of it is excellent reaſon. But I can believe that this was but a ſlip. As for your anſwer to the parallel caſes, wherein, ſaith his Lordſhip, God's goodneſs is equally concerned; do you think you can ever ſatisfy any reaſonable man in ſaying, [that the firſt thing he ſpeaks of, is onely contrary to God's goodneſs in his Lordſhip's underſtanding, not abſolutely; but of the ſecond, he ſpeaks, not as it is in his underſtanding, but as it is ſimply in it ſelf] from whence you conclude, that he changes the terms] Certainly, Sir, in deſpight of your exception, the argument is good, Thus;

Section 2. If it be ſufficient to conclude an infallible guide, becauſe it agrees not with God's goodneſs to let men want one, then any man that conceives that Church to teach any thing which he conceives againſt God's goodneſs, by the ſame reaſon is not to receive her doctrine; The caſe is clear, becauſe nothing concludes to any man any farther, than it is conceived by him; and that is not a proof to me, which I do not conceive to be ſo; which makes his Lordſhip's arguing to be far from fallacious; For the matter of this paragraph is not whether it be really true, that it agrees not with God's goodneſs to let men want an infallible guide, but (ſuppoſing it to be ſo) whether it will follow the Church is infallible, or whether he whoſe underſtanding is convinced and perſuaded of that truth, [that it is not agreeable to God's goodneſs to let us want ſuch a guide] be enforced to confeſs it infallible.

A.

Section 3. This alſo his Lordſhip diſputes not againſt (but will willingly acknowledge the conſequence, ſuppoſing that the Antecedent were true) onely by the ſame argument proves another thing, that he that conceives the Church to teach any doctrine contrary to God's goodneſs, or that, which is ſuch to his underſtanding, or he that ſuppoſes the Church to teach ſo, muſt not believe that Churches doctrine. So that if you mark, the ſuppoſition is equal on both ſides, not taken for true on one ſide, and onely pretended on tother, but one taken to be true by you, (that, not to provide an infallible guide is contrary to God's goodneſs) and tother taken to be true by his Lordſhip (that God's damning thoſe that err without either negligence or prejudication, is contrary to his goodneſs alſo) and if the argument be of force on one ſide, it muſt be ſo alſo on tother; and for you to ſay that what you ſuppoſe, is true, but what his Lordſhip ſuppoſes, is not ſo, is a terrible petitio principii again, and no ground of a confutation againſt his Lordſhip; The ridiculous arguments that you put in his Lordſhip's paper, without his privity, will be matter of reproach to you, (who if you underſtood (as I ſuppoſe you did) were willing to deprave his diſcourſes) and not unto his Lordſhip. B.

Section 4. As for your way of ſatisfying his Lordſhip's underſtanding, that what the Church teaches is not contrary to the goodneſs of God, [becauſe the Church knows what is ſo, better than he] 'twill ſure prevail little with any, that is a diſputing whether the Church is infallible or no, (as you ſee his Lordſhip now is) for if ſhe be fallible, ſhe may miſtake in that judgment, and that ſhe doth not miſtake, there will be no aſſurance from her ſaying it, as long as the controverſie depends about her Infallibility, which to affirm not to depend, or to be no controverſie, is petitio principii again. C.

Section 5. As for your Concluſion of this diſpute, wherein you ſet the compariſon betwixt two Arguments, and ſay yours is much the better; I ſhall not need debate that with you, becauſe they are not the two Arguments betwixt which his Lordſhip makes the compariſon. The firſt I confeſs you have rightly ſet down, [This Guide to my underſtanding teaches things contrary to God's goodneſs, therefore it is not the Guide] and this will be as good an argument, as this other, ['Tis to my underſtanding contrary to the goodneſs of God, that the Roman Church ſhould not be an infallible Guide, or that there ſhould be no infallible Guide, where there is none but the Roman Church, therefore the Roman Church is ſo] In this compariſon the conſequences are equally true, and built upon the ſame ground, that that which is againſt God's goodneſs cannot be; and the Antecedents equally affirmed according to ſeveral underſtandings; and then whether the other Argument which you bring, be comparable to either, it matters not.

Section 6. But when at laſt you give us a note, that the argument from God's goodneſs doth not conclude that your Church is infallible, but onely that it may be ſo; I confeſs you make me repent of all this unprofitable attendance I have paid you, in following your argument thus far, when your ſelf have given me directions to a ſhorter cut of anſwering, viz. by granting that it may be infallible, that is, that nothing in nature reſiſts, but that, if God's pleaſure were ſo, it might be infallible; but ſay we, we have no evidence from God that it is his pleaſure it ſhould, and therefore we conclude it may be deceived, or may be fallible; betwixt which two, though there may be ſome difference, (as there is betwixt falli and fallibilem eſſe) yet unleſs ſome evidence can be brought againſt one, which cannot againſt the other, they will be both equally true, as far as reſpects our knowledge or debate of them. D.

Section 7. And when you add, that 'tis from other reaſons that you conclude ſhe is infallible, and not from this of God's goodneſs, I anſwer, that 'tis clear that his Lordſhip was now diſputing onely againſt that reaſon taken from God's goodneſs, which it ſeems you confeſs was no reaſon; and for your other reaſons, they are either confuted in other Paragraphs of his Lordſhip's Treatiſe, or when you produce them, ſhall be. E.

To the thirty firſt Section, Chap. 19.

This Section is ſpent in the inquiring whether a man ſhall be damned for making a diligent and impartial enquiry after the true religion, of which he finds the infallibility of the Church to be a part, ſuppoſing that his reaſon, when all is done, will not aſſent. This is his Quære, and the ſame may be made concerning any other verity, or point of doctrine; as namely, of the holy Scripture, whether or no it be the word of God; and what ſhall become of that man whoſe reaſon, after an impartial ſearch made, will not aſſent; or again, about the truth of Chriſtian Religion, unto which, after ſuch a ſearch made, his reaſon will not condeſcend.

I anſwer firſt, that it is a mockery to ask whether or no any man ſhall be damned for making a good enquiry without ſucceſs; and in effect it is the ſame as to enquire whether a man ſhall be damned for doing a deed that's commendable and good. For this Queſtion ſuppoſes that either the Enquirer, or we were very ſimple Creatures, and did not underſtand our ſelves, or elſe that the Gentleman-demander was not in earneſt, but propounded it onely for his recreation, though at a time ill choſen and unſeaſonable, and alſo in a matter about which there ought to be no jeaſting.

I anſwer ſecondly, that in a place where inſtruction and information may be had, the caſe he puts is morally impoſſible to happen out; for we deny that where the ſearch is diligent, impartial, and without prejudice, and where again information ſufficient is to be had, that there the reaſon ſhall not be able to aſſent, and that whereſoever it cannot, that ſame happens, either through weakneſs, or inhability of judgment and capacity, or elſe by reaſon of ſome diſordinate paſſion of the will, by which the underſtanding is miſled and darkened, as in thoſe, who are refractory, it for the moſt part falls out. Which paſſion and prejudices ariſe, ſometimes from cuſtom and education, ſometimes from vitious inclinations, ſometimes from a crookedneſs and perverſity of nature, which doth refuſe inſtruction. Wherefore as it is no ſufficient excuſe for an Infidel to ſay, I have ſearched diligently whether or no Chriſt be the true Meſſias, or whether the Scripture be the word of God or no, and after all endeavours uſed, my reaſon will not aſſent; ſo in like manner it is as little ſufficient to alledge, that after enquiry made about the true Church, and her Infallibility, your reaſon would not aſſent, for in theſe caſes, we cannot grant any ignorance invincible, or free that errour which poſſeſſes them from guilt. Now what ſhall become of others who want inſtruction ſufficient, and have no crookedneſs or backwardneſs in their will, and dye in ignorance, is another point, and different from this of ours, and is to be reſolved in the Queſtion about the efficacy of implicit Faith, to which I refer my Reader.

Chap. 19. Anſwer to the nineteenth Chapter.

Section 1. In this Paragraph his Lordſhip asks a Queſtion, Whether, ſuppoſing [that he that never heard of the Church of Rome, ſhall not be damned for not believing it infallible] it can be thought, that he that hath made diligent ſearch, and uſed honeſtly all means afforded him, and yet doth not believe the Church infallible, ſhall be damned for that not-believing? this is the Queſtion; and to weigh it down on one ſide [that that latter ſhall not be damned, when tother is not] this reaſon is put in, that in this matter all that that Man hath done in the ſecond caſe more than in the former, is onely the having diligently enquired, which is preſumed to be no damning ſin.

Section 2. Inſtead of the Queſtion thus put, you ſet another ſomewhat diſtant, but I will ſuppoſe tending to the ſame effect, whether a Man ſhall be damned for making a good enquiry without ſucceſs; which you ſay is a mockery, and ſo, as I conceive, ridiculous to affirm it; and ſo, Sir, after all your deſcanting on his Lordſhip for asking this queſtion, it is apparent by our explication of it, that upon the denying of that which you ſay, 'tis ridiculous not to deny, it inevitably follows, that that Man ſhall not be damned for denying the infallibility of your Church.

Section 3. And though you take pains to perſuade that this caſe is morally impoſſible, yet you muſt give us leave from your ſtating of the caſe, wherein you ſay it is ſo, (viz. when information ſufficient is to be had) to con-

A. clude your proof a petitio principii again; for when we deny your Church to be infallible, and moreover affirm, that if it be, it cannot be infallibly known to be ſo, how can you think that we ſhall ever yield (without any offer of proof) that there is ſufficient inſtruction to be had for any man in this point? be-

B. ſides, for you to ſay that every mans not acknowledging this, proceeds either from weakneſs or paſſion, what is that but uncharitableneſs firſt, and then ſhortneſs of diſcourſe, when the caſe was, on ſuppoſition that there was no fault of which his ſearch was guilty) and petitio principii again?

To the thirty ſecond Section, Chap. 20.

Whoſoever admits of truth upon no better grounds than others do admit of falſhood, doth not receive it rightly, ſolidly, and as he ought, but after a way defective and infirm. Again, whoſoever ſearches and is loath to find, and would not ſee it when he might, this man refuſeth truth as badly and weakly as the other doth receive it; and as the truth will not benefit the one, ſo the enquiry will not advantage or excuſe the other. As for ſuch as are bred up in a true Religion, and which, without particular examination, they accept, it were raſh judgment to ſay all theſe received truths upon no better grounds, than others did falſhood; for firſt, according to this account, the greateſt portion of Chriſtian men on all ſides would be in a hard condition: amongſt whom the ſimple and illiterate, who are not able to reade Epiphanius either in Greek or Latin, nor yet the Bible either in Hebrew or Greek, or otherwiſe to make any ſtrict ſearch into Antiquity, for their making diſcoveries which Faith was the Ancient and Apoſtolick. But though they be unable to doe this, yet do they not therefore take up their Religion at random and by chance, or conſult paſſion about it, and not reaſon, but contrariwiſe, do find their reaſon ſatisfied each one according to their ſeveral models, or meaſure of capacity, by the preſent view of the majeſty and divine perfections of the Catholick Church and Faith therein profeſſed, together with the aſſurances from publick fame and creditable relations. By means of which the divine providence and veracity ſhews them infallibly what ways they are to take, and what doctrines to receive as revealed from above. And thus, regularly ſpeaking amongſt orthodox Believers, where Religion may appear like it ſelf, every man of capacity, though illiterate, may ſee ſufficient to reſolve him, which ſatisfaction from any falſe Religion he could not receive; for though to a heedleſs eye, and before a diligent enquiry made, ſome grand falſhoods may ſeem more probable than truths, and that as Ariſtotle teacheth, multa falſa ſunt probabiliora veris, many falſhoods are more probable than truths; yet, not to a diligent Enquirer after the ſearch is made, and eſpecially, in buſineſſes of great concernment, becauſe God and Nature have laid theſe kind of truths more open to our view, and ſet marks upon them by which they might be known and diſcerned from falſhood. Wherefore, in the law of nature, it was more credible, even to the illiterate, that there was a God, than that there was none; and now Judaiſm is not ſo probable as Chriſtianity is, though ſometimes it hath been, nor Mahumetiſm at any time ſo perſuaſible as Chriſtian Religion, or Hereſie ſo credible and ſatisfactory as orthodoxal Chriſtianity, or the Greek ſchiſm as the Greek unity; wherefore though the Parents belief, and the Religion prevalent in the Country have great influence into the minds of men, and are great and powerfull Perſuaders, yea oftentimes Seducers alſo, and thoſe very dangerous; yet nevertheleſs in thoſe places where truth is taught, they do not hinder men from the right apprehenſion of it, and from making true judgments about it, but rather like a proſperous gale of wind to Veſſels under ſayle, cauſe them to move towards the Port deſired more ſwiftly than otherwiſe they would. And thus much may ſuffice for taking off the ſlander and ſcandal which this Enquirer, and after him Chillingworth, with great acerbity, have almoſt in the very ſame terms, labour'd to caſt upon right believing Chriſtians, therewith to diſparage their faith, as if forſooth, they believed truths invalidly and upon no better reaſons than others believe falſhood. Thus have both theſe conſpired againſt the truth, for both indeed are but one Authour in effect, one the Text, and the other the Commentary; wherefore the Publiſher of this ſmall work hath ſhewed us all the Well-head to which Chillingworth went to draw, which Well before was unknown to the moſt part of men, and ſo might have ſtill remained, had it not been for this Publiſher's unſeaſonable diligence.

Chap. 20. Anſwer to the twentieth Chapter.

Section 1. Your miſtake is very remarkable in this Paragraph, and your pains very prodigally miſpent in diſpro-

A. ving of that which is by his Lordſhip mentioned onely on ſuppoſition of ſomewhat elſe affirmed by you, and by that means demonſtrated to be infirm.

Section 2. His Lordſhip's preſent reaſoning is, that ſuppoſing your infallibility true, yet he that denies it, and withall uſes his beſt reaſon to ſeek if it be true, will ſure be in as ſafe a condition, as he that believes it, and ſearches not. And this he proves, becauſe the one believes that ſuppoſed falſhood on as good grounds, as the other doth that ſuppoſed truth. Which is ſo fully concluded from thoſe premiſſes, (and ſo needs no farther proof) that indeed theſe premiſſes are able to conclude more; viz. that in that caſe, that Man believes that ſuppoſed falſhood on better grounds (viz. upon impartial ſearch) than the other believes that ſuppoſed truth; and then 'twere unreaſonable to think, that God that rewards mens actions, and not their fates, their choices, and not their ſtars, ſhould condemn the one, more ingenuous and guiltleſs, and reward the other meaner and more criminal part of the parallel.

All

All this you in a manner confirm, by ſaying, that he that thus admits of truth, admits it not ſolidly, rightly, and as he ought, but after a defective and infirm way. Which being borrowed from you out of this Chapter, the reſt will appear to belong very nothing to his Lordſhip's argument, and therefore I chooſe not to inſiſt on any reply to it. For of thoſe which do find their reaſon ſatisfied in your infallibility, of which you ſpeak a-while, his Lordſhip ſpeaks not; and for the truths that God and Nature have laid ſo open to our view, of which you ſpeak again, ſure this of infallibility is none. Section 3.

As for your diſpleaſure expreſſed again (without any new occaſion) againſt the unſeaſonable Publiſher (which if you and ſome others of your Friends were mere Students and Votaries, to pray for, and ſtudy the peace of Hieruſalem, and not too active Infuſers and Enterprizers in theſe troubled waters, might indeed be acknowledged leſs ſeaſonable) it is the very thing you ſaid before, and then was ſufficiently proved to be unſeaſonable. Section 4.

To the 33, and 34. Sections, Chap. 21.

That the Enquirer did not deny with obſtinacy the infallibility of the Church of Chriſt, or any other Article, we are willing to believe, yet nevertheleſs how ſafe he was, we know not. For a man may be obſtinate and yet not think ſo, though he may peruadventure have juſt reaſon to ſuſpect it. It is not likely that Arius for example, or any other Arch-heretick did think themſelves to be obſtinate, although it is not to be doubted but they were, for in the heart of man there be many dark corners in which obſtinacy may lurk and be unſeen; many paſſions that do corrupt the intention, which without great diligence are not eſpied, eſpecially in men that are lovers of the world, or be poſſeſſed with prejudices before-hand. For which the wiſe man wiſely ſaid. Verebar omnia opera mea, I diſtruſted all my works. And ſo hath every man reaſon to doe in this univerſal corruption of nature and manners. The thirty fourth Section hath no difficulty in it which may require an Anſwer.

Chap. 21. Anſwer to the twenty firſt Chapter.

Your Anſwer to the thirty third Section is very ſtrange; you firſt grant very freely, that you believe that his Lordſhip did not deny with obſtinacy the infallibility of your Church; and yet in your next words you interpoſe againſt him, that a man may be obſtinate, and yet not think ſo; and on that, ground your Anſwer to that Section. But ſure, Sir, whoſoever elſe may be obſtinate, or what grounds ſoever he may have to ſuſpect he is, yet this cannot by you be ſaid of him at the ſame time when you acknowledge he is not obſtinate. Section 1. A.

I beſeech you compare your Anſwer with that Paragraph of his Lordſhip's again, and tell me whether this would not be very ſtrange dealing. Suppoſe a Friend ſhould make this Syllogiſm for you; an honeſt Catholick ought not to be denied the liberty of this Town, but this Gentleman is an honeſt Catholick, ergo: and to the major I ſhould anſwer by ſilence, (i. e. conſent) and to the minor [that you are an honeſt Catholick I am willing to believe;] Nevertheleſs, whether you ought to have the liberty of this Town, I know not, for you may be a diſhoneſt Catholick, and yet not think ſo. Section 2.

I pray how would you like this way of diſcourſe? would you not firſt tell me that I did in effect deny the concluſion, i. e. make ſcruple how you ſhould be dealt with, after I had acknowledged, both that all honeſt Catholicks ought to be uſed as you deſire, and that you are an honeſt Catholick? And ſecondly, that I did ſuck in my conceſſion of your being an honeſt Catholick, as ſoon as I had made it; for if that Reply belong to me, then is it doubted, whether I am ſuch or no. Be pleaſed to compare the caſes, and this is directly your Anſwer. Section 3.

What you mean by the no-difficulty in the thirty fourth Section, (which you confeſs, and which therefore requires no Anſwer) I do not perfectly know, but ſhall ſuppoſe you mean, that there is nothing of doubt or queſtion in it, and then I am ſure I have nothing to reply, but that by the ſame reaſon the thirty third Section muſt be granted alſo, for the medium is the ſame to infer both thoſe concluſions. Section 4.

To the 35, and 36. Sections, Chap. 22.

To believe, ſaith he, implicitly what God would have believed, is alſo to believe implicitly what the Church teacheth, if this doctrine be one of thoſe which God commands, to be believed. My anſwer to this is negative, and my reaſon of denial is, becauſe one implicit faith doth not contain another, but it is an explicit aſſent and no other that contains within it an implicit. To the point then I anſwer, that if that ſame general belief, which he falſly calls implicit, be ſincere and cordial, we then grant that it may, as he ſaith, implicitly contain the other. But what will he deduce from thence? what? that all who pretend to believe on that manner doe it ſincerely? It is improbable, for if it were ſincere, it would in knowing men, not ſtay within the narrow compaſs of an implicit aſſent, but quickly dilate it ſelf, and become explicit. Indeed this great profeſſion of believing in a preparation of mind all which God would have believed, and goes no farther, ſeems in moſt men to be but feigned and deluſory, and ſo no great truſt can be repoſed in it.

Chap. 22. Anſwer to the twenty ſecond Chapter.

The force of the argument, Section 35. you deny upon a ſhew of ſome ſubtlety, becauſe, ſay you, one implicit faith doth not contain another. This you affirm, but afford us not the leaſt offer of proof for the affirmation. I muſt therefore beſeech you to look over your principle again. Suppoſe me to believe by an implicit faith, that you are an honeſt man, may not that belief contain in it an implicit belief to every propoſition by you aſſerted? Nay, what need this circumlocution? is not his Lordſhip's argument moſt clear being put into a Syllogiſm? Section 1. A.

If God commands the Church to be believed, then he that implicitly believes all the commands of God, implicitly believes that the Church is to be believed: but God commands the Church to be believed, Section 2.

lieved, ergo. See now which Propoſition you will deny, the major is evident, the minor I preſume you will not deny, whoſoever elſe doth, and then I beſeech you be good to the concluſion.

Section 3. But that it ſeems you will grant too, but ſuſpect that that general belief is not ſincere and cordial; But that I am ſure is not for us to diſpute of, or diſcern, and I am as ſure 'tis nothing to the caſe where 'tis ſuppoſed to be ſincere, and if it be not, no man ever thinks it can be relied on.

To the 37, 38, and 39. Sections, Chap. 13.

Admitting the formoſt of theſe Sections as probable; To the 38, I anſwer, that as ſome are made obſtinate by pride, ſo again otherſome lazineſs detains in ignorance. But what of that? I grant you that it is not pride in you or any man never to aſſent, till you find good reaſon for it, but rather wiſedom. Nevertheleſs it may be pride which blinds a man and hinders him from the ſeeing a juſt reaſon of aſſenting, yea even then when it is not onely perceptible, but alſo eaſie to be perceived; for the eye of the proud ſees not the truth, but overlooks it. The 39th Paragraph containeth in it no buſineſs conſiderable in the matter of controverſie between us.

Chap. 23. Anſwer to the twenty third Chapter.

Section 1. The 37, Section you admit as probable; and now methinks I underſtand your dialect ſomewhat better than before I did; Doth not [admitting as probable] ſignify [not underſtanding?] Truly it had been more ingenuouſly done to have uſed that other phraſe; for the truth is, it might have been done at this time without any diſparagement to your underſtanding; for in the beginning of this Section there was at the firſt Edition clearly an errour in the print. It ſhould be thus as 'tis now mended; To the Greek that concludes the former Section ſhould be adjoined in the ſame period, If I could, &c. and no new Section be there made; and as the ſenſe, by that miſtake of the Printer, lies broken in the firſt Impreſſion, it is non-ſenſe.

Section 2. Now this being ſaid, It is a little odd that there ſhould be but one piece of non-ſenſe in the Book, and that ſhould have the luck to be in your favour, and by you be confeſtly admitted as probable. But this was but a misfortune. Your Anſwer to the 38th is not ſo excuſable, being not one ſyllable to the matter in hand, [that ſluggiſhneſs may as probably bring a Papiſt to grant your infallibility, as pride a Proteſtant to deny it] Inſtead of denying or anſwering of which, you onely reply, that pride may poſſibly blind a man. Sure this Paragraph you might have admitted alſo, (as well as the other two that encompaſs it) much better than to have ſaid nothing to the purpoſe.

Section 3. The 39th I would not diſcourage you from granting (it had been much for my eaſe, if you had granted the whole Treatiſe) otherwiſe I could ſhew you, that it contains an argument perfectly concludent againſt your cauſe, in ſatisfying one main objection of yours againſt us.

To the 40. 41. 42. Sections, Chap. 24.

We Catholicks do not diſagree in points of faith, neither where there is fire to keep us in awe, nor where there is none, and therefore this exception againſt our unity is frivolous. It is the clearneſs and perfection of our rule that draws us all to unity, and not any of the four Elements. If we follow this rule we are at peace, and we do well know how to follow it: contrariwiſe, follow your rule as well as you can, and yet you are at variance; wherefore you aſſign a rule, which though it in it ſelf be not uncertain, yet which is as bad, you are uncertain of it. Now as in Logick a maxim, or axiome, if unknown, or uncertain, is no good principle of argumentation; ſo in matter of belief, a rule not certainly diſcernible and underſtood, is no good rule of faith, though never ſo perfect in it ſelf: and this is juſt your caſe.

The differences amongſt thoſe of our Church are not differences in matters of faith or religion, as it is evident; but on the other ſide it is manifeſt and confeſſed, that yours are. Our differences are in Philoſophy onely, or in ſome Scholaſtick and undefined point, and ſuch in particular is, that now ſome years agitated between the Dominicans, and ſundry of their party on the one ſide, and the Jeſuits, and Sorbon Doctours, and many more, on the other. For theſe contend not as we do, with the Calviniſts, namely, whether we have free will or no; all of them agreeing in that verity of faith; but they contend about a queſtion onely Philoſophical, which hath ſome relation to it, namely, whether with this freedom of will acknowledged by both ſides, Phyſical predeterminations or premotions can conſiſt: which queſtion is no queſtion of faith. Now admitting, as many think, that theſe predeterminations could not ſtand with the doctrine of free-will, yet the ſaid doctrine of faith is not hurt thereby: for the oppoſition between them and free-will, is either diſcovered by the Dominicans, or not. If not, then is it dormant, and ſo, though never ſo ill, it cannot doe hurt to faith, or work it any prejudice. If it be diſcovered, then it can work nothing, foraſmuch as thereupon it will be relinquiſht and abandon'd preſently: becauſe the doctrine of free-will is received by an aſſent of faith, and the other but by a philoſophical or opinative; the former being the ſtronger, muſt needs command and expell the latter, as ſoon as they begin to fall at variance. Wherefore it would in that caſe be a good conſequence with them, viz. Man hath free-will, therefore there is no predetermination, and not contrariwiſe, (as it is with the Calviniſts) there is predetermination, therefore no free-will. Therefore in the holding of predeterminations there is a vaſt difference between a Calviniſt and a Dominican, even as much as between an obedient Catholick, and a perverſe and obſtinate Heretick, and that is difference enough. And ſince you would needs know, this is the reaſon why theſe arguments make you Hereticks, and not the Dominicans. That the Church ought to have reſolved the point in difference, between thoſe two orders, is more than the Enquirer can prove, for neither of their doctrines do hinder conformity with the Ancients in any one thing, wherein conformity was requiſite; for men are not bound to conform with the Ancients in the reaſons of their belief, but in their belief onely. The 42. Section we grant, as making nothing againſt our doctrine. And thus Chillingworth is alſo anſwered who inſiſts upon this ſame point, and alſo in the ſame faſhion with this Enquirer, ſo that all things conſidered, both theſe make but one Authour, and require but one anſwer to what they have objected. And by this the 41, and 42. Sections be alſo anſwered.

Chap. 24. Anſwer to the twenty fourth Chapter.

His Lordſhip ſaith that the conſent is little thank-worthy, becauſe that may be an effect of fear, when there is fire for them that diſagree. To this you anſwer, that you diſagree not in matters of faith, neither where there is fire to awe, nor where there is none. Section 1. A.

Sir, is not that a ſtrange anſwer in you, that know there is fire to awe diſagreers in all matters of faith, and conſequently no matter of faith, where there is no fire to awe? By this it appears that that exception of his Lordſhip's againſt your unity in matters of faith, is far from frivolous; and to get quit of it, you are fain to make a diſtribution, of which onely one ſpecies belongs to the Genus, which being put into form betrays it ſelf preſently: It muſt be thus; of matters of faith, ſome are required of us ſub pœnâ ignis, ſome are not. Can you ſtand to it, that this ſhall hold? are there any things de fide, which a man may ſafely disbelieve? if not, all the reſt you ſay in that Section is nothing to the purpoſe. But then you add, that all the differences are in matters not of faith; to which the anſwer will be very obvious (if I troubled you with no other) that ours are ſo too, and then you have little matter of triumph over us in that excellence. Section 2. B. C.

But if you pleaſe, I ſhall be a little more large with you in this point; and, firſt I beſeech you to conſider, that it is you that bring this Argument againſt us, taken from Diſſentions amongſt us, and not we againſt you (though we might with as good reaſon) and therefore that it lies on you to prove it a concluding Argument, and to us 'tis abundantly ſufficient, if we be but able to retort it, for then 'twill be an Argument ad homines, though in it ſelf it be no Argument. Section 3. D.

This being premiſed, I pray obſerve, in the ſecond place, the no-force of this Argument againſt us, unleſs it may alſo appear that our departing from you, is the cauſe of theſe Diſſentions. For if they be but onely conſequent to it accidentally, this ought not in all reaſon to be laid to our charge, any farther than thus, that this accidental conſequent, is a probable argument of one of theſe two things, either that you have better rules for the reſtraining of ſuch Diſſentions than we, or elſe that you are more carefull in executing the rules you have; and if either of theſe be ſaid by you, I ſhall then tell you, 1. That it ſeems this Argument concludes but probably, though the propoſition were granted, and I believe I could urge as probably on the other ſide, and conclude the excellency of our Reformation from that old ſaying of Clemens (by way of Anſwer to your Objection, both of Jews and Heathens againſt Chriſtianity, taken from the Diſſentions of Chriſtians in the Primitive Church τέτο ἡ αἰτία, ὅτι πασὶ τοῖς καλοῖς μάχη ἐστὶ καὶ ζῆλος, The cauſe of them is, becauſe all things, that are excellent, are ſubject to the envy of Men and Devils, and from thence, to the ſowing of ſeeds of Diſſentions amongſt them; agreeably to that of our Saviour, that as ſoon as the wheat was in the ground, the envious ſowed his tares. Section 4.

But then ſecondly, for the preventing of ſuch Diſſentions, I ſhall add, that though we have not pretence of infallibility, and threats of fire to reſtrain men from them, yet we have other rules more agreeable to ancient Church-practice, than either of theſe; and though the weapons of our warfare are not carnal in your ſenſe of εἰς ὄλεθρον σαρκὸς, to the taking away of life, yet are they, if they were executed, mighty to bring down or ſhut out Hereſies. For, if you know it not, I can tell you, that Excommunication (that ſovereign receipt of Chriſt and his Apoſtles, the moſt perfect deſign of charity, to ſave and recover that which is loſt, to ſhame men to reformation) and upon contempt of that, that ſecular rougher hand interpoſing, the Writ de Excommunicato capiendo, and the Statute of Abjuration are very ſtrong reſtraints; and if they have not been ſo diligently executed as they ought to be, though I hope you will pardon this fault, yet he that will not, muſt charge it onely on the Perſons of our Magiſtrates, and not on our Religion, or the ſtate of our Reformation. And then let me add, that even theſe Laws, and this execution of them, or the like, whether among you or us, can extend no farther than to outward reſtraints, and that onely of thoſe that will be ſo terrified, or to puniſhment of them that will not; but not to preventing of Hereſies in the inward riſe or growth, or ſometimes in the breaking out, whenſoever ambition of being Leader of a Sect, &c. are more prevailing than fear of puniſhments, which caſes muſt be lookt for in every Church. Section 5.

To which purpoſe you may pleaſe to reflect upon your ſelves, and tell me, whether there were not good ſtore of Hereticks before the times of the Reformation; If not, I am ſure Irenæus, and Epiphanius, and Saint Auguſtine, and Philaſtrius have abuſed us in their Catalogues; and I beſeech you, but to remember the ridiculous Hereſies of Galatia (which Saint Jerome mentions on occaſion of Gal. 3. 1. in reſpect of which he conceives the Apoſtle calls them ſuch fools, and thinks they were bewitcht) particularly thoſe of the ἀσελγεῖς, that would have Cheeſe mixt with the Bread in the Sacrament, which with two others of the like ſtamp, there mentioned, came from Ancyra the Metropolis of Galatia. And yet I believe, you would not think the Argument of much force, if it ſhould (from your example againſt us) be made uſe of by us either againſt thoſe Apoſtolical Churches, or againſt the Roman Church ever ſince, that ſo many Hereſies are gone out of it; and yet that would be as reaſonable in us, as in you it is to charge all the Hereſies which have been in the World ſince Luther, upon the Reformation. Section 6. E.

For, let me ask you, is the fault that you object to us in this matter, that Hereticks are gone out from us? That which we have ſaid, will ſatisfy you that that is no argument, that we are not a true Church, for if it be, it will be of force againſt the Catholick Orthodox Church in all Ages. Or is it, that they that thus diſſent from us, are ſuffered to continue among us? if that be it, then firſt there are alſo Diſſenters among you, continuing with you. Secondly, our Laws and Canons are for the caſting them out, if their diſſentings be heretical, and that is all that you can pretend of theſe, and if we have been more indulgent than you would have us, that is but an errour of tenderneſs firſt, and then, that onely the fault of Perſons. Section 7.

Having ſaid thus much (which I conceive full ground of ſatisfaction to what you have or can ſay in this matter) I might now add, that if you look no farther than the Church of England even in theſe (which I ſuppoſe you will count the) worſt times of it, you cannot find any greater or more dangerous Hereſies avowed by any conſiderable Party, than are owned by ſome of the Jeſuits among you. Section 8.

Section 9. I ſhall firſt mention that popular doctrine (you know what I mean) of Bellarmine, reſumed and confirmed not long before his death, with his moſt adviſed care in his Recognitions. Secondly, the doctrine and practice of reſiſting and depoſing lawfull Magiſtrates under colour of Religion (that I ſet it no higher, even to killing of Kings.) Thirdly, the oppoſing the Order of Biſhops, as expreſly contrary to the ſole power enſtated by Chriſt on Saint Peter. And alſo fourthly, the affirming it lawfull that evil may be done, ſo it be in order to a publick good; and that I trouble you with no more (and yet give you reaſon to think that it is in my power) I beſeech you to believe that I have read Watſon's Quodlibets, (and I could without much difficulty make a parallel betwixt theſe whom you ſo much charge, and thoſe whom you defend, your hateſt Enemies, and your deareſt Friends, that Book being ſo richly able to furniſh me with hints) and that I have ſurveyed the Writings betwixt the Seculars and the Regulars (with the late controverſie among you, about the Biſhop of Calcedon's being appointed Ordinary in this Kingdom, produced) and in them the difference about the neceſſity of Confirmation, and the [non] (even now mentioned) in the Canon of the Council, as alſo the Symbolum Jeſuiticum, &c. and if we have any greater diviſions among us yet, than theſe, I beſeech you to let me know it from you (for I believe 'twill be no eaſie diſcovery) and I ſhall promiſe to doe and pray my utmoſt, that they may be avoided.

Section 10. This being thus ſet betwixt us, I ſhall not need to deſcend to a particular ſurvey of the truth of what you ſay, that theſe differences among you are in matters not de fide; though in that there would be a large field to amplify in alſo.

Section 11. To his Lordſhip's argument, [That the Church ought to have reſolved theſe queſtions, if they deſired conformity with the ancient Church] you anſwer, that neither of theſe Doctrines hinder conformity with the Ancients in any thing wherein conformity is required; and confirm that, by an implicit aſſertion, which you will never be able to prove, viz. that the Fathers did not deliver doctrines (as well as reaſons) directly contrary to the Dominicans; Whereas 'tis clear they did, viz. to that, that phyſical predeterminations can conſiſt with freedom of will. Which even now you thought good (not to deny, but) to excuſe by a dilemma, that if this oppoſition were not diſcovered to the Dominicans, it would doe no hurt, if it were, it would be relinquiſht. It ſeems by this, that if they are diſcovered, and not relinquiſht, the danger would then be great; and ſo, that if they knew this conformity, this conformity would be requiſite alſo, and ſo is requiſite in it ſelf, though by the excuſe of blameleſs ignorance, it be capable of mercy.

Section 12. To the forty ſecond Section you anſwer by granting again, and thus you ſay alſo Maſter Chillingworth is anſwered, and truly ſo any man will be content to be anſwered; I would all his Lordſhip's Treatiſe had been ſo anſwered, it had been more eaſe to your ſelf, and advantage to ſomebody elſe.

To the 43. Section, Chap. 25.

We do not formally infer, that becauſe our rule breeds unity, therefore all diſſenting Parties ought to yield to that; but that diſſenting Parties have no rule on which it is fit, or ſafe to rely; and again, that in place of it, we ought to ſeek out one which cauſes unity, becauſe no rule can be good without that quality. Nevertheleſs it follows alſo, ours is the true rule, becauſe, de facto, none but ours either doth it, or is apt to doe it, and one ſuch rule there muſt be, we are ſure. Ours then is not therefore to be accepted, becauſe it breeds unity, but becauſe it alone doth breed it. As for Nilus, he is a pratling Greek, and beſides that in his ſeveral ſayings he overthrows himſelf, and confirms our Doctrines; in this point no heed is to be taken to what he ſaith.

Chap. 25. Anſwer to the twenty fifth Chapter.

Section 1. In this Chapter you diſclaim an Aſſertion by affirming it; diſclaim it in theſe words, [That you do not infer, becauſe your rule breeds Unity, therefore all diſſenting Parties ought to yield to it] and affirm it in theſe [That diſſenting Parties have no rule, that they ought to ſeek out one that cauſes Unity, that yours is the true rule, and none but yours:] your meaning is, it ſeems, that you do infer it, but you doe it not formally; and ſure it matters little for formality, when the thing is ſo granted by you.

Section 2. For that you put in the word [onely] it matters little; becauſe any other company that ſhould deny that infallibility, and uſurp it themſelves, would ſoon get the monopoly of it alſo, eſpecially from any that differed from them in any particular. As for Nilus, 'tis far cheaper and eaſier to call him pratling Greek, than to confute his ſaying, which yet, if you pleaſe to mark his words in this place, is no more than you ſay in the very undertaking to anſwer this Treatiſe, that your Church muſt by all be lookt on as infallible.

To the 44, 45, 46, 47 Sections, Chap. 26.

In theſe four Sections the Enquirer buſily endeavours to perſuade that errours might ſecretly creep into the Church by degrees, as a Child waxes bigger, and as the index of a Clock moves about. Be it ſo as the Enquirer ſaith; yet nevertheleſs, might all ſuch creeping errours, if there were any, be eſpied, at leaſt, when they had once got in, if not while they were ſtealing thither. Thus the growth of a Child is ſeen plainly, though not the growing, and the hand, or ſhadow of a Dial is ſeen at what hour it is, though the ſlow pace thither was not perceptible; and men may give a judgment whether it go falſe or true. Why then could not errours be eſpied as eaſily after they were once ſtoln in, though by never ſo ſmall degrees, they made their approaches thither? Thus were the errours of Arius, Pelagius, Wicliff, Socinus, and others, preſently diſcovered, notwithſtanding all their Authours counterfeiting and ſly manner of divulging them; even as tares, which were ſown while men ſlept: as ſoon as grown up were ſeen and noted. What then ſhould hinder all other pretended errours of the Church from being ſeen and regiſtred, although crept in never ſo inſenſibly?

What matter is it that ſundry Books are loſt? Are they more loſt for thoſe errours, than for others? or were theſe more inviſible than all the reſt? It is ſtrange with what improbable conjectures this Enquirer deludes himſelf.

He tells us afterwards of another ſly way of breaking in, that is to ſay, under old names and titles, altering the ſignification, but not the words. But I would know how the errours of the Church could by this art be concealed, more than the errours of Calvin, who ſought with old appellations to palliate his new Doctrines.

But,

But, in concluſion, his principal device is, that if no precedent oppoſition were a note of the being taught from the beginning, that then the doctrine of the Chiliaſts would paſs for right and Apoſtolical, becauſe, as he affirmeth, it was not contradicted till two hundred years after the coming in. But my anſwer is, it is more than any man can prove, that it was contradicted no ſooner: nay, it is more than probable, that it was contradicted in the time of Saint Juſtin, as we have ſhewed before, and alſo highly probable, that it was oppoſed and rejected in the time of Dionyſius the Areopagite, as alſo hath been noted before.

Beſides, it is no way neceſſary that every caſual or innocent opinion ſhould be forthwith contradicted, or noted as an errour againſt faith; and of this ſort was the errour of the Chiliaſts during the time it was held but as an opinion, without cenſuring or condemning others, to which height, as ſoon as it arrived, it was cried down preſently and rejected.

The 48. Section contains but a recapitulation of what was before propounded, and therefore requires no new anſwer to it.

The laſt Section contains nothing that deſerves not commendation, or is unworthy of the Authour, but is rather to be extolled and imitated by all that make enquiries after truth, and his reſolves there be ſuch, that if they be truly and ſincerely put in execution by any, no man can have reaſon to be offended with him in this world, nor is it likely that God will be diſpleaſed with him in the next. But whether the Enquirer was not very unhappy in his ſearches after truth, or no, I leave it by the ſearcher of all hearts to be determined.

Chap. 26. Anſwer to the twenty ſixth Chapter.

To your anſwer to the undiſcernableneſs of errours, that though they are not ſeen at the time, they may be ſeen after. I reply, that I confeſs it poſſible they may be ſeen after, and that ſome are ſo, very ſoon after, but yet ſure not all preſently after, at leaſt not publickly and vulgarly ſeen; As they are ſeen, ſo they may be made known to the world, ſome a long time after others; and this is ſufficient to ſhew, that the Authours of the errours may poſſibly not be ſeen and diſcovered at all, though the errour in proceſs of time chance to be ſo, which will be moſt evidently true, if it be farther conſidered (what his Lordſhip affirmed) that errours came in by degrees, and not at once. Section 1. A.

To your queſtion what it matters that ſundry books are loſt? I anſwer, that thus much it matters, that from thence it follows infallibly, that 'tis poſſible there might be oppoſition againſt any doctrine, though in the writings we have, there be none mentioned; and as you diſprove not that, ſo his Lordſhip deſires not to have more acknowledged. Section 2. B.

Your next anſwer by retortion againſt Calvin, will be of no force, unleſs Calvin undertook to be infallible. Section 3.

For the matter about the Chiliaſts as you refer to your anſwer before, ſo do I to my reply; onely from your favour or indulgence to that opinion, during the time that it was held but as an opinion, without cenſuring or condemning others; but then withdrawing that favour when it arrived to that height; I am very glad and joyfull to join iſſue with you, and charitably to ſuppoſe (though I affirm it not) that till you took upon you to condemn and cenſure others, any opinion you held, merely as an opinion, might doe you no irreparable hurt; but now that you proceed to that inſolent unmercifull height, what mercy can you expect from your own principles, by which yet we that cenſure not, condemn not, are confident to hope for ſome kindneſs from you, though not from other men. Section 4. C.

To the forty eighth Section I ſhall take your example likewiſe; and to the laſt, commend your ingenuity for commending that, that deſerved it ſo much; and onely demand, with what conſcience you could think him very unhappy in thoſe ſearches, which you confeſs to be ſo happy in propoſing; for ſure if unhappineſs ſignify the ill ſucceſs of his ſearches, there can be (according to your Principles) no fear that they ſhould by God be permitted to be unhappy; or if it ſignify any fault in them, you cannot without uncharitableneſs, and judging of hearts, pronounce him guilty of it. Section 5. D.

The Concluſion.

The general reſult of all that which hath been debated hitherto betwixt the Enquirer and me, is, in effect, no other but that, Firſt, the Catholick Churches infallibility is a ſovereign preſervative againſt errour; and againſt all diſſention or diſ-union in believing, unto all thoſe who do acknowledge it, and yield ſubmiſſion thereunto. Secondly, that each new verity defin'd by that Church is to them a new path to Heaven, though on the other ſide, to all ſuch other as refuſe to be directed by her, it may prove juſt as the Enquirer is pleaſed to expreſs himſelf, a new path to walk in towards the Devil, or one ſtep more unto damnation. And in this he was in the right, and ſpoke truer than he was aware. Now it is well known that all we Catholicks are guided by that ſame infallibility; and again, that on the contrary all Anti-catholicks do reſiſt it, and what will follow out of this, is no hard matter to collect. Moreover this ſame infallibility, a quality ſo unpleaſing to the Enquirer, cannot, as he ſurmiſes, make us ſure, if we be in errour, never to mend, for we all do offer freely that if either he, or any of his ſide be ſure to diſprove ſoundly and clearly the infallibility, we will be as ſure to mend and forthwith to relinquiſh it; by which expected act of theirs we ſhall be reduced unto ſuch good terms, in which all Anti-catholicks continually are, that is to ſay, to believe at random, reel wildly up and down unconſtantly, and fall at variance amongſt our ſelves, as they do; and then I hope the Enquirer will be contented with us.

But the want on their behalf of ſuch an efficacious proof as this, hath been the true reaſon why we have not hitherto thought of any alteration, or coming towards them. Certainly it is much better to be perſuaded though falſely, of an infallibility, than to be ſure to have none, as you now are, but to be wrangling perpetually, falling out and fighting amongſt your ſelves; whereas, before you were, whenas our Religion prevailed, this inconvenience happened not. So that, in fine, all the goodly fruits you have reaped from your impugning Church and Councils, and in bringing in inſtead thereof a new invention of your own, is but the making of your ſelves and your Country miſerable, which daily, by dear experience we find. And ſo much for the Enquirer's unadviſed impugnation of the infallibility of the Catholick Church.

Chap. 27. Anſwer to the Concluſion.

Section 1. In your Concluſion which recapitulates the ſumme of theſe debates betwixt his Lordſhip and you, your firſt reſult is acknowledged perfectly, upon ſuppoſition that your Church were infallible; but then whether it be or no, that is the queſtion ſtill, and its being taken by you for a Principle, when 'tis ſo far from being ſuppoſed one, is the clear ground of the Irreconcileableneſs betwixt You and Us. For, upon
A. ſuppoſition that we were your Proſelytes in all manner of doubts beſides, yet your requiring us to believe you not onely in the right, but infallible, equally obligeth us to believe all that your Church can poſſibly ever affirm, as what you do already; and then we muſt have a ſtrong faith indeed, to be able to bear ſuch a burthen. Whereas, if you could but be brought to think it poſſible, you might be deceived, we
B. could then find place in you for Scripture and Reaſon to make impreſſion: but till then, you have that terrible prejudice againſt them, whenſoever they are produced againſt you (and whenſoever they are urged for you, they are to little purpoſe, onely to confirm you in the belief of that which you are already infallibly perſwaded to be infallible) that they are but temptations and ſhafts of Satan, which, the ſtronger
C. they come, and the more irreſiſtibly, the more is your faith obliged to reſiſt them all; and to that, this one fortification is ſufficient, that you know that whoſoever doubts of your infallibility, is not fit to be heeded in any thing elſe; Reaſon muſt ceaſe to be reaſon, Scripture to be Scripture, when it appears on that Argument.

Section 2. And that ſure is the reaſon that this Treatiſe of his Lordſhip's, which conſiſts not of more Paragraphs, than convincing Reaſons, againſt your Infallibility, is ſo eaſily rejected, or forgotten by you, that now you cannot acknowledge ever to have heard any ſuch on that Theme. And then I ſhall not attempt to hope to have ſo much, either Logick or Rhetorick, as to make that impreſſion on you.

Section 3. Onely let me deſire you to conſider the ground of your laſt period but one, that certainly it is better to be perſwaded, though falſely, of an Infallibility, than to be ſure to have none.

Section 4. Where firſt you muſt, if you ſpeak intelligibly, intimate that your errour is better (not onely than another errour, but) than truth; for the Infallibility you ſuppoſe to be an errour, when you ſo ſpeak, but the no-infallibility you do not ſuppoſe to be no-truth.

Section 5. But then ſecondly, I am ſo far from this opinion of yours, that I conceive it hard to imagine any errour, that could doe ſo much harm, as this of the pretended Infallibility, ſuppoſing it, as now you do, to be an errour; for that which brings a certain poſſibility (if no more) of all errours after it, and leaves no one falſity out of the Creed, that 'tis poſſible for all temptations to perſuade your Church; is certainly a complicated errour, and may well be called Legion, for nothing elſe can be ſo numerous as this; I'm ſure, not the believing you fallible, though you were not ſo; For, that would be but one errour, and no other neceſſarily conſequent to it, it being very poſſible for him that hath that opinion of you, to think every thing elſe that you think, to think you actually in the truth, although it be poſſible you may be in the
D. wrong. Not to mention the great injury that that Infallibility, if it did belong to you, would in one reſpect be apt to doe you, I mean to deprive your Church of all reward for any truths you preach, there being no matter of reward where there is no poſſibility of doing otherwiſe, nor capacity of a crown, where, for want of a poſſibility of being overcome, there is alſo an impoſſibility of obtaining victory.

Section 6. Thus have I given you an impartial account, how much, or rather how little, your Papers have wrought upon my underſtanding; and truly as the end of my writing any thing, was, that I might ſatisfy your judgment, ſo the main end of my enlarging to ſo many particulars, and, (as you may ſee by the expreſſions of my then-preſent-intentions at the end of the firſt Chapter) to a length which I had reſolved againſt, by examining almoſt every period in your ſeven ſheets, was to ſatisfy your deſire, ſignified in
E. putting your Papers into ſo many hands, that, to tell you true, after I had read them over, and declined the having any thing to doe with them once, they within few days after found another way to come to my hands again; ſo that it had not been civility toward you, to have put you to any more trouble, or farther to have tempted you to think your ſelf victorious. To fortify you the better againſt that temptation, I have been perhaps more plain and punctual ſometimes, than would otherwiſe have been neceſſary; and if when you have read it over, you find any ſuch plainneſs to have been without cauſe, upon your ſignification of your ſenſe of any ſuch my offence, I will promiſe to ask your pardon; mean while I ſhall not trouble you with any farther thoughts of continuing this Controverſie, (peace and unity and amity of pens and hearts being much a more lovely thing) but deſire that if any thing in your Paper (as far as it preſſes his Lordſhip) be in your opinion unſatisfied, it may in few words) without ſuch a large trouble as
F. this, be mentioned by you, and then friendly debated betwixt us at any time of meeting; of which whenſoever by the means that this came to my hands, you ſhall ſignify to me your pleaſure, I ſhall not fail to ſerve you, being indeed reſolved never to be thus injurious to my Reader again in civility to any man.

Appendix, or Anſwer,

To what was returned by the

APOLOGIST.

TO this Reply of mine, what was by the Apologiſt returned in the Margent of my Paper, ſhall be now diſtinctly ſet down, as the Preface promiſed, with a direction (by ſome Letter of the Alphabet) to that part of any Chapter of the Diſcourſe, to which each of his Annotations were applied, and affixed. And for Anſwer to them I ſhall not need enlarging.

In the Introduction, at the letter [A] this Annotation was ſet in the Margent. [I know of neither Scoffs nor Triumphs.]

Anſw. That there are ſuch, the Reader will give credit to his own eyes, if he review the latter part of your firſt Chapter, as alſo the cloſe of the eighth, and of the fifteenth Chapter; And that you ought to know them, i. e. acknowledge and reform them, as being contrary, the former to that Charity, the latter to that Meekneſs, which our Saviour left in charge with thoſe that would be called by his name, I hope you will diſcern, and confeſs with me.

Chap. 2. B. the Annotation is [I do not treat here what is done by ſome, but what in propriety of ſpeech ought to have been done.]

To this I anſwer, firſt, That it being true (as this Reply confeſſes) that ſome Romaniſts uſed that ſtyle of Catholick Roman Church, (though this Apologiſt did not) This is fully ſufficient to juſtify his Lordſhip's title, becauſe he was not bound to foreſee that this Apologiſt would reform the ſtyle of others; And ſecondly, though it be not propriety of ſpeech, yet was that no argument neither, becauſe his Lordſhip that holds that Church fallible in great matters, might conceive it poſſible for them to be ſo in matter of propriety of ſpeech, nay was confident that ſo they were, being not able to disbelieve his eyes and ears, that of this they were guilty, as improper as it is. But then thirdly, the matter is yet more clear againſt the Apologiſt, for though his Lordſhip's title did not preſage, yet I which had read that Anſwer, could ſee that he himſelf ſaid that the Church Catholick was the Roman, and the Roman the Catholick, and that is the thing which I affirm'd from his own words in that place to which that Annotation is prefixt. And therefore for him to ſay, that in propriety of ſpeech this ought not to be done] as it is an accuſation of himſelf, who was guilty of that impropriety, ſo is it not a confutation of me, who onely ſaid he was ſo.

Ib. C. [We ſpeak here according to the rules of formal predication, not for reprehenſion of the Enquirer, but for rectifying the manner of ſpeaking, and ſtating the Queſtion rightly.]

Anſw. 'Tis not imaginable how this note could advantage the Writers cauſe. In the very place to which this note is affixt, I am a-proving by rules of formal predication, that, by what is ſaid by the Romaniſts, and particularly by your ſelf, it is apparent, that you affirm the Roman Church to be infallible, though not quatenus Roman; this concluſion you deny not to follow from thoſe rules, but ſay, [you ſpeak according to thoſe rules.] And truly I have as yet no neceſſity to deny that you doe ſo, nor ſhall I, untill having affirm'd the Roman Church to be the Catholick, you proceed to deny the Roman to be infallible, though the Catholick be. This you do not yet diſtinctly deny, (though the whole controverſie about the title of his Lordſhip's book, ſhews that you are not very willing to ſtand to the affirmative.) When you doe ſo, I ſhall make bold to put you in mind of thoſe rules, and in the mean, onely to take notice of your own confeſſion, that what you ſaid, was not for reprehenſion of the Enquirer: which I muſt affirm to be a retractation of your former writing, which pretended to prove that in truth it was not ſo, as in the Enquirer's title it is called. This was then ſurely a reprehenſion of the Enquirer; and if now you ſay you meant not to reprehend him, this is to ſay you did not mean to doe what you did, which being a ſtyle of humility, I ſhall never reproach or find fault with in you; but yet tell you, that what you call in the next words of your Annotation, your [rectifying the manner of ſpeaking, and ſtating the Queſtion aright] is in my Anſwer proved to be contrary to your own manner of ſpeaking; and a clear miſ-ſtating. To which proofs as here you reply nothing, (nor is it imaginable how you ſhould, the matter being ſo evident, viz. that they that affirm the Roman Church, to be the Catholick, and the Catholick to be infallible, muſt needs affirm the Roman to be infallible) ſo do you in effect confeſs that you had nothing to reply to the remainder of that whole Chapter, which as it is the longeſt in the Book, ſo by vindicating the fitneſs of his Lordſhip's title, and ſtating of the Queſtion againſt your exceptions, doth lay very uſefull grounds for the voiding your pretenſions to infallibility: For if it be cleared by my firſt Chapter (as I conceive it is, and your Annotations do not deny it to be) that the Queſtion is of the infallibility of the Roman Church, then we that deny the Roman to be the Catholick, muſt never be charged of denying the Catholick to be infallible, nor be liable to the arguments that are brought againſt us upon that head, (which without queſtion are the beſt you have) though we deny it never ſo confidently of the Roman.

Ib. D. Surely the meaning is very obvious.]

Anſw. If it be, I am ſure the words do not clearly expreſs it; for how ſhould the editor of his Lordſhip's Tract (to whom the former part of that period belongs, in theſe words [though no notice hath been taken of any anſwer given already]) take notice of giving licence for any other anſwer? Give notice he might, but that in my judgment is not to take; and take notice you might, but that I conceive would not cohere with the antecedents; and any third way of rendring, I confeſs I imagin not; and therefore ſtill if the meaning be obvious, it muſt be met with ſomewhere elſe, than in the ſound, and contexture of the words; but this σφάλμα ſhall not be imputed to you, it was onely an officiouſneſs in me then, to ſhew you it was ſuch.

Ib. E. Theſe are bitter ſcoffs, and no way grounded upon my words.

Anſw. That the phraſe [ſad news] was grounded on your words there recited by me, I muſt ſtill affirm; for they are moſt evidently a form of complaining, and that is all I meant by [ſad news:] yet if to you it ſeem to be a ſcoff, or bitter, and both thoſe in the plural, (more ſcoffs than one in that ſingle expreſſion) though my conſcience doth not accuſe me of any ſuch intention, yet I will fall at your judgment, and beſeech you to pardon me for it; and to make you reparations, promiſe to endeavour to offend no more againſt you, or any other Adverſary, by any kind of bitterneſs; and for once, be you pleaſed to imitate my reſolution, and remember, that when another man ſpake it, [ſad news] was a bitter ſcoff, and then perhaps your reprehenſion of me may work a double cure, and heal you alſo of ſome exceſſes.

Chap. 2. Anſwer to Chap. 2. A I do not beg the Queſtion, but deny what the Enquirer aſſumed as true and granted, namely, that our proofs of the Church are no other nor better than thoſe by which you impugn it: which aſſumpt of his we deny, and whether juſtly or no, muſt depend upon the trial and the examination of his proofs to follow after; and therefore this denial of mine is no petitio principii, but a right and Logical denial, which either the Enquirer or you were bound to diſprove, and not to tell us as you do that we are bound to prove againſt the Enquirer, who here chargeth us, and ſuſtaineth the Perſon of the Opponent, or one that argues againſt our Infallibility.

I am the Defendent, and no Defendent can beg the queſtion, my diſcourſe is Apologetical as the Title tells you.

Anſw. I did not venture to tell you that you were guilty of a petitio principii, untill I had, as I conceived, made an ocular demonſtration to you that it was ſuch, which you may pleaſe to review in the place; or to ſave you that trouble, I ſhall tell you the ſum of it; you deny a propoſition, which in that place 'tis clear that his Lordſhip proves, and having not anſwered one word to his proofs (which is in effect to deny the concluſion) you then give a proof or reaſon of your denial [for we affirm that our Churches infallibility is proved by reaſons which are real and true, &c.] this reaſon of yours being as much denied by his Lordſhip, as your main concluſion againſt which he diſputes, ought in any reaſon to have been backt with ſome firm proof, and of that kind you give none but your own affirmation; and becauſe you do not, this I there call a petitio principii, agreeably both to Ariſtotle's notion of that Sophiſm, and to the notation of the phraſe. For principium, or τὸ ἐν ἀρχῇ, being acknowledged to ſignify the queſtion; for that, or any part of it, to be brought in to prove any thing, that in that diſputation is denied, is either αἰτεῖσθαι or λαμβάνειν, to beg the queſtion, or take it for granted, and in effect, to prove a thing by it ſelf, (which is the moſt irrational proceeding that can be.) If you are not yet convinced of this, I ſhall yet farther give you a proof of it from thoſe ancient Authours, which can beſt judge of this matter, the Interpreters of Ariſtotle; Take one for all, † Magentinus, in his definition of this Sophiſm: Ἐν ἀρχῇ αἰτεῖσθαί ἐστιν, ὅταν τὶ δείκνυῃ δι' ἑαυτοῦ, περαίνοντι δὲ ἄλλο δείκνυσθαι, A begging of the queſtion is, when any thing is proved by it ſelf, which ought to be proved by ſomething elſe. Or again, ὅταν τὸ αὐτὸ προκείμενον εἰς ἀπόδειξιν, πάλιν λαμβάνωμεν ὡς περαίνοντες εἰς κατασκευὴν ἑαυτοῦ, when that which is propoſed to be proved, is uſed as a medium, to prove it ſelf. Or again, ὅταν πάλιν λαμβάνωμεν περαίνοντες, δοκοῦσαν ἑτέρων εἶναι τοῖς προκειμένοις, ὅταν δὲ τὸν αὐτὸν, when we uſe a medium which ſeems to differ from the queſtion (or the thing to be proved) but is all one with it. As if to prove, that pleaſure is good, I ſhould aſſume, that pleaſure is to be choſen; whereas, ſaith he, τὸ αἱρετὸν, καὶ τὸ ἀγαθὸν ταὐτὰ εἶναι, that which is good, and that which is to be choſen, are all one: and therefore unleſs that be farther proved, that pleaſure is to be choſen, there is nothing done toward the proving it to be good. That this is your very manner of proceeding, I need not farther prove, having done it ſo newly by laying your whole proceſs before you; I ſhall onely add the note of that Scholiaſt, that Γένος τοῦ ἐν ἀρχῇ αἰτεῖσθαι ἐστὶ τὸ μὴ ἀποδεικνύναι, The not demonſtrating of what we undertake, is the genus of this begging the queſtion; or begging the queſtion is a ſpecial ſpecies of not demonſtrating; and unleſs you will diſcern firſt, and then labour to repair this infirmity in your diſcourſes, all your mentions of the Philoſopher in his Analyticks, will not perſuade us that you are likely to demonſtrate.

† Ἐξήγ. εἰς τὰ ςοφιςικ. ἀναλύτ. βιβ. α. fol. 28.

Thus

Thus much I had briefly ſaid to you before, but now have been forced to lay down more largely; and let me tell you, that when I had not onely affirmed, but proved you guilty of this Sophiſm, you ought either by denying my premiſſes, or by ſome other way to have anſwered my proof.

And inſtead of ſo doing, to ſay onely [you are not guilty] is a denying my concluſion, and petitio principii again. And from this you cannot be cleared by what you add [that you deny what the Enquirer aſſumed as true and granted;] For firſt, I ſay you were to have anſwered or denied my premiſſes, and you onely aſſay to prove your own concluſion: Secondly, your way or medium of proving that, is not concluding neither; For the thing aſſumed (by his Lordſhip) being this, [That the means brought to prove your Infallibility, were fallible means, and ſo granted by you] his Lordſhip did not aſſume this as granted or true in it ſelf immediately or without proof, but proceeded to prove it to be true and granted by you, and that by this medium, becauſe with you nothing was conceived infallible, but the Church: That concluſion then (being not ſet down as a premiſe or principle of probation, but as a concluſion proved by that medium) you again profeſs to deny, (remember I ſay you deny the concluſion) and then ſure we want no trial to diſcover the juſtneſs of ſo doing; and whereas you ſay his proofs follow after, I anſwer, that ſome other proofs follow after, but one ſufficient proof is brought in that place; and the denying the concluſion without anſwering of that one proof, is it which brought all this charge and inconvenience upon you; and therefore you now ſee I do not require of you (as you ſay I do) to prove againſt the Enquirer, but onely to anſwer his proofs; But if inſtead of doing ſo, you will take upon you to prove the concluſion which the Enquirer hath diſproved, and doe that onely by a bare ſaying ſomewhat which you know he denies, this is a petitio principii ſtill. And your ſecond Argument that it is not, taken from your being Defender, or Anſwerer, or Apologiſt, will no more quit you from that charge; for though an Anſwerer as long as he doth no more but either deny the major or minor, or anſwer to either of them by diſtinguiſhing, limiting, &c. cannot be guilty of that fault, yet if he deny none but the concluſion, he doth in effect, and interpretativè beg the queſtion; and if inſtead of denying of, or anſwering to the premiſſes, he go about to prove the queſtion in hand, or any part of it, he doth by ſo doing, take the place of an Opponent upon him. Now becauſe 'tis poſſible for an Anſwerer to doe one of theſe, though he ought to doe neither, it follows, that by either of thoſe ways the Anſwerer may beg the queſtion; and both thoſe are your caſe at this time, as hath, I conceive, already been manifeſted, and therefore I muſt be excuſed, if I ſtill conceive my concluſion is regular, the Apologiſt is guilty of that Sophiſm.

Chap. 5. Anſwer to Chap. 5. A. An Anſwerer is not bound to prove but to defend; This Arguer and the Replyer, which is your ſelf, are bound to prove.

Anſw. He that keeps himſelf ſtrictly to the Reſpondent's task, i. e. either to deny, or limit, or diſtinguiſh of either of the premiſſes in the Objection, is not, I confeſs, bound to prove, becauſe he is not ſuppoſed to affirm any thing; his repelling the Enemies weapons, or avoiding of them, is enough to defend himſelf. And if this were your caſe, I ſhould be unjuſt to require any proofs from you. But you muſt be a very great deſpiſer of my Papers, if you did not take notice in that place, that I was forced to be plain with you, and tell you that you had not anſwered (either by denying or diſtinguiſhing, &c.) any one word to his Lordſhip in your whole fifth Chapter, but fell into other diſcourſes of your own, which courſe as it is not the part of an Anſwerer ſtrictly taken, ſo if it be permitted him at all, it muſt oblige him to give proof for all ſuch aſſertions as he ſhall bring in thus caſually, or elſe never to expect, or require to be heeded by his Adverſary.

And of ſuch aſſertions as theſe, (which were caſual and extrinſecal to your diſcourſe, and by me conceived falſe) it was, that I required proof from you, and you are ſtill my Debtour for it.

Chap. 6. Anſwer to Chap. 6. A. If we affirm our principles be certain, contrary to the Enquirer's ſurmiſe, you, if you can, are to prove they are not, or elſe leave off contending.

Anſw. Certainly this is very ſtrange uſage, when that which you call the Enquirer's ſurmiſe, is a concluſion induced by the Enquirer by many ſtrong proofs. This you know is there evidenced by me, and if I had been miſtaken, you ſhould have ſaid ſo.

This being ſuppoſed, I muſt tell you, that it is far from being ſufficient for you, to affirm your principles to be certain; for when the Enquirer hath propoſed many Arguments to prove they are not certain, and among the reſt this convincing one, [That your Church (which is your infallible) is offered to be proved by ſuch marks, as the ignorant cannot ſeek it by, and the learned, though never ſo honeſt, may chance not to find it by] for you ſtill to affirm they are certain, and to add no more, is but to deny the concluſion; and againſt ſuch an one 'tis to little purpoſe for me to bring farther proofs, when thoſe that are already brought are ſo dealt with; and truly unleſs you pleaſe to give over this courſe of denying concluſions, and not conſidering premiſſes, I will ſoon obey your adviſe, and reſolve to leave off contending.

Ibid. B. Our Authours have proved all that we in defending do affirm, and if the Enquirer had impugned their proofs, we then would have tried to defend; wherefore that which we affirm and declare, doth not reſt upon a bare affirmation, although I prove them not in this place, as being here a mere Defendant, and not an Arguer.

Anſw. This Annotation being upon the ſame occaſion, and in ſubſtance the ſame with the former, is already anſwered. Onely I ſhall add, that if you affirm ought which your Authours in other Books bring proof for, this will not excuſe you from a neceſſity of anſwering his Lordſhip's arguments againſt that concluſion of your Authours; or if it doe, you muſt not paſs for a Defendant. His part it is, to ward the Adverſaries blows; and if he make a thruſt himſelf, he then turns Offendent or Arguer, and when he doth ſo, he muſt take care his weapon have ſome edge (I mean, his affirmations ſome proofs annext) or elſe they will wound no body. As for the Enquirer, i. e. his Lordſhip, it was not his preſent task to defcend cend to an enumeration and impugning of all your Authour's arguments (though yet thoſe which he could think of as your chief, he hath inſiſted on; and were he alive, he would from your dealing here, have little encouragement to ſeek out for others) his intention was to frame arguments againſt your concluſion, and if you had denied or anſwered them, you needed not to have troubled your ſelf to affirm any thing; or if out of deſign, or ex abundanti, you will, you muſt be content to be call'd upon to prove it; For call your ſelf what you pleaſe, you muſt be an Arguer when you ſo affirm.

Ibid. C. Yes ſure by conſequence it is.

Anſw. I am forced to ask your pardon, if I know not certainly to what part of my diſcourſe this Annotation belongs, whether to the end of one period, or the beginning of the other. Yet it falls out luckily, that whichſoever it is, it is again the denying the concluſion (which you are very ſubject to) for the end of the former period is the mention of a concluſion deduced from grounds immediately before ſpecified. And the beginning of the ſecond period is a negation of mine, with proof immediately following it, and before I come to the proof, [For though, &c.] you preſently interpoſe your [Yes ſure by conſequence it is] but will not conſider me ſo much, as after my example, to give the leaſt proof for what you ſay, or take notice of that proof of mine.

Chap. 7. Anſwer to Chap. 7. A. I make no diſtinction here, but ſuppoſe it made and alſo manifeſt.

Anſw. I onely ſaid you had given a diſtinction (not made it) and that ſuppoſed it made alſo; and I then conteined my ſelf from taking any exceptions to it; onely I told you, the applying of it to that place, would have afforded ſome game, if I had been ſo ſportingly diſpoſed. And to that, I pray conſider how pertinent your Annotation hath proved. I will not be provoked to add more.

Ibid. B. Your part was to have confuted what I ſay, and not ſo often, and to no purpoſe repeat this petitio principii.

Anſw. If it be a ſufficient confutation of any Sophiſter, to find out, and tell him of his ſophiſm (which ipſo facto is worth nothing when 'tis diſcovered, as the Title of Ariſtotle's Book of Elenchs ſuppoſes, ἔλεγξις being defined by Varinus, φανέρωσις τοῦ κεκρυμμένου, a diſcovery of that which was hid; and 'tis manifeſt by comparing 1 Cor. 14. 24. with v. 25. and Eph. 5. 13.) then have I obeyed you in confuting what you ſay, though I take not your advice for the way of it. And indeed, if it ſhould be in any Dueller's power to preſcribe to his Adverſary (when he is in his danger) that he ſhall not wound him this way, but ſome other, or if it were regular for you to forbid me to tell you of a petitio principii, (when you are clearly guilty of it, and when to evidence that againſt you, is not onely the ſhorteſt, but moſt logical, moſt expedite, and moſt clear way of redargution) your Adverſary might be weary of playing out the prize, though he were ſure to conquer in it. I ſhewed you that an Anſwerer might ſo carry the matter, as to be guilty of petitio principii, and 'twas but paſſion in you to check or tell me, 'twas to no purpoſe, that I ſaid you were ſo.

Chap. 8. Anſwer to Chap. 8. A. We have done it, and doe it continually when occaſion requires.

Anſw. I beſeech you reade over thoſe lines of mine to which your Annotation is affixt, and ſpeak your conſcience, whether you think 'twas fitly noted: If you can be ſo partial to your own creature, I will not contend with you; but onely tell you, that as I conceive it impertinent, ſo I ſee apparently, that 'tis contrary to that other ſpeech of yours, which within three lines I there recited from you. For if you doe it continually (i. e. prove the Roman Church to be the true by its agreement with Scripture, &c.) as here your Annotation ſaith you do, how could you ſay his Lordſhip was miſtaken in ſuppoſing you did ſo? I wiſh you had firſt read out to the end of the period, and then I ſuppoſe you would have fitted your Annotation to it the better.

Ibid. B. I do not diſclaim Scripture, though I do not hold it to be the firſt or formoſt proof either of the Church or of Chriſtian Religion, and would know how you your ſelf would convert an Infidel or Atheiſt by Scripture, beginning with that proof.

Anſw. You muſt again remember (what my laſt Anſwer mentions) that in that place when his Lordſhip had ſuppoſed you to prove the Roman Church to be the true Church by its agreement with Scriptures and Antiquity, which is in effect by holding the truth, you plainly tell him he is miſtaken in you. On this ground I muſt conclude (and think it proved by that confeſſion) that you do diſclaim Scripture, as far as I ſaid you did, i. e. not to all purpoſes, but to that of which the diſcourſe was, viz. to prove your Church to be the true Church. And 'tis not enough to ſay that you do not hold it to be the firſt or formoſt proof, &c. For if it be uſed by you as any proof at all, that will alſo be a very probable means, (beſides that it makes it evident, that his Lordſhip was not miſtaken in ſuppoſing it ſo) to bring you into the circle which you were ſo carefull to avoid. You ſee I am clear from your Animadverſion, and ſo have no occaſion to enter into that new controverſie, whether the Scripture be the formoſt proof either of the Church, or of the Chriſtian Religion, (though ſure it may be one, without being the other; it may be the formoſt proof of evidencing which is the true Church, to them that are ſuppoſed Believers (and none elſe will be fit for that enquiry) yet not be the firſt means to prove Chriſtian Religion to Unbelievers:) And yet I ſhall not be overcoy, nor make much ſcruple to tell you my opinion of this alſo, that I would not begin with an Infidel, with that proof to either purpoſe, as ſuppoſing he did believe it, or that it would of its own accord attract his belief infallibly; but for Chriſtianity it ſelf, I ſhould firſt labour to win ſomewhat upon his affections by converſe, and by ſhewing him the excellency of the Chriſtian Precepts, (and the power of them in my life) life) bring him to think my diſcourſe worth heeding; then when I had gotten that advantage, I would relate the rem geſtam of Chriſtianity, where all the acts, and miracles, and paſſages of Chriſt's life, would come in; then, if he doubted of the truth of it, tell him the authority, by which it comes down to us in a continued, undiſturbed, undenied tradition, from thoſe that were αὐτόπται τῦ λόγυ, oculate Witneſſes of Chriſt, and the whole matter; and to as good an advantage as I could, compound the ſeveral motives of Faith together, which if you pleaſe you may view at leiſure in Grotius de verit. Chr. Rel. and when by theſe means I had converted him, I ſhould then by Scripture and Antiquity, (which would now be of ſome authority with him) and not by miracles, attempt to manifeſt to him which were the true Church. To which end it may be worth your remembring, that your Apoſtle of the Indies, Xaverius, thought fit for their uſe to compile a double Goſpel, one of Chriſt, another of Saint Peter, by the authority of one of them to teach them Chriſtianity, of the other, the ſupremacy and infallibility of Saint Peter's chair. But I ſhall not give my ſelf liberty to enlarge on this.

Ibid. C. I deliver the method, and how it may be, I alſo affirm or declare that it is, I was not in this place to prove, but to defend againſt the Enquirer's arguments, and no other, and therefore thoſe two quarrels needed not.

Anſw. The deſign of moſt of your Notes is to ſave your ſelf from the neceſſity of proving any thing that you affirm, whereas it might be but an act of a little ſupererogating charity, if you would ſometimes prove your aſſertions, even when by ſtrict law you were not bound to it. But, Sir, I will not require your alms, but onely your juſtice, and though that will not oblige you to prove, when you onely defend, i. e. when you onely deny the premiſſes of his Lordſhip's arguments, &c. or when you are ſtrictly an Anſwerer; yet when inſtead of that, you confront any affirmation of yours to his Lordſhip's concluſion (as here you do, and in all places when we charge petitio principii upon you) I muſt then be pardoned to put you in mind of your duty (which is that of Arguers then, and not of Reſpondents) either to prove what you ſo ſay, or not to think you have convinced any man. They that cannot anſwer one argument produced againſt them, may yet think fit to make uſe of ſome argument for them, hoping that may prove as convincing on their ſides, as that againſt them: and ſo by divertiſement put off the heat of the impreſſion; and this you have been proved to be often guilty of, and 'twill ſatisfy no man to ſay, that you neither are, nor (becauſe Defendant) can be guilty of ſo doing.

Ibid. D. Sure he hath not, for Turnbull hath vindicated himſelf.

Anſw. If every Reply were a Vindication, then you may have affirmed truth, and then theſe few marginal notes of yours (ſuch as they are) would be your Vindication alſo; and then I ſuppoſe you will give your free conſent that they be printed. But the task would be too long to diſprove what you have now ſaid, (for it would require the examination of all thoſe writings betwixt the two Combatants, and when that were done, you would think perhaps, that Turnbull were vindicated, and I that he were not) I ſhall onely tell you that you had been ſo concluded in a circle infallibly, if you had aſſerted that method, which his Lordſhip there diſproves; which is enough to vindicate his Lordſhip againſt thoſe that do aſſert that method, (as ſure ſome Romaniſts do) and againſt them he there argues, and not againſt you, or any in that place, which renounce that method.

Ibid. E. If our Church be the true Church, it muſt be proved firſtly, as Chriſtianity is firſt proved; that is to ſay, by motives of credibility, and ſupernatural oſtenſions, or acts not of natural and ordinary, but ſupernatural and extraordinary providence; and he that will not prove Chriſtianity by this way, will not prove it at all. After this done, Scriptures and Fathers do come, but not before, and this way is not new, but the way of the Ancients.

Anſw. I have here no neceſſity of re-examining of the means of proving Chriſtianity to an Infidel; it will ſuffice to remember, that thoſe means which are neceſſary to that, may be unneceſſary to prove, which is the true Church, becauſe now to him that is converted (as he that will judge betwixt true and heretical, is ſuppoſed to be) other means may ſufficiently ſupply the place; ſuch are Scripture and Antiquity, which to an Heathen are of no authority, but to a Chriſtian, or ſuppoſitâ fide, are; and being ſo, (as I conceive, you will not think fit to deny) may well be made the umpire betwixt us, who are, I hope, allowed to be Chriſtians ſtill, by the conſent of parties, or if we are not, our pretenſions to miracles, will hardly gain any credit with them that have that prejudice againſt us.

Mean while I muſt remember you, that motives of credibility, as you call them, are but weak premiſſes to induce a concluſion of ſuch weight, as the choice of religion is. I will tell you what I ſhould have ſaid inſtead of it. Motives of exceſſive probability, of the ſame, or greater force than thoſe, on which I ground and build the moſt conſiderable actions of my life, and which (as * formerly I told you) if I will diſbelieve, I have as good reaſon to miſtruſt the wholeſomeneſs of every diſh of meat I taſte on, (which 'tis phyſically poſſible may poiſon me, but yet none but Hypocondriacks think it will, or phanſie it ſo ſtrongly, as to abſtein) the ſecurity of any title of eſtate I purchaſe or poſſeſs, the truth of any matter of fact in the moſt acknowledged hiſtory or tradition among men, that I daily talk of. * Anſwer to C. 14.

All which though they produce not (nor are apta nata to doe ſo) a ſcience or infallible certainty, cui non poteſt ſubeſſe falſum, yet doe they (or are very ſufficient to doe ſo) a Faith, or fiducial aſſent, cui non ſubeſt dubium; of which I doubt no more, than of the demonſtrated problem before me; a certainty of adherence, of which the believer is as fully poſſeſt, and from it receives as ſtrong motives to doe any thing proportionable to that belief, as if the certitude of evidence were allowed him. And this, I conceive, is a degree prettily advanced above motives of credibility; for ſuch is every the loweſt probability, nay almoſt poſſibility, and non-repugnance; whatſoever is poſſible to be, being (in it ſelf, and in caſe the oppoſite ballance be not otherwiſe weighed down) credible, i. e. poſſible to be believed alſo. But this by the way, and ex abundanti.

Chap. 9. Anſwer to Chap. 9. A. Why cannot the ſimple know this (viz. that the Greek Church doth not pretend from Saint Peter) as ſurely as they know the whole Chriſtian Church pretends from Chriſt, and from no other?

Anſw. Sir, you are a little too haſty in your Annotation; for if you had but read on to the next lines, you had received the anſwer to your queſtion, ſo far as my diſcourſe is concerned in it, viz. a ſpecifying of divers ways, by which 'tis poſſible the Greek Church might (and one, whereby one part of it doth) pretend ſucceſſion to Saint Peter. And then, that which ſo manifeſtly may be, and is, will not I hope be ſo eaſie for ignorant men to know ſurely that it is not, or ſo ſurely as that the Chriſtian Church pretends from Chriſt, and from no other. Which yet if it have any difficulty in it not intelligible to ſome ignorant men, I take no pleaſure in frighting any with an apprehenſion that God will ever damn thoſe ignorants for not being ſure of what is ſo difficult, ſo their lives be believing and Chriſtian, and agreeable to what they do know of Chriſt.

Chap. 10. Anſwer to Chap. 10. A. No ſure, not againſt the ordinary neceſſity.

Anſw. The thing I ſay in that place is, that his Lordſhip's argument might be (I ſhall add, is) of force againſt the neceſſity of a guide, (meaning thereby an infallible one, for ſuch onely is to our purpoſe) and that that will ſerve his Lordſhip's turn, and deſtroy you, I there farther prove by a full explication of the whole matter. And therefore you muſt give me favour to leave out your epithet of [Ordinary] which you would have me interpoſe, when my diſcourſe in order to its end, hath no need of it. And if you tell me, you put it in in your anſwer to his Lordſhip, and that therefore I have not vindicated his Lordſhip from that anſwer, unleſs I take it in alſo; I muſt then confeſs to you, that I did not ſo underſtand your words, [all that is nothing againſt the ordinary proviſion and neceſſity of a guide] that the word [ordinary] was ἀπὸ κοινοῦ to be repeated to the word [neceſſity] but onely that it belonged to [proviſion.] And now that I know your pleaſure, I ſhall more clearly return my anſwer, that his Lordſhip ſuppoſes ſome men (and I confeſs my ſelf to be one of them) to believe, that to all who follow their reaſon in the interpretation of Scripture, and ſearch for tradition (i. e. the conſtant interpretation of the Catholick Church concerning any difficulty) God will either give his grace of aſſiſtence to find the truth, or his pardon if they miſs it. To which purpoſe you may pleaſe to compare Juſtin. Mart. queſt. 4. ad Orthod. and, to omit many more, Facundus Hermian. in def. 3. capit. ad Juſt. l. 11. p. 491. & p. 496. & l. 12. p. 513.

Now to them that ſo believe, the argument which you fetch from God's providence, to conclude an infallible guide, will not, ſaith his Lordſhip, be ſufficient to prove it; becauſe he ſtill will be able to ſay, that where imperfection is accepted, means of perfection are not neceſſary; If God will pardon weakneſſes, he need not give ſuch a meaſure of ſtrength, as excludes all weakneſſes; if ſincerity, though with ſome mixture of ſin, will ſerve turn here in viâ, we need not expect from God that integrity of faculties, which either was beſtowed in Paradiſe, or will be in Heaven, to give us an unſinning innocence. And if you will ſtill interpoſe, that this is nothing againſt the ordinary neceſſity, becauſe theſe are caſes extraordinary: I anſwer, that this is a great miſtake; For under the Goſpel or Evangelical State (under which all men have been, ſince the promiſe of Chriſt upon Adam's fall) there is no ordinary neceſſity of never miſſing or miſtaking; our natural ſtate being an eſtate of weakneſs, is advanced by Chriſt into ſuch a condition, not wherein all weakneſs is excluded, but wherein ſincerity with mixtures of ſlips and errours ſhall be accepted, and this as infallibly as innocence had been rewarded under the firſt Covenant made with Adam in the firſt ſtate. To the firſt Covenant, which is ſtricti juris, ſuch pardon for ſlips might be extraordinary; but to this ſecond (whereof ἐπιείκεια or gentleneſs, is as much a part, as ἀκριβοδίκαιον, or ſtrict juſtice, was before) this pardon for invincible infirmities is as ordinary, as obligation to puniſhment for every ſlip, had been before, this being a prime ingredient in that Covenant, and not extraordinarii, but ordinarii juris, that under it ſuch ſlips ſhall not be remembred. In like manner as in this Kingdom, Chancery, though it be oppoſed to common law, (in one ſenſe, as that ſignifies ſtrict law) yet it is a part of our common law, as that ſignifies the municipal law, or total body of Laws by which this Kingdom is ruled; Equity (though perhaps it came in later, and to repair defects or exceſſes in the ſtrict law) being now as much every Subjects right, and Writs out of that Court as legally required and granted, and the whole proceſs in Chancery, as clearly ſec. jura & conſuetudines Angliæ, and ſo, as much ordinary, or ſecundum ordinem, as any thing that paſſes in the common-pleas. And ſo much for your nice interpoſition of the word [ordinary] to your pretended neceſſity of a guide; where yet I might farther tell you, that infallibility is not eſſential to, or inſeparable from a guide; and therefore though the guide were granted to be ordinarily neceſſary to the finding out of truth, yet this would not come home to infallibility. The antecedent I could make good at large, if it were now ſeaſonable.

Ibid. B. They (i. e. miſſes and miſtakings) are called extraordinary, becauſe happening accidently beſides the proviſion of the law, and not becauſe they happen ſeldom.

Anſw. That miſſes and miſtakings, infirmities and ignorances, do happen beſides the proviſion of the ſecond, or the Evangelical Covenant, is a miſtake, as was intimated then (within few lines after thoſe, whereon your Annotation was faſtened) and now at large proved in my laſt anſwer to your former Annotation, and I ſhall not need repeat it, but onely tell you there is a law of faith (as well as of works) and that in that law there is proviſion for errours, as well as ſins, and that I hope belongs to all Chriſtians, for we are not under the law, but under grace.

Ibid. C.

Ibid. C. And why ſo?

Anſw. I had before given you the reaſon, viz. becauſe your diſcourſe hath tended to infer the one, and not the other.

Chap. 14. Anſwer to Chap. 14. A. No man can bind another under pain of Anathema to believe as he defines, unleſs his definition be certain.

Anſw. There was here very little occaſion for this note. For the buſineſs of Anathema's, I had ſufficiently reſtrained; Firſt, by limiting them onely to excommunications, as an act of Eccleſiaſtical diſcipline upon the refractary; and therefore ſecondly, not for matter of ſimple believing or disbelieving; but thirdly, for matter of diſobedience to our lawfull Superiours; and that diſobedience, again, not in refuſing to ſubmit our underſtandings, but our wills, and our conſequent actions: and fourthly, all this with ſtubbornneſs and perverſeneſs, after the uſing of all milder courſes. And with theſe and the like limitations there will be no more difficulty to ſay, an Eccleſiaſtical Magiſtrate may excommunicate a diſobedient refractary perverſe Gain-ſayer, without undertaking to be infallible, than to ſay a Civil Magiſtrate may puniſh a Malefactour, without being inerrable. And therefore when you talk of binding to believe under pein of Anathema; there is ſome miſtake in that, or if there were not, yet Truth (if it were on grounds of Scripture believed to be ſo) would be as ſufficient a foundation of ſo doing, as the infallibility of the Judge. For not onely every truth is in it ſelf as certain, as that which is infallible, (every matter of fact that is ſo, is as certainly true, as any demonſtration in Euclid, and he that ſpeaks it, ſpeaks as certainly true, as if he did demonſtrate, yet is not in other things infallible for all that) but he that believes it with a full aſſent, hath as little doubt of that truth, as if it were before his eyes; yet doth it not fide cui non poteſt ſubeſſe falſum, on any ſuppoſition of its infallibility; by which means (though he pretends not to infallibility, yet) having no degree of doubt, he hath that, on which he will confidently build any action, and even lay down his life for ſuch truths, if they be of weight, which if it be not ground enough to proceed on to an eccleſiaſtical cenſure againſt the ſtubborn and perverſe, you are very mercifully diſpoſed, and I will not provoke you out of it, but rather give you my ſuffrage, that no man be thus cenſured for matter of opinion, but upon that light which is clearly deducible from the Scripture, or univerſal Tradition; and then I ſhall confeſs my ſenſe, that to anathematize men for any matter of doctrine, of any lower alloy, is, though not formally, yet interpretativè a kind of pretending to infallibility, uſurping as much, as if men were infallible, which they that have the ſpirit but by meaſure, ſhould have ſo much humility in themſelves, and charity toward others, as not to be guilty of.

Ibid. B. The ſword preſerves not inward unity, nor ſatisfies the mind.

Anſw. I had no occaſion to ſay it did. I was ſpeaking (as your anſwer called me to it) of diſcipline, and unity, or ſuch unity as diſcipline produced, which is outward unity, as oppoſed to diviſion and Schiſm; and yet let me tell you, it were not unpoſſible to extend my ſpeech to inward unity, and ſatisfying of the mind. For ſuppoſe a particular Church to have ſufficient means to work in the hearts of her Sons this inward unity, viz. by ſetting up the authority of Scripture, as it is interpreted by the Fathers, and receiving with due reſpect and obedience all Apoſtolical Traditions; Theſe, if duly revered by all Sons and Subjects, would be able to keep all of one mind in all matters of Faith (and for lower points, ſome kind of liberty being allowed, would preſerve Charity as well) and then while that Church were in this happy temper, you may farther ſuppoſe the ſword of violence to come in, and diſturb all, wreſting out of her hands the uſe and exerciſe of thoſe means, and beating down the authority, and taking away the reputation of them. And then in the caſe thus ſet, you will ſurely grant, that the rightfull ſword, if it might be ſo proſperous as to vanquiſh the diſturber, and reſtore what was thus violently taken away, may prove no improbable means of preſerving even inward unity in this ſenſe; and if you mark it, we ſpake it not in any other. And yet once more, if we had, we might have been juſtified perhaps in our ſaying. For Hereſie being a piece of carnality in the Apoſtles judgment, 'tis poſſible that the outward ſmart, that comes from the exerciſe of the power of the ſword, i. e. from temporal puniſhments, may cure that diſeaſe, and perſuade them, who inſtead of pleaſure from their hereſie, reap nothing but pain and ſorrow, to make better proviſion for their own fleſh and bloud, and think of hearing that reaſon, to which other honeſt mens ears are open, and then that may produce inward unity alſo, and theſe mens minds may be ſufficiently ſatisfied with that truth coming thus to them tempore congruo, at a fit ſeaſon of working, which at another time had been rejected. You ſee how little reaſon you had for that annotation.

Chap. 15. Anſwer to Chap. 15. A. Chillingworth ſaith it in terms, and him alſo I deſired to anſwer.

Anſw. Can you think this fair dealing? His Lordſhip, I made appear from his words, ſaid it not. And you cannot ſay he did. But Chillingworth ſay you did ſay it. What is that to his Lordſhip, or to me who undertake onely to vindicate his Lordſhip, and had not that rich harveſt of leaſure to think fit to be retained any more in other mens cauſes on ſuch joyleſs terms as theſe? in which, rather than I would adventure to be engaged, I ſhould be content to be thought to have no degree of kindneſs to him, eſpecially hearing that you had three great volumes prepared againſt Maſter Chillingworth: But then I pray what is the meaning of [him alſo I deſired to anſwer?] Can you think fit to impoſe a thing on his Lordſhip, which was ſaid onely by Maſter Chillingworth, and when you were diſproved, think you had ſtill confuted Maſter Chillingworth alſo, when you had onely falſified, not confuted his Lordſhip? Sure, Sir, this is not fair.

Ibid. B. I know very well this was objected by both of them, and this I desired to answer, whether it were in their books or no.

Answ. Here is more of the same strein. But I did conceive by your title, that you had confuted his Lordship's Tract that was published, not any unwritten discourses, which we have no way of knowing, whether they past or no, I am sure were not undertaken by me to be vindicated. I never resolved to justify all that you could say either of them said, and I might be forced to be uncivil with you, if I should enter any such debate with you.

Ibid. C. Neither Arius, Nestorius, nor others could peep out for saying any thing against the doctrine received. How then could this Dionysius have escaped, if he had adventured any thing against all the Orthodox?

Answ. You are very much given, instead of answering Reasons, to deny Conclusions, and if that were backt with Reason, 'twere yet very improper for a Respondent, which you told us was your office at this time. But then secondly, in this matter you know, that neither I, nor his Lordship have said that all the Orthodox were for the Millennium. And yet thirdly, if they had, yet the denying the Millennium being a more tolerable opinion than those other of Arius, and Nestorius, Dionysius's opposition of the Chiliasts might pass more unresisted, than Arius, or Nestorius could do.

Ibid. D. Photius tells us there were Answers given, though he recites them not, and Schottus in his Notes hath resolved them.

Answ. I will not take the pains to see or examine whether Photius say there were Answers. If he recites them not, I shall not be much moved with such blank Papers. The truth is, this hath been the way to satisfy the hardest Arguments that ever were brought, and confuting whole Books at once, by having it given out, that they are confuted, or that answers are made to them, when what those answers are, is not so much as intimated; this is a very cheap way of confutations; As for Schottus's Solutions, if he have any, they prevail little with us; I am sure they will not conclude that Photius foresaw, or would have counted them of any moment to alter his opinion, which was the onely thing I there had occasion to take notice of.

Ibid. E. Though Philoponus cite but one Epistle, yet elsewhere he numbers him among the famous Doctours, Basil, Gregory, &c. thereby insinuating he had left works as they had, and not one single Epistle to Policarpus. This is but a conjecture, but such both we and all must use in matters of fact, and when we are to walk through dark passages of Antiquity.

Answ. Sir, you cited three places out of Philoponus, to prove that Dionysius Areopagita wrote those works now extant bearing his name: This testimony I told you, would be nothing to your purpose, unless it testified (if not all those Books, yet) of some one wherein he wrote against the Chiliasts. But this I shewed you was not done, because those places mention nothing of his, but an Epistle of Polycarpus, and in that I advertized you there was nothing against the Chiliasts. This it seems you cannot deny, but being willing to say something, say that elsewhere Philoponus numbers him amongst the famous Doctours, &c. I have not now leasure to reade over all Philoponus, for that [elsewhere] though I have reason to think, that you that before cited the Chapters in Philoponus so punctually, would have had the same charity to me again, if it had suted with your interests) considering how little can be concluded from what you now cite out of him. Dionys. was numbred among the famous Doctours, Basil, Gregory, &c. doth it follow thence, that all the works now extant under his name were his, or particularly that, wherein he opposes the Chiliasts? Nay, would not a man rather conclude from that pretended testimony of Philoponus, that the Authour under the name of Dionysius Areopagita was some Writer about Saint Basil's or Saint Gregory's time, with whom he is there consorted, and that is somewhat later than Dionysius in the Scripture. Nay, if Philoponus really meant him, would he not rather have given him the title of an Apostolical Person, than of a famous Doctour, such as Saint Basil, &c. As for the insinuation which you mention from this of Philoponus, if it did conclude as you would have it, that he left Works as they did, and not onely one single Epistle, yet sure 'twill not so much as once insinuate that they were the Works, that we have under his name; much less that peculiarly, which opposes the Chiliasts; least of all, that 'twas the Apostolical Dionysius that really wrote all these. But you confess these but a conjecture, and therefore sure 'twill be a very weak prop to hold up infallibility, especially when the conjecture, if it should be supposed true, would tell us that which we had not before been told from you, that the Chiliasts doctrine was taught, (and so capable of being confuted) so early as the Apostles times, for with them this Dionysius lived.

You conclude that such conjectures as this, you and all must use in matters of fact, &c. To which I answer, that 'tis possible you may be forced to it, on supposition that you think your self obliged to vindicate your Churches Infallibility, for 'tis very possible, there may be no better, than such conjectures to sustein it. But believe me, Sir, I will never maintain cause, as long as God keeps me in my right wits, which hath no better conjectures, than these to sustein it. And for matters of fact so long ago, they are of all things in the World the unfitteſt to be believed upon such conjectures. Because nothing but an authentick expres witnes can be ground of faith for such. There is no matter of fact done yesterday, but may if we will go by conjectures (I am sure as good and as probable as yours here) be related 10000 ways, for whatsoever may be, some bold Affirmer may conjecture was, and the more ancient, and more dark the passage was, the more liberty there will be for such Conjecturers, because the less possibility to confute any of them.

Ibid. F.

Ibid. F. Salvian doth not refuse to condemn the Arian hereſie, but ſome of the Gothick Arians for it, as men not guilty of the malice of it.

Anſw. If you look again, you will find that both his Lordſhip, and I, ſay that Salvian refuſed to condemn the *Arian Heretick*s (not hereſie) and this it ſeems, you confeſs with the reſtraint of [Gothick Arians] and this will ſerve our turns perfectly, and ſo we ſhall not quarrel about that, but hope from your own confeſſion, that he that is not willing to condemn all Proteſtants, may eſcape as well as Salvian even in your cenſure.

Chap. 16. Anſwer to Chap. 16. A. The Council of Conſtance doth not teach this [viz. that no faith is to be kept with Hereticks] neither our Doctours hold it, as Molanus, Becanus, Tannerus, Layman, Coeffecteau, Coquæus, and others do ſhew us.

Anſw. To teach is an equivocal word, and may ſignify to define by way of poſition or doctrine in univerſum; In this ſenſe I ſaid it not, nor do now mean it of that Synod, that they made any ſuch determination, that it ſhould be unlawfull to *keep faith with Heretick*s, or lawfull for any man in any caſe not to keep it. But then to teach may ſignify alſo, to teach by example, and to lay grounds of doctrine for the juſtifying of ſuch example. And thus the Council of Conſtance did teach it; The Emperour had given ſafe conduct to John Hus, &c. and the Synod declared, that that ſafe conduct ſhould be no prejudice to any Eccleſiaſtical juriſdiction, and that non obſtante any ſuch conceſſion, any competent Eccleſiaſtical Judge might enquire, and proceed againſt any ſuch Perſons, and puniſh them as much as juſtice ſhould perſuade, if they would not retract their errours. And this coſt thoſe poor men their lives, whoſe preſumption on the Emperour's ſafe conduct, made them venture themſelves in that ſnare, never ſuſpecting, that ſuch a diſtinction as that could have proved ſo fatal to them. That you may not hereafter ſay I charge you unjuſtly, I ſhall ſet you down the very words in the Council in Binius, Seſſ. 19.

Præſens ſancta Synodus ex quovis ſalvo conductu per Imperatorem, Reges, & alios ſæculi principes, hæreticis vel de hæreſi diffamatis, putantes eoſdem ſic à ſuis erroribus revocare, quocunque vinculo ſe aſtrinxerint, conceſſo, nullum fidei Catholicæ vel juriſdictioni Eccleſiaſticæ præjudicium generari vel impedimentum præſtari poſſe ſeu debere declarat, quo minus dicto ſalvo conductu non obſtante, liceat judici competenti & Eccleſiaſtico de ejuſmodi perſonarum erroribus inquirere, & aliàs contra eos debitè procedere, eoſdemque puhire, quantum juſtitia ſuadebit, ſi ſuos errores revocare pertinaciter recuſaverint, etiamſi de ſalvo conductu confiſi ad locum venerint judicii, aliàs non venturi: nec ſic promittentem, cum fecerit quod in ipſo eſt, ex hoc in aliquo remanſiſſe obligatum. I ſhall not trouble you with the Engliſh, but onely ask, what this differs from teaching that faith is not to be kept (i. e. not neceſſarily, but in ſome caſe may be broken) with Hereticks? They that ſhall after ſafe conduct given, proceed to judgment (be it Eccleſiaſtical) againſt any man, and condemning him for hereſie, deliver him up to that ſecular hand to puniſh him with death, who had given him the ſafe conduct, and tell him, that he, having done what in him lies, remains not obliged by his promiſe, but may and muſt put him to death, who came to that judicature, onely on confidence of that his promiſe and ſafe conduct; have ſure proceeded upon other notions of juſtice, than thoſe with which my education hath embued me, and I muſt profeſs to appeal from their judgments, as in my Reply to that citation of them, I was bold to doe; and whatever your friends Molanus, &c. have thought fit to ſay for the ſaving the reputation of that Council, the matter is too groſs to be palliated, and I ſhall not trouble my ſelf or you to examine their excuſes.

Ibid. B. Hereſie is puniſhed not for the accidental grievouſneſs of it, but for the eſſential.

Anſw. This is again a denying the concluſion, (and not ſo much as endeavouring to prove the contrary) for this was the thing in this place clearly proved by the citation of thoſe Laws, that all Hereticks (viz. Arians and Macedonians by name) were not to be ſo puniſht, when onely Eutychians were; the former of theſe acknowledged by you as much Hereticks in reſpect of the eſſential grievouſneſs of their doctrine, as the latter, From whence it follows, that either there was great partiality, or elſe the difference aroſe from the accidentals. And truly, Sir, your ſaying in general that it is not ſo, will little perſuade any, when here is ſuch evidence in the particular, that it is.

Ibid. C. The title of defence is the Argument.

Anſw. There is not in that place any one word of this title of defence, or of any other argument; And that was all I affirmed. If you pleaſe to ſurvey the place, that will judge it betwixt us.

Ibid. D. This is a hard cenſure, and hardly to be proved.

Anſw. I confeſs 'tis hard in ſome ſenſe, i. e. to them that ſuffer under you for being Hereticks (as you call thoſe that depart from your deformations) and for being invaders (which all may at pleaſure be called, that are not able to reſiſt.) As for the cenſure, it is but that for which the grounds are gathered from your own words. Which 'till you diſprove, 'tis but your bare ſaying that 'tis an hard cenſure; or when it is proved, it matters little what difficulty there was in doing it.

Ibid. E. Theſe were not ſettled violences, but tumultuous, and outrages not for Religion, but for other quarrels occaſioned by Religions.

Anſw. The paſſage to which this Annotation was affixt, was about the pictures of Papal approbation of Maſſacres, to be ſeen at Rome. Which if they were, as you now ſay, tumultuous and outrages, then it ſeems there is Papal approbation for ſuch; and then, either that or you are fallible. But ſince you ſee it neceſſary to add another limitation, that the Maſſacres ſo approved were not for Religion, I would fain perſuade my ſelf that you diſclaim Maſſacres for Religion (the lawfulneſs of which you were ſo long defending.) And if you be now in that good mood of mercy, I ſhall not go about to confute or provoke you out of it, but rather pray that God confirm you and all your friends in it for a longer ſpace, than your charitable not damning us did laſt in the former part of the Chapter.

Ibid. F. Thoſe of Queen Mary's days had ſpoiled and ſtript the Catholicks of all they had, and therefore no marvail they did ſeek to puniſh them ſeverely, and to ſuppreſs them as men would do wild Boars broken into a Park or Garden.

Anſw. He that ſhould compare this Annotation with the Text, would wonder how it came in, ſo without all temptation or occaſion. I was there a challenging him to name one, that ſince Queen Mary's days was in this Kingdom put to death for Religion. And to the mention of Queen Mary, the Annotation is affixed. But I ſhall excuſe the impertinence; that very hint might well put him in mind of that ſea of bloud in Queen Mary's days. Which if it were by way of puniſhment for ſpoiling and ſtripping Catholicks, and not for Religion; I beſeech you produce one ſuch bill of indictment brought in againſt the ſufferers. Our ſtories have told us otherwiſe; If you have any authentick Records in your Archives, I pray make us partakers of the truth; In the mean, I fear a Proteſtant Son of a Romaniſt Father, may, when opportunity ſerves, paſs for ſuch a wild boar and a ſpoiler.

Ibid. G. My ſenſe is, that Religion may not be planted by arms, but being once planted and in quiet poſſeſſion, it may. And this I ſuppoſe no learned man will deny.

Anſw. I may believe you, that this is now your ſenſe; but that it is the ſenſe of thoſe words of yours, which I was then confuting, I ſhall be confident to deny, not onely becauſe the words bear no ſuch ſenſe, but becauſe you did there your ſelf interpret them thus, that the thing which you diſclaimed the deſigning by arms, was onely the juſtifying the right and truth of Religion by them. Which I then conceived to ſignify, that your ſwords do onely force men to be of your minds, do not give them reaſons why they ſhould. Yet if after all this, you tell me in earneſt, that this was not your meaning, I ſhall cry you mercy for the miſtake, but not now enter into a diſpute with you of that new queſtion now propoſed by you, [Whether Religion (that muſt ſignify your doctrines as they are diſtinguiſht from, or oppoſed to ours, or elſe 'twill not be pertinent to our purpoſe) being planted and in quiet poſſeſſion, may] becauſe I cannot imagine what verb that ſyllable [may] is the mood of. [Plant] it cannot be, for that which is in poſſeſſion, is already planted: But what it ſhould be, I muſt not divine for you. Onely at an adventure I ſhall make a plain ſtate: If your doctrines were in quiet poſſeſſion here, and you ſhould know of any man that taught the contrary to them, muſt your ſword be drawn againſt him, or no? I beſeech you anſwer out of the ſenſe of your brethren, that we may know what to expect from you. For my own part, I ſhall make no ſcruple to tell you, that though the defender of the faith have the power of the ſword given him by God to that end, to govern in godlineſs and quiet, and may therefore draw it effectually againſt any that raiſe ſedition to bring in ſome other Religion againſt that which is by law eſtabliſht, or that vent doctrines that are in themſelves ſeditious, yet ought he not, onely in caſe of any ſingle doctrine or difference in Religion (where none of the civil intereſts are concerned, no violent aſſault made, or feared from the Diſſenters) to unſheath his ſlaughtering ſword againſt any ſuch Diſſenter, provided always that that doctrine be not blaſphemous. (And they that conſenting to this truth, will yet tyrannize over mens ſouls in ordine ad temporalia, as you and ſome others have done over mens bodies and eſtates in ordine ad ſpiritualia, ſhall never be excuſed by me.) And of this opinion I conceive there might be vouched as learned, and as primitive-tempered Chriſtians, as any that are more zealouſly, and ſo more bloudily minded.

Ibid. H. Aſperſions be eaſily caſt, but ſhould not be admitted, when there are ſtrong preſumptions to the contrary, without evident proof; The Catholicks were known good Patriots under our former Kings, and under this our moſt gracious Prince we have good teſtimony, greater than which cannot be given.

Anſw. The caſe is not here of aſperſions, but of matters of fact, or attempts of Prieſts, whereby Queen Elizabeth was known to have been in danger. On which provocation the Laws forbidding all ſuch to come into the Kingdom, made it ſuch a legal preſumption, that if they did, they ſhould incur that ſuſpicion, and ſentence of the Law. And ſo every man knowing what meaſure to expect from the Laws, were farther to be preſumed either traiterous or mad, if on thoſe terms he would adventure on ſuch a forbidden journey. As for evident proof, which you require, it belongs little to this matter, becauſe the very being in the Kingdom, was a demonſtration of contemning the Law, and an evidence that they were the men that were under that legal preſumption; which is far more than a proofleſs aſperſion, with evidence to the contrary. As for the fidelity of your Patriots under our former Kings, when they were of their opinions, I ſhall not queſtion it; neither in like manner your behaviour to our preſent Sovereign, but onely tell you, that the Queen Elizabeth Laws might be juſt for all that; (which was all we had now in hand) and for the execution of them in latter times, I before gave you an account.

Ibid. I. We do profeſs, our beſt reaſon hath brought us to our Religion, not our paſſion, and we have as much reaſon to be believed as any others can.

Anſw. 'Tis poſſible you may not; for if mens actions give in any teſtimony againſt their words, there will not be ſo much reaſon to believe ſuch, as when there is a concordance of them; But if upon ſerious thrift

ſhrift you are able to profeſs this ſincerity, I ſhall be ſo charitable to believe you, and allow you any hope of mercy for your errours, which you can wiſh; but yet tell you, that by making this profeſſion in the plural number, you do ſomewhat prejudge it; no man being ſo privy to the hearts of his fellow profeſſours, as to be a fit voucher for them, every man muſt ſtand or fall to his own Maſter.

Ibid. K. I was to anſwer and not to prove, and therefore might in right deny what the Enquirer falſely ſuppoſes without proof. It is the Reſpondent's right to affirm the very point in queſtion, or to deny it, without caring whether it be granted or no, ſo he himſelf be ready to defend it; and ſo he that can exact this as his own, ſhall not need to beg any thing, and if he do, he cannot beg more than what he hath, and what he affirms or denies already. For example, I deny againſt Copernicus that the earth moves, or I affirm that it is quiet, and I ſtand to maintain my ſaying. Certainly this is no begging, but yet to ſay that it is ſo, may be a begging, or if I ſhould ſay it ſtood ſtill, becauſe it doth not move, were a frivolous ſpeech, but yet for all that no begging of the queſtion.

Anſw. This vindication of your beloved petitio principii, (that ſtands you in ſuch ſtead, and returns ſo frequently upon you) I have already examined, and diſcovered the miſtakings of it; and muſt now tell you again, that when the queſtion is by the Opponent proved by any medium, it muſt never be lawfull for the Reſpondent to deny it again any farther than by denying the proof on which it was inferred; for this would be the denying the concluſion, and petitio principii again. The Reſpondent in this caſe cannot exact the queſtion as his own, nor any otherwiſe defend it, than by repelling the weapons brought againſt him. As for your great ſimile of denying the motion of the earth, and your ſtanding to maintain your ſaying; if you doe this by any other means, than by denying or anſwering the proofs produced againſt you, this is not the Reſpondent's part, but will, when you have done what you can, appear to be that vulgar Sophiſm. It being certain, that when a thing is queſtioned betwixt two, the affirming without proof, is begging it; and it being not the Reſpondent's part to prove (for if he do, he becomes Opponent) it follows neceſſarily, that the Reſpondent that in time of diſputation affirms, muſt either ceaſe to be Reſpondent, or elſe beg the queſtion.

Chap. 18. Anſwer to Chap. 18. A. We are to conſider here, not what is conceived, but what is to be conceived. Now what is to be conceived I have ſhewed, namely, that the Church underſtands better than he doth, for right reaſon will tell him this.

Anſw. This is the very thing which is diſproved in that place, and then the bare repeating it over again, will be but a mean kind of vindication. Be pleaſed to look over the place again, and if you will ſtill think that there was any place for this Annotation, I ſhall be ſorry I have been thus troubleſome to you.

Ibid. B. I have ſhewed the reaſon why.

Anſw. When an argument is framed on a double ſuppoſition; without diſputing the truth of either, 'tis not to be allowed the Reſpondent to anſwer, by denying the truth of either of the things ſuppoſed, for they are ſuppoſed in that diſpute, but not diſputed of. As for example, if the queſtion were, [Whether ſuppoſing Adam were not faln, and Chriſt were come, the coming of Chriſt would be for the ſin of Adam.] Do you think 'twould be tolerable for the Reſpondent to avoid ſome argument brought againſt him, by ſaying that it was abſolutely falſe to ſay that Adam was not faln, whereas 'twas true that Chriſt was come? This would certainly be ſo groſs and impoſſible to be juſtified, that I ſhould ſuſpect any man's fidelity, that ſhould tell me, he had rendred a ſatisfying reaſon why this ſhould be. And this is your caſe at this time.

Ibid. C. Whether ſhe be infallible or no, ſhe is like to be wiſer than any private man. And this point cannot be in controverſie with a wiſe man, and therefore here is no petitio principii.

Anſw. This is a rare way of replying, when a diſcourſe hath been proved guilty of a petitio principii, to ſay 'tis impoſſible it ſhould, and when a thing is denied, to ſay it cannot be in controverſie.

But, Sir, I ſhall yield you, the Church may be wiſer than any private man, yet not conceive it to follow (unleſs ſhe be alſo infallible) that when a private man and the Church differ, ſhe muſt always be in the right. He that is much wiſer than another, may yet in ſome particular be miſtaken, when that other is in the right, yea, and may be adviſed and reformed in ſuch a particular, by one that is not ſo wiſe as he. This you may apply to the matter in hand, not ſo far as to prefer the authority of any one man before the Church in general, but onely ſo, as not to pronounce it infallible. I might tell you farther, that a member of the Church of England aſſenting fully to the doctrine of that Church, and ſo diſcharging the duty of a private man in preferring the judgment of the Church (whereof he is a member) before his own judgment, may yet doubt of ſome things affirmed by the Church of Rome, and not make the compariſon between a private man's judgment, and the judgment of the Church, but onely betwixt one particular Church and another. But after all this, I might have ſpared any, or all theſe Anſwers, and do now onely deſire you to look back upon the place, and you will ſoon ſee that no ground is to be found there of your Annotation.

Ibid. D. If you have no evidence (that 'tis God's pleaſure that your Church ſhould be infallible) nor can have, you ſay true, but this latter is denied.

Anſw. 'Tis eaſy to deny concluſions ſtill. But if you will either anſwer the arguments, which have proved there is none, or produce any ſuch evidence that it is infallible, you ſhall be victorious indeed.

Ibid. E.

Ibid. E. This argument which the Enquirer impugns, is an argument of his own making, and none of ours, yet for all that, the argument is not like a Ballad as good backward as forward, as Maſter Chillingworth, putting it a little differently from the Enquirer, would have it.

Anſw. If you had pleaſed to diſclaim and not defend this argument at the firſt, you might have ſaved us ſome pains; and if you will yet promiſe me, that no man ſhall out of Maſter Knot's Book make uſe of this argument any more, I will be very well content that argument ſhall be no longer inſiſted on; yet muſt tell you my opinion from my own expreſs knowledge, that they which read that Book before 'twas confuted by Maſter Chillingworth, did verily believe that that argument to prove an infallible Judge, taken from the topick of God's goodneſs, was Maſter Knot's maſter-piece, and the foundation on which the main weight of his ſtructure was ſupported.

Chap. 19. Anſwer to Chap. 19. A. In a Reſpondent there can be no ſuch thing as petitio principii.

Anſw. We have ſhewed you that a Reſpondent may ſo ill behave himſelf, that there may. As for example, when a man hath uſed arguments to prove that you have been guilty of begging the queſtion, For you to deſpiſe and not take notice of the arguments, and to ſay onely that there can be no ſuch thing, is the very thing called petitio principii.

Ibid. B. But we again deny it is [petitio principii] and the contrary ought to be proved.

Anſw. It is clearly proved in the place; and not to conſider the proofs, but to deny the concluſion is another guilt of that ſophiſm.

Ch. 20. Anſwer to Ch. 20. A. If the Enquirer's meaning be as you put it, it makes nothing at all againſt us, nor needs any Anſwer. But Chillingworth goes farther, and ſays that many of the ſimpler ſort amongſt us believe Truth upon no better grounds, than others believe Falſhood, and yet our ſimpler ſort believe Truths, upon all the motives that yours do, and ſomewhat more.

Anſw. That that is his Lordſhip's meaning is plain, viz. That he that denies your infallibility, and yet uſes his beſt reaſon to ſeek if it be true, will be in as ſafe a condition, as he that believes it, and ſearches not. And if this be nothing againſt you, I ſhall hope this quarrel is nearer an end than ever I had thought to ſee it. And then ſure many of us ſhall be capable of that charity, which you beſtow upon your own, for I am confident what we doe, we doe upon ſearch, and uſe of our beſt reaſon; and yet that we deny your infallibility, you are ſufficiently aſſured.

Chap. 21. Anſwer to Chap. 21. A. He might be ſecretly obſtinate, and yet both he and we conceive the contrary.

Anſw. 'Tis true he might. But yet ſure you that believe he was not obſtinate, cannot believe that the puniſhment of obſtinacy ſhould belong to him, but muſt either think God unjuſt, or elſe believe him ſafe in the ſame degree, that you think him not obſtinate. And this is all I required from you.

Chap. 22. Anſwer to Chap. 22. A. Every implicit aſſent muſt be reſolved laſtly into an explicit, or elſe there will be an infinite regreſſion, for every implicit preſuppoſes ſomething in which it is involved or implicit.

Anſw. I beſeech you obſerve the nature of this Annotation of yours. You ſay in your Apology, that one implicit Faith doth not contain another. I proved that falſe by this inſtance, that ſuppoſing I believed by an implicit Faith, that you were an honeſt man, this might contain in it an implicit belief, of every Propoſition by you aſſerted; and farther, by putting his Lordſhip's affirmation by you denied into a down-right Syllogiſm: you after your wont, anſwer no proofs, but prove againſt the concluſion. And truly your proof is a ſtrange one; every implicit aſſent muſt be reſolved laſtly into an explicit: Ergo, One implicit faith doth not contain another. As if you ſhould ſay, Every ſubordinate cauſe muſt be reſolved laſtly into a firſt cauſe; Ergo, One ſubordinate cauſe doth not contain another; the Genealogy of Abraham muſt at laſt be reduced to God, therefore Abraham's Grandfather was not Father to Abraham's Father: what ſound of reaſon is there in this arguing? The antecedent is the onely thing which you go about to prove, and the conſequence that which we deny, and therefore I ſhall need ſay no more to this Annotation.

Chap. 24. Anſwer to Chap. 24. A. We mean the fire of this World, and that fire we are ſure is not in all Countries appointed to burn ſuch as do diſſent from us.

Anſw. What? not to burn ſuch as diſſent in matters of faith? Is there any matter of faith which is not required ſub pœna ignis? (I mean alſo with you, the fire of this world) If there be, ſpeak out. But you have by your next Annotation in effect confeſt there is not, and ſo by that confuted this, for ſo you add, Ibid. B. I make no ſuch diſtinction.

Anſw. i. e. No ſuch diſtinction, that of matters of faith ſome are required ſub periculo ignis, ſome not; which is in effect, that in reſpect of that penalty, all matters of faith are of the ſame nature. Which is abſolutely contrary to that former, unleſs in that your meaning were, that fire was not in all Countries appointed to burn Diſſenters from you, i. e. not in thoſe Countries, where you had not the power. And that will be but a ſlender obligation from you, if it be acknowledged.

Ibid. C.

Ibid. C. If you could make that appear we were ſatisfied.

Anſw. It is made appear as much, as your like Aſſertion of your ſelves, i. e. by our affirming it. But if you will have patience to reade on in that place, you ſhall ſee the point ſtated, and as much of it proved, as we have need to aſſert in this matter.

Ibid. D. In ſome places we do (make uſe of the Argument from Mutual Diſſentions) but in this it is brought againſt us.

Anſw. This is clearly falſe, for in the 40. Sect. his Lordſhip there mentions it as an Argument of yours, and in that place becomes Reſpondent, gives an Anſwer to that Argument, and that is the ground of the preſent debate.

Ibid. E. Our Criterion or rule of Faith keeps off diſſentions when it is followed, yours does not. Lutherans and Calviniſts follow the ſame rule, and yet diſſent and condemn one another, ours do not ſo, but remit the differences to be decided to one and the ſame judge both exteriour, and interiour.

Anſw. I was a-proving by the ancient Catalogues of Hereticks, that there were good ſtore of Hereticks in the world before the reformation, (from which it followes, that either your infallible Judge was not then in faſhion, or elſe that it is not ſuch a ſovereign means or antidote againſt Hereticks) you ſeem to diſtinguiſh, that your rule keeps off diſſentions, not always, but when it is followed; and prove that farther, becauſe you remit the differences to be decided to one and the ſame Judge. I might anſwer, that our rule, the word of God doth ſo too, at leaſt in matters of faith, and that any ſuch diſſention, at leaſt uncharitable cenſuring of Diſſenters, is abſolutely againſt that rule. But I conceive, that is not the thing that commends a rule as a means to prevent diſſentions, that they that follow it diſſent not, (for the rule if it be but one rule, what ever it is, will doe that) but that it is able and apt to keep men obedient, and to reſtrain them from exceſſes and not following of it. Now this is an excellence that theſe many Catalogues of Hereſies proved, that you had no right to pretend to; and if we have not ſo neither, we are but Partners in this piece of humane infelicity, to which, as long as we carry fleſh about us, it will be incident, for there muſt be Hereſies among you. As for your inſtance of the Lutherans and Calviniſts diſſentions, and condemning one the other, I muſt tell you, that this little concerns the Church of England, which always diſclaimed the being called by the names, or owning the diſſentions of Lutheran and Calviniſt, and profeſſeth onely the maintaining of the Primitive Catholick faith, and to have no father on earth, to impute their faith to. I might add more even for thoſe Lutherans and Calviniſts, that if they did really follow (I ſay not onely profeſs, but follow) the ſame rule, they would certainly agree alſo.

Ibid. F. I do not excuſe all (the Jeſuits from the doctrine of reſiſting Magiſtrates under colour of Religion, killing Kings, oppoſing the Order of Biſhops &c.) nor ought you to have accuſed all; For neither all the Jeſuits, nor near all be of that mind, but of the quite contrary. Bellarmine, Valentia, Petavius, and other Jeſuits have written for the Order of Biſhops againſt Salmaſius and others, but none at all have written againſt it. Neither was the controverſie between the Seculars about that point, as it is moſt evident.

Anſw. I have already obeyed your commands; and indeed had no neceſſity to accuſe all of that Order in all places. It was ſufficient to prove the point in hand, (diſſentions among your ſelves) that any conſiderable number were of thoſe opinions, which are the worſt that are to be found among our Sectaries. And it ſeems, you cannot in your own heart excuſe all, as kind as you are to them. If others in a matter of ſuch moment are of a contrary mind, this is an argument not againſt, but for the truth of what is laid to you, diſſentions after all your infallible judgments. For the Jeſuits opinion of Biſhops, I appeal no farther than the diſputations in the Council of Trent, and the general pretenſions of that Order to an independency, and abſoluteneſs from any but their own ſuperiour, and the Pope; and this, though it allow Biſhops over other men, yet is ſufficiently contrary to the Apoſtolick inſtitution, and practice, of having all the Churches and Presbyters in them, ſubjected to them. You add, that the controverſie of the Seculars (I ſuppoſe you mean and Regulars) was not about that point, i. e. of Epiſcopacy: I did not ſay it was, any farther than thus, as the neceſſity of Confirmation is all one with the neceſſity of Epiſcopacy, (which truely to me ſeems to be very near it, and I am ſure the buſineſs was, whether the Catholicks in England ſhould have an Ordinary here reſident or no, and that Ordinary was a Biſhop; ſo that though it was not of Epiſcopacy, in univerſum, yet it came to a debate, whether the having Biſhops was neceſſary, or no) On which ſoever it is, it is enough to prove diſſentions.

C 26. Anſw. to C. 26. A. At leaſt they might have been diſcerned, as well as other errours were, and the Authours of them alſo.

Anſw. This note being reduced to intelligible ſenſe, will I conceive be, that the now Romiſh errours might have been diſcerned, &c. To which I anſwer, that though they might, yet Firſt, 'tis poſſible that they might not; Secondly, very poſſible that being favoured, if not brought in by thoſe in authority among them, they would not be branded or recorded for errours; and then, all that we their poſterity can ſee, may be onely, that the tares are ſown, but not punctually at what point of the night, or who the man was that ſowed them.

Ibid. B. No more for theſe than for other errours.

Anſw. His Lordſhip had occaſion onely to ſpeak of theſe, but will ſay the like of all others whoſe original is not diſcernible.

Ibid. C. In all ages errours were cenſured and condemned.

Anſw. All kind of errours were not thought to be of ſuch weight, as that ſuch heavy cenſures and condemnations which you lay on us, ſhould be faſtened on them. And therefore in caſe ours be not errours, or but in materia non gravi, in diſputable parts, (as if you pleaſe to deſcend to particulars, we will undertake to prove them) thoſe ſevere cenſures of yours, being more contrary to charity, may prove more dangerous to you, than we ſhall otherwiſe affirm your opinions to be.

Ibid. D. I judge one of theſe two by the event, and the other by the ſemblance of his making a ſearch in manner as he ought.

Anſw. This is a dark ſpeech which I do not clearly underſtand: if the meaning be, that you judge the ill ſucceſs of his Lordſhip's ſearches by the event, and the fault of them by the ſemblance, &c. I muſt then tell you, that the firſt is a very ill grounded judgment, for no event hath proved the illneſs of that ſucceſs, (unleſs like thoſe in the Goſpel, you count them the greateſt Sinners on whom the Tower of Siloah fell; or like him of late, that being willing to paſs his opinion on a learned man's choice of a ſide in the differences in the Low Countries, ſaid onely this, Illud notum eſt, partes quas ſecutus non eſt, prævaluiſſe; ſi quis infelicitati hoc tribuat, ego prudentiam non probo minus felicem; and Busbequius tells us ſomewhat like of the Turkes judgments of good and bad enterprizes) but rather on your own principles I have already proved, that they muſt be good in the ſucceſs, which were ſo happy in propoſing.

But then what you mean by the ſemblance of his making a ſearch in manner as he ought, by which you judge the fault in his ſearches; I muſt confeſs I do not at all underſtand, and therefore muſt be fain to confeſs my ſelf overcome and maſtered, though not by the reaſon, yet by the obſcurity of your writing; and if that be a victory, I wiſh you much good of it.

To the Concluſion. A. I here contend no more, but that our Church may be infallible, notwithſtanding any thing the Enquirer hath objected. That ſhe is ſo, hath in due place been proved by others.

Anſw. If you had performed the former, I mean ſatisfied all his Lordſhip's arguments, I ſhould not require at this time the latter from you, i. e. proving your Church to be infallible. I muſt then onely ask you in earneſt, whether you do believe that no one of his Lordſhip's arguments againſt your Infallibility (for any one will ſerve our turn) remains unanſwered by your Apology, and, then whether all that I have ſaid to vindicate his Lordſhip, be effectually anſwered in your marginal Notes, and whether you can juſtifie all them againſt this laſt Reply. If you are of this opinion in each, I am to crave your pardon for this ſo gainleſs trouble, but refer the matter to God and impartial men to judge between us.

Ibid. B. If you would do it, we then would think it more than poſſible.

Anſw. The meaning of this annotation, if it be ſenſe, muſt be this, that if we Proteſtants could or would find place in you for Scripture and Reaſon to make impreſſion, you Papiſts would then think it more than poſſible you might be deceived. Which if it be the meaning, I muſt then onely reply by prayer, that God would ſo ſoften your hearts, that they might be capable of that impreſſion. But if the words be indeed no ſenſe, but yet miſtaken for ſome other words, which would be ſenſe, then the likleſt thing that I can imagine, is, that you would have ſaid ſomewhat to this purpoſe. [If you Proteſtants could by Scripture or Reaſon diſprove our Doctrines, we then would think it more than poſſible for us to be deceived] Which though it were no huge Conceſſion, yet I ſhould be glad to have it from you, for then in effect your grounding of Faith on your Infallibility would be laid aſide, and then there would be no more truth in any individual Doctrine of your Church, than Scripture or Reaſon would infer, abſtracted from the Authority of your Church, which is all that at this time we demand from you.

And in that we are a little importunate (ſeeing we have you now in a ſeeming good humour:) Firſt, becauſe there is ſo much danger in inſiſting on that privilege of Infallibility, even in any particular, wherein men are in the right, becauſe he that really doth ſtand, yet may (and therefore ought to take heed leſt he fall;) but moſt eminently, when a man chances to be in the wrong. He that miſtakes firſt in a peice of Divinity, and after in a perſwaſion that he cannot miſtake, ſealeth up that errour, obſtructs all entrance, all approach, all poſſibility of Reformation, is fortified impregnable againſt all aſſaults either of reaſon, or even the ſpirit of truth; and by that one errour hath a kind of propriety in all other that can by the ſame hand be repreſented to him. Secondly, becauſe we cannot but obſerve the prudence of your fellow-Champions, Maſter Knot &c. now of late, who have choſen to vary the method from inſiſting on the ſeveral points of difference betwixt us, and them (proving themſelves to be the onely true Church from the particular truths profeſt by them, and by no others) to this other more commodious way of putting off all together by whole-ſale, of concluding the truth of all their aſſertions from the unerrableneſs of the Aſſerter, manifeſting that they are in the right, becauſe 'tis impoſſible they ſhould be in the wrong, uſing all skill to perſwade this one point, and then confident on good grounds, that no other can be reſiſted. Theſe two things put together, will advertiſe you, how ſeaſonable an admonition it is to you, that you will will beſtow a little pains on your Brethren, to perſwade them they are mortal or fallible; and then again Reaſon and Scripture may find reception, and be agreed on the umpire betwixt us, and we ſhall promiſe ſincerely, that whatever that ſhall, ſententiâ latâ, award to you, we will moſt gladly yield, and never break with you, till you break from that umpirage.

Ibid. C. The words are applicable againſt our belief of Chriſtianity, as well as againſt our belief of our Churches doctrine.

Anſw. The words are applied by me onely againſt your infallibility, and if that be as infallible as Chriſtianity it ſelf, I beſeech you either ſhew as plain teſtimonies from the conſent of all Ages, that the Church of Rome is infallible, as there are for the Canon of the Scripture, or as plain places out of the Scripture for it, as we can for the ſeveral parts of Chriſtianity, and then I will give you leave ſo to apply the words; In the mean, you may ſpare your labour of applying my words, or elſe prove demonſtratively that they are ſo applicable.

Ibid. D. A poſſibility perhaps of more errours, but a probability of fewer, for if ſhe were fallible, yet ſhe would not be fallible, as a private man; ſo that with theſe fewer errours we ſhould have quiet and unity, you with more errours ſhould have diſturbances and diſſentions.

Anſw. In this place, whereto your Annotation was affixt, the diſcourſe was upon a ſuppoſition, that your Infallibility were an errour, (which I in that caſe affirm'd, would be the moſt dangerous, becauſe moſt prolifical complicated errour imaginable) and will you ſay that upon that ſuppoſition, there would be a probability of fewer errours? Will the thinking I cannot fall, make me ſtand the longer? is there no advantage to be made of care, and caution, and fear? or is there a diſadvantage in them? This is brave fiduciary doctrine; I muſt think infallibly I ſhall be ſaved, and that I cannot fall away, and the thinking that, will make it more probable that I ſhall be ſaved, and ſhall not fall. I confeſs I had thought that humility were a readier way both to truth and Heaven, than either of theſe preſumptions. What you mean by adding (by way of proof of that ſaying) that if your Church were fallible, ſhe would not be fallible as a private man, I confeſs I cannot gueſs. If ſhe would not, I conceive, this would be but little advantage on her ſide, for her fallibility would be a greater ſnare and ſcandal, and more apt to draw into errour thoſe that conceived her infallible, than any private man's fallibility would do. For that which you add of quiet and unity, if it were ſuppoſed to be joyn'd with fewer errours, I grant it would be an advantage; but at a time, when that infallibility was ſuppoſed to be one errour, and that prov'd moſt apt to produce a multitude; ſurely this ought not to have been ſuppoſed, any more, than that we ſhould have more errours ſtill, though 'twere not at the ſame time ſuppoſed that we have.

Ibid. E. It was never put into more hands than two, but what thoſe hands might doe, I know not; and to thoſe on purpoſe to make trial what exceptions might be made againſt it, that ſo upon a review, I might know better what to alter in it, what to add, and what to take away.

Anſw. I conceive one man hath two hands, and therefore 'tis poſſible you may mean, it was never communicated to above one man. If you do, 'tis certainly falſe; But if you mean two men by two hands, you acknowledge what I ſaid, for I ſaid no more. As for your affirmation that 'twas put into thoſe hands onely for trial, &c, This cannot be ſaid of one of them, for to him it was delivered by one of your friends, as an unanſwerable piece; but yet if it were, as you pretend, that you might know better what to alter in it; I am then glad I have given you occaſion to doe ſo, but muſt tell you, that now you have altered it, and delivered it from ſome infirmities, which appear'd to be in it, there be yet enough behind, to be reformed by any body elſe, and when that is done, there will remain ſomewhat elſe perhaps, but I am ſure no anſwer to my Lord of Falkland.

Ibid. F. Sir, your noble courteſie is gratefully acknowledged, and I deſire with all due reſpects and ſervices to correſpond.

Anſw. This I conceive to be a civility, and I ſhall never go about to confute that, or anſwer it, but by the return of the like, and my prayers alſo, that the Lord give you a right judgment in all things.

HERE it ſeemes was once an end of thoſe annotations, and it had been for the readers eaſe and mine, that you had continued in that mind. But upon better thoughts, either that which had been here noted, was thought not quite ſufficient, or elſe, ex abundanti, this ſuperfœtation is beſtowed on us. The cloſing ſheet which I mentioned in the Preface, and promiſed to annex alſo. Which here in juſtice to the Apologiſt, I ſhall give you, though I conceive I had been as kind to him, if I had forgotten it.

Section 1. THIS ſmall treatiſe Apologetical is no finiſht work, but onely a firſt draught or inchoation, and was ventured abroad to explore the judgments or cenſures of one or two intelligent Adverſaries, that ſo the Authour by his ſecond thoughts might be the better able to underſtand what was to be altered in it, what added, and what taken away, either as ſuperfluous or offenſive, and till that act was done, and withall an approbation and licence given by thoſe to whom it belonged, neither the work, nor any line of it is to be acknowledged, or vouched by the Authour.

Section 2. The drift is not to prove the Church which we call Catholique, and the Enquirer calls Roman, to be infallible, but to defend it againſt the Enquirer's arguments; for he Sect. 28. undertakes to give reaſons why the Church of Rome is fallible. So that our drift is to make it good that this ſame Church may ſtill be infallible, notwithſtanding any thing that he hath ſaid unto the contrary.

Section 3. The pillars that ſupport all his diſcourſe be 1. Sect. videl. that with us both Reaſon, Scripture, and Antiquity, be fallible; his proof of this aſſertion is a ſuppoſed maxime of ours, namely, that nothing is infallible but the Church. The aſſertion is firſt denyed, and afterward the proof, and againſt theſe denialls no reply can be made, becauſe we know beſt our own inward acts and judgments, and no man is able to tell us what we think, but we muſt tell them.

Section 4. Theſe three pillars of fallibility being broken and relinquiſht as deſperate, you are pleaſed to come with new ones in their places.

Section 5. Reaſon, ſay you, cannot prove the infallibility of your Church, becauſe it is not an evident verity; Scripture cannot, becauſe not certainly expounded to that probation; Fathers do not, becauſe it was not a doctrine held in their time.

Section 6. It ſeems then, that the cauſe why none of theſe three can prove our Churches infallibility, is not any want of infallibility in them, as the Enquirer contended it was, but ſome other different; ſuch, namely, as you here aſſign; and ſo the Enquirer's argument is at an end, even at the very beginning of it, and my task is done, yet, in my reſpects, to you, I will go on farther.

Section 7. To your firſt, I anſwer, that though reaſon cannot it ſelf alone prove our Churches infallibility, yet, as you acutely note, Sect. 3. reaſon can aſſure us, by ſhewing us ſome words of prophecy, or revelation from God, with ſufficient evidence that it is a revelation, and thus reaſon can prove a verity be it never ſo inevident. After this manner it is that we ſay reaſon proves our Church, againſt which proof the inevidence of it, as we ſee, can be no impediment.

Section 8. To your ſecond, I anſwer, by denying that ſcripture hath not been ſo certainly expounded to that purpoſe, for we ſay it

Section 9. hath been ſhewed by our authours at large, as for example, by Bellarmine, Valentia, Petavius, Veron and others.

1. L. 5. c. 20. l. 3. c. 4. 2. L. 2. adverſ. Creſcon c. 33. item ep. 118. item l. de unitate Eccleſ. c. 22. 3. l. 4. c. 30. 4. L. 12.

To your 3. I anſwer, firſt, that 1. Irenæus, 2. Auguſtinus, 3. Lactantius, and 4. Facundus Hermanenſis do abſolutely teach the Church to be infallible. Secondly, I deny that the Fathers teach not the Roman Church to be the true Church, and contrary to your tenet, I affirm that they hold that Church to be the true Chriſtian Church, as the forenamed authours have declared out of them, as alſo Card. Perone and Coeffeteau have excellently ſhewed. Alſo I my ſelf have endeavoured it elſewhere out of the ſeveral Teſtimonies of Antiquity not to be in this place repeated.

Section 10. The buſineſs touching the motives of Faith which I, with Irenæus, called Oſtenſions, their place, uſe and efficacy needs onely explanation, and ought to be admitted by every Chriſtian, and therefore begging your patience, I will tarry longer upon it.

Section 11. We do not go about to prove our Church to be the true, therefore becauſe ſhe holdeth with the truth, but becauſe we conceive we have good ſolid reaſons to perſwade us that ſhe hath the truth. Theſe reaſons have been often rendred by our Authours, to whom if the Enquirer had replyed, we alſo had endeavoured to defend them. Concordance with the Scriptures and Fathers we do marſhall amongſt them, not in the firſt place indeed in order of Doctrine, but yet in the firſt in order of dignity. Neither do we aim to prove our Church by the gallantry of Demonſtration, or any other way than Chriſtianity, ſooner, or later, is to be perſwaded unto Infidels; for we are now dealing, not about a parcel, but the whole frame of Chriſtianity, from the top to the foundation, and the laying of the firſt ſtone; which firſt ſtone we hold to be thoſe acts of God which Pſal. 104. 27. are called verba ſignorum, and fitly may be termed ſigna realia, that is to ſay, ſigns and oſtenſions, which be the acts of Gods omnipotence and ſovereign Government, and, by a moral certainty and rational way are ſhewed for humane inſtitution and inſtruction. This ſort of ſigns is, by order of nature, to have the precedence before all artificial ſigns, or vocal expreſſions of the divine will, and therefore as Raymund Sebund obſerveth liber factorum is to be peruſed before liber dictorum; by theſe ſigns, as, by the apparentiæ, or φαινόμενα, in Aſtronomy, we are to get the firſt notions of theſe celeſtial revolutions, or reſolutions of faith; and though theſe be ſure, yet are they not demonſtrative becauſe no way intrinſecal, neither to the revelations which they aſſure, nor to the objects revealed, which are aſſured by the revelations, as being no cauſes, nor effects of either, nor ſigns inherent of thoſe objects.

Section 12. Seeing then, the true Catholick Religion is but the true Chriſtianity, they both of them are to be learned by the ſame Apparences, or Oſtenſions, more or leſs expreſly underſtood. Now, while we draw nearer unto theſe ſigns, and learn them more and more expreſly, amongſt other things we may diſcover as good characteriſms and ſignatures of revealed truth, the Concordance of our Faith with holy Writ and venerable Antiquity, which two ſigns, without the preceding could have little force to perſwade belief. For, ſay I were to convert an Indian, I would not ſeek to doe it by telling him firſt of all of theſe two Concordances mentioned which 'tis like would move him but a little, for, though I could ſhew him the Bible was ancient and Godly, and the Fathers wiſe, yet this would not be enough to perſwade him, and therefore I ſhould hold it fit, Firſt to repreſent to him ſome other motives, as namely, Prophetical predictions authorized by event, miracles and miraculous operations and effects, creditably recorded from age to age, both in the Evangeliſts and other ſequent Hiſtories, of whoſe faith a man rationally cannot doubt, at leaſt in the ſum of them, or the chief bulk. I ſpeak not here of fabulous Narrations, or ſuſpected Hiſtories, but Authours of credit and eſteem; Secondly, the excellency of our Faith it ſelf, and manner of propagation of it. Thirdly, the perfection of life and heroick actions of ſuch as do profeſs it, and all this after a manner not interrupted, but continued from age to age, and conveyed down to us by the prime Eccleſiaſtical ſucceſſion, not of Perſons onely, but of Paſtours in the chief ſeat, and other inferiour, prized ſo highly by Irenæus, and held a moſt ſure note of truth, and a way to confound all that do gainſay it. Laſtly, a conſonance with Reaſon, Scripture, and Antiquity. Theſe and ſuch like be our φαινόμενα, theſe our oſtenſions; theſe be the received notices and ſignatures of revealed truth; by theſe God invites us and induces us to believe; and by theſe, engages his own veracity to warrant the act of our aſſent, it being repugnant to the high perfection of his truth, to lay upon man a rational obligation, and then deſert him, and to permit that the publique acts of his providence ſhould be a ſnare, not a direction, not an introduction to truth, but a ſeduction from it. Though therefore theſe motives make our faith but credible in an eminent and a high degree, yet the veracity of God is at hand to ſupply, ſeal and confirm all, and with the authority thereof, to make the aſſurance abſolute. This method of reſolving and reducing faith, was ſignified by Irenæus, when as he ſaid, Poſt tot Oſtenſiones factas non oportet adhuc quærere apud alios veritatem quam facile eſt ab Eccleſia ſumere. This way deſigned by Saint Auguſtin, this is conformable to the Analytique principles delivered by Ariſtotle in his Organon; this is the beaten path of all Divines, and no new invention or exotique ſtuff. Iren. l. 3. c. 4. Auguſtin. ad Honoratum Manichæum.

This method we are ready to maintain as ſtrong and ſolid, not permitting the believer to ſit down with a ſlender Socinian certainty liable to deceit, nor enclosing him in any maze, circle, or ſemicricle not enforcing him into endleſs and wearisome regreſſes, neither precluding evidence, nor deſtroying liberty, but by theſe motives fortified with the divine veracity, leading him aſſuredly to the Church, and by the Church to the entire and determinate Canon of holy Scripture; and ſo at length by both theſe joyned together, to the full diſcovery and diſtinct knowledge of the doctrines of our faith, after the manner following.

Theſe motives or oſtenſions being once conſidered, we are forthwith to obſerve to what body of Chriſtian profeſſours they belong, and in what line of ſucceſſion of Eccleſiaſtical Magiſtrates they deſcend unto us, and in the paſſages of antiquity, diligently to note which ſhip it is which in the Chriſtian fleet was counted the Prætorian, or Admiral, with which all the reſt were to joyn company, and by the ſeparation from which, we are to judge which veſſels be fugitives, or pyratical, and which not; which aſſembly of Chriſtians legitimate and approved, and by this aſſociation to be diſtinguiſhed from the broken and diſperſed troops of Anti-Catholiques, and by the ſame the army of the living God in the Church militant, diſcerned from the ſtragling companies of divided and diſagreeing Sectaries, how numerous ſoever they may ſeem, when ſummed up all into one inconſiſtant body, or confuſed rout. This way and method we hold, which if it do not ſatisfie any, let them ſet us down a better, and not leave us without any; but let them take heed, that while with the Enquirer, we receive and admit the fallibility of the Church of Rome, or of any other determinate Church, and of one denomination, we fall not, with Maſter Chillingworth, to the infallibility of the Chriſtian faith, and ſo preſently to Infidelity. It is eaſie to impugn the Organon of faith, or Doctrinal principles, but not eaſie to compoſe it, eaſie to pull down, but not to build. The Enquirer's judgment uttered to me, was, that Baron, when he writ againſt us, was luſty and ſtrong, but when he ſpake any thing for himſelf; he was weak and languiſhing; and I believe this is the Enquirer's own caſe, and that he was able to ſay more againſt an infallibility than for it. In the one he hath ſhewed his ſtrength, in the other not. Section 13.

Now a word or two about laws, and I have done. In which point I obſerve it as an uncontroverted doctrine, that unjuſt laws, properly ſpeaking, are not laws; firſt becauſe Lex is the dictamen rectæ rationis practicæ in eo qui poteſtatem habet; but an unjuſt law, is neither dictamen rectæ rationis practicæ, nor poteſtatem habentis, for no man is preſcribed to doe wrong by reaſon, nor hath God the chief Legiſlatour given power to make them. Durandus concurres in terminis in Opuſculo de legibus, ſaying, Injuſtæ leges magis ſunt violentiæ quam leges, nam ſecundum quod dicit Auguſtinus, l. de libero arbitrio, Lex eſſe non videtur quæ juſta non fuerit. Et tales non obligant quantum ad Deum. So Durandus. To him Suarius ſubſcribeth, l. 3. de legib. c. 19. n. 11. Lex injuſta non eſt lex, præſertim quando ex parte materiæ eſt injuſta, quia rem iniquam præcipit; tum enim ad acceptandum eam non obligat, verum etiam, neque ſi ſit acceptata. And preſently after, giving a reaſon hereof, he addeth, Quia excedit poteſtatem legiſlatoris. Section 14.

Secondly, ſo much veneration is due to laws, though never ſo unjuſt, that they are nevertheleſs in conſcience to be obeyed, unleſs they ſhould be publickly and knownly found contrary to a greater authority than that was by which they were enacted; that is to ſay, to the law of God, or Nature, Therefore they are not to be judged or cenſured by any private man.

Thirdly, being diſcovered to be unjuſt, they derogate nothing at all from the authority of the reſt, no more than the unjuſt laws of ſome Emperours did from the body of the law Imperial. For though all of them were made by the ſame Authours, yet not by the ſame authority; becauſe for the making of one ſort, there was good authority derived from God; but, for the making of the other, there was none at all, but ſuch as could not make it.

Fourthly, in caſe of ſuch laws, no man is to take arms, or make reſiſtence, but contrariwiſe, to ſuffer with humble patience, remitting the righting of his cauſe onely to God, per quem Reges regnant & legum conditores juſta decernunt. And thus, Sir, I reſt your humble ſervant.

The holy Scripture hath a threefold influence into faith. 1. Diſpoſitive, as one of the motives, or inducements. 2. Negative, as a property, ſine qua non. 3. Poſitive, as a foundation or principle. The 1. as an ancient and godly book. The 2. as a rule, without concordance to which, faith could not be acknowledged; for every doctrine muſt be conſonant to its rule, whether that rule be true, or falſe, certain, or uncertain. The 3. as a ſetled principle, and a book known to be Canonical. Section 15.

TO all this I ſhall anſwer as briefly as I can.

Firſt, to the 1. Sect. That for the matter of fact which concerns this treatiſe, I have already averred thoſe truths, that will not permit any reaſonable man to believe that this was ſo indeed, [a firſt draugh: &c.] for it was confeſt by him, Chap. 1. to be a ſecond draught. Secondly, it was not ſent out onely to explore, &c. for it was, * ſaith he, delivered but to two adverſaries, and to one of them (as I ſaid before) it was delivered as unanſwerable. Thirdly, if there were any ſuch deſign of exploring and mending, &c. I muſt conceive that that work is now done; for when it was ſent home to me again with theſe notes, many places which I had charged, were altered or taken away, and for additions, ſure ſuch were the marginal notes, and this appendage. Fourthly, For the licence I can ſay nothing, (but that I conceive it might as eaſily be gotten, as to what you have already made publick, if you had a mind to it) nor indeed force you to acknowledge or vouch any line of this book, but onely tell you, that thoſe words in your firſt Chapter of complaint, [That there was no notice given of licence for it to be publiſhed, and have the advantage to be diſperſed abroad in many copies] and that [for want of the Printers help it ſhall lie concealed, and in much reſtraint, yea and be in danger to periſh] ſeemed to me to ſignifie your willingneſs then to make it publick; and if you have ſince retracted that deſign, I hope ſo weak an anſwer, as ſome of your friends boaſt this to be, did not diſcourage you. I ſhall rather think it was modeſty, or elſe deſign, that you choſe rather to have diſclaimed, than commended your own, and thought it would appear more glorious for you to * In Conclus.

have it extorted from you, or (if it ſhould prove leſs ſplendid) yet more tolerable, to have been raviſht from you than proſtituted.

To the ſecond Sect. I anſwer, that you had ſaid that before in annot. to the concl. A. And the anſwer there belongs to this Sect. and if you had made good what you ſay was your drift, you ſhould be pronounced conquerour.

To the third Sect. You have taken a good courſe to defend infallibility, by ſetting up for it your ſelf, and affirming that no reply can be made to you in that matter, becauſe it depends onely upon your judgment, which none can know but whom you tell it; But, good Sir, your Authours do tell us, that there is nothing infallible but the Church, and when they have done ſo, we may know your outward acts, for ſuch are your writings, though your inward we pretend not to pry into.

To Sect. 4. I anſwer, that one argument of his Lordſhip's, taken from your affirmed fallibility of Reaſon, Scripture, and Antiquity, is moſt prodigiouſly by you call'd three pillars. And how Sampſon-like you have broken them down, the Reader muſt judge; if you are ſo confident, I have here expreſt my ſelf your ſervant, by helping you to a publick tryal.

To Sect. 5. I acknowledge that from your own confeſſion I make thoſe three arguments, that neither Reaſon, Scripture, nor Antiquity, can infallibly prove your Church to be infallible. And

To Sect. 6. I ſay that the want of infallibility in thoſe three mentioned Sect. 6. and by you confeſt, is ſufficient to prove his Lordſhip's concluſion that they cannot infallibly prove your infallibility, and this is the ſame that was meant by his Lordſhip, though more explicated by me, and brought home againſt you by way of retortion, and Argument ad hominem, upon your own confeſſion. And ſo your ὅπνικιον was ſung much too early, and you muſt to your task again, if you will make an end of it.

To Sect. 7. I anſwer, that if you had ſhewed the revelation, on which reaſon infers your infallibility, your ſection had ſtood good, but the total want of that, is your main impediment.

To Sect. 8. Be you alſo pleaſed to produce your conſent of Antiquity certainly expounding Scripture to infer your infallibility; and that ſhall be yielded you alſo, but I conceive thoſe writers of yours have not done it, and whenſoever you pleaſe, I ſhall be ready to examine their teſtimonies with you.

To Sect. 9. I anſwer, That we have allowed a ſenſe, wherein the Church univerſal may be ſtyled infallible, and that to ſave my ſelf the pains of examining your teſtimonies (though ſome without examining I know to be ill cited) I ſhall grant it in that ſenſe to be ſo; But then to your ſecond propoſition, (be it either [I deny that they teach not] or [I affirm that it holds] it matters little) that the Roman Church is the true Church, I anſwer. That if there be emphaſis in the particle [the] in the predicate, ſo that it ſignifie the [Catholick] Church in the former propoſition, 'tis then abſolutely falſe, that the Fathers ſay any ſuch thing. And you are prudent to cite none to that ridiculous purpoſe. But if you mean, that the Roman Church is a true Church, (ſo you do not mean that all it ſaith is true) as we grant that, ſo we challenge you to prove, that ever the ancient Church thought any ſuch particular Church of one denomination to be infallible; When you pleaſe to produce your teſtimonies, you ſhall receive anſwer to them.

To Sect. 10. Concerning the motives of Faith, You might have ſpared that pains, it being not at all concluded by you here or before, that that infallibility is built on the ſame grounds with Chriſtianity.

To Sect. 11. If you had never ſuch ſolid reaſons to perſwade you; that your Church had the truth (as I ſhould not need to deny, were it not for your denying the cup to the Laity, againſt Scripture, and your keeping the Scripture in an unknown tongue, and ſome other ſuch defects in faciendis, but rather charge you that you have more than the truth, viz. many errours mixt with the truth) this would prove but a very weak probation, that your Church is [the true Church] in the excluſive notion, i. e. that no other is the Church, but that: for having the truth, doth not ſignifie a Monopoly, or incloſure of it, or that no body elſe can have it, And if by [the true Church] you mean no more, but a true part, you know we do not queſtion it, nor affirm that your errours though many, have turn'd you in non Eccleſiam, into a no-Church. As for your Concordance with the Fathers which you ſay you have, I anſwer, that in thoſe things wherein you and we conſent, we ſhall not be unwilling to grant it to you (but yet muſt remember you, that you would not allow that to be a proof of your being infallible) but in thoſe other which we call errours in you, we challenge you to produce an univerſal Concordance. You go on; that you prove your Church by no other way than Chriſtianity is perſwaded unto Infidels. I hope your meaning is, that you prove your Church to be a true Church, and that ſhall be granted you without your proof: but that it is the onely true one, or the infallible one, I hope you have not miracles for that, (if you have, you have trifled away a great deal of time in not telling of them) nor revelation from Heaven, nor univerſal tradition to aſſure you, (what you affirm ſo confidently) that the Infallibility of your Church is the whole frame of Chriſtianity. And therefore what you learnedly add about the verba ſignorum, or ſigna realia, ſigns and oſtenſions, &c. by which you go about to prove Chriſtianity, I muſt profeſs to edifie me but little in point of the infallibility of your Church, becauſe that is ſo diſtant a thing from it.

To Sect. 12. Your affirmation, that the true Catholick Religion is the true Chriſtianity, (if that be the onely thing you aim at) ſhall be willingly granted you; all the queſtion will be, whether all your doctrines, that of denying the cup to the Laity, &c. be that Catholick Religion. And ſure to him that queſtions that, all the characteriſms, &c. all your Prophetical predictions will give but little ſatisfaction, and no more will the excellency of Faith, perfection of heroick actions of Profeſſours, nor the conveyance from age to age, by the Prime Eccleſiaſtical ſucceſſion of Paſtours in the See of Rome, becauſe that of the ſub unica ſpecie, &c. which we quarrell at in you, might as well be pretended to have teſtimonies out of the preſent Articles of our Church, as out of theſe. If there be any of theſe evidences, or moreover of Reaſon, Scripture, Antiquity, on your ſide, for ſuch controverted particulars, I beſeech you let them be produced, or elſe you may be Chriſtians, but yet corrupt in theſe particulars, your being a true Church will not pronounce you infallible, your Church of Rome Primitive may have the truth, and your Modern Rome be filled with errours. And therefore you may ſpare the pains of proving (what we have no occaſion at this time to deny) that God engages his veracity to make good thoſe things, for which he gives us ſuch rational means of proof to induce our aſſent, For what ever elſe is, your infallibility, or your other errours, for which we charge you, are none of theſe things. And if you mark it, that which (according to your diſcourſe) gives us ſuch aſſurance of the truth of Chriſtianity, is the oſtenſions, miracles, publick acts of God's providence, not the infallibility naturally inherent either in your Church, or in any particular ſociety of men, nor the promiſe of God that any ſuch ſociety ſhall be infallible, and viſible to all, that it is that infallible. As for that which you covertly caſt into the heap of the motives of Faith [that 'twas continued from age to age in the ſucceſſion of Paſtours in the chief ſeat] that is no more a ground of the truth of Chriſtianity, than its ſucceſſion in all other ſeats, as I conceive you have your ſelf let fall alſo. The truth is, the Preaching the Goſpel over all the world, and the reception in ſo great a part of it, is an argument of the truth of Chriſtianity (among many others) becauſe it is the fulfilling of a Prophecy of their ſounds going out into all Lands; But this is far from concluding the peculiar privilege of infallibility of thoſe, who are under the Roman ſubjection. By which 'tis clear, that what you cite out of Irenæus, and Saint Aug. comes home no better to your point of infallibility, than Ariſtotle's Analytick principles, which in the ſame place (and elſewhere) you cite alſo. And therefore if all you ſay in that long Section were yielded, (concerning the motives to Chriſtianity, and your way by bringing to the Church, &c.) yet would you be as far to ſeek as ever, concerning your pretended infallibility.

To your 13. Sect. which is nearer indeed to your purpoſe, I anſwer, that being by your means brought to Chriſtianity, there is no need that I ſhould find out any particular body of profeſſors (or Church of one denomination) to which thoſe motives to Chriſtianity ſhould ſo belong, as to belong to no other but that; This ſure I may better ſay without proof, than you have affirmed the contrary; For do you think it reaſonable, that Chriſtianity being planted all over the world, each man that is converted to it, muſt find out the Roman Biſhop, and thoſe that are in ſubjection to him, or not be accounted a Chriſtian? If he be born at Jeruſalem, or converted there, will it not ſerve his turn to communicate with that Church, which hath given him Baptiſm? Was there any thing in his Creed could ſend him thither, till the holy Chatholick Roman Church was (by mockery I conceive) put in thither? As for the line of ſucceſſion of Eccleſiaſtical Magiſtrates, you muſt know, that is to be found in other Chriſtian Churches, as well as in Rome, and the Scriptures and Apoſtolical verities deſcend down to us in them alſo. And what if in ſome paſſages of Antiquity, the See of Rome ſhould be found to be the Prætorian or Admiral, in your ſtyle, i. e. the prime or principal See, would this prove her infallible? the Prætorian may ſpring a leak, as well as any other, and in caſe it ſhould, I do not conceive, that all other Ships of that fleet, were bound to doe ſo too, or elſe be counted fugitive, becauſe they are unwilling to run that unhappy fate of ſin, or errour in her. Sure if the Prætorian ſhould caſually, or wilfully ſplit upon a Rock, you would not cenſure all others for Pyratical, that did not ſo too. The reaſons are viſible, why that See of Rome had the Primacy at ſome time (and at other times other Sees put in their plea for it, and if they obtained not, yet was that an argument that it was never judged a matter of Faith, becauſe the Pretenders were not condemned for Hereticks, even when it went not with them) viz. From the Imperial Seat being placed in that City, with which the Eccleſiaſtical πρεσβεια, πρωτεια, might proportionably go along, juſt as your Prætorian is that ſhip, where the Admiral reſides, or which peculiarly belongs to him. But what is that to infallibility? That honour which comes by ſympathy with the Civil State, is not like to be ſuch a charm, or amulet, ſo to elevate above humane condition, that it muſt preſently ſet up for perfection. Let your Church have all its due and cuſtomary reſpects, but do not ſo link inerrableneſs with Principality, unleſs you can bring ſome ground from Scripture, for the union; and becauſe in all your Apology, Annotations, and Appendage you do not ſo much as name any ſuch, I ſhall conceive you are too wiſe to claim by [Tu es Petrus] or any other ſo unconcluding an argument. Believe me, your preſcription for ſome kind of Principality from the poſſeſſion of it continued to that See ſo many years, is a better plea than any other, and againſt that I am not now a-diſputing, but onely add, that greatneſs ſecular is no marke of infallibility. As for your rule of judging by the Aſſociation with Rome, which Aſſembly of Chriſtians is legitimate, which not, that that is an infallible way of judging, is not at all proved by your magnificent ſimile. For firſt, the fleet may be broken aſunder by ſome tempeſt, and ſo without any fault of any ſhip, be divided from the Prætorian. 2. The Prætorian may quarrell with all, or any of the reſt, and by threats or bullets drive them from her, and then if the cauſe be not juſt, if it be, for example, upon no other crime, but that the other ſhips judge it neceſſary to caſt out ſome veſſels or trumpery which they are reſolved to be either uſeleſs, or perhaps dangerous to the veſſell and all the Paſſengers, or again becauſe the reſt of the ſhips are reſolved to obey the commiſſion that ſent out the whole Fleet, when the Prætorian was reſolved to diſobey it, in this and the like caſes, 'tis clear, that the Prætorian is the onely Schiſmatick; Or if it be juſt, yet the ſhip though confeſt guilty of that other crime, or crimes, which made that ſeverity of the Prætorian juſt, will yet not be guilty of a new crime of ſeparation: the reaſon is clear, becauſe ſhe is forced to that, driven away, and now ever ſince lies under it unwillingly, 'tis her infelicity, not her crime; her puniſhment, not her fault. Or if there be a fault in that, viz. That ſhe doth not humbly confeſs the fault, and deſire to be reconciled, yet ſure it will not be infinitely true, that that is a fault, when either ſhe was guilty before of no fault, but a pretended one, for which that puniſhment was inflicted (to which purpoſe the Chancellour of Paris will adviſe you) or when the condition of her being received again is ſuch, as cannot with any honeſty be entertained, be it the undertaking any Treaſonable act againſt the King, whoſe Admiral he is, which denominates that Prætorian, and who is ſupreme Maſter of the whole fleet, or be it, but ſwearing any thing to be true which is falſe, or ſubſcribing to the belief, or practice of what we believe neither true nor practicable. And that this is the ſtate of our Church in its ſeparation from yours, I ſhall undertake to make good, whenſoever you will yield the point of Infallibility, or exchange it for the queſtion of Schiſm. You ſee I am not much edified by your way, and becauſe you are not ſo importunate, that I ſhould, but are modeſtly content that if I am not ſatisfied with it, I ſhould ſet you down a better, I ſhall humbly crave leave to doe it in very few words. The far better way, more Chriſtian, becauſe more humble and more charitable, (and beyond all, probably the moſt peacefull too) Is, to make the Scripture, as 'tis interpreted by the ancient Fathers, the ground of our belief for all the ſubſtantial, i.e. plain parts of Faith; to define as few of this nature, as the Primitive Chriſtians may be diſcerned to have done, to command and require obedience, and aſſent to theſe, from all our Inferiours under our authority, and to proceed to Eccleſiaſtical cleſiaſtical admonitions, in caſe of errour, to cenſure, in caſe of contumacy, but to bloud, never purely for Religion; nor too often for Religion in ordine ad temporalia; To tolerate with meekneſs, thoſe that are contrary minded, in all things that are not either of the number of theſe few, very few neceſſario credenda, or that have not a neceſſary connexion and immediate influence on practice, and good life; This, as it is far from either pretending to infallibility, or letting looſe the reins to licentiouſneſs, ſo is it the happieſt, moſt laſting, durable temper of a Church, moſt agreeable to all thoſe ends that Chriſt hath made moſt eſtimable to us in his Goſpel, and ſo will be far from that fear of yours, of betraying us to a deſerting of the Chriſtian faith, or falling to Infidelity; univerſal peace and charity and humility, being above all things moſt contrary to that. And ſo you ſee, 'tis not ſo unpracticable a difficulty to compoſe an Organon of Faith ſo far, as to preſerve it among Chriſtians; And for the planting it among Infidels, that is not hujus conſiderationis, nor do I much believe I ſhall have much reaſon to differ from any learned Romaniſt on that Subject, on condition he would agree with me in this. As for your judgment upon his Lordſhip, that he was able to ſay more againſt an infallibility than for it, and that in the one he hath ſhewed his ſtrength, in the other not, I eaſily believe, and muſt think my ſelf bound to confeſs, becauſe I have ſeen a Book of his againſt infallibility, but never any for it. If this muſt be thought a fault in him, I muſt be content to lie under your ſevereſt cenſure for the ſame crime alſo, and ſic habes confitentes reos, patiently expecting what you will pronounce againſt us.

Sect. 14. You are reſolved it ſeems to have a word or two about Laws, upon what temptation, or provocation from the precedent diſcourſes, at leaſt from the main buſineſs in hand, I cannot readily ſatisfie my Reader. The moſt I can gueſs is, that in our meeting we fell into ſome diſcourſe and difference about the nature of unjuſt Laws, whether they might be ſaid to be Laws, or no. And perchance your charity led you now out of your rode to inform me in this matter; if 'twere onely ſo, I muſt acknowledge it an obligation, and ſhall thank you for that, though I chance to diſſent from you.

And that matter I perceive will be ſoon ſtated: Thus: That Laws, if (conſidered in reſpect of the matter of them) they be found to command me to doe ought, which by any ſuperiour law, 'tis unlawfull for me to doe, they are then unjuſt laws, be the Legiſlatour never ſo lawfully my Magiſtrate; and in this caſe 'tis true, that God hath not given him power to make them; meaning thereby ſuch a power, that he may make them without being unjuſt; but yet another power he hath given him, to wit, ſuch an one, as that, if he exerciſe it thus againſt God the Doners will, yet it ſhall not be lawfull for any man, or ſociety of men on earth, to call him to account, and puniſh him, to reſiſt violently, or reduce him in ordinem; Onely God that hath given him poteſtatem in genere (which is libera ad utroſque actus, power to make good or evil laws, but withall reſtrained by a command from the law of nature, and God, and limited by that law onely to the lawfull exerciſe of it, or making the good laws) is to receive an account of the Talent given him to trade with as his Steward, and to enquire whether he hath uſed it well or no. Thus much, unleſs I am miſtaken your diſcourſe gives me reaſon to think granted by you. And from thence I muſt conclude, that any ſuch abuſe of power in the Law-giver, though it be in him aberration from the rule in reſpect of God, yet ſtill is an act that hath ſome effect on the man which is born, or lives under that law, though not to oblige him to doe what is commanded him, yet to oblige him to non-reſiſtence, and ſuffering patiently, if the Law-giver be ſo wicked to tyrannize over him. Which obligation to paſſive, though not active Obedience, is the reſult of a Law, if not properly ſo called in your notion of it, yet very lawfully and intelligibly ſo called, as I have interpreted it; And for the propriety or impropriety of the word, I ſhall not much contend with you, ſo the ſubſtance be agreed on; and yet 'twere eaſie enough to repay you with the quotations of School-men and Caſuiſts, which make no ſcruple to uſe the word in my ſenſe, and to anſwer the places you have produced, and ſhew that 'twas onely in that ſenſe which we yield, that they did deny it. But enough of this.

For your 15 Sect. What it ſignifies, or whither it would, I cannot, I confeſs, divine; 'twas I conceive in you an exceſſive act of liberality, that you thought might be for your turn; and, though I know not how at this time I ſhall reap profit by it, yet I cannot but accept your good intentions. And ſo being extremely weary of a very thankleſs task, I bid you heartily farewell.

THE END.

TO THE
RIGHT HONORUABLE, HENRY
L. Viſcount of Falkland,
MY HONOURABLE LORD.

My Lord,

NOT long before the death of that incomparable perſon, your Lordſhip's Mother, that great example of piety and humility, the Lady Viſcounteſs of Falkland, ſhe was pleaſed to commit to my hand that, which ſhe believed, next her Children, the deareſt pledge of her dead Lord; ſome excellent Monuments of his Reaſon, Wit and Induſtry, in the ſearch of that, which he would have as gladly found, as he hath rationally rejected, an Infallible Judge here on Earth in all our Controverſies in point of Religion, of which the labouring world ſeemeth at preſent to ſtand in ſo much need. I have conſidered often of that ſingular truſt and friendſhip, in making me the depoſitary of ſo rich a Jewel: And ſince ſhe, from whoſe hands I received it, is gone thither, where ſhe ſtands in no need of theſe diſcourſes, I know no perſon living that hath more right to it than your Lordſhip, or indeed to whom I would more willingly offer it. For though your Lordſhip be now out of my immediate charge and Tuition, yet as long as it ſhall pleaſe God to make me able to doe, or point at any thing that may, though never ſo little, help forward to perfect a good work in you, I ſhall never account my ſelf diſobliged. I muſt profeſs to all the World, that there is no Family now in being, to which I owe more true ſervice, than to your Lordſhip's: And ſhall to the utmoſt of my power, upon all occaſions make it good. Ihave nothing left me but a poor thank fullheart, which hath been my onely ſure Companion, when all elſe have forſaken me: That ſtill remains ἀσύλητον τι and κτῆμα εἰς ἀεί, being neither in the power of time nor persons to spoil me of that, which like a good Conscience to my self, must to my friends be the best feast I can make them.

My Lord, my design is not by this to engage your Lordship in this Polemical discourse, nor my self neither, having neither ability nor leasure for a business of that concern, and by reason of my business of imployment, I had not been able to have presented it thus to your Lordship without the assistence of Judicious Friends, that honour the work for the Authour's sake, and the Authour for his own.

But, My Lord, I hope I shall have my end in it however, an end which no good man will envy me, namely, an occasion hereby to remind your Lordship of the Gallant Authour, your Noble Father, that by proposing Him to you as your constant Copy, you may do Him an honour beyond all his Friends: For while they praise, you may imitate him.

Indeed, it is one of the greatest comforts I have in this calamitous life, to remember, that I had the honour to be so near Him: And a reproach, which I cannot clear my self of, to have been at the same time so near, and so far off; so near in Conversation, and yet so far removed from him in those Excellencies, whereby he was the envy of this Age, and will be the wonder of the next.

His Religion, (for that I should begin with) was the more Eminent, because the more Early; at that age, when young Gallants think least on it: When they, young Candidates of Atheism, begin to dispute themselves out of a belief of a Deity, urging hard against that, which indeed is best for them that it should never be, a Judgment to come; then, I say, that salvation which these mention with a scoff or a Jeer, he began to work out with fear and trembling, and effectually to remember, that is, to honour and serve his Creatour in the days of his youth.

In the next place, I may not forget his vast natural parts: Dixit ex tempore, saith Pliny of Isæus, sed tanquam diu scripserit; and I may truely apply it to him, his Answers were quick and sudden, but such, as might very well seem to have been meditated. In short, his abilities were such, as though he needed no supplies of industry; yet his industry such, as though he had had no parts at all. How often have I heard him pity those Hawking and Hunting Gentlemen, who if unseasonable weather for their sports had betrayed them to keep at home, without a worse exercise within doors, could not have told how to have spent their time: And all because they were such strangers to such good Companions, with whom he was so familiar, such as neither cloy nor weary any, with whom they converse; such company as Erasmus, a person much esteemed by my Lord your Father, so much extolls in his 31. and 35. Epistle of his fourth Book: Not friends of the Cellar, or the Kitchin; τὰ ἄλλα δὲ προσκλητοὶ ἥδιον διαλέγονται, indeed their own friends rather than his who entertaineth them: But such, as being bidden, are ready; uninvited, intrude not; that bite no man's meat or reputation; silent, not spoken to; spoken to, speak as we please, what we please, how long and how much we please: Candidly communicating themselves to us without betraying our secrets committed to them; that still tell us somewhat that may delight us for its Antiquity, please us for its Novelty, or someway or other enrich our knowledge. While others studied the Heraldry of Horses, of Dogs, or at the best, their own: He, though not inferiour feriour to his Neighbours in Deſcent, and Honour, knowing well how much more glorious it is to be the firſt than the laſt of a Noble Family, (Bloud without Vertue making Vice but more conſpicuous) was ſo far from relying upon that empty Title, that He ſeemed Ipſe ſuos genuiſſe Parentes, to have begotten his Anceſtours, and to have given them a more Illuſtrious life, than he received from them.

Though there were as much true worth cloſely treaſured up in him, as, well divided, had been able to have ſet up an hundred Pretenders; yet ſo much Modeſty withall, that the hearing of any thing was more pleaſing to him, than one tittle of his own praiſe.

This Vertue was indeed in a high degree in him, and ſhewed it ſelf upon all occaſions. If any thing, though never ſo little unhandſomely, had been ſpoken or done where he was, he was the greateſt ſufferer in the company, and much more out of countenance than he that made the offence. And ſurely he that was ſo tender of another man's Civility, may very juſtly be preſumed to have had a great regard to his own. And ſo he had indeed. For though his Courage were as great as his Wit and his Learning, (and that is expreſſion high enough) his Valour ſo undaunted and dreadleſs, as his great fall witneſt ἐν πολυφθόρῳ Διὸς ὄμβρῳ καὶ χαλαζαίνῃ φόνῳ, in that fatal Haile that made more Orphans than his Children: Yet to doe an ill or an uncivil thing, he was an arrant Coward: Though he was of David's Stature, of his Courage too, μορφὰν βραχὺς, ψυχὰν δὲ ἄκραμπτος, and in this moſt like him, afraid of nothing but to offend. Slain at Newbury, Sept. 20. 1643.

But what needs any body plead for his Civility more than this preſent Diſcourſe, where he excells his Antagoniſt in that, as well as in reaſon, and ſhews that a Gentleman writ with a Scholar's Pen.

Before I ſhut up all, my Lord, one Vertue there is yet to be mentioned, which of all that ever had relation to his Lordſhip, I may not, I muſt not ever forget, and that was his Friendſhip. That is a Vertue, which by the unintermitted affliction of my life, I have had more than ordinary occaſion to make uſe of. And that I muſt needs ſay was it, which made all his other Graces and Excellencies reliſh to me, He being the deareſt and the trueſt Friend, that through the whole courſe of my unhappy life I ever had the happineſs to meet with.

If it be a kind of pleaſure to reade diſcourſes of Friends and Friendſhip, What is it to enjoy ſuch a Friend in whom really was, that Excellency either Hiſtory can record, or almoſt Poetry feign?

Nothing ſo hard in Lucian's Toxaris, that he durſt not doe; and nothing ſo handſome in all Seneca's Laws of Benefits, that he knew not how to doe, and to out-doe for his Friend.

Let your Vertuous and dear Grandmother, my Lord, and all your Kindred yet alive, ſpeak to this: And your bleſſed Mother were ſhe now alive, would ſay, ſhe had the beſt of Friends before the beſt of Huſbands. This was it that made Tew ſo valued a Manſion to us: For as, when we went from Oxford thither, we found our ſelves never out of the Univerſity: So we thought our ſelves never abſent from our own beloved home. But I dare ſay no more of this, it being now a melancholy thing, I am ſure to me, to call back into my memory, happineſs never to be recalled, and to afflict my ſelf anew with the conſideration of what felicity I have out-lived.

Your

Your Lordſhip is now the onely ſurviving pledge of that admired Father, of whom when we his poor ſervants have ſaid all we can, the Character will be far too ſhort. It is in you, and onely you, my Lord, to ſet him out truly, and to reſemble him to the life; and that will be, by taking that Evangelical Counſel, Tu autem fac ſimiliter: Doe like him, live like him; and pardon me if I add one thing more, like him, Love

My Lord,

Your Lordſhip's moſt

humble and affectionately devoted Servant,

THE PREFACE TO THE READER.

THE eminent abilities in the moſt noble Authour of the enſuing learned Diſcourſe, and learneder Reply, can ſcarcely be imagined unknown to any whom this language can reach: But if any ſuch there be, I ſhall deſire them to learn the perfections of that moſt excellent Perſon, rather from the Dedication, than this Preface; the deſign of which, is onely to give the Reader ſome ſatisfaction concerning the nature of this Controverſie in it ſelf, and of theſe diſſertations in particular.

The Romiſh Doctrine of their own Infallibility, as it is the moſt general Controverſie between them, and all other Churches excluded by them from their Communion: So it is of ſuch a comprehenſive nature, that being once proved and clearly demonſtrated, it would without queſtion draw all other Churches ſo excluded, to a moſt humble ſubmiſſion and acknowledgement; nay, to an earneſt deſire of a ſudden Reconciliation upon any Terms whatſoever. For howſoever they pleaſe to ſpeak and write of our Heretical and obſtinate perſiſtance in manifeſt Errours, yet I hope they cannot ſeriouſly think we would be ſo irrational, as to contradict him whom we our ſelves think beyond a poſſibility of erring, and to diſpute perpetually with them, whom onely to hear were to be ſatisfied.

But when they have propounded their Deciſions to be believed, and embraced by us, as Infallibly true, and that, becauſe they propound them, who in their own opinion are Infallible; if, notwithſtanding, ſome of thoſe Deciſions ſeem to us to be evidently falſe, becauſe clearly contradictory to that which they themſelves propound as infallibly true, that is the Word of God; ſurely we cannot be blamed, if we have deſired their Infallibility to be moſt clearly demonſtrated, at leaſt to a higher degree of evidence than we have of the contradiction of their Deciſions to the infallible Rule. Wherefore, The great Defenders of the Doctrine of the Church of England, have with more than ordinary diligence endeavoured to view the grounds of this Controverſie, and have written by the advantage either of their learning accurately, or of their parts moſt ſtrongly, or of the cauſe it ſelf moſt convincingly, againſt that darling Infallibility. How clearly this Controverſie hath been managed, with what evidence of truth diſcuſſed, what ſucceſs ſo much of reaſon hath had, cannot more plainly appear than in this, that the very name of Infallibility before ſo much exalted, begins now to be very burthenſome, even to the maintainers of it: Inſomuch as one of their lateſt and ableſt Proſelytes, Hugh Paulin de Creſſy, lately Dean of Laghlin, &c. in Ireland, and Prebendary of Windſor in England, in his Exomologeſis, or faithfull Narration of the occaſion and motives of his Converſion, hath dealt very clearly with the World, and told us, that this Infallibility is an unfortunate Word: That Mr. Chillingworth hath cumbated againſt it with too too great ſucceſs; ſo great, that he could wiſh the Word were forgotten, or at leaſt lay'd by. That not onely Mr. Chillingworth, whom he ſtill worthily admires; but we the reſt of the poor Proteſtants, have in very deed, very much to ſay for our ſelves, when we are preſſed unneceſſarily with it. And therefore Mr. Creſſy's advice to all the Romaniſts, is this, that we may never be invited to combat the authority of the Church under that notion. Oh the ſtrength of Reaſon rightly managed! O the power of Truth clearly declared! that it ſhould force an eminent member of the Church of Rome (whoſe great Principle is non-retractation) to retract ſo neceſſary, ſo fundamental a Doctrine, to deſert all their Schools, and contradict all their Controvertiſts. But indeed not without very good cauſe: For he profeſſes withall, that no ſuch word as Infallibility is to be found in any Council: Neither did ever the Church enlarge her Authority to ſo vaſt a wideneſs: But doth doth rather deliver the victory into our hands when we urge her Decisions. In all which Confessions, although he may seem onely to speak of the Word, yet that cannot be it which he is so weary of, because we except not against the word at all, but confess it rightly to signifie that which we impugn, neither do we ever bring any nominal Argument against it. But as when Cardinal Bellarmine sets down the Doctrine of the Church in their positive terms, Summus Pontifex, cùm totam Ecclesiam docet, in his, quæ ad Fidem pertinent, nullo casu errare potest: We conceive he hath sufficiently expressed the sense of the word Infallibility, so that, Insallibilis est, & nullo casu errare potest, are to us the same thing: It cannot therefore be the Word alone, but the whole importance and sense of that word Infallibility, which Mr. Cressy so earnestly desires all his Catholicks ever hereafter to forsake, because the former Church did never acknowledge it, and the present Church will never be able to maintain it. This is the great success which the Reason, Parts and Learning of the late Defenders of our Church have had in this main Architectonical Controversie.

And yet though the Church never maintained it, though the Protestants have had such advantage against it, though Mr. Cressy confessing both, hath wished all Catholicks to forsake it; yet will he not wholly forsake it himself, but undertakes most irrationally to answer for it. If the Church never asserted it, if the Catholicks be not at all concerned in it, to what end will Mr. Cressy the great mitigatour of the rigour, and defender of the latitude of the Churches Decisions, maintain it? If Mr. Chillingworth have had such good success against it, why will his old Friend Mr. Cressy endeavour to answer his arguments? especially, considering when he hath answered them all, he can onely from thence conclude that, Mr. Chillingworth was a very bad Disputant, who could bring no argument able to confute that, which in it self is not to be maintained.

So unreasonable it is, and inconsistent with his Concessions, that he should give an answer at all; but the manner of his answer, which he gives is far more irrational. For deserting the Insallibility, he answers onely the Authority of the Church, and so makes this Authority answer for that Infallibility: from whence these three manifest absurdities must necessarily follow.

First, When he hath answered all Mr. Chillingworth's arguments, in the same manner as he pretends to answer them, he must still acknowledge them unanswerable, as they were intended by him that made them. And no argument need to be thought good for any thing else, if he which made it, knew what he said, as Mr. Chillingworth certainly did.

Secondly, He onely pretends to answer those arguments, as against the Authority of the Church, simply considered without relation to such an Infallibility, which were never made against an authority so qualified. And therefore, whether the argument of his dear friend were to any purpose or no, his answer manifestly must be to none.

Thirdly, If he intend to refute all opposition made to their Infallibility by an assertion of their bare Authority, then must he assert that authority to be as great and convincing, which is fallible, as that which is infallible: that Guide to be as good, which may lead me out of my way, as that which connot: That Judge to be as fit to determine any doubt, who is capable of a mistake, as he which is not. And then I make no question, but some of his own Church, amongst the rest of their dislikes, will put him in mind of that handsome sentence of Cardinal Bellarmine, Iniquissimum esset cogere Christianos, ut non appellent ab eo Judicio quod erroneum esse potuit.

I once thought to have replied to those answers, which he hath given to Mr. Chillingworth's arguments: But his antecedent Concession hath made them so inconsiderable to me, that upon a second thought, I fear I should be as guilty in replying after my Objections, as he hath been in answering after his Confessions. Wherefore I shall conclude with an asseveration of mine own, which shall be therefore short because mine: That the Reply of this most excellent Person, Sola operarum summa, præsertim in Græcis, incuria excepta, is the most accurate Refutation of all, which can be said in this Controversie, that ever yet appeared; and if what hath already been delivered, have had such success upon so eminent an adversary, then may we very rationally expect at least the same effect upon all, who shall be so happy as to reade these Discourses.

Which is the earnest desire of

I. Pearson.

[The Discourse of Infallibility, being before printed in this Volume is therefore here omitted.]

THE

AN ANSWER TO THE L. Faulkland's Diſcourſe OF INFALLIBILITY.

CHAP. I.

NATURE being not able to perfect the work of humane kind, which ſhe had begun, and burſting at thoſe throws and ſpringings, which her timely child gave, to ſee the light of eternal life, (whereof the diſtaſte of all things experienced in this world, and certain ſparklings ſowed in our ſoul, had given it a dim notice) expected from her merciſull Creatour, the aid (whereof how much greater the wonder was to be, and the neceſſity, now divers thouſand years, by lamentable experience was more dear, ſo much the readier was he) and it was to ſend from his eternal breaſt, his onely wiſedom to recount us wonders, and aver them under the ſeal of his immutable truth. He knew all ſecrets, and could not be touched with ſuſpicion of ignorance; he was all goodneſs, and free from all calumny of jealouſie or envy: who knew him, could not miſtruſt him; for beſide thoſe great Verdicts already expreſſed in his favour, his works gave aſſurance of his words, he fulfilling in deeds, whatſoever he perſwaded in words, and working to himſelf, what he wiſhed unto others. Lo here, the high, and ſage Maſter of our faith, whoſe Oracles we cannot miſ-doubt, ſo we be aſſured they are his; and who hath in vain ſpent ſo much ſweat, and pains, if after he paſſed from hence, he hath left no means to aſſure mankind, what it was he taught and practiſed, and for the teaching and practiſing of it, eſchewed not the ſtormy paſſage betwixt Bethlehem and Mount Calvarie: but as in Bethlehem he multiplied the three drops of his Circumciſion into the thouſands of innocent Brooks; ſo upon the Mount Calvarie he opened the great Source, which hath now through 16. Ages irrigated the world with an infinity of ſtreams of proportional examples of bloud and ſufferance. Now was his Legacy performed, and he from Mount Olivet triumphantly returned, from whence he was come, and the world left to be ſaved by faith, that is, by a conſtant perſwaſion of thoſe things which he had taught.

The Conditions of this Faith were three. Firſt, That it ſhould be a means fitting for humane kind, that is, for learned and unlearned, for young and old, for wiſe and fools, for Princes and peaſants, Rabbies and Idiots. Secondly, That it ſhould be a tenent, conſtant, undoubted, undiſputable, uncontrollable. Thirdly, That it ſhould be a rule of our life and actions, making but a paſſage of this preſent life, to the following, and teaching us to contemn the preſent and ſeen ſubſtance, in hope of an unſeen and abſent fortune. Certes, a hard task, and which needeth to be well grounded and founded by God himſelf. For who well conſidereth it, cannot doubt it, to be as great a miracle (to make the whole Maſs of mankind, to forſake what it ſeeth, and take to obſcure hopes or things, it does not ſo much apprehend what they are) as to force the ſtrongeſt works of nature, to hang the ſea in the air, to alter the courſe of Moon, and Stars, and whatſoever elſe is ſtrange and incredible in nature. Beſides that, to make a way of knowledge common, and indifferent to learned and unlearned, to make the ignorant underſtand what the learned cannot reach unto, and the learned die in defence of the truth he hath no other warrant for, than becauſe he hath learned it from an ignorant perſon, was the work of him alone who framed them both, and underſtood in what veins ſo different blouds do run.

But done it was to be, and how? Thoſe to whom during his life, he had moſt fully declared his mind, went, and told it to others, and all was done. We cannot deny the way to have been fitting, and expedient, ſo it be found efficacious and powerfull, to effect what the Authour intended. For if Faith muſt believe what Chriſt hath taught, what better inſtrument to breed faith, than who heard him ſpeak? If Faith muſt be common to learned and unlearned, what better means, than by hearing? From which no unlearnedneſs can excuſe, nor learnedneſs be extempt. Every man may have from whom to hear and learn, if not wiſer than himſelf, yet one who may have properties to be a better witneſs. Children naturally believe what their parents tell them, unlearned men what Doctours teach them, abſent men, what thoſe who were preſent do report. All this goeth very well, ſo that this Expedient prove efficacious to the end intended.

Object. But it hath the prejudice of humane fallibility, for who, for weakneſs that he doth not carry away what he hath heard, who, for vanity to ſeem to know more than his fellows, who, to make ſome traffic of it, or for ſome emulation to ſome other; but ſeldome it hapneth that a multitude can carry away a thing all in the ſame manner; and 1600 years are paſſed ſince, ſo that it is not credible, a Doctrine ſo delivered can perſevere incorrupted untill this day.

Anſw. Yet if we look into the immediate progreſs and joints of the deſcent, we cannot find where it can miſs; for the doctrine being ſupernatural, and not delivered by man's skill or wit, the firſt and main principle of it can be no other, than to know what was delivered them by their Teachers, a thing not ſurpaſſing the underſtanding of any ſenſible wiſe man; ſo that put but twenty wiſe underſtanding men to agree, that the Preacher, to their certain knowledge, ſaid ſuch a thing, there remaineth no probable nor poſſible doubt, but that it was ſo.

Now then ſuppoſe, that one of thoſe (who having been taught by Chriſt's own mouth, had received by the confirmation of the Holy Ghoſt, that he could neither forget nor [illegible] this received doctrine) ſhould have preached over and over again the ſame doctrine, not long, nor hard to be carryed away, in all the Cities, Towns, and Boroughs of ſome great Country, ſo that whilſt he ſtayed there, they were throughly underſtanding and endoctrinated in that way. Now let him be gone, and after him all dead, who had heard him ſpeak; and then ſome queſtion ariſe concerning this doctrine (as we may ſay in the ſecond age) let us ſee whether errour can creep in or no, if the Chriſtians keep unto their hold. Their hold is what they were taught by Chriſt's Apoſtles. Let therefore the wiſeſt and beſt men of thoſe Cities and Towns meet together about the controverſie, and diſcuſs it out of this principle (what was delivered unto them as taught by the Apoſtles) will not there be a quick end of their diſpute? For every man can ſay, My father heard the Apoſtle ſpeak, he underſtood him to have ſaid this, ſo he himſelf believed, ſo he taught me, that this was that which the Apoſtle taught us. And when out of divers Cities and Towns, ſhall come a multitude of witneſſes, all agreeing in one point, how can it be doubted, but that this is Chriſt's doctrine, and that which his Apoſtle taught? And to diſagree, how is it poſſible? Since all their fathers heard the ſame things, and things not above their capacity, and often told them, and well apprehended by them when they were taught, and by conſequence could not tell their children otherwiſe than what they had heard and underſtood, in a matter of ſuch moment, and of which they apprehended no leſs, than that it concerned their own, and their childrens ſalvation, happineſs, or miſery for all eternity. And what here is moſt evidently certain, in the children of thoſe who heard the Apoſtles, may be derived with as much evidence again in the grand-children, and ſo in every age even to our preſent; for if in any age any queſtion begin, and it be reduced unto this principle; what did our forefathers teach us? neither can there be any pretended ignorance (for who can be ignorant of what was taught him when he was a child, and in what he was bred, as in the grounds and ſubſtance of his hopes, for all eternity? True it is, that if men leave this principle, and ſeek to judge the controverſie by learned diſcourſe, then may the Church be divided, one part following the authority of their Anceſtours; the other the ſubtile Arguments, and the great opinion they conceive, of the learning of their preſent Teachers: ſo that one ſide will claim ſucceſſion, and to have received it from hand to hand; the other the glory of great learning, and to have come by great induſtry to diſcover the errours of their forefathers. But it is evident, that if what the Apoſtles preached be the touchſtone of what is true, and what they preached, to be ſeen in what thoſe believe who have heard them, and they who received it from them that heard them; It is moſt evident, I ſay, that the one part, who ſeek for Chriſtian truth in learned diſcourſe, muſt needs forego the moſt certain and eaſie way, of attaining unto what they aim at: And likewiſe evident, that who keep themſelves duly and carefully unto the principle, cannot poſſibly in any continuance of time, ſwerve from the truth which Chriſt hath left unto his Church. So that the whole difficulty is reduced unto this, whether the Church for ſo many ages be perpetually preſerved in this principle, that what ſhe received from her forefathers, is that ſhe muſt believe, and deliver unto her poſterity; A thing ſo grafted in nature, which maketh us receive our being, our breeding, our learning, our goods, our eſtates, our arts, and all things we have, from our fathers, that it is a wonder of our mutability, that without forcible Engines we can be drawn from it.

CHAP. II.

NOW let us turn our diſcourſe, and as we have ſeen, that if our Saviour ordered his Apoſtles in the manner explicated, there was no way for his Church to ſwerve from his truth, but by ſwerving from the moſt plain, the moſt natural, and moſt evident, and concluding rule of his doctrine, and that but one, and moſt eaſie; ſo let us ſee whether from the preſent Church we can draw the like forcible train, which may lead us up to Chriſt, and his Apoſtles. Be therefore ſuppoſed or imagined, what no judicious man can deny to ſee with his eyes, if he hath never ſo little caſt them upon this preſent religion of Chriſtendom, to wit, that there is one Congregation or Church which layeth claim to Chriſt his doctrine, as upon this title, that ſhe hath received it from his Apoſtles without interruption, delivered ever from Father to Son, from Maſter to Scholar, from time to time, from hand to hand, even unto this day; and that ſhe does not admit any other doctrine for good and legitimate, which ſhe does not receive in this manner. Again, that whoſoever pretendeth Chriſt his truth againſt her, ſaith, that truth was, that once ſhe had the true way, but that by length of time ſhe is fallen into groſs errours which they will reform, not by any truth they have received from hand to hand, from thoſe who by both parts are acknowledged knowledged to have received their leſſon from Chriſt and his Apoſtles, but by ſtudy and learned Arguments, either out of ancient Writers, or out of the ſecrets of nature and reaſon. This being ſuppoſed, either this principle hath remained unto her ſince the beginning, or ſhe took it up in ſome one age of the 16. ſhe hath endured; if ſhe took it up in ſome latter age, ſhe then thought ſhe had nothing in her what ſhe had not received from her forefathers in this ſort: And if ſhe thought ſo, ſhe knew it. For as it is impoſſible now, any country ſhould think it was generally taught ſuch a thing, if it were not ſo; ſo alſo was there the like neceſſity, and impoſſibility to be otherwiſe, if all men were not run mad. Therefore clear it is, ſhe took it not up firſt then, but was in former poſſeſſion, and ſo clear it is, that ſhe could not have it now, if ſhe had it not from the very beginning. Now if ſhe had it, and hath conſerved it from the beginning, no new opinion could take root in her, unleſs it came unto her under this Maxime, as received from hand to hand; and to ſay, that any opinion which was not truly received from hand to hand, ſhould by ſuch a community be accepted, as received from hand to hand, is to make it believe, what it ſeeth clearly to be falſe, to lie unto its own ſoul, againſt its own ſoul, and the ſoul of its poſterity. Let us add to this, that the multitude of this Church is ſo diſperſed through ſo many Countries and languages, of ſo divers governments, that it is totally impoſſible they ſhould agree together, or meet upon a falſe determination, to affirm with one conſent a falſity for truth, no intereſt being able to be common unto them all to produce ſuch an effect. Wherefore as an underſtanding man cannot chuſe but laugh at the ſelf-weening Hampſhire Clown, who thought in his heart there was no ſuch Country as France, and that all that was told of it, were but Travellers tales, becauſe himſelf being upon the Sea ſhore, had ſeen nothing but water beyond England; ſo I think no wiſe man will accompt him leſs than phrentick, that underſtandeth ſo little in humane ways, as to think whole Nations by deſign, or by hazard, can agree together to profeſs, and proteſt a thing, which they know of their own knowledge to be a mere lie, and a well known falſhood to themſelves, and all their neighbours

CHAP. III.

THE force of the declared link of ſucceſſion, is ſo manifeſt to a capable underſtanding, that being compared with any objection made againſt it, it will of it ſelf maintain its evidence, and bear down the greateſt oppoſitors and oppoſition, if the underſtanding be left unto it ſelf, and not wreſted by the prejudice of a ſome ways intereſſed will. Nevertheleſs, there is a deeper root, which greatly ſtrengthens and reduces into action, the former efficacity of the tradition. And this is, that Chriſtian doctrine is not a ſpeculative knowledge, inſtituted for delight of man to entertain his underſtanding, and hath no farther end than the delectation which ariſeth out of contemplation; but it is an art of living, a rule of attaining unto eternal bliſs, a practical doctrine whoſe end is to inform our action, that our life and actions ſquared by her directions, may lead us to that great good, the which God Almighty eſteemed ſo highly of, that he thought it reaſon enough for him to ſhade his Divinity under the miſery of man, to make us partakers of ſo great a bliſs. Hence it followeth, that no errour can fall, even in a point which ſeemeth wholly ſpeculative in Chriſtian faith, but ſoon it breedeth a practical effect, or rather defection in Chriſtian behaviour. What could ſeem more ſpeculative, than whether the ſecond, or third Perſons of the Trinity were truly or participately God? Yet no ſooner was an errour broached in theſe queſtions, but there followed a great alteration in Chriſtian action; in their Baptiſms, in their manner of Prayer, in the motives of Love and Charity toward Almighty God, the very ground-work and foundation of all Chriſtian life. Whether man hath free-will or no, ſeemeth a queſtion, belonging to the nature of man, fit for a curious Philoſopher; but upon the preaching of the negative part, preſently followed an unknown Libertinage, men yielding themſelves over to all concupiſcence, ſince they were perſwaded they had no power to reſiſt. Free-will being denyed. I need not inſtance in prayer to Saints, worſhiping Images, prayer for the dead, and the like; which is evident, could not be changed without an apparent change in Chriſtian Churches. So that a doctrine contrary to faith, is like a diſeaſe, which although the cauſe be internal, yet cannot the effects and ſymptoms be kept from the outward parts, and view of the world. The conſequence which this note draweth, is, that it is not poſſible, that any material point of Chriſtian faith can be changed, as it were by obreption, whilſt men are a-ſleep, but it muſt needs raiſe a great ſcandal and tumult in the Chriſtian Common-weal. For ſuppoſe the Apoſtles had taught the world, it were Idolatry to pray to Saints, or uſe reverence towards their Pictures: How can we imagine this honour brought in, without a vehement conflict and tumult, in a people which did ſo greatly abhor Idolatry, as the Apoſtles Diſciples did? I might make the like inſtance in other points, if the whole Hiſtory of the Church did not conſiſt of the invaſions made by Hereticks, and the great and moſt violent waving of the Church to and fro upon thoſe occaſions. We remember in a manner as yet, how change came into Germany, France, Scotland, and our own Country: Let thoſe be a ſign to us, what we may think can be the creeping in of falſe doctrine; ſpecially, that there is no point of doctrine, contrary to the Catholick Church, rooted in any Chriſtian Nation, that the Eccleſiaſtical Hiſtory does not mention the times and combats by which it entered, and tore the Church in peices.

Let it therefore remain for moſt evidently conſtant, that into the Chriſtian Church can come no errour, but it muſt be ſeen and noted, and raiſe ſcandal and oppoſition to ſhew it ſelf (as truly it is) contrary to the nature of Piety and Religion. And when it does come, it cannot draw after it any others, than ſuch as firſt deſert the root of Faith, and Anchor of Salvation, that is to be judged by what their forefathers taught them, and affirmed to have received from their Anceſtours, as the Faith which Chriſt and his Apoſtles delivered to the whole world of their time, and to ſuch as ever claim and maintain the right of ſucceſſion, as a rule of what they believe. Yet may this alſo be worthy of conſideration, that as in our natural body, the principal parts are defended by Bones, Fleſh, Skins, and such like defences, in such sort, that no outward Agent can come to offend them, before having annoyed some of these; so in the Catholick faith, there are in speculation those we call Theological conclusions, and other pious opinions; and in practice many Rites and Ceremonies, which stop the passage unto the main principal parts of Christian belief and action. And about these we see daily such great motions in the Catholick Church, that he must be very ignorant of the Spirit of God, which quickneth his Church, that can imagin any vital part of his faith can be wounded while it lies a-sleep, and is insensible of the harm befalleth it; for as in any Science a principle cannot be mistaken, but it must needs draw a great shoale of false consequence upon it, and lame the whole Science, so never so little an errour in faith can be admitted, but in other Tenets, and Ceremonies it must needs make a great change, and innovation.

CHAP. IV.

NOW let any discreet man consider, what farther evidence he can desire, or peradventure, what greater assurance nature can afford, and not be of an awkward wilfulness to ask, that which is not conformable to the laws of nature? Much like unto him, who being sate in a chair far from the chimney, could not think of applying himself to the fire, but was angry the fire and chimney were made so far from him. The Philosophers say, it is indisciplinati ingenii to expect in any Art or Science more exactness than the nature of it affordeth. As if a man would bind a Seaman, to go so far every day, whether wind and weather served or no: So in moral matters, and such as are subject to humane action, we must expect such assurance as humane actions bear. If for the government of your spiritual life, you have as much as for the managing of your natural and civil life, what can you expect more? Two or three witnesses, of men beyond exception, will cast a man out of, not onely his lands, but life and all. He that amongst Merchants will not adventure, when there is a hundred to one of gaining well, will be accompted a silly Factor. And amongst Souldiers, he that will fear danger where but one of a hundred is slain, shall not escape the stain of Cowardise. What then shall we expect in Religion, but to see a main advantage on the one side, we may cast our selves on? and for the rest, remember we are men, creatures subject to chance and mutability, and thank God he hath given us that assurance in a supernatural way, which we are content withall, in our natural and civil ventures and possessions, which nevertheless God knoweth we often love better, and would less hazard than the unknown good of the life to come. Yet peradventure, God hath provided better for his Church than for Nature, since he loved her more, and in his own Person did more for her. Let us therefore examine the assurance he hath left her particularly. It was found in the second Chapter, upon this principle, that so great a multitude of men as cleave to this ground (to have received their faith by tradition) could not conspire by lying, to deceive their posterity. And if I be not deceived, this principle being granted, the conclusion (that this present Church is the true) followeth in as severe a way of discourse, as in Aristotle's Organ is taught, and exemplified in Mathematical Writers; whose use and art it is to put the like suppositions, whence to enduce something out against their principle. As in the said Chapter you are bidden, to put what year, or age, such an errour entred, and it is evidently true, that if it be true, then that year or age conspired to tell a lie to deceive their posterity. And as for the strength of their principle it self (although no moral man can be so absurd as to doubt of it) yet may we consider, that the understanding being the part, which maketh man to be a man, and truth being the perfection of our understanding, and true speech the effect, natural to true knowledge, or understanding: It is clear, that to speak truth is as natural a fruit of man's nature, as Pears of a Pear tree, Grapes of a Vine, Hony of the Bee: and that it can be no less grafted in nature, for men to speak truly, than it is in any other natural cause, to yield the fruit, for whose sake nature bred the cause. Wherefore as the constancy of the effect sheweth, that it holdeth upon eternal principles, that no one species of perfect creatures can perish, although we are not so skilfull of nature, as handsomly to weave the demonstration; so cannot it be doubted, but that if one had all the principles of man's nature well digested, he might demonstratively deduce the impossibility of [that such multitudes of men should conspire to a lie] the variety of particulars ever holding their being, from a constancy and uniformity in the universal. Add to this, the notoriousness of the lie, such as he is rarely found, that is so wicked as to venture upon; besides the greatness of the subject, and of the danger ensuing upon himself, and his deerest pledges. The ground therefore assumed, is a demonstrative principle, and peradventure in a higher degree than most physical principles be: For who knoweth not the nature of the soul, to be the highest thing Physicks can reach unto? Who knoweth not, that immaterial things are less subject to mutability, than those which are grounded in matter? Then as more noble, and as more immaterial, it hath greater exemption from mutability, than any other natural cause whatsoever. One addition more, may chance to clear the whole business more fully. Nothing more clear than that, no natural cause faileth of his effect, without there be some impediment from a stronger. Now the impediments which hinder a man from speaking truth, experience teacheth us, to be no other than hopes and fears. The same experience giveth us to know, that it is a rare thing, that hopes and fears should comprehend so great multitudes, as are in the union of the Catholick Church, specially during an age, which is the least time necessary for the effect we speak of, that what peradventure might at one time be ill admitted, should not be rejected at another. But if there were; can any man be so mad as to think, it could be a secret hope or fear, which should not break out amongst the posterity, and be known, that what was done was not true, but counterfeited upon fear or interest, which if it were, a whole ages counterfeiting would not be sufficient to make the posterity believe, they had received such a point of doctrine by tradition. Wherefore I do not see, how this principle of tradition, and the doctrine received by it, can be accompted of less certainty, than any Physical demonstration whatsoever; or Faith upon this ground not as sure as any natural cause, as the course of the Sun

Sun and Moon, as the flowing and ebbing of the Sea, as the Summer and Winter, Sowing and Harveſt, and whatſoever we undoubtedly preſume upon the like nature, and kind.

The principle which is taken in the following Chapter, is of no leſs force (if not of far better) to who rightly underſtandeth the nature of God his works, whoſe courſe it is, deeplier to root and ſtrengthen thoſe things which he would have moſt to flouriſh, or whereof he hath moſt care. Now Chriſtians well know, that God Almighty hath made mankind for his elect, as the world which is about us, for mankind. And therefore he hath rooted thoſe things which more immediately belong to the Elect (as is his Church, his Faith, and Holy Spirit in it) more ſtrongly than the principles either of man's nature, or of the world which was made for it: himſelf aſſuring us of it, when he told us, One tittle ſhould not miſs of the holy Writ, though Heaven and Earth ſhould be diſſolved. And ſo ſeeing the latter principle, relyed upon the not failing of God's Holy Spirit to his Church, which ſhould ever watch upon their actions, that nothing ſhould creep into Chriſtian life, which preſently the zeal of his faithfull ſhould not ſtartle at: I think it needleſs to ſeek to farther qualifie the ſtrength of that part, which receiveth it from the quality of ſo good a workman as was the Holy Ghoſt.

CHAP. V.

I Doubt not but whoſoever ſhall have received ſatisfaction in the diſcourſe paſſed, will alſo have received in that point we ſeek after; that is, in being aſſured both that Chriſt hath left a Director in the world, and where to find him, there being left no doubt, but it is his holy Church upon earth. Nor can there be any queſtion, which is this Church, ſithence there is but one that doth and can lay claim, to have received from hand to hand his holy doctrine in writings and hearts. Others may cry loud, they have found it, but they muſt firſt confeſs it was loſt: and ſo if they have, it was not received by hands, I mean, as far as it diſagreeth with Catholick doctrine; ſo that where there is not ſo much as claim, there can be no diſpute. And that this Church is a lawfull directreſs, that is, hath the conditions requiſite, I think can no ways be doubted. Let us conſider in her, preſence, or viſibility, authority, power. As for the firſt, her multitude and ſucceſſion, makes the Church that ſhe is ever acceſſible, ever known. The Arians ſeemed to chaſe her out of the world in their flouriſh, but the perſecution moved againſt her, made her even then well known and admired. In our own Countrey we have ſeen no Biſhop, no form of Church for many years; yet never ſo, but that the courſe of juſtice did proclaim her through England, and who was curious, could never want means to come to know her confeſſion of faith what it is, and upon what it is grounded. Whereſoever ſhe is, if in peace, her Majeſty and Ceremonies in all her actions, make her ſpectable and admired. If in war, ſhe never wanteth Champions to maintain her, and the very heat of her adverſaries, makes her known to ſuch as are deſirous to underſtand the truth of a matter ſo important, as is the eternal welfare of our ſoul.

For Authority: her very claim of antiquity and ſucceſſion (to have been that Church which received her beginning from Chriſt and his Apoſtles, and never forewent it, but hath ever maintained it) giveth a great reverence unto her amongſt thoſe, who believe her; and amongſt thoſe, who with indifferency and love of truth, ſeek to inform themſelves, a great prejudice above others: For it draweth a greater likelihood of truth, than others have. And if it be true, it carrieth an infinite authority with it, of Biſhops, Doctours, Martyrs, Saints, miracles, learning, wiſedom, venerable antiquity, and the like: that if a prudent man ſhould ſit with himſelf and conſider, that if he were to chuſe what kind of one he would have it, to carry away the hearts of men towards the admiration and love of God Almighty, he could find nothing wanting in this, that could be maintained with the fluxibility of nature. For to ſay, he would have no wicked men in it, were to ſay, he would have it made of Angels and not of Men.

There remaineth Power: the which no man can doubt but Chriſt hath given it moſt ample, who conſidereth his words ſo often repeated to his Apoſtles. But (abſtracting from that) who doth not ſee, that the Church hath the nature and proportion of ones Country, unto every one? As in a man's Country, he hath Father and Mother, Brothers, Siſters, Kinſfolks, Allyes, Neighbours, and Countrymen which anciently were called Cives, or Concives, and of theſe are made his Country; ſo in the Church findeth he in way of ſpiritual inſtruction and education, all theſe degrees nearer and farther off, untill he come unto that farthermoſt, of being all united under the univerſal Government of Chriſt his Vicar: And as he in his Countrey findeth bearing, breeding, ſettling in eſtates and fortunes, and laſtly protection and ſecurity; ſo likewiſe in the way of Chriſtianity doth he find this more fully in the Church: ſo that if it be true, that a man oweth more unto his Maſter than unto his Father, becauſe bene eſſe is better than eſſe; certainly man alſo (as far as Church and Country can be ſeparated) muſt owe more to the Church than to his very Country; wherefore likewiſe the power which the Church hath to command and inſtruct, is greater than the power of the temporal Country, and community, whereof he is part. Again, this Church can ſatisfie learned and unlearned. For in matters above the reach of reaſon, whoſe ſource and ſpring is from what Chriſt and his Apoſtles taught, what learned man, that underſtands the nature of ſcience and method, can refuſe in his inmoſt ſoul to bow to that which is teſtified by ſo great a multitude, to have come from Chriſt? And what unlearned man can require more for his faith, than to be taught by a Miſtreſs of ſo many prerogatives and advantages above all others? Or how can he think to be quieted in conſcience, if he be not content to fare as ſhe doth, who hath this prerogative evident, that none is ſo likely by thouſands of degrees?

CHAP. VI.

THE stemme and body of our position thus raised, will of it self shoot out the branches of divers Questions, or rather the solution thereof.

And first, How it hapned that divers Hereticks have pretended tradition (the Millenarians, Carpocratians, Gnosticks, and divers others) yet they with their traditions have been rejected, and the holy Church left onely in claim of tradition.

For if we look into, what Catholick tradition is, and what the said Hereticks pretended, under the name of Tradition, the question will remain voided. For the Catholick Church calleth Tradition, that doctrine which was publickly preached in the Churches, ordred and planted in the manners and customs of the Church. The Hereticks called Tradition a kind of secret doctrine, either gathered out of private conversation with the Apostles, or rather they pretended that the Apostles, besides what they publickly taught the world, had another private or mystical way proper to Scholars, more endeared than the rest, which came not to publick view, but was in huggermugger delivered from those secret Disciples unto others, and so unto them; where it is easily seen, what difference there is betwixt this Catholick Tradition and this pretended. For (the force and energy of tradition residing in the multitudes of hearers, and being planted in the perpetual action, and life of Christians, so that it must have such a publicity that it cannot be unknown amongst them.) Those the Hereticks pretend, both manifestly want the life and being of traditions, and by the very great report of them lose all authority and name. For, suppose some private doctrine of an Apostle to some Disciple, should be published and recorded by that Disciple, and some others, this might well be a truth, but would never obtain the force of a Catholick position, that is, such as it should be damnation to reject, because the descent from the Apostles is not notorious, and fitting to sway the body of the whole Church.

The Second Question may be, How it cometh to pass, that something which at first bindeth not the Churches belief, afterward cometh to bind it? For if it were ever a Tradition, it must ever be publick, and bind the Church: And if once it were not, it appeareth not how ever it could come to be; for if this age, (for example) hath it not, how can it deliver it over to the next age that followeth?

But if we consider, that the scope of Christian doctrine being great, and the Apostles preaching in so great variety of Countries, it might happen some point in one Country to have been less understood, or peradventure not preached at all, which in another was often preached, and well both understood and retained; we may easily free our selves from these brambles. For the Spirit of Tradition residing in this, that the testimony of that, the Apostles delivered this Doctrine, be exceptione majus, and beyond all danger of deceit; It is not necessary to the efficaciousness of Tradition, that the whole universal Church be witness to such a truth, but so great a part as could be a Warrant against mistaking and deceit; so that if all the Churches of Asia, or Greece, or Aphrique, or Egypt, should constantly affirm such a Doctrine to have been delivered unto them by the Apostles, it were enough to make a Doctrine exceptione majorem: Whence it insueth, that if in a meeting of the Universal Church it were found that such a part had such a Tradition, concerning some matter, whereof the rest either had no knowledge or no certainty, such a Doctrine would pass into a necessary bond in the whole Church, which before was either unknown or doubted of in some part thereof. A likely example thereof might be in the canonical books, the which being written some to one Church, and some to another, by little and little were spread from those Churches unto others, and so some sooner, some later, received into the constant belief of the Catholick world.

The Third Question may be, How (Christian religion consisting of so many points) it is possible to be kept incorrupted by tradition, the which depending on memory, and our memory being so fraile, and subject to variation, it seemeth, cannot without manifest miracle, conserve so great diversity of points unchanged, for so many ages?

But if we consider, that Faith is a Science, and Science a thing whose parts are so connexed, that if one be false, all must needs be false, we shall easily see, that contrarily, the multitude of divers points is a conservation the one to the other. For, if one be certain, it of it self is able to bring us to the right in another, whereof we doubt. And as in a man's body, if he wanteth one member, or the operation of it, he must needs find the want of it in another: And as a Common-wealth that is well ordained, cannot miss any office or part, without the redounding of the defect upon the whole, or some other part; so a Christian, being an essence instituted by God, as specially as any natural creature, hath not the parts of his faith and action by accident and chance knitted together, but all parts by a natural order, and will of the Maker, ordred for the conservation of the most inward essence, which is the charity we owe to God, and our Neighbour. Wherefore Christian life and action consisteth but upon one main tradition, whose parts be those particulars, which men specifie either in matter of Belief or Action: So that this connexion of its parts amongst themselves, added to the Spirit of God, ever conserving zeal in the heart of his Church, with those helps also of nature (wherewith we see wonders in this kind done) will shew this conservation to be so far from impossibility, that it will appear a most con-natural and fitting thing. Let us but consider, in constant nations, their language, their habits, their manners of sacrificing, eating, generally living; how long it doth continue amongst them. See that forelorn nation of Jews, how constantly it maintaineth the Scripture? how obstinately their errours? The Arabians of the desart, from Ismael his time unto this day, living in families, wandring about the desart. Where Christians labour to convert Idolaters, they find the main and onely argument for their errours, that they received them from their forefathers, and will not quit them. The King of Socotora, thinking to please the Portugals by reducing a nation, that had the name of Christians, to true Christianity, he found them obstinately protest unto him, that they would sooner lose their lives, than part with their religion their Ancestours had left them. The Maronites, a small handfull of people, amongst Turks and Hereticks,

to

to this day have maintained their religion in Syria. And certainly thouſands of examples of this kind may be collected in all Nations and Countries, eſpecially, if they be either rude, and ſuch as mingle not with others, or ſuch as be wiſe, and out of wiſedom ſeek to maintain their ancient belief. And Catholicks are of both natures: For they have ſtrict commands not to come to the Ceremonies and Rites of other religions, and in their own, they have all means imaginable to affect them to it, and conſerve a reverence and zeal towards it.

CHAP. VII.

TO come at length to the principal aim of this Treatiſe, that is, to give an anſwer to him that demandeth a guide at my hands. I remit him to the moderate preſent Church of Rome, that is, Her, who is in an externe ſenſible communion with the externe ſenſible Clergy of Rome, and the externe ſenſible Head and Paſtour of the Church. If he ask me now, how he ſhall know her? (I ſuppoſe he meaneth, how he ſhould know her to be the true) I muſt contreinterrogate him, who he is? that is, in whoſe name he ſpeaketh? Is he an ignorant man? Is he unlearned? yet of good underſtanding in the world? Is he a Scholar? and what Scholar? A Grammarian, whoſe underſtanding hath no other help than of languages? Is he a Philoſopher? Is he a Divine? (I mean an Academical one, for a true Divine is to teach, not to ask this queſtion:) Is he a Stateſman? For he who can think one anſwer, can or ought to be made to all theſe; may likewiſe expect, that a round bowle may ſtop a ſquare hole, or one cauſe produce all effects, and hang lead at his heels to fly withall. Yet I deny not, but all theſe muſt have the ſame guide, though they are to be aſſured of that, in divers ſorts and manners. If therefore the ignorant man ſpeaketh, I will ſhew him in the Church of God an excellency in decency, Majeſty of Ceremonies above all other Sects and Religions, whereby dull capacities are ſweetly enſnared, to believe the truth they hear, from whom they ſee to have the outward Signs of vertue and devotion. If the unlearned ask; I ſhew him the claim of Antiquity, the multitude, the advantages of ſanctity and learning, the juſtifiableneſs of the cauſe, how the world was once in this accord, and thoſe who oppoſed, when they firſt parted, firſt began the Schiſm; how the points of difference be ſuch as on the Catholick ſide help devotion, and on the contrary diminiſh the ſame, and ſuch like ſenſible differences, which will clearly ſhew a main advantage on the Catholick ſide, which is the proportional motive to his underſtanding.

To the Grammarian I will give two Memorandums: Firſt, that ſeeing Catholicks were firſt in poſſeſſion both of the Scriptures and the interpretations, the adverſe part is bound to bring ſuch places as can receive no probable Expoſition by the Catholicks. It is not ſufficient that their Expoſitions ſeem good or better; that is, more conformable unto the Text; but they muſt be evincent, to which no ſo ſound anſwer, even with ſome impropriety, can be given. For who knoweth not, that is converſant in Criticks, how many obſcure, and difficult places occur in moſt plain Authours? and the Scripture, of all Books (the greater part of the men who wrote them, ſpecially the new Teſtament, being not eloquent, and writing not in their native tongue) for the moſt part are ſubject to many Improprieties.

The other Memorandum is, That to prove a Catholick point by Scripture, it is ſufficient that the place brought, do bear the Explication the Catholick beareth, and if it be more probable by the very letter, it is an evincent place. The reaſon is, Becauſe the Queſtion being about a Chriſtian Law, the Axiome of the Juriſts taketh place, that Conſuetudo optima interpres Legis. So that if it be manifeſt, that Chriſtian practice (which was before the controverſie) be for the one ſenſe, and the words be tolerable, no force of Grammar can prevail to equalize this advantage. The Grammarian therefore who will obſerve theſe rules, I turn him looſe to the Scriptures, and Fathers, to ſeek in them what is the faith of Chriſt, and properties of his Church to know her by.

Of the Philoſopher I exact to go like a Philoſopher, and to ſearch out the ſpecifical differences of every Sect, and when he hath found them, (if any one but the Catholick hath any rule of Faith and good life; which I remit to him to enquire.) But at leaſt, when he hath found the Catholicks to be this claim of Tradition before declared, then, if this do not bring him as demonſtratively, as he knoweth any concluſion in Philoſophy, and Mathematicks, to the notice that this is the onely true Church of Chriſt, for my part I ſhall quit him before God and man.

The Divine, if he hath truly underſtood the principle of his Faith in the nature of a Divine (I mean, Trinity, Incarnation, Redemption, Euchariſt, Beatitude, the Creation and Diſſolution of the World) and hath ſeen the exact conformity with the deepeſt principles of nature, with an unſpeakable wiſedom of the contriver: If he does not plainly confeſs, it was above the nature of man to frame the Catholick Religion, and ſeeth not, that onely that is conformable to nature and it ſelf; I ſay, he hath no ground ſufficient to be of it.

At laſt, the Stateſman who is truly informed of the Church (how far it is really of Chriſt's Inſtitution, and what either pious men have added, or peradventure, ambitious men encroached,) If he does not find a government of ſo high and Exotick ſtrain, that neither man's wit would dare to have attempted it, neither man's power could poſſibly have effected it: If he findeth not eminent helps, and no diſadvantage to the temporal government; I ſhall think there wanteth one Star in the Heaven of the Church, to direct theſe Sages to Bethlehem. But if God Almighty hath in all ſorts and manners provided his Church, that ſhe may enlighten every man in his way, which goeth the way of a man; then let every man conſider, which is the fit way for himſelf, and what in other matters of that way he accompteth evidence. And, if there be no intereſt in his ſoul, to make him loath to believe, what in another matter of the like nature he would not ſtick at, or heavy to practiſe what he ſeeth clearly enough, I fear not his choice; but if God ſend him time and means to proſecute his ſearch any indifferent while, it is long ago known of what religion he is to be of.

After this followeth no order of Chapters, becauſe it is applied to the diſcourſe which was occaſion of it.

Although if what is already ſaid, be not ſatisfaction unto the writing, and the Authour thereof, (for whoſe ſake and contentment, all that hath been diſcourſed hitherto, hath been ſet down:) I confeſs, that I have not ability to give him ſatisfaction: yet leſt it ſhould be interpreted neglect, If I did not make an application of it unto the writing, I ſhall as briefly as I can, for avoiding tediouſneſs, run over the diſcourſe. And true it is, ſpeaking of the Church of Rome, as this day it is the true Church of God; I anſwer the doubter, ſhe neither hath, nor can have any errour, which he need to fear, and be ſhye of. The which two limitations I add, for avoiding queſtions, Impertinent to our diſcourſe. The firſt, for thoſe which are concerning the connexion of the See of Rome to the univerſal Church. The latter, to avoid ſuch queſtions as touch that point, whether the Church may erre, in any Philoſophical or other ſuch like matter? which queſtions are not ſo pertinent to our matter.

Neither do I remit the Queſtioner unto Scripture for his ſatisfaction, although I hold Scripture a very ſufficient means, to ſatisfie the man, who goeth to it with that preparation of underſtanding and will, which is meet and required. Howſoever this I may anſwer, for them who prove it out of Scripture, that becauſe they diſpute againſt them who admit of Scripture, and deny the authority of the Church; if they can convince it, they doe well; though they will not themſelves admit generally of a proof out of Scripture, as not able to prove every thing in foro contentioſo.

That they ſay, the Church is made infallible, that we may have ſome guide, I think it very rational. For nature hath given ever ſome ſtrong and uncontrollable principle in all natures to guide the reſt. The Common-wealth hath a Governour not queſtionable; our underſtanding hath ſome principles, which ſhe cannot judge, but by them judgeth of all other verities. If there ſhould not be ſome ſuch principle in the Church, it were the onely maimed thing God hath created; and maimed in its principal part, in the very head. And if there be ſuch a principle, the whole Church is infallible by that, as the whole man ſeeth by his eyes, toucheth by his hands. Neither can I deny, but that the Authour well excepteth, or aſſumeth, that there is no leſs neceſſity, the Church ſhould be known to be infallible, or which is this Church, than that there is one. For if I ſhould admit abſolutely, that it is neceſſary for every man to know the Church is Infallible, precedently to the knowledge of which is the true Church, I ſhould forget what I had before ſaid, that ſatisfaction is to be given to every one, according to his capacity. It is ſufficient for a Child to believe his Parents, for a Clown to believe his Preacher, about the Churches Infallibility. For Faith is given to mankind, to be a means to him of believing, and living like a Chriſtian: and ſo he hath this ſecond, it is not much matter in what terms he be with the firſt. The good women and Clowns in Italy, and Spain, trouble not themſelves to ſeek the grounds of their faith, but with a Chriſtian ſimplicity, ſeek to live according unto that their Preachers tell them; and without queſtion, by perſeverance, come to the happineſs, great Clerks by too much ſpeculation may fail of. Such therefore know no otherwiſe the Infallibility of the Church, than becauſe ſhe telleth it them, to whom they give credit, as innocently as any child to his Mother.

The Church therefore was made infallible, becauſe ſo it was fitting for her Maker, ſo it was fitting for her ſelf, ſo it was fit for that part of mankind, that had more refined wits; not becauſe it was neceſſary for every one which was to come to her, or live in her, whereof the greateſt part firſt cometh to her, drawn by ſome of the means before delivered, and believeth her about her infallibility.

Neither do I remit him to a general and conſtant tradition, as if himſelf ſhould climb up every age by learned Writers, and find it in every one. I take it to be impoſſible. Teſtimonies one may find in many ages, but ſuch as will demonſtrate and convince a full tradition, I much doubt. Neither do I find by experience, that who will draw a man by a rope or chain, giveth him the whole rope or chain into his hands, but onely one end of it, unto which if he cleave hard, he ſhall be drawn which way the rope is carried. Tradition is a long chain, every generation or delivery from father to ſon, being a link in it. I ſend him therefore no farther than to this preſent age, where he ſhall (beyond all doubtfulneſs) find that this doctrine was delivered unto this age, by the care of their Anceſtours. And if we ſeek upon what terms, we find, that upon a fixed opinion of damnation in failing; and ſo, that they had received it ſo from their forefathers upon the ſame terms, with opinion that it had continued ever ſince Chriſt his time by this means. And he who is able to look into the means, how this can remain conſtantly ſo many ages, may find it not onely the far ſecurer, but an evidently infallible ſucceſſion of doctrine, inviolable as long as there is a Church. And this doth not onely ſhew that there is one, but which ſhe is, and that there can be no other. For I ſuppoſe, no man will be ſo ſenſeleſs as to ſay, the Apoſtles preached one thing in one part, and the contrary in another: wherefore it will be agreed, that once the Church agreed in her faith. This ſuppoſed, let us ſet the time when one part changed, and will it not be evident, that the changing Church being challenged cannot plead, ſhe received it from her Anceſtours, becauſe it is manifeſtly falſe to both parties? Then muſt needs one onely Church remain with that claim. And although we did not know what the Greek Church doeth by her Hiſtory, yet the force of conſequence would tell us, they cannot doe this which the Weſtern Church doeth, becauſe the doing of one is incompatible with the doing of the ſame by the other.

As for the two places concerning the Popes and Councils infallibility, it is not to my purpoſe to meddle of them, becauſe on the one ſide, the way I have begun, there is no need of thoſe diſcourſes: and on the other, I ſhould engage my ſelf in quarrels betwixt Catholick and Catholick, obſcure the matter I have taken in hand, and profit nothing in my hearers more than to be judged, peradventure, to have more learning than wiſedom to govern it withall. Wherefore I ſhall omit thoſe Paragraphs, if I onely note concerning the tradition impoſed upon Papias, that the very narration of it, ſheweth that it is no tradition, in the ſenſe we ſpeak of tradition, but in the ſenſe ſome Hereticks have pretended tradition; as it were a doctrine ſecretly delivered, and gathered out of private conference with the Apoſtles, and not their publick preaching delivered to the Churches, which is the way we exalt tradition in. The witneſſes alſo of ancient Fathers are no parts of tradition, but ſigns and marks where it hath paſſed, whereas the body of tradition is in the life and belief of the whole Church. For the Church (as I have ſaid) is an eſſence compoſed, as it were, of interne and externe parts; the interne being faith, the externe, the outward action, which muſt needs be conformable to the internal faith, nor can there be a material change in the action, but it muſt argue the internal change of faith, nor internal change in faith, but it muſt draw with it an Iliad of altered actions.

As for the place of Fevardentius, which alloweth many Fathers to have fallen into errours, I think it will not trouble him, who is acquainted with the courſe of the preſent Church, wherein divers, who be thought great Divines, fall into errours, for which their books ſometimes are hindred from the print, ſometimes recalled, or ſome leaves commanded to be paſted up. The reaſon is, the multiplicity of Catholick doctrine, which doth not oblige a man to the knowledge of every part, but to the prompt ſubjection to the inſtruction of the Church; wherefore many men may hold falſe doctrine inculpably, not knowing it to be ſuch, even now after the learned labours of ſo many, that have ſtrived to open and facilitate by method, what is true and what is falſe; much more in the Fathers times, when there was great want of ſo many compilers, as theſe latter ages have produced.

As for the two points, he ſaith, avert him from Catholick doctrine, I am miſtaken, if he be not miſtaken in both. The firſt is, that Catholick doctrine damnes all, who are not in the union of their Church. He thinketh the ſentence hard, yet, I think he will not deny me this, that if any Church does not ſay ſo, it cannot be the true Church: For call the Church what you will, the Congregation of the Elect, the Congregation of the Faithfull, the Congregation of Saints, or Juſt; call it, I ſay, or define it what you will, doth it not clearly follow, that whoſoever is out of that Church, cannot be ſaved; for he ſhall not be Elect, Juſt, Faithfull, &c. without which there is no ſalvation. How then can any Church maintain theſe two propoſitions? I am the true Church, and yet one may be ſaved, without being in me. But peradventure he is ſcandalized, that the Catholick Church requireth actual communion external with her, which he thinketh in ſome caſe may be wanting without detriment of Salvation. But how would he have the Church ſpeak, which ſpeaketh in common, but abſtracting from ſuch particular caſes, as may change wholly the nature of the queſtion. For example ſake; hath not the Church reaſon to ſay, he that denyeth the bleſſed Trinity is an Heretick? It hapneth one who hath converſed among the Tritheites, hearing them uſe the word Trinity for three Gods meaning to ſpeak againſt them, denyeth there is any Trinity; ſhall this man be comprehended in the foreſaid condemnation? Or was the ſentence ill pronounced? Neither, as I think. For both was it well done by the Church, to condemn denyers of the Trinity, becauſe per ſe loquendo (as the Philoſophers ſpeak) that is, according to the ordinary courſe, and nature of things, who denyeth a thing in words, denyeth it in heart; yet the man foreſpoken, did not ſo, and was not condemned in that ſentence. In like manner, when the Church condemneth all ſuch as are not in actual union, and communion with her, ſhe doeth well: becauſe according to the ordinary courſe, this doth not fall out, without either preſumption, and damnable pride, or elſe culpable, either ignorance, or fear, and love of private intereſt, before God and his Church. But it followeth not thence, that by accident no man may ſometime be excuſed. The words of our Saviour concerning Baptiſm and Euchariſt their neceſſity, are very preciſe, yet the Church doubteth not to excuſe thoſe who have it in voto.

But to proceed unto the point. The current of Catholick Doctours holdeth, that no man ſhall be damned for infidelity, but he who wilfully doth miſ-believe; and that to doe ſo, it is required that faith be ſufficiently propoſed unto him. And what is to be ſufficiently propoſed, is not determined amongſt them. There wanteth not Divines, that teach, that even ignorantia affectata, doth excuſe from Hereſie.

On the other ſide it is moſt certain, that no man is damned for not profeſſing, what he is not damned for not believing. Wherefore profeſſion being that which engrafteth a man exteriourly in the Church of God, according to the ordinary opinions of Catholicks; it followeth, that no man is condemned for not being of the Church, who is not for infidelity; for which it is a very uncertain caſe, who be damned and who not. So that the Catholick poſition is not ſo crude, as peradventure the Authour underſtood it to be, though the words be rough, and ought to be ſo, as being of what is according to the courſe of nature, not what chance and accidents may invent.

The other point was of putting Hereticks to death, which I think he underſtandeth to be done Vindicatively, not Medicinally. I mean, impoſed as a puniſhment, and not in way to prevent miſchief, or oppreſs it in the head. If the Circumcellians were the firſt, that is ancient enough for the juſtification of the fact, although for baniſhment (which alſo he ſeemeth to reprehend) we know the firſt that could ſuffer it, did ſuffer it. Arius, I mean, by the hand of Conſtantine, whom he praiſeth for a ſpeech he uttered, before he knew the conſequence of the danger, and ſeemeth to reprehend for his after and better wits. Saint Auguſtine juſtifieth ſuch proceedings againſt Hereticks. Saint Gregory adviſed the like againſt Pagans, (if I remember) and the Church laterly, hath rather increaſed than decreaſed in the practice of it. Moſes's ſpeech, I believe is miſtaken, the force of it being, that the baniſhment of Biſhops ſhewed his faith, becauſe the baniſhed were Catholicks, which ſhewed Lucius to be none. But what can be ſaid, if the Church uſeth that for the prevention of a greater, and more dangerous evil, which all politick Eſtates uſe for the remedies of leſs, and leſs dangerous evils, and are commended for it? For if Faith be the way of Salvation, and Hereſie the bane of Faith; if Salvation be the greateſt good, then the danger of a Countries being over runn with Hereſie, is the greateſt of dangers, greater than the multiplying of Thieves, greater than the unſurety of the ways, greater than a Plague, or Invaſion. Why then doth not reaſon force us to uſe the means to prevent it, which the ſame reaſon and experience, teacheth us to be moſt efficacious in this and all other contagious and gangrening maladies of the Common-wealth. I hope reaſon it ſelf, and the zeal of the Authour to his own and Countries ſalvation, will ſupply my ſhortneſs in this point. For ſuppoſing a Church be aſſured she is in the right, and that the doctrine preached by another, leadeth to damnation, I know not why Caiaphas's words should not be prophetical in this case, and that truly it doth not expedire, that unus moriatur pro populo, & non tota gens pereat.

He urgeth afterwards against the unity of the Church, that it is none such as we brag of. And I confess we brag of it, and think we have reason too. And if it please him to look into the difference of our Country of England, and some Land of Barbarians, as Brasile, or such other, where they live without Law or Government, I think he will find, that our bragging is not without ground. For wherein is the difference betwixt a civil Government, and a barbarous Anarchy? Is it either, that in a civil Estate there be no quarrels, or amongst Barbarians there is no quiet? The former would prejudice our Courts and Justice, the latter is impossible, even in nature. What is then the goodness of Government, but that in a well govern'd Country, there is a means to end quarrels, and in an Anarchy there can be no assured peace? This therefore is that we brag of, that amongst us, if any controversie rise, there is a way to end it, which is not amongst them who part from us. And secondly, that there is no assured agreement amongst those who are parted from us; for although to day they agree, there is no bond, nor tye, why to morrow they may not disagree. These two things we brag of, and I think the Authour will not deny it. For he confesseth we all agree, in that the Church is an infallible Mistress. Then it is evident, that if in any controversie she interposeth her judgement, the controversie is ended. He likewise confesseth, that who part from us, have no such definitive authority amongst them, and that Scripture whereon they rely, hath not this vertue, to take up controversies clearly. Again, I do confess, most English men confess a Trinity, the Incarnation, and Passion of our Saviour; but if to morrow, any one or more of them, light upon some book of an Arian, Trinitarian, or other Sect, so wittily written, that he putteth probable solutions for the places of Scriptures, sheweth slight ways, how our well-meaning fore-fathers may have slipped into such an errour; what is there to retain these men, from disagreeing with the rest of their brethren, and betake themselves to the Arians? And when the heat is passed, light upon some Rabbi, who shall cunningly exaggerate the absurdities (as he shall term them) of the Trinity, Incarnation, Passion; say our Saviour did strange things in vertue of some constellation, and delivering these things so oratorically, that for a new heat these things shall seem more conformable, than his Arianisme; what then shall hinder this to become a Jew, and at last to prove himself so great a Clerk, as to write De Tribus Impostoribus? Take away the power of the Church (which every man doth, who taketh away the Infallibility) what can retain any man, why he should not yeild to that discourse, which seemeth faireſt, seeing nothing is certain? But peradventure, some may attribute power unto the Church without Infallibility; whom I would have consider, but what himself saith. For his Church, by the power it hath, must either say, I command you to believe me, or I command you to profess this, whether you believe me or no. The second I think, no enemy of equivocation will admit, as the former is as much, as if it should say, I know not whether I say true or no, yet you must think I say true. So that if I understand any thing, where there is no Infallibility, there is no Power, where no Power, no Unity, where no Unity, no Entity, no Church. Now for the controversies mentioned (besides that there is a means to terminate them) they be such, as bring no breach of the ancient life, and action of Christians, which all those Opinions do, which for the most part are reputed to make Hereticks; That some controversies amongst us are not resolved, is a thing necessary amongst humane affairs, where things must have a time to be born, to encrease, to fall; and the greater things are, the greater is their period. Wherefore I do not see, why this may hurt the Church, more than the Suits which hang in our Courts, prejudice the Government of the Land. Neither can any other Church assume Infallibility to it self; because it cannot lay hold of this principle, that it receiveth its doctrine by hands; and so must first profess the Church of Christ to be fallible, or else it cannot part from it.

The last point of the Authour's discourse, is, to shew how errours might have crept in. Wherein I shall have no opposition with him, for I do not think the question is, how they should creep in, but how they should be kept out? For the fluxibility of humane nature is so great, that it is no wonder if errours should have crept in, the ways being so many: but it is a great wonder of God, that none should have crept in. This nevertheless I may say, (if the Authour will confess, (as I think) he will not deny, but that it is disputable, whether any errour in sixteen ages hath crept in) this very thing is above nature. For if there were not an excellency beyond the nature of corruptible things, it would be undeniably evident, that not one or two, but hundreds of errours had quite changed the shape of the Church in so many years, tempests, divisions, want of commerce in the body of the Church. But this one maxime, that she receiveth her Faith by Tradition, and not from Doctours, hath ever kept her entire. And he that will shew the contrary, must shew how it could come to pass, that those who lived in such an age could say unto their children, this we received from our fore-fathers, as taught them by their forefathers, to have been received from Christ and his Apostles, from hand to hand; which if it could not be, the question is resolved, that no errour is in the Church of God, which holdeth her faith upon that tenure.

And truly, if the Authour desire to examine many Religions, let him look their main ground wherein they rely, and see whether that be good or no. And I think amongst Christians he shall find but two, Tradition, and Scripture. And the Catholick onely to rely upon Tradition, and all the rest upon Scripture. And also shall he see, that relying upon Scripture cannot draw to an unity, those who rely upon it; and that more than one cannot rely upon Tradition, which when I have considered, I have no farther to seek, for if I be a Christian, I must belong to one side. By falling on the one side, I see my fortune in thousands who have gone before me, to wit, that I shall be to seek all my life time, as I see they are, and how greatly they magnifie very weak peices. On the other side, I see every man who followeth it, as far as he followeth it, is at quiet; and therefore cannot chuse, but think there to be the stone to rest my head upon, against which Jacob his Ladder is reared unto Heaven.

The Authour hath through his whole discourse, inserted divers things, which seem particularly to the the juſtification of himſelf, in the way of his ſearch. The which, as I think, on one ſide I ſhould be to blame to examine (for who am I, to judge the Servant of another man) ſo, becauſe I cannot think, but that they are inſerted for love of truth, and to hear what might be ſaid againſt them (craving pardon, if on preſumption of that, it is his will, I any way offend) I ſhall touch the matter, wholly abſtracting from the perſonal diſpoſition of any man. And to begin a far off, it is confeſſed amongſt Catholicks, that all ſin muſt be wilfull, and ſo, as far as any man's doubt in Religion is not by will, but by force and neceſſity, ſo far it is not culpable, but may be laudable before God and man. As was without doubt the anxious ſearch of Saint Auguſtine for the truth, which he relateth in his confeſſions, for who is aſſured of being out of the truth, muſt have time to ſeek it, and ſo long this doubt is rational, and laudable. That which muſt juſtifie this ſearch, is in common, that which juſtifieth all actions, that a man be ſure in the aim he aimeth at, and in the means he taketh, not to be governed by any paſſion, intereſt, or wilfulneſs, but that he ſincerely aimeth, and carefully purſueth in the ſearch of the truth it ſelf, for the love of it; and of thoſe goods which depend of the knowledge of it. This is a thing, in which a rational man can have no other judge than himſelf; for no man knoweth what is within a man, but the Spirit, or conſcience of man. But he himſelf muſt be a rigorous Judge unto himſelf, for it is very hard to know the truth: when I ſay rigorous, I mean exact, and fearfull of miſ-deeming; As holy Job was, who ſaid, He was fearfull of all is actions. Holy David, but amongſt all, Saint Auguſtine doth more ſweetly complain of the miſery of man, not knowing his own diſpoſitions, and yet he was then forty years of age, when paſſions and heats of youth, which make this diſcuſſion harder, are generally ſettled. Beſides this, he muſt have this care, that he ſeek what the nature of the ſubject can yield, and not as thoſe Phyſicians, who when they have promiſed no leſs than immortality, can at laſt onely reach to ſome conſervation of health, or youth in ſome ſmall degree: So I could wiſh the Authour, to well aſſure himſelf firſt, that there is poſſible, an Infallibility, before he be too earneſt, to be contented with nothing leſs. For what if humane nature ſhould not be capable of ſo great a good, would he therefore think fitting to live without any Religion, becauſe he could not get ſuch a one as himſelf deſired, though with more than a man's wiſh? Were it not rational to ſee, whether amongſt Religions, ſome one hath not ſuch notable advantages over the reſt, as in reaſon it might ſeem, humane nature might be contented withall? Let him caſt his accompts with the deareſt things he hath, his own, or friends lives, his eſtate, his hope of poſterity, and ſee upon what terms of advantage he is ready to venture all theſe, and then return to Religion, and ſee whether, if he do not venture his ſoul upon the like, it be truly reaſon, or ſome other not confeſſed motive, which withdraweth him. For my own part, as I doubt not of an Infallibility, ſo I doubt not, but ſetting that aſide, there be thoſe excellencies found on the Catholick party, which may force a man to prefer it, and venture all he hath upon it, before all other Religions, and Sects in the world: Why then may not one, who after long ſearching findeth no Infallibility, reſt himſelf on the like, ſuppoſing man's nature affordeth no better?

Another thing may make a man's ſearch faulty, and is carefully to be looked unto, I mean, that it is eaſie for a man to miſtake himſelf, by too much confidence in himſelf or others. He that will make a judgement in an Art he is not Maſter in, if he be deceived, is to impute it unto himſelf. The Phraſe commandeth us to believe every man in his Art; he who knoweth and underſtandeth himſelf, believeth not. Therefore when we ſee Maſters in an Art, we are not skill'd in, oppoſe us, we may believe we are in the wrong: which will breed this reſolution in the Authour of the diſcourſe, that if himſelf be not skilled all thoſe ways in which he purſueth his ſearch, he muſt find himſelf obliged to ſeek Maſters, who be both well skilled, and (the matter being ſubject to faction) alſo very honeſt and upright men, or elſe he doth not quit himſelf before God and man.

I cannot part without one note more, which is, that it is not all one to incur damnation for infidelity, and to be in ſtate of Salvation. For the man to whom infidelity is not imputed, may be in ſtate of damnation, for other faults; as thoſe were, who having known God by his works, did not glorifie him as they ought: nay, they may be damned through want of Faith, and yet not be condemned for incredulity. As for example ſake, if when they have ſinned, they know not what means to take to have them forgiven, though they be without fault in not believing, nevertheleſs dying without remiſſion of ſin, they are not in ſtate to come to life everlaſting. As the man, who ſhould venture into a Wood without a guide, although he did his beſt to have a guide, nothing leſs might fall out of his way, as well as he, who neglected the taking of one; ſo if God ſent his Son to ſhew us the way of Salvation, and that be but one; as well is he like not to be ſaved, who never heard of ſuch a way, as he that heard of it, and neglected it; for neither of the two goeth that way; and who goes not on the way, is not like to come to the end. I known, God is good and mercifull; but I know his works, as far as we know, are diſpenſed by the order of ſecond cauſes; and where we ſee no ſecond cauſes, we cannot preſume of the effects. God is good and mercifull I know, and feedeth the Birds of the air, and much more men; yet we ſee in dearths and hard winters, both men and Birds to periſh, do they what they could to get victuals. And how am I aſſured he will ſend Angels to illuminate ſuch men as doe their endeavours, that their ſouls may not periſh? But far more do I doubt, whether ever man, who had not the way of Chriſt, or even of thoſe, who walked in it, did ever doe his beſt (except ſome few, and very few, perhaps not two of Chriſt his greateſt favourites,) and was not ſo culpable, that his perdition would not have been imputed unto himſelf. God of his mercy put us in the ſcore of thoſe, of whom he ſaith, He will take pity upon whom he pleaſeth, and compaſſion of them he pleaſeth.

THE

Lord of Faulkland's

REPLY.

SIR,

I Receive your intention to inſtruct me, for a great obligation; but I ſhould have eſteemed it a greater, if you would have pleaſed to let me know to whom I owe the Favour, and ſhould pay my thanks; and if you had not tranſlated the command of ſecreſie from proper to metaphorical Almes.

I am alſo to thank you (for in this Age we are beholding to them who doe what is fit) for not mixing Gall with your Inke; ſince I have ever thought that there ſhould be a little bitterneſs in a Treatiſe of Controverſie, as in a Love-letter, and that the contrary way was both void of Chriſtian charity, and humane wiſedom, as ſerving onely πρὸς τὸ πτοεῖσθαι τὴν θήραν, to fright away the game, and make their Adverſary unwilling to receive inſtruction from him, from whom they have received Injuries; and making themſelves unable to diſcover Truth (which Saint Auſtine ſays is hard for him to find who is calm, but impoſſible for him that is angry:) raiſing beſides a great ſuſpicion of ignorance in him that uſeth it; ſince it is a very true Rule which we have received from Hierocles, μέγα συντελεῖ πρὸς πραότητα τὸ τῆς ὑπεροψίας θάρσος, Confidence of knowledge conduceth much to meekneſs: Now in this I intend to take you for my pattern, and the ſame Authour for my Counſellour; καὶ δυνάμενος ἀνατρέπειν τὰ ψεύδη, and being able to overthrow what is falſe (for ſo muſt I think I can, and ſuch I muſt take your reaſons to be, as long as they perſwade me not) μήτε σοφιστῶς μήτε ὑβριστικῶς τοῦτο πείσῃ, σὺν πραότητι τὴν ἀλήθειαν διώκων, καὶ μετ' ἐυμενῶν ἐλέγχων τὸ ψεῦδος ἀναιρέπων, ἃ συγχωρῶν ἔστως ἔχειν ὡς λέγεται ἀλλ' ἀοργήτως ἀκούων, reſiſting Errours without Anger, and purſuing Truth with mildneſs.

Syneſius.

Now this I muſt profeſs for my ſelf, that ſince I conſidered any thing in Religion, and knew that there were ſeveral of them in the world, I never avoided to hear (at leaſt) any man that was willing to perſwade me by reaſon, that any of them was the true, μήτε πάντας λόγους καταδεχόμενος, ἵνα μὴ καὶ τοὺ ψεύδεις, μήτε πάντας ὑποβάλλων, ἵνα μὴ καὶ τοὺ ἀληθεῖς. Nay rather I have laid wait to meet with ſuch of all ſorts, as were moſt likely to ſay moſt on their ſide (as S. Chryſoſtome ſays of Abraham, that he did σαγηνεύειν τοὺ ξένους, lay nets for Gueſts) and though almoſt all that undertake the ſearch of ſo important a Truth, doe it better provided with ſharpneſs of wit, and ſolidity of judgement, yet I verily believe that few doe it with that indifference and equality which is fit for a Judge, and with which I both began and continue it.

Yet (leſt there might ſome un-markt prejudice lye lurking in me, and leſt I might harbour ſome ſecret inclination to thoſe Tenets which I had firſt been taught) I have ever lean'd, and ſet my Byas to the other ſide, and have both more diſcourſed of matters of Religion with thoſe of the Church of Rome than with their Adverſaries, and read more of their writings; though none either ſo often or ſo carefully, as this which I am now anſwering, both becauſe it was intended for my Inſtruction and confutation; as alſo becauſe the beauty of the ſtyle and language, in which you have apparrelled your conceptions (although.

Ovid. Metamorph.

——Non Hæc
Auxilio tibi ſunt, Decor eſt quæſitus ab iſtis, yet) ſhowes the Authour a conſiderable Perſon, and I may ſay of the ſplendour and outſide of what you have ſaid (for my opinion (that it wants ſolidity, and that the Logick of it is inferiour to the Rhetorick) is ſeen by my writing againſt it) what Tacitus ſays of Vitellius his Army, Phaleræ torqueſque ſplendebant, & non Vitellio principe dignus exercitus; for as he would have had that glorious Army been employed in the defence of a better and braver Prince, ſo I wiſh your eloquence had guilded the better cauſe; καὶ εἰθ' ὡς λωστοὺ τοιούτου ὢν φίλου ἡμῖν γένοιο. And (having learnt moreover from the Pagan Divinity of Hierocles (which in this is conformable to that of moſt Chriſtians) ἔοικε τὸ παρ' ἡμῖν σπουδαζόμενον ἐκτεινομένη χειρὶ πρὸς λῆψιν τῶν ἀγαθῶν, τότε παρὰ θεοῦ συντελούμενον χρηστὰ εἶναι, καὶ πηγὴ τῶν ἀγαθῶν. καὶ τὸ μὲ ἐκζητεῖν πυκνίναι τὰ ἀγαθὰ, τότε ἐκφαίνειν τὰ ζητούμενα ὀρθῶς, ἢ δὲ εὐχὴ ἱδρύειον εἶναι τοῦτο παρ' ἡμῖν ζητοῦσι, καὶ τὸ παρὰ τοῦ θεοῦ δόσεως, Xenophon Hiſt. 3.

that all our ſearch is but the ſtretching forth of our hands, and that our finding proceeds from God's delivering delivering the Truth unto us, and that prayer is the beſt means to joyn the latter to the former:) I have not onely with my utmoſt endeavours done my part; but alſo beſought God with my moſt earneſt fervency to doe his; and ſo ὡς εἶδος ἐπὶ ὕλῃ ἐυχὴν τῷ ἔργῳ συνάπτων, joyning Prayer to ſearch, like form to Matter, I doubt not but God who hath given me a will, to ſeek his Will, will alſo τὰ ἑαυτοῦ χωρηγεῖν ἀνέρματα: and if I have not the truth already, I ſhall be taught the truth by him, and by you as his Inſtrument, or ſhall be excuſed, if I find it not; aſſuring you that I was never more ready to part with my clothes when they were torn, than with my opinions when they were confuted, and appeared to me to be ſo. Euſeb. Orat. de Laud. Conſt.

To begin then with your Treatiſe, you can ſay nothing for Tradition, which I will not willingly allow, Scripture it ſelf being a Traditum, and by that way coming to our knowledge, (for I am confident that thoſe who would know it by the Spirit, run themſelves into the ſame Circle between Scripture and Spirit, out of which ſome of your ſide have but unſucceſsfully laboured to get out between Scripture and Church) but that this way which you propound ſhould be convenient to know what was Tradition at firſt, I can by no means agree. Which to conſider the better, I will comprehend all the ſtrength of what you have ſaid in a little room, and ſhut up your Oration into the compaſs of ſome 3. Syllogiſmes; thus you argue.

What company ſoever of Chriſtians alone pretend to teach nothing but what they have received from their Fathers, as received from theirs, as ſo come down from the Apoſtles, that company alone muſt hold the truth.

But that company of Chriſtians which are in communion with the Church of Rome onely pretend this,

Therefore they alone hold the truth, and the Church.

The Major you prove thus:

If ſuch a company of Chriſtians could teach falſhoods, then (ſince it is granted that what was at firſt delivered was true) ſome age muſt either have erred in underſtanding their Anceſtours, or have joyned to deceive their poſterity.

But neither of theſe are believeable,

Therefore neither is it believeable, that ſuch a company of Chriſtians ſhould teach falſhoods.

The Minor you prove thus; (I mean that they alone pretend it, for that they, I mean all they, pretend it, you take for granted.)

If it be incompatible with the Church of Romes doing it, that any elſe ſhould doe it, then ſhe does it alone.

But it is incompatible, (which is denyed, and not yet proved.)

Therefore ſhe doeth it alone.

The ſeveral parts of this Argument, I mean firſt to Anſwer; and ſecondly, Whatſoever lyes ſcatter'd in your diſcourſe any thing to this purpoſe, or any other unanſwer'd in the firſt part; and thirdly, I will reply to thoſe Anſwers which you have been pleaſed to make, to part of that Nothing which I writ, wiſhing that this laſt work might have been longer, I mean that by anſwering it all, and in order you had given me occaſion to have dwelt more upon my reply.

Now if I do not ſhew that all of the Church of Rome do not, nor cannot pretend this; that for two to pretend it, is not incompatible (as having been ſo heretofore) that thoſe who alone pretend this, may pretend it falſly; that ſome men, and in time all may miſtake their Anceſtours, and have a mind in ſome caſes to deceive their poſterity; and that it is not neceſſary for a whole age at once to joyn in doing it, though it be done; if, I ſay, I ſhew not this, then let me not bee believed; and if you can ſhew me that I have not ſhewed it, I will promiſe to believe you.

Firſt, That the Church of Rome doth not, nor cannot pretend, that all their doctrine was received by them from their fathers as come down from the Apoſtles, it appears, becauſe when queſtions have riſen about ſuch things, whereof there was before no ſpeech, yet if a Council have determined them, they are received with the ſame aſſent, as if they had come from the Apoſtles; and they profeſs now the ſame readineſs to receive always any ſuch definition, though about a queſtion now unknown; and it is likely, they have done what they profeſs they are ready to doe; at leaſt, they ſhew, that yours is not the ground upon which they build. And I pray ask your ſelf, whether thoſe that teach the common people, (who are the greateſt part of your Church) uſe to be askt about it by them, or uſe to tell them, that this they received from their Fathers, as deſcended from the Apoſtles, by a continual verbal Tradition. For ſuppoſe they told them, that [this Tradition tells us] yet they are not able to diſtinguiſh between ſuch as is but Eccleſiaſtical, and Apoſtolical, or whether this be known to them onely by deductions, or from ancient books, and no ſuch uncontinued line of teaching, and not rather perſwade them in general to believe it, what by Arguments drawn from Scripture, what from reaſon, what from Fathers, Councils, or Decretals? I am not certain what is their courſe, but I am ſure, the moſt ordinary amongſt the Ancients (whom they pretend to follow) was, that when they had told the people, that ſuch a propoſition was true, they added [neither is it I that ſay ſo, but the Apoſtle, the Prophet, or the Evangeliſt] and mentioned the place, where they thought ſuch a doctrine was included; ſeldom ſpeak of any verbal Tradition (leſs of ſuch a one, upon which you wholly rely) except urg'd to it, when that was impudently claim'd by ſome Heretick; and when they did (as the Aſian Biſhops about Eaſter, Juſtin Martyr about the age of Chriſt, Saint Auſtine about communicating Infants, Papias and Irenæus about the doctrine of the Chiliaſts) then (as Lucian tells us, that when that Jugler Alexander ſent to a City a Verſe to be ſet upon their doors, to keep away the Plague, thoſe houſes which uſed the remedy, were more viſited than thoſe that did not ſo) thoſe doctrines which the Fathers did grace by writing verbal Tradition in their foreheads, were not leſs (perhaps more) apt to be after disbelieved, than the other which were not in that kind taught.

Now if the Ignorant be not expreſly inſtructed, that upon this ground they are to think that true, which they are bid to believe (eſpecially where their religion is eaſily enough received, onely for being that of their Country) you muſt allow, that the greateſt part of your Church cannot, nor does not pretend, to have received all they believe under that Notion; and to know they did, you must have spoken with them all, or have heard them all instructed; for what is in some places so taught, may be delivered upon other grounds in the very next Parishes.

From the Ignorant let us come to the learned, and see whether they do not both believe more, and require more to be believed, than hath had any such pedigree as you imagine. First then, the great, eloquent, and judicious Cardinal Perron, (whom I prefer so much before all those of his side that have been Authours, that [if a Pigmy may be allowed to measure Giants] I should think that the vast learning and industry of Bellarmine, and Baronius, might with most advantage to their party, and no disgrace to them, have been employ'd in seeking quotations for his large and monstrous understanding to have employ'd them) he, I say, tells us, (and not from himself, but from Saint Austine) that the Trinity, Pennance, Free-will, and the Church, were never exactly disputed of, before the Arians, the Novatians, the Pelagians, and the Donatists. Now (since without doubt the former ages disputed as well as they could, and so could not instruct their Proselytes, better than they confuted their Adversaries) I think it evident, that more hath since been concluded, than came from Tradition, and that the way you speak of, appeared not sufficient, either to Cardinal Perron, or Saint Austine. But because Bellarmine (being written in a more general language) is more generally (though, I think unjustly) esteemed than Perron, I will ask you a question of him, when he excuseth Pope John the 22*d.* for denying, that Saints enjoy the beatifical vision before the day of judgment (in which he was lead by a Troop of Fathers) because the Church had not then defined the contrary; did Bellarmine believe, that then Christians had received from their Fathers, as from the Apostles, a direct contrary Tradition to his doctrine? If he did, how could he think the Pope, either possibly to be ignorant of it, or excusable, if he stood against it? If not, then he thought our Age beholding to our Fathers, for finding out some truths, which had no such line to come down by; nay, which the Apostles either taught not, or but obscurely, and so as needs Arguments to deduce it out of their writings; at least, not so generally, but that a Pope, and many more chief Doctours of the Church, knew not they had done so, (although you often put us in mind, that Tertullian tells us, how in that Church which he governed, the Apostles poured out all their doctrines with their bloud) and in his time, Fathers taught not their children so: And this objection lies against you, as often as any of your side confess any of the Ancients (accompted Orthodox) to have delivered any doctrine, contrary to that of the now Church of Rome, which many of them often confess, and you your selves do not deny: for that they could not have done, if an uninterrupted verbal Tradition had been then the onely rule of true doctrine, and they had known it to be so (for then they had a way of information, which you must confess easie, since they might soon have known, whether generally, Christians had been taught the contrary, under such a Notion, and in such a degree, as you speak of) or the Church of Rome had not since, either deviated from the tradition of one part, or introduced on the other.

But because you know, that the claim of Tradition could not serve your Churches turn, if any other different from yours made the same; you therefore affirm, that none doth, and prove it, because two cannot doe it; and in this you must give me leave to say, that you imitate the Philosopher, who made Arguments against Motion, though one walked before him; for though we see that the Greek Church does it as much as the Roman, (though apt to be deceived in the doing it, by the same ways) yet you hope to perswade us beyond our eyes, by a reason, which indeed ends in an assertion: for, I pray, why may not two companies of Christians, both pretend to such a Tradition, (though opposing each other) as well as the Asian Churches and the Roman did long together, about the celebration of Easter? But not onely that it may be so, but that it is so, you may find by Hieremy, Nilus, and Barlaam (who profess to stand to the Scriptures, the ancient Tradition of their Fathers, and the seven first general Councils, and they can be disprov'd no way; but by the same you may be so too) over and above the confessions of your own men.

But suppose you did pretend, and alone pretend to such a Tradition, yet you might falsely do it: for I desire you to remember, that the Apostles delivered, as well Writings as verbal Doctrine; and whatsoever the first ages thought to be contained there, that they might as well deliver to their posterity, as taught them by the Apostles, as what they received by word of mouth; since we use to say, I learnt this of such a man, when we mean from his book; and though you strive to joyn verbal Tradition in commission with Scripture, yet sure none of you can desire to thrust Scripture out quite from being at least a part of the Rule. Now that they might erre in interpreting their writings (and an errour in the cheifest then, might easily cause a general one since) I think you will not deny, especially since to say, that they left by Tradition every place of Scripture interpreted, would be an evidently false assertion: for how could the Fathers then have written upon it such differently-expounding Comments?

Secondly, How shall it appear, that there were not once two contrary Traditions claimed by two Parts (as the Asian Church, and the Roman, whereof both, it seems, claim'd a direct verbal Tradition, because one pretended to have received theirs from Saint John, and the other, from Saint Peter, whereof there is no word in their works) and that the erring Part did not prevail? We know, out of the fifth of Eusebius History, that the fore-runners * of Paulus Samosat. laid claim to Tradition, and nam'd the very Pope, that had chang'd the doctrine at Rome; which claim (how impudently soever) yet shews, that men might joyn to deceive their Posterity, as pretending to a Tradition, when there was no such; for, if you say those were but few, I answer, both that you are not certain of their number, and since so many may joyn, I pray, what number is it cannot?

v. Euseb. l. 5. c. 28.

Thirdly, Since you must and do confess, [that some Doctrines, which were not once generally witnessed to have been delivered by the Apostles, are now Doctrines of Faith (as the Epistle to the Hebrews was rejected by the Roman Church in Saint Hierom's time, though to her, ye use to say, that Irenaeus would have every Church agree, and though Saint Hierom, whom you would prove to have thought thought Damaſus infallible, when it is known, that he thought Liberius a Heretick, received it for all that) becauſe you ſay, that theſe doctrines had ſo much Tradition as was exceptione major, beyond exception, (though the Church of Rome thought not ſo then;) doth not this reſt upon the Logick of thoſe Ages, to conclude what Teſtimony is ſo? which might eaſily deceive them, eſpecially ſince you confeſs alſo, that particular Traditions may be falſe (as you inſtance in the Chiliaſts) and yet the ſame reaſon, which perſwaded ſome to receive them, may perſwade more and more in ſeveral times (and ſo no age need to joyn, as you ſuppoſe) and ſo a falſe Tradition may grow a general one; as it ſeems that of the Chiliaſts (if it be one) did, ſo general, that Juſtin Martyr ſayes, in his time all Orthodox Chriſtians held it.

Beſides, in thoſe things which were believed very convenient, and which yet it was fear'd, that unleſs men thought them neceſſary, they would be backward to practiſe, in reſpect of the contrariety of them to their diſpoſitions, (as confeſſion) how eaſie was it for them to be after taught, under pain of more danger, than at firſt they were delivered with? as Phyſicians often tell their Patients, unleſs they take ſuch a Potion, from which they are very averſe, they muſt unavoidably die, though the not taking of it (even in their own opinions) would but make them leſs likely to recover. Some of great authority (moved by a good meaning) might thus deceive others; theſe, thus deceived, might deceive others; till being generally ſpread, other good men, being loath to oppoſe them for the ſame reaſon, for which others deſir'd to ſpread them, (as we ſaw Eraſmus, who believed your confeſſion not to have been inſtituted by the Apoſtles, yet would not reprehend them that ſaid ſo, thinking it an errour that would increaſe Piety) they be at laſt taken to have been commanded, by the Apoſtles, without contradiction.

Indeed all the ways, by which I ſhewed in that paper, which you vouchſafed to anſwer (which I deſire not to repeat, to avoid both your being wearied, and my own, ἐχθές γε μὲν ἴσην ἄνδρὶ ἀειζήλως εἰρημένα μυθολογεῖν,) that errours might come to be general; all thoſe are ways, by which the ſame errours might come to be thought to have proceeded from Tradition. Saint Auſtin, and Tertullian, agreeing in the ſenſe of the ſentence, which we read in the latter, * Si legem nuſquam reperio, ſequitur ut Traditio conſuetudini morem hunc dederit, habiturum quandoque Apoſtoli authoritatem ex interpretatione rationis; and it is the more ſtrange that Tertullian ſhould allow any cuſtom the authority of coming from the Apoſtles, ſince in the ſame place, he gives any man leave to begin a cuſtom, ſo it be good (which depends upon his reaſon, as the reception of it does upon theirs that follow him) and ſo make it a cuſtom, in theſe words. Annon putas licere omni fideli concipere, & conſtituere, duntaxat, quod Deo congruat, quod diſciplinæ conducat, quod ſaluti proficiat, dicente Domino cur non & vobis ipſis quod juſtum eſt judicatis? By which it ſeems, he was willing, more ſhould be believ'd than was firſt taught; and when that way had brought in any thing (for there is the ſame reaſon of opinion, as of actions) and made it common, then the former Rule ſerves to rivet it in, under the falſe Notion of coming from the Apoſtles, or having at leaſt equal authority; neither can you except againſt this, as ſaid by him when he was a Montaniſt, ſince your ſide uſeth to brag of this, and the like places, as making for them. * De Corona.

To explain my meaning the fuller, give me leave to conſider one queſtion, which ſhall be, the Immaculate conception of the Bleſſed Virgin: In the firſt ages it is a thing granted, that many Fathers believed her, not onely not free from Original ſin, but not even from Actual; after this ſecond queſtion came to be more conſidered, and this firſt to be defin'd; but yet thoſe of the Affirmative opinion, cannot but grant to thoſe of the Negative, that many Fathers ſided with them (or elſe they were impudent Quoters, who claim three hundred) nay, even in Saint Thomas his time, they confeſs, that the Negative opinion was the more common doctrine; and yet ſee I pray, how things are altered? We have now a Hiſtory of ſome Treaties, of two Kings of Spain with two Popes, by two Embaſſadours to perſwade them to define the Affirmitive. The Hiſtory is written by one Wadding an Iriſh-man, his Secretary; there I find, that the Biſhop of Carthage, (having Order from the Embaſſadour his Maſter, to deſire, to preſs, nay almoſt to tear a Definition from his Holineſs about it) tells him (and not falſly) that thoſe who hold the Negative are, Inter Catholicos ſoli & pauci unius inſtituti viri, & unus & alter ab illis edocti, but a few of one onely Order, and one or two of their Diſciples. His Maſter bids him urge for the contrary, The opinion and ſubſcription of ſo many Prelates Orders and Univerſities, the univerſal acclamation of the People, the weighty neceſſity of cutting off ſcandals; nay ſaith he, many Univerſities ſuffer none to take Degrees, without making a Vow for the Defence of the Immaculate conception; and for the Oppugners, Conſtat eos ſentire aliter, quam univerſa docet Eccleſia, they differ from the Doctrine of the Univerſal Church: If then an opinion for which nothing is to be ſaid out of Antiquity, and much againſt it, which was even lately, the leſs common opinion, could grow to be held by ſo great a multitude in ſo high a degree, in ſo ſhort a time, that the much greater part of the Church ſhould now preſs to have it defin'd, and that ſo earneſtly, that to remove the oppoſing Fathers out of the way, they make a confeſſion very advantageous to us Hereticks, that many things have been defin'd by their Church againſt many Fathers; you may eaſily ſee, that Opinions may grow very general, nay grow to claim Tradition in one Age, that were unknown in another; for that they claim and prove onely becauſe of the general reception in all Apoſtolical Churches, not of any ſuch uninterrupted teſtimony of Fathers to their Children, that ſo it hath been taught in all Ages.

You may ſee then, that all your Church goes not upon your grounds; ſince if they did ſo, many of it that ſtand for the Affirmitive, muſt pretend to them, and if they do, then ſure the Pope muſt have confeſſed them to be witneſſes beyond exception, and would accordingly have defin'd; if they do not, then this certain way of yours, cannot keep falſe opinions out of a Church, which makes not that their Rule.

You may alſo ſee, that opinions firſt unknown, after but particular, may come not onely to be general, and to have Tradition claim'd for them, but even to be defin'd; ſince if a General Council ſhould ſhould now meet about this point, it is plain (without God's immediate working to the contrary, of which you ſpeak not) which would be defined; nay, I am confident, that as it is obſerved of the Romans that they were twice as long in firſt conquering Italy, as (after) all the world; and as my Lord Bacon tells us of one who was wont to ſay, That he had firſt with much pains gotten a little eſtate, and after with little a great one; ſo it is a much more ſhort, and eaſie work, to bring this to a Definition, than it was before to bring it thus far on the way towards one.

Which if it were brought (it being already almoſt defined, and ready to topple into a Doctrine neceſſary to ſalvation, the contrary being forbidden to be either printed or publickly taught) then (if you forſake not your Religion) you muſt forſake the Principle, and joyn with Turnbull, who tells us, That the Churches ſupreme definition of matters of Faith, is the infallible word of God, and together with the ancient Revelation made to the Prophets and Apoſtles, makes up one Object, wich is to be held by the Catholick Faith: By which it is plain, he thinks more may be reveal'd (and then muſt be held) than was to the Apoſtles and (by conſequence) could be delivered by them, which is contrary to what you now ſay.

And indeed the current of Writers of your own ſide either knew not this opinion and Argument of yours, or conſideringly balk it; elſe they might ſave themſeves and their Readers the labour of writing, and reading ſuch infinite Quotations: for though they ſpeak often of Tradition, yet they think themſelves bound to prove it better than by the pretence of your preſent Church; they pretend to receive it from the Ancient Writers, (not, ſay they, that verbal Tradition hath in all Ages been taught to all men, to teach it their children, and that it never ſlept,) and you are the firſt whom I have met with, who build upon this; Indeed they know the Greeks have as much claim to ſuch a one (in truth to any) as they, and if they ſhould ſay with you, that it is incompatible for two to have it, the Greeks may as well argue upon thoſe grounds, that the Romans claim it not, becauſe they do, as the Romans can, that the Greeks lay no claim to it, becauſe their Church does. And indeed direct experience ſhews that this is not, nor hath always been the ground of Chriſtians; that it is not (even amongſt you) we ſee by thoſe multitudes who cry out to have a Doctrine defined; which is ſo far from having any Tradition, (much leſs your kind of one for it,) that they labour with little ſucceſs to ſhew that there is none againſt them, and make it plainly appear, that upon your grounds they build not, but prove out of Metaphorical places of Scripture, ſome at moſt but probable reaſons, and the Revelations of S. Bridget, which are contradicted by thoſe of S. Katharine, (ſo ill do your Saints agree in heaven, that me thinks, we may be forgiven, if we have ſome differences upon earth:) That this hath not been always the way, we ſee by the example of Origen, who having been eſteemed by all Chriſtians, as almoſt a Prophet, no man in his time diſcovering that he taught contrary to what their Fathers had taught them, was yet condemned many years after his deceaſe, and his followers counted Hereticks, by the name of Origeniſta, which had been impoſſible, if the following Ages had thought Tradition the onely fit Rule to judge by, and accompted nothing Tradition, but what they received from their Fathers in expreſs terms: But if the opinions of Doctours, counted the Gnomons and Canons of Truth (for to that purpoſe ſpeaks Nazianzen of Athanaſius, and Saint Auſtin of Nazianzene, and Pope Pius the fifth of Saint Thomas, calling his doctrine, the certaineſt rule of Chriſtian religion, a title deny'd to Scripture) the definitions of Councils, counted the higheſt Tribunals upon earth, aſſiſted by the power of Emperours, which might doe much, when almoſt all were under one (as may be ſeen by the multitude which followed Conſtantine, to Chriſtinaity, and Julian from it, and by Conſtantius (as is complain'd) ἐν ὀφθαλμῷ στρεβλῷ, in the twinckling of an eye, transforming an Orthodox world into an Arian) if theſe ways, I ſay, might make a Tenet general, though no Tradition had come down at all concerning it; and after, it pleaſe to claim by a Tenure, by which it came not in at firſt, encouraged by ſome Rule of ſome Fathers to that purpoſe (as ſome Frenchmen ſay of Cardinal Richelieu, that ſince he had that title, he claims to have come from better Anceſtours, than he aimed at, being an ordinary Perſon; and Henry the ſeventh, though he came to the Crown by his Wives right, yet would hold it by his own) and none after oppoſe that claim, ſome not doing it, becauſe they think the opinion true, and then care not though it be believ'd upon falſe inducements, ſome as being ignorant that ever it was leſs general (which before the late and happy reſurrection of learning, the beſt read Perſons of their time might often be) how deceiving a way is yours, to diſcover what all ages have thought, by what now a part of the preſent teacheth, upon what pretence ſoever? which when you have conſidered, and not onely, that what I have ſaid may be, but by ſeveral examples (whereof I will touch ſome) that ſo it is, and hath been, then I hope you will be ſo far from expecting that I ſhould be moved by your Arguments, that your ſelf will wonder that ever you were.

Wadding p. 334. Vincent. Le. Wadd. Pag. 282.

Firſt then, that the Chiliaſts are Hereticks, or your Church not infallible, which counts them ſo, is moſt certain, and moſt plain; and if you be in the right, and that ſhe teacheth nothing, but what ſhe hath received uninterruptedly down from the Apoſtles, then they muſt always have been eſteemed ſo by Chriſtians; whereas their doctrine is ſo far from having any Tradition againſt it, that if any opinion, whether controverted, or uncontroverted (except that Scripture which never was doubted) may without bluſhing pretend to have that for it, it muſt be this of theirs. My Reaſons are theſe:

The Fathers of the pureſt Ages (who were the Apoſtles Diſciples but once remov'd) did teach this, as receiv'd from them, who profeſſed to have receiv'd it from the Apoſtles, and who ſeem'd to them witneſſes beyond exception, that they had done ſo, they being better Judges what credit they deſerv'd, than after-comers could poſſibly be.

All other opinions, witneſſed by any other Ancients to have Tradition, may have been by them miſtaken to haye been ſo, out of Saint Auſtin's and Tertullian's rules: whereas for this, and for this alone, are delivered the very words, which Chriſt us'd when he taught it.

Of the moſt glorious and leaſt infirm building, which ever, in my opinion, was erected to the honour honour of the Church of Rome, Cardinal Perron was the Architect (I mean his book againſt King James) and that relyes upon theſe two pillars, that whatſoever all the Fathers (he means, ſure, that are extant) witneſs to be Tradition, and the doctrine of the Church, that muſt be receiv'd for the doctrine of thoſe ages, and ſo reſted upon: If theſe rules be not concluding, then the whole book being built upon them, neceſſarily becomes as inconſiderable for what he intended it, as Bevis or Tom Thumb: If they be, then this doctrine, which is now heretical in your Churches belief, was the opinion of the Ancient Church. For if being taught by the Fathers of any Age, none contradicting it, be ſufficient, this all for above two Ages (and thoſe the firſt) teach, not any Father oppoſing it before Dionyſius Alexandrinus (250, years after Chriſt at leaſt) that we know, or Saint Hierome, or Saint Auſtine knew and quoted: wherein I note, beſides, that both theſe Fathers, either thought that no ſign of the opinion of the Church, or cared not though it were.

And if Fathers ſpeaking as witneſſes will ſerve, let Papias and Irenæus be heard, and believ'd, who tell us, it came to them from Chriſt by Verbal Tradition, and Juſtine Martyr, who witneſſeth that in his time all Orthodox Chriſtians held it, and joyns the oppoſers with them who denyed the Reſurrection, and eſteems them among the Chriſtians like the Sadduces among the Jews: which proves, that you have the ſame reaſon expalleſcere audito. Eccleſiæ nomine, to grow pale at the mention of the Ancient Church, (the neareſt to the Apoſtles) as we have to ſtart at that of two hundred years ago, and to be aſham'd of your Dionyſius Alexandrinus, as we of Luther: Thus that great Atlas of your Church hath helpt us to pull it down the ſame ways, by which he intended to ſupport it, and though he have beſt of any undergone the burthen of proving that to be infallible, which is falſe, yet he muſt have confeſt, that either theſe are not proofs, or they prove againſt himſelf. And this advantage we have, that unleſs you prove your own infallibility (which you will never be able to do) in what point ſoever you confute us, that falls like a Pinacle without carrying all after it; whereas if we diſprove any one of your Religion, we diſprove conſequently that infallibility, which is the foundation of it all: ſo that (like them who uſe poiſon'd weapons) whereſoever we wound, we kill, but we are like thoſe creatures, which muſt be killed all over, or elſe their other parts will remain alive. Camp.

Neither muſt you think that you have anſwer'd the Chiliaſts, by tying them to the Carpocratians and the Gnoſticks, (which is but like Mezentius his joyning Mortua corpora vivis, dead bodies to the living) ſince the opinions of the two latter, aſſoon as they were taught, made the teachers accounted Hereticks, and were oppos'd by almoſt all, whereas that of the firſt, found in above two ages, no reſiſtance by any one known and eſteemed Perſon, and the teachers of it were not onely parts, but principal ones of the Catholick Church, and ſuch as ever have been, and are reputed Saints; though, by I know not what ſubtilty, you diſpence with your ſelves for departing from what doctrine was received from them as come down from the Apoſtles, and yet threaten us with damnation if we will not believe more improbable Tenets to be Tradition upon leſs Certificate. For as Ariſtotle ſaith τὰ ὄντως μεγάλα ἃ μὲ ὠνοῦνται μέζω, ἃ δὲ πωλοῦσιν ἐλάττω, Wine meaſures to buy with, are great, and to ſell by, are ſmall; ſo when you are to put a doctrine to us, how ſmall a meaſure of Tradition would you have us take? one place of one Father, ſpeaking but as a Doctour, ſeems enough: but when you are to receive any from us, how large and mighty a meaſure will yet give you no ſatisfaction? Neither can I find out what it is by which you conclude, that their Tradition was gathered the Heretical way from private diſcourſe with the Apoſtles: Irenæus indeed tells us, that Presbyteri meminerunt, one of which Papias was; but not a word, that it was deliver'd in ſecret, or the auditours but few, nor that others had not heard other diſciples teaching the ſame doctrine; and me-thinks that if you had evinced what you deſire (as you ſeem to me not to do, unleſs to affirm be to prove) it would make more againſt you; ſure if from ſo ſmall a ground as the word of one onely diſciple, that he in private diſcourſe was taught this by the Apoſtles, a falſe doctrine could ſo generally be received by all the firſt Doctours of the Chriſtian Church; and that, ſo long after Dionyſius Alexandrinus had uſed his great Authority to deſtroy it, Saint Hierome was yet half afraid to write againſt it, as ſeeing how many Catholicks he ſhould enrage againſt himſelf by it, as he teſtifies in his proeme to the eighteenth Book of his Comment upon Iſaiah; what ſuſpicions muſt this raiſe in the minds of thoſe of your own party, leſt what they eſteemed Tradition, had at firſt no greater a beginning, and no firmer foundation, but onely better fortune; for why might not the ſame diſciple have cozen'd them from whom their belief is deſcended in twenty other things, as well as in this? and why not twenty others as well as he? eſpecially ſince you confeſs ſome of your doctrine not to have had Univerſal Tradition, but onely Tradition enough; which if thoſe Fathers did not think they had had, for this, they would never have receiv'd it, but have excepted againſt the Heretical way of their delivery, if they had known that to be a private one, and a private one to be ſuch; and if they were ſo deceived in this way, might not they, and more have been ſo too in other points, and in time all? Ethicks.

If you ſay (as it hath been ſaid to me by one whoſe judgment I value, as much as any one of your Party) that if this opinion had indeed had Tradition, it could never have been ſo totally extinguiſh'd. I anſwer, that I affirm not, that it had, but onely that if the rules of your part be good and valid, then it had; I am ſure it hath better colour to plead upon, than any of thoſe other doctrines, which you impoſe upon us: Beſides, although it had, yet when Doctours of great authority with the people, had won upon many, firſt not to think it Tradition, and then not true, and laſtly their courage encreaſing with their multitude, (for Saint Hierome durſt not call it) had made it accounted an Hereſie, it is not ſtrange that none ſhould riſe to oppoſe it; for by that time, burning was come in faſhion, which was a ready way to anſwer all objections, and end all controverſies; eſpecially Piety being grown more cold, and ſo, men leſs apt to ſuffer for opinions, and the times more ignorant, and ſo men leſs able to examine what had been believed before them. But you who affirm, that your Church receives nothing, but what hath come to her by Verbal Tradition down from the Apoſtles, muſt not onely deſtroy the Arguments, which prove this to have had Tradition (which you, or any elſe will be never able to do) but muſt affirm, that the contrary hath ſuch; which yet their moſt ancient oppoſers never pretended to, but ſcoft at the opinion as ridiculous and ſavouring of Judaiſm, which as wiſe men, and as good Chriſtians, as they, before them believed to be Orthodox.

Let us next conſider that controverſie which more afflicted the Church, and for a longer time than any other, that between the Arians and their Adverſaries, and let us ſee, whether even againſt
Lib. Con. R. Jac. Pag. 633. thoſe there were any ſuch Tradition as you ſpeak of. Firſt then I pray mark what Cardinal Perron confeſſeth, that an Arian will be deſirous to have his cauſe tried by thoſe Authours we now have, which lived before the queſtion aroſe; for there, ſaith he, will be found, the Son is the inſtrument of his Father. The Father commanded the Son, when things were to be made, the Father and the Son are aliud & aliud, which who ſhould at this day ſay, now the language of the Church is better examin'd, would be accompted an Arian. Now though there be no reaſon for you to disbelieve ſo learned a Prelate in a matter of fact (eſpecially ſince ὅτι ὁ μάρτυς) yet if you pleaſe to reconſider thoſe Authours ſeriouſly, if you have not mark't it before (as Prejudication blinds extremely) you will then confeſs it; Sure then if Fathers in the firſt ages taught their Children, that ſo they had receiv'd from theirs, as the doctrine of the Apoſtles, how could the chief Pillars of Chriſtianity have been ignorant of it? or if they knew it, how would they ever have written ſo directly againſt their knowledge? For that anſwer which Saint Hierome gives (as Saint Auſtine to the Pelagians) that before Arius aroſe, the Eccleſiaſtical Writers ſpoke minus caute, with leſs circumſpection, though it brings ſome ſalve to the preſent objection, yet it is a weapon againſt Tradition in general; for if through want of care the beſt and wiſeſt men us'd to contradict Tradition, (as you muſt grant they did) then ſure much more likely, when they taught by word of mouth, when leſs care is always us'd, than in Books; and how then can any age be ſure, that by this reaſon (of minus caute loquuti ſunt) their Anceſtours have not miſtaken their Fathers, and miſlead their Poſterity? Look but into Athanaſius, and ſee but what he anſwers to what is brought againſt him out of Dionyſius Alexandrinus; truly in my opinion, when he ſtrives to make it Catholick Doctrine, he doeth it with no leſs pulling, and halling, than Sancta Clara uſeth to agree the articles of the Engliſh Church with the Tenets of the Roman. Conſider what eighty Biſhops, and thoſe Orthodox, decreed againſt Paulus Samoſatenus, and if you make it conſent with Athanaſius his Creed, I ſhall believe that you have diſcover'd a way how to reconcile both Parts of a Contradiction: This I ſay, not as intending by it to prove the Arian opinion to be true, but that the contrary Party inſiſted not upon your grounds, but drew their belief out of Scripture; for if there had been ſuch a common and conſtant Verbal Tradition, the chief Chriſtians would not through want of Caution have contradicted it, neither could Conſtantine, if it had been then as known a Part of the Chriſtian Religion, as Chriſt's Reſurrection, have ever ſo ſlightly eſteemed the Queſtion, when it firſt aroſe, neither would Alexander the Biſhop of Alexandria have remain'd any while in ſuſpence, as Sozomen ſaith he did, τὰ μὲν τοῦτος τὰ δὲ ἐκεῖνος ἐφρόνουν: but this being then a Queſtion newly ſtarted and ſpoken of before but by Accidents, and ſo peradventure minus caute, (for the ſame Authour ſays, that they did ἄχρι εἰς ζήτησιν τὰ παράτολμον ἀνεξέτασα) they were therefore fain to try it by Scripture, (eſteeming Written Tradition, as ſufficient a Rule, as Verbal) as you may ſee by Conſtantine's own words at Theodoret. the Council of Nice, εὐαγγελικαὶ βίβλοι καὶ ἀποστολικαὶ, καὶ περὶ παλαιῶν θεοπνεύστων τὰ διαπρέποντα σαφῶς ἡμᾶς, πῶς χρὴ περὶ τῆς θείας φρονεῖν, ἐκπαιδεύουσι, ἐκ περὶ ἀσυνέτων ἐν λόγων λαβόντες τὰς ζητουμένας τῆς λύσιν. The Books of the Evangeliſts, and the Apoſtles, and the Oracles of the Ancient Prophets teach us clearly what we are to think of the Divinity. Let us therefore out of theſe Divinity-inſpir'd diſcourſes, ſeek the ſolutions of our Queſtions, which being the Emperours Propoſition, and paſſing uncontradicted (which the Biſhops would not have ſuffer'd it to do, if they had known yours to be ſo much the beſt, and moſt certain way, and this ſo hazardous as you ſuppoſe) we have reaſon to believe that they, for want of your direction, made the Scripture their Rule, and ſought out for Truth by the ſame way, that we damnable Hereticks do, and by that condemn'd the Arians, as not having ſuch a Tradition as you ſpeak of, (or if they had, which is very unlikely) counting it ſo inſufficient, as that they were not to conclude by that. Neither did onely that ancient, (and not yours) Council, but even your own Modern ones ſhew, that they went upon other grounds; ſince to have had every Biſhop askt what he receiv'd from his Teachers, as receiv'd from theirs, as come down from the Apoſtles, would ſure have been the ſhorteſt way to find Truth; and if they had thought it the beſt too, it would have ſav'd the Friers at Trent many a long diſpute out of Scripture, Fathers and Reaſon, and the Biſhops many a weary Seſſion before any thing could be determined, or the Parties brought to agree. Beſides there is another reaſon (if I may be pardon'd a little inſiſting upon my digreſſion) which perſwades me that your own Councils define not upon your grounds, (that is) becauſe ſuppoſe a thouſand Catholick Biſhops meet and define any thing, yet we know it is not among you believ'd de Fide, without it be confirmed by the Pope; which ſhews plainly enough, that you think not, they went by ſuch a Tradition, ſince of that eighty, ſo many perſons from ſo many ſeveral Parts are witneſſes beyond exception, according to your own grounds, and that their Infallibility is not thought to depend upon an Impoſſibility; that (in the matter of Fact, what hath been taught under that Notion) they ſhould either deceive, or be deceiv'd, but upon an infallible aſſiſtance of the Holy Ghoſt, which may be wanting to any company, whereof the Pope is no part, or of whoſe decrees he is no confirmer.

Now to return to my proofs, that againſt the Arians there was no ſuch Tradition as you ſpeak of, (at leaſt, that was the ground upon which they were condemned) conſider, if you pleaſe, that in that Epiſtle which Euſebius of Ceſarea writ to ſome Arians after the Council of Nice, he ſaith, Firſt, that they aſſented to the word ὁμοούσιον, Conſubſtantial, becauſe alſo they knew τῶν παλαιῶν λογίων τινὰς καὶ ἐπιφανεῖς ἐπισκόπους, καὶ συγγραφεῖς, ſome eloquent and illuſtrious Biſhops and Writers had us'd the Term:

In

In which I note, that neither claim'd he any ſuch Verbal Tradition for this, as you ſpeak of; and of that ſort which he claim'd, he names onely τίνας ſome, as knowing too many had writ otherwiſe to give ſuch a Tradition leave to be general.

Secondly, He ſaith, they conſented to Anathematize the Contradictors, διὰ τὸ ἀπόῤῥητον ἀγράφοις χρῆσθαι φωναῖς, to hinder men from uſing unwritten words, by which he ſaith (and that truly) that all confuſion hath come upon the Church. And if it be askt, why the ſame reaſon made them not keep out the word ὁμοούσιος, I anſwer, That I believe (or elſe he is not conſtant to his own reaſon) that he meant onely thoſe words to be unwritten, which were in Scripture, neither themſelves, nor equivalently, whereas he took ὁμοούσιος to be in the Scripture in the latter ſenſe: And that by written, he meant in the Scripture onely, appears by what follows, that no divinely-inſpired writing (μηδεμίαν θεοπνεύστου γραφῆς) uſing the Arians Phraſe, it was neither fitting to ſay nor teach them: Neither can you ſay that Euſebius being himſelf a ſecret Arian prevaricated herein; for Theodoret makes this epiſtle an Argument againſt them, which he would not have done, if either it had ſeem'd to him to ſay any thing contrary to the Catholick doctrine, or not to have oppos'd the contrary by a Catholick way, at leaſt without giving his leader ſome Caution concerning it.

All which reaſons move me to think, that the generality of Chriſtians had not been always taught the contrary to Arius's doctrine, but ſome one way, others the other, moſt neither, as having been onely ſpoken of upon occaſions; and therefore me thinks you had better either ſay with the Proteſtants, that the Truth was concluded (as Conſtantine ſaid it ſhould be) by Arguments from Scripture, or (as ſome of your own ſay of other points) that before the Council it lay in Archivis Eccleſiæ, in the Desks of the Church, than claim ſuch a Tradition for it, as appears it can never be defended that it had.

Let us conſider but two opinions more:

That Infants are not to receive the Euchariſt, is now both the doctine and practice of the Roman Church; but ſix hundred years the Church us'd it; Saint Auſtine accounted it neceſſary, at leaſt in ſome ſenſe of the word, if not abſolutely (which laſt is moſt likely, becauſe from the neceſſity of that which could not be receiv'd but by them who had received Baptiſm, he, and Innocentius a Pope, prove the neceſſity of Baptiſm) and an Apoſtolical Tradition. If therefore both theſe Ages had one by your Rule, how comes this difference between their opinions, the Sacrament being the ſame it was, and the Children the ſame they were?

This I may conſider, and ſee if the ſame way that this Doctrine hath been altered, whether any other might not have received change?

Next, that Saints are invocable, you muſt ſay, is Tradition taught from Father to Son, as deriv'd from the Apoſtles, if you will be conſtant to your own principle; now though I might diſprove this, firſt by the many Fathers that believed, the juſt not to be admitted to the Beatifical viſion before the day of judgement (for upon this, your ſide now grounds that) but to be kept in ſecret receptacles, and by the long time which paſt before this Doctrine was condemn'd: Secondly, by the beginning of it, which was particular Doctours Hypothetical prayers, with εἰ τῆς ἀξιώσεις, and ſuch conditional clauſes: And thirdly, by Nicephorus Calliſtus his Relation (who in this is a believable witneſs, becauſe he allows of your opinion) that prayers to the Virgin Mary were firſt brought into the publick Liturgy by one Petrus Gnapheus a Heretick, about five hundred years after Chriſt; yet I will rather chuſe to confute this, by the confeſſion of Sancta Clara out of Horantius, who to this objection, that Sub Evangelio (which muſt mean when the Goſpel was preacht) no ſuch precept is extant, not onely denies it not, but gives this reaſon for it, leſt the Pagans ſhould think themſelves brought again to the worſhipping of Men inſtead of Gods: If upon this, or any other reaſon, this were not then taught, then have not all your Doctrines ſuch a Pedigree as you ſuppoſe; but allow it were; yet, howſoever it follows, that ſome, at leaſt, of the learned of your Church have not been taught that they have, or conſequently that it is neceſſary they ſhould have: Though it ſeems to me little leſs than Montaniſm to believe that any ſince (as it were a Paracket) ſhould perfect the doctrine which then was delivered by the Apoſtles: Neither can you anſwer, that they ſpeak onely of ſuch a Precept, and of being extant, whereas they might teach it lawfull, without giving any Precept, and they might have given ſuch a Precept although not extant; for I ſhould readily reply, that the reaſon they give why there is none ſuch extant, ſhews, that they mean there was none at all, neither Precept, nor allowance, ſince the Pagans would have been ſcandaliz'd at its being accounted lawfull to worſhip men inſtead of Gods, although it were not commanded, and not a whit the leſs, whether that in after times were extant or not, which they could not foreſee.

Lib. 15. C. 28 Pag. 271.

The onely anſwer which I am able to invent in your behalf, is this, that though ſome of your particular doctrines have not ſuch a Tradition, yet there being a Tradition that the Churches definitions are infallible, whatſoever ſhe at any time defines, is then to be believed upon the ſtrength of ſuch a Tradition, and before did latere in cauſis, as Flowers do in Winter.

Yet to this I may reply by deſiring you to enter with me into ſome few conſiderations.

Firſt, if this were ſo, and that ſo much of Chriſtian Religion depends upon the definitions of the Church, and our Reception of them, upon knowing always which is ſhe, and that ſuch is her authority; can you perſwade your ſelf, that Chriſt ſending his Apoſtles and Diſciples to Preach the Goſpel, and after four of them writing his Goſpel, (which ſhews, if the Books be true to the title, that they writ all they preacht, at leaſt that was neceſſary; for elſe they were not Goſpels, but Parts of it) that they ſhould not rather leave out any thing elſe, how important ſoever, than not have imployed themſelves about teaching us, that the Churches Definitions are a Rule of our Faith, and inſtructing us in Markes ſo proper to her, that we might never need to doubt, whether it be ſhe that defines or no; and whether their not having done this, evince not in Reaſon that this your Doctrine is falſe?

Secondly, I pray conſider whether if there were any ſuch continu'd Tradition about the Definitions of the Church, whether that muſt not alſo have taught, (or elſe have been to ſmall purpoſe) when it is that the Church hath defin'd: but yet that is a caſe not fully judged among you; For ſome hold, that the Church hath defin'd when a Council hath, although unapproved by the Pope, which is denyed by others.

Thirdly, Conſider whether (ſuppoſing as was before ſuppos'd) it muſt not alſo have taught certain Notes to know the Church by: but yet about thoſe you are not agreed, Salmeron putting Miracles among the falſe Signs of the Church, and Bellarmine and many more among the True ones. Tom. 13. Pag. 193.

Fourthly, Conſider whether the Church have an eternal ſpring of Doctrines within her, or but a finite number, and onely thoſe which the Apoſtles preacht: and I believe you will pitch upon the latter. Not then to ask how they came to know them, nor, if you anſwer by Tradition, to ask you again how come men then not to know (before a Definition) what it is they Preacht? for if the Biſhops (of which a Council is compounded) know it not now, how will they know it when they meet? I will deſire to know why the Church will not at once teach us all ſhe knows, and not keep us in doubts which ſhe may reſolve? and did the Apoſtles teach their Doctrines to be lockt up, or taught to us? And then having conſidered this, you will find, I believe, that the Church doe with Doctrines, as Fathers with Eſtates, never give their Children all, that they may ſtill have ſomething to keep them in awe with; becauſe if ſhe ſhould, ſhe could never have after pretended a Power to end any new emergent controverſie; keeping in ſecret what ſhe knows, any that ariſeth, ſhe may ſtill pretend is endable by her.

Fifthly, Conſider that it will appear but a ſhift, if you ſay that there is a Tradition that all the Churches Definitions be true, and ſo excuſe the particular Doctrines, for otherwiſe having none, and yet avoid giving us any Rules to know the Church by at all times, and anſwering thoſe Queſtions, which muſt be ended before we can know at any time when ſhe hath defin'd.

Now I confeſs if you had ſaid Tradition teacheth, that the particular Church of Rome is ſo the Admiral ſhip, that we may know any other if it be of God's Fleet, becauſe then it muſt follow her, that is, be ſubject to her decrees and theirs which joyn with her, this would have been plainly to let me know your mind, and we might quickly have examin'd, whether there were any Tradition for the Church in this ſenſe to be always obeyed when ſhe Teaches; and without you ſay this, you ſay nothing, and will never be able to give any ſuch Note of the Church, as the ignorant may without bluſhing pretend to know it by: Becauſe therefore I gueſs, that when not I, but your Adverſaries reaſons (for I am but one of the worſt tranſcribers of them) have driven you from your own Fort, you muſt retire to that of your friends, or like them which are drowning, you will rather catch at a Twigg, than ſink; I will conſider this Aſſertion, which I ſuppoſe you muſt lay hold of, ſo far forth as to ſhew it to be indeed but an Aſſertion. That there hath no ſuch Verbal Tradition (nor indeed any) come down, ſeems to me for theſe reaſons.

Saint Cyprian by oppoſing the Church of Rome, and that with many Biſhops, about the Rebaptization, ſhews ſufficiently, that he and they knew of no ſuch Tradition; and then in what Cave muſt it have lain hid, if the chief Doctour of that age was ignorant of it, and even his Adverſaries claim'd it not? And that he knew no ſuch, appears not onely by his Actions, but alſo by his words; for to them who claim'd Tradition for the particular point propos'd, (though none for the Authority of the Church propoſing) he anſwers, If it be contain'd in the Goſpels, Epiſtles, or Acts, let it be obſerved; at one blow cutting off not onely that (for ſure the authority of the Church of Rome is no way taught in the Scriptures) but all other unwritten Traditions, which Cardinal Perron, thought moſt skilfull in that kind of Fence, was not able to ward, but Du Pleſſis objecting it, receiv'd no other anſwer, than that the opinion of Cyprian was condemn'd, and that Tradition, although unwritten, maintain'd. Which anſwer though it be as far from befitting the Cardinal, as from anſwering the objection (ſince it is plain, that this opinion was once held by ſuch as were of chief eſtimation among the Orthodox, and conſequently the contrary was not then the general and neceſſary doctrine of Chriſtians; and the prevailing of the one ſince, proves not the other falſe, but rather unfortunate, or the ſpreaders faulty) yet I confeſs I excuſe him, for as I have learnt from Ariſtotle, that it is ridiculous to expect a Demonſtration where the matter will bear but a probability, ſo would it be in me to expect even a probable ſolution of an Argument, the evidence of which will ſuffer none at all.

Neither was he (I mean Cyprian) the firſt, that without blot of Hereſie oppos'd the Tradition of the Church of Rome; but that courage which he left to others after him, when they ſaw the Chriſtian World joyn in counting him a Saint, and a Martyr, whom the Biſhop of Rome had ſtyled a falſe Chriſt, and a falſe Apoſtle, the ſame had he received by ſeeing that the Aſian Biſhops had alſo rejected, and oppos'd her Tradition, and yet Polycrates ever had in great honour, and the reſt never branded with the crime of Hereſie; nay, even the more neighbouring Biſhops, and who joyn'd with the Pope in the time of celebrating Eaſter (as Irenæus) yet thought the difference not worth excommunication, and for want of skill in the Canon Law, tranſgreſt ſo far as to reprehend him for it, whereas if to that Church all elſe had been to conform themſelves, then Irenæus ought therefore to have thought the matter of weight enough, becauſe ſhe thought it ſo, who were to ſmall purpoſe made a Judge, if ſhe were not as well enabled to diſtinguiſh between ſlight and material, as between Falſe and True, though that it ſeems ſhe was not, for the Church of Rome never refus'd their Communion before, though ſhe knew them to hold the ſame opinion, and ſo (as plainly appears) counted that material in one Age, which ſhe had not ſo eſteemed in others, and therefore (in the degree at leaſt of holding what ſhe held) contradicted herſelf, and followed Traditions.

And as Cyprian imitated them, ſo did the African Biſhops him; for a Queſtion hapning between them and the Biſhops of Rome about Appeals, though they abſolutely oppos'd him, and (in vain I confeſs) deſired him that he would not bring into the Church Typhum hujus Seculi, the ſwelling pride of this World; and though he laboured infinitely in the buſineſs πάντα λίθον κινῶν, that he might bring bring it to pass, yet he, and two of his successours were either so unready, or so unskil'd in the present Roman Doctrine, that Feed my sheep, and Thou art Peter, were either out of their knowledge, or out of their memory, and they alledged, not any power jure divino, but onely pretended to a Canon of the Council of Nice, which when the Africans found not in their copies, (for they would not believe the Church of Rome so far as to trust to hers, though now you generally think the Scripture it self to have its authority quoad nos, onely for her definitions) they sent to the East to enquire there, and finding their copies agreeing with theirs, they then more resolutely withstood the Pretence, which brought at that time nothing to the Popes, but repulse and shame.

And indeed, not to object, that it is not numbred among any of the ancient Heresies, that they differ'd from the particular Roman Church, nor is this Rule, of being sure at all times to joyn with her, ever given by those Fathers who set us ways and Antidotes how to secure our selves against Heresie, (which could not have been left undone, if they had known any such Tradition) nor to speak of the Canon of the Council of Chalcedon, which attributes the power of the Popes to the gift of their Fathers, and that again to Romes being the head City; setting all this aside, I will ask your self if it be not plain that those Fathers, who (upon the impudent pretence of some Hereticks) send men to several places to enquire after Tradition, either send them to all the Apostolical Churches, or (to save their labour) to that to which they were neerest, as esteeming them all of equal authority (though not jurisdiction) for I may say of Rome, and them, as Tacitus doth of Cælius and the other Commanders (Mutato nomine, the name onely chang'd) Pares jure, Roma audendo potentior, for what by watching all occasions to greaten herself, whereof Cardinal D' Ossat is my witness, what by abusing the respect all men had ever given her, in respect of the chief Apostles which founded her, of the Empire which was long seated in her, and of her ancient Bishops, whereof about thirty together were martyr'd there, what by interpreting what was given to her Authority, as given to her Power, and taking civilities and complements (of which no Court is now so full as the ancient Bishops were) made to Popes, for allegeance sworn to them, what by forging false decretal Epistles (which the Termed Authours of them would not forgive them for, if they knew it, if it were onely for the barbarous language) what by these, and such other ways, she is come at length to that pass that what Avitus a Roman General said to the Ansibarians, who gave him reasons why he ought not in justice to disturb their possessions, Id Diis placitum, ut Arbitrium penes Romanos maneret, quid darent, quidve adimerent, neque alios Judices quam seipsos paterentur, It is the will of Heaven, that it be left to the Romans what they will please to give or take away, and suffer not any Judges but themselves; appears now not so much a History of the Pride of the Roman Empire, as a Prophecy of the general doctrine of the Roman Church.

Pag. 208. and 687.

Tacitus.

Having ever marked Errour and Confidence to keep so much company, that I seldome find the first, but I mistrust the second, makes me loath to affirm any thing over dogmatically out of these objections, or say that they cannot be answered; Onely (because I must not offend against Truth, for fear of offending against Modesty) I will take leave to say, that if I could have answered them my self, I would not have put you to the trouble of doing it; which you might also have sav'd, if by letting me know your name, you would have enabled me to have found you out, and so in a short discourse have tryed whether I could have obtain'd that satisfaction from your words, which I must now expect from your Pen. But supposing I had none of these objections, yet two things besides would have kept me from assenting to what you say: The first is, that your men, when they ask us how we know Scripture to be Scripture, and this to be the sense of it, tell us withall, that unless we know it by some more infallible way than our own Reason (they mean their Church) it will not serve for a belief of those things which are to be believ'd by a divine Faith; Now this Argument of yours upon which you build all, (allowing that it appear'd good reason) yet at most it is but reason, and liable to the same exceptions, unless the same thing be a wall when you lean upon it, and a bulrush when we do. The second is, that all you say (for as yet you speak not of the Authority of the Particular Church of Rome, though you must at length come to it, though by that too, little is to be gotten) if it were granted, would but prove those who adhere now to the Church of Rome to be now in the right; but I asked for a guide, which might without new search serve me the next year, as well as this; For (for all that you have prov'd) she may leave the way you say she now pretends to walk in, and attempt to reform too, (which I wish were as probable as it is possible) or there may arise a schism between two parts of those Churches which now adhere to the Roman, and both may claim Tradition, (for what hath been, may be again) and how shall I know then which side to take, since both will seem equally good by the Touchstone which you appoint me to try with? And if I be then sent to try by Ancient Writers, it is certain, that (besides the fallibility of that way for the learned) this cannot be done at all by the ignorant, and it is probable that both Parties will fall into that absurdity, into which the Church of Rome daily runs, which is, that although the evidence which she claims by, cannot well be exactly read over in thirty years time, yet she requireth us under pain of Damnation to give our Verdicts for her by twenty years old.

SECOND PART.

Object. THE high and Sage Maſter of our Faith hath in vain ſpent ſo much ſweat, and pains, if after he paſſed from hence, he hath left no means to aſſure mankind, what it was he taught and practiſed.

Reſp. I ſuppoſe this ſpeech is directed at me, who (as you conceive) take away all means, becauſe I have no Judge; but I would fain know of you, whether Plato, and Ariſtotle have not left us means to know what they taught, although they have not left us any living infallible Judge to deliver us their doctrine verbally, or to expound their works: Or if you intended your Accent upon the word Aſſure, and if you mean by that, ſome infallible knowledge, I deſire you (out of your own words) to conſider whether humane nature be capable of it. For my part ſuppoſing as I do, that his Faith is in a ſufficient degree, which brings forth obedience, I require not any motives more aſſuring, (except from them who claim that they cannot erre) than ſuch as any man unprepoſſeſt with paſſion or prejudice, will believe ſufficiently to obey; and ſuch in my opinion are mine: For though I know, you count any way without a guide but groping in the dark, yet if God had not given us ſo much light as we deſired, we muſt not therefore ſet up falſe lights, and becauſe we would be ſure to have a guide, make one our ſelves: but he ſeems to me, to have dealt with us in Religion not very un-analogically, to what he hath in the world, giving us two lights, Scripture and Univerſal Tradition, whereof one gives light to the other, and both to us: Univerſal Tradition is our Guide to Scripture (as whatſoever elſe that guided us to, we would receive, if there were any ſuch thing) and Scripture is our way to God; By Univerſal Tradition we know much better, that theſe Books were written by Chriſt's Diſciples (who are ſufficient witneſſes of what he taught) than the Ariſtotelians know that theſe were Ariſtotle's works, or the Academicks knew Plato's, ſince Chriſtians have both kept them with more care, and in the acceptance of them uſed more caution, as thinking them ſo much more important: In the Scriptures I conceive, that (according to that rule, which I am ſure I have either read in Chryſoſtome, or very often quoted out of him) πάντα ἀναγκαῖα δῆλα, all that is neceſſary is clear; or if any man that ſtrives to ſquare both his actions and opinions by that Rule, chance to fall into any errour (for which his underſtanding is onely in fault and not his will) it ſhall not hinder his riſing to heaven: Such an infallible way excludes, if not all uſe, at leaſt all neceſſity of an infallible guide, and is as good as a Judge to keep Unity in Charity (which is onely needfull) though not in opinions; and indeed ſince you muſt grant, that if any man miſ-interpret the Council of Trent, it ſhall not damn him, ſo he doubt not of its truth, deſire to diſcover what it meant, and be in a Propenſion of believing that, when he knows it; me thinks (as Cyneas told Pirrhus) you had as good doe that at firſt which you muſt doe at laſt, that is, ſay the ſame with us at firſt concerning Scripture, which after much trouble, you are forced to ſay concerning Councils, and in hard matters let the ſame implicite Faith in God ſerve, which ſerves in them, who can claim no authority but from, and under him: And (which is more than I affirm) that no man, but by his own being wicked, can come into any errour by falſe interpretation of Scripture, ſee I pray, what Saint Auſtine ſays in his forty ninth Sermon de verbis Domini, that God hath ſo hedg'd in all his own ſayings, that whoſoever would interpret any place of Scripture falſe, he that hath a circumciſed heart, by reading what is before and after, may find that ſenſe which the other would pervert.

Yet if you can ſhew me reaſon to believe that there is any ſtanding guide upon earth (and without reaſon, it were unreaſonable to hope to perſwade me to believe it) I will never be proud ſo much to my own coſt, as rather to venture looſing my way by chuſing it my ſelf, than be beholding to him for directing me in it.

Object. Thoſe to whom during his life, he had moſt fully declared his mind, went and told it to others, and all was done; But this way hath the prejudice of humane Fallibility, for ſeldome it hapneth, that a multitude can carry away all in the ſame manner, and one thouſand ſix hundred years are paſſed ſince; yet if we look into the immediate joynts of the deſcent, we cannot find where it can miſs: for the doctrine being ſupernatural, and not delivered by any man's skill, or wit, the main principle of it can be no other, than to know what was delivered them by their Teachers: when therefore an Apoſtle had preached over and over again the ſame Doctrine, not long, nor hard to be carryed away, in all the Towns of a Countrey, and let him be gone, and all dead who heard him ſpeak, and ſome queſtions ariſe concerning his doctrine, let us ſee whether errour can creep in if Chriſtians keep to their hold, that is, what they were taught by Chriſt's Apoſtles. Let therefore the wiſeſt and beſt of thoſe Towns meet and diſcuſs the controverſie out of this principle, will not there be a quick end of their diſpute? For every man can ſay, Thus my Father heard the Apoſtle ſpeak; and what is here certain of the Children of thoſe who heard them, may with as much evidence be deriv'd again in the Grand-children, and ſo in every age.

Thoſe

Thoſe writings, whoſe buſineſs is to prove, ſhould be like the houſes in the Low Countries, Reſp.
for as there they take ſuch care of their foundations, that what is under ground coſts them more than all above it, ſo in theſe, the greateſt labour ought to be in ſetling ſurely the Principles, becauſe ἑνὸς ἀτόπου δοθέντος, one abſurdity granted, how fertile errour is after, what a herd or ſwarm of ſtrange concluſions follow, not onely your ſelf have obſerv'd, but Ariſtotle alſo hath told all that have read him, and experience daily tells mankind; ſince therefore a ſmall miſtake encreaſeth as much, and as ſpeedily as a grain of muſtard-ſeed, I muſt the earneſtlier contradict this πρῶτον ψεῦδος, this firſt errour of yours, as being the Parent of ſo many more already, and being likely in time (if by being confuted it be not us'd as Saturn us'd his Father) to have yet a more large and numerous Iſſue.

Then, you leave one thing out of your Hiſtory of the Goſpel, which alone conſider'd, 1 would have much weaken'd what you ſay; For you ſpeak of the Apoſtles, but forget utterly their Writings, a miſ-interpretation of which, might ſoon ſpread an errour. And certainly out of them, if Chriſtians had been to receive no Inſtructions, but onely to remember what was taught them by word of mouth, both they would have ſav'd themſelves the labour of writing them, and Traditors, who deliver'd them to be burnt, would have been thought to have committed no greater fault, than if they had done the ſame to any ordinary writing: But if the firſt Chriſtians, and generally their ſucceſſours ſince, have ever carefully and aſſiduouſly ſtudied (what by comparing places, what by all other ways) to underſtand them, and thought themſelves bound to believe, and obey whatſoever they found, or thought they found there contain'd, and eſteem'd that they were taught by themſelves, what they learnt from their writings (as they muſt have thought it the ſame thing, unleſs the Apoſtles authority had vaniſht, by having their inſtructions put into paper, which were as if the King's verbal Commands bound us, but not his Proclamations.) Then here appears a gate at which errours might enter, which you (at leaſt I am ſure this part of your Treatiſe) did not conſider.

But even their verbal might either be miſ-interpreted, or knowingly miſ-alledged, even by thoſe 2 who are counted Archi-Catholicks; for, I pray, muſt not one of thoſe two have been done, or by Socrat. lib. 5 the Church of Rome, or by thoſe of Aſia (which example I would not ſo often ſpeak of, but that I hope δὶς κὴ τρὶς τὸ ἀληθὲς is as good an excuſe, as δὶς κὴ τρὶς τὸ κακὸν:) For ſince it is impoſſible, that Saint John and Saint Peter, both inſpir'd by the Holy Ghoſt, which is the Spirit of Truth, ſhould teach contradictory doctrines, whereof one muſt neceſſarily be falſe; what elſe can follow, but that one part (if not both) intended to deceive, or were themſelves deceiv'd in it (and what makes it impoſſible, that ſuch a miſtake by men of authority may not generally ſpread?) and after a plain example, your reaſon will be no more able to overthrow experience, than the earthen Pitcher, in the Fable, was to break the Braſen one; χύτρα κὴ πίτρα ἃ συμφωνεῖ.

One of the Arguments you make for the infallibility of the way which you propound, is, That 3 the Doctrine, which the Apoſtles taught, was neither long nor hard to be carryed away; Out of which methinks I can evidently deduce that the Church of Rome is not that, ſince both it appears how long that is, and ſince you tell us your ſelf, That the cauſe of many errours among you, is the multiplicity of Catholick Doctrines, which doth not oblige a man to the knowledge of every Part, but to a prompt ſubjection to the Church. Truly if there be no contradiction between theſe two Propoſitions, I will confeſs that I have hitherto miſtaken what the word ſignifies; unleſs you mean, that the Apoſtle by teaching ſubjection to the Church incluſively, taught all that ſhe teaches, and ſo what they delivered was ſhort, but what implicitly, much; If this were ſo, certainly the Apoſtles, when they included almoſt all their doctrine in the ſubjection enjoyn'd to the Church, taught ſome certain markes by which men might at all times know her, though you pretend to none but ſuch as the Greek Church as much claim (which is enough to ſcruple the ignorant) and rightly too, as the Roman (as Antiquity, Succeſſion, Miracles, &c.) excepting onely communion with the Pope, and ſplendour, whereof neither are proper markes of the true Church, that is, ſuch as can never be abſent from her, ſince the Hereſie of a Pope (which hath been, and is not by your own whole Church held impoſſible) may take away the one way, and a general Perſecution the other.

It appears alſo by what you ſpeak of the immediate joynts of the deſcent, that you ſuppoſe if 4 any errour come in, ſome one Age muſt joyn to teach it, which by no means follows, no more than one Age of them at Rome joyn'd to teach their Poſterity Italian inſtead of Latine; but ſome may have taught a Doctrine to be probable in one Age, more, then, in the ſecond, and all in the third, according to Seneca's obſervation. The errour of few (eſpecially when Notable Perſons) begetting the errour of a multitude; and again the authority of a multitude deceiving Particular men, and ſo by degrees it may be thought from probable, True, from true, fere de Fide, from that, abſolutely a part of Faith, and conſequently, to have come from Tradition; whilſt the contrary opinion being firſt believ'd the more improbable, next falſe, from falſe, Temerary, from temerary, Hæreſi proximum, and from that, abſolutely Heretical, hath by almoſt inſenſible degrees met with a mighty change, and is arriv'd at Hell before it almoſt misdoubted it. And that theſe progreſs-Doctrines have travel'd, it is eaſie for any man to ſee who hath been but a little converſant in your own Books, and whoſoever denies it, may as well deny that there is any green in Summer, when there is hardly any thing elſe.

And for the Caſe you put, that the wiſeſt, and beſt of the Towns where Doctrines were deli- 5 vered ſhould have met, &c. I both ſuppoſe, that the controverſie of who were beſt and wiſeſt, would not it ſelf have been eaſily ended; but allowing that it might have been eaſily done, and would have been moſt uſefully done, yet it never was; and ſo ſuppoſe the way never ſo good, it was yet like a Medicine, which be it never ſo Sovereign, can never cure if it be never taken; Councils there have been call'd Ancient, becauſe leſs Modern, and general, becauſe leſs particular (for the firſt was not till more than three hundred years after Chriſt, nor to the largeſt, appears it, that ever any were ſummon'd from beyond the bounds of the Ancient Roman Empire, though Chriſtianity were much farther extended: Some leſs meetings or Conciliabula there were indeed before, but none of theſe accounted infallible by your ſelves (though me-thinks they ſhould by your grounds) and indeed it would goe ill with your own infallibility if you ſhould, for of the two moſt notable, the one defended Rebaptization, and the other condemned Samoſatenus, and in doing ſo, taught as plain Arianiſm, (if we might know mens meaning by their words, which if we cannot, all arguing, eſpecially from what any Authours ſay, is ended) as even Arius himſelf was condemned for at Nice; If theſe intended to diſcuſs the Controverſie out of the Principle you ſpeak of, and yet miſs'd Tradition when they meant to have followed it, then ſo might your beſt and wiſeſt men have done too; if they did not intend it, then it ſeems it hath not been held needfull always by Catholicks to try Doctrines by that Criterium, which you now preſcribe.

any

Object. Who can be ignorant what he was taught when he was a child, as the ground and ſubſtance of his hopes for all Eternity?

Reſp. Truly the ordinary ſort more than moſt eaſily: For becauſe either their mind wanders, or their Teachers deſcend not to their capacities, they commonly goe away both from publick Sermons and private Catechiſms, as if they had receiv'd inſtruction in a language as ſtrange to them, as that wherein they ſay their prayers: Beſides, their own Fathers teach them little or nothing, becauſe that is as much as they have learnt themſelves, (eſpecially in ignorant places and times) their Ghoſtly Fathers teach them moſt, but that much more concerning life than opinions; ſo that though they were not ignorant of all they were taught, yet they are abſolute ſtrangers to the greateſt part of what your Church teaches; And if now no more of their Religion be delivered by Verbal Tradition, what was then, when many points, which are now often taught (though not conſtantly, and in all places, but upon occaſions) were not thought of in many years? Suppoſe that about the Queſtion of what makes a Prieſt, a convocation of men had met (I mean of ſuch who knew not what was taught in Books) before Luther's time (and what I ſay would be true in ſomewhat a leſs degree of this more inſtructed Age) what account could they have given, what they had been taught when they were Children? Truly they could have ſaid, we know it to be the cuſtom for our Biſhops to make Prieſts, and ſome of us have heard, he onely is to make them; what is done and taught in other places, we know not: Very far would they have been from all agreeing that they were taught when they were Children (as part of the ground of their hopes for all Eternity) by their fathers, as receiv'd from theirs, as come down from the Apoſtles; that he is no Prieſt, to whom in expreſs terms Commiſſion is not given to offer for the living and the dead, which now being objected to the Clergy of England, perſwades me, that your Church teacheth more than generally men are taught when Children, or indeed at any time by any Verbal Tradition: For not onely the Ordinary ſort, but even your moſt learned men knew not what is Tradition, if that be ſtill your Rule of Faith; for they diſagree among themſelves, whether ſome things be of Faith or no: as for Example, Whether the Pope can erre in the Canonization of a Saint; for if all Queſtions were that way to be ended, and ſuch Traditions were evident, (as if they were ſuch as you ſpeak of, they muſt be) all your ſide muſt be ſoon reſolv'd both in this, and all other ſuch Queſtions; And if you ſay that indeed all Particular Doctrines are not taught by ſuch a Tradition, but that by ſo much as all are taught, they know their Judge and Directour concerning them, and ſo are taught them implicitely, I anſwer, that the Vulgar, although they are generally told that the Church is infallible, yet I doubt whether they be either taught that this Doctrine hath had any ſuch general and uninterrupted a delivery, or have heard much concerning thoſe means, by which ſhe her-ſelf is to be known, or thoſe Circumſtances, by which we are to know when ſhe expreſſeth her opinion: That the Pope is the Head of the Church, they know; but whether Tradition teach him to be ſo, of Divine, or humane Right, from God, of Councils, or tacite conſent, and what Power is included in that Headſhip, a Mahumitan is as much inſtructed as moſt of them; and even his headſhip is ordinarily prov'd to them but out of ſome place of Scripture, out of which they hear his Infallibility concluded too, without being told the different degree in which thoſe two Doctrines are to be held. Secondly for the learned, neither are they taught ſo well ſome of theſe things, but that they differ concerning them, and your ſelf fly wholly ſpeaking of them, leaving them to agree among themſelves, and (as Cardinal Perron ſays in one place, he will do us Proteſtants when we differ) ſuffering the dead to bury the dead; If then neither are you all agreed by what to know your Church, nor when ſhe hath defin'd, ſo that even what is of faith is undermined among you, I find cauſe to believe, that Tradition is no excellent Directour of you even in your grounds, no not to teach you to know that which ſhould teach you all the reſt; And if you were, yet at the ſame wicket, and by the ſame degrees, by which I have ſhewed that other errours both may, and have not onely entered into your Church, but aſcended alſo to high places there; this doctrine concerning your Directour might have done the ſame.

Wadd. Pag. 30.

His Opuſc.

True it is, that every little is generally and conſtantly taught in all ages to the people, and that which is ſeldom, is told them to have been ſo receiv'd from hand to hand by the Verbal Tradition you ſpeak of; and if they be at any time taught ſo, and remember it, yet they know not whether the next Curate teach the ſame, at leaſt, if under the ſame notion and degree of Neceſſity. Indeed it would not be ſo intricate a work (as now adays it is) to be a Chriſtian, if your way had been onely followed: but it is not this Tradition, but the writings of paſt Ages, which tranſmit to poſterity the opinions of the Doctours of paſt times, many of them being erroneous, and more unneceſſary; out of theſe works the learned learn, and teach again in their works, what the greater part (the unlearned) ſcarce ever hear of; out of theſe they ſettle the degrees your doctrines are to be held in, ſome as probable, ſome true, ſome almoſt neceſſary, ſome altogether; and teach concerning others, that ſome are falſe, ſome dangerous, ſome damnable; whereas the vulgar have ſeldom their meat ſo curiouſly joynted to them, but are told in general for the moſt part (unleſs ſome publick oppoſition, or the other occaſion perſwade them at ſome time to deſcend to teach them more particularly) that this is ſo good, and this is not ſo: And indeed the degree in which the laſt Age held ſuch an opinion, is both moſt hard to know (not onely becauſe the ignorant are ſeldom taught by word of mouth, and the learned have ſeldom occaſion, without ſome oppoſition, to explain themſelves ſo far in their writings) but becauſe alſo as many, and as conſiderable Perſons not writing, as do write, we cannot know by the Authours, what the whole Age thought true (except the acceptation of that Doctrine were a condition of the Communion) and moſt neceſſary to be known, becauſe moſt of our controverſies with your Church are as much, if not more, about the neceſſity of her opinions, as about the truth of them: For we ſeeing plainly, that in the pureſt ages many of the chiefeſt Doctours have contradicted ſome of her Tenets, without ſuſpicion of Hereſie; are not able to conceive how a doctrine ſhould, from being indifferent in one age, become neceſſary in another, and the contrary, from onely falſe, Heretical, ——As time makes Botches Pox,

(unleſs

And plodding on will make a Calf and Oxe. Dr. D.

eſpecially if that way had always been walkt in, which you now ſpeak of.

No judicious man can deny to ſee with his eyes, (if he have caſt them never ſo little upon the preſent ſtate of Chriſtendom) that there is one Congregation of men which layeth claim to Chriſt his Doctrine, as upon this title, that ſhe hath received it from his Apoſtles without interruption, delivered from Father to Son untill this day, and admits not any doctrine for good and legitimate which he doth not receive in this manner. Object.

What the Judicious (of whom I am no member) can do, I know not; but I not onely can, but do deny it, you meaning by that Congregation, the Church of Rome; for by ſeeing, that not upon this, but other kind of claim certain Doctrines have arrived to the very brink of being defin'd, I have cauſe to think, that if they received none in upon other grounds, theſe would not be ſuffered to ſtand ſo near the door. And indeed there being between your ſelves ſuch differences, that Eraſmus tells us, that he who is a Heretick among the Dominicans, is Orthodox to the Scotiſts, ſure one ſide hath admitted of a Doctrine for Legitimate, which hath not been ſo received; and then me-thinks this being eaſily endable, which it is, by ſeeing which claims ſuch a delivery, (for if both do it, then two Parts may, which you deny; if neither do, then your whole Church goes by ſome other Rule) that which doth, upon that which you call the Catholick Grounds, me-thinks ſhould have obtained a definition from her, and the other, which reſiſts that Principle, upon which they ought onely to build, ſhould have been ſuddenly and abſolutely condemned. This will appear plainer, if we conſider the opinions of your Church by the Actions of her Head, in a notable and late Example. A great controverſie being riſen between the Dominicans and the Jeſuits, it was heard before Pope Clement; let us ſee then what courſe he took to find which Part held the Truth, ſince he was not likely (eſpecially in a time wherein, by being more oppoſed than uſually, he had reaſons to be conſequently more cautious) to chuſe a new way, by which truth was not wont to be found out by your ſide upon like occaſions; Did he ſend for the wiſeſt and beſt men from all, nay from adjoyning Parts, to enquire of them what they had been taught by their Fathers, to have been received by them uninterruptedly from the Apoſtles? did he examine with which of them the firſt and pureſt ages ſided? did he conſider which opinion would make us have the more excellent conceit of God, and work moſt towards the expelling of Vice? None of all theſe were his courſe, but he appointed both ſides, to prove which of them followed Saint Auſtine, and according to them, he intended to give ſentence, if the advice of Cardinal Perron had not prevailed to the contrary: But many days they ſpent in examining what he thought, who thought ſo variouſly concerning it, that he ſcarce knew himſelf which; whereas before him, all the Ancients that I could ever meet with, were with the Jeſuits with an Unanimous conſent, and by them (if they muſt be tryed by men as fallible as themſelves) it would have better agreed with their own Principles to have had both Parts judged. Reſp. Præfat. in Hilar.

After the Pope, let us hear Biſhop, and almoſt Cardinal Fiſher, who being one of your own Authours and Martyrs, cannot be thought to prevaricate againſt that Church, for whoſe defence he imployed not onely his Inke, but his Bloud.

His words are theſe,

There are many things of which was no enquiry in the Primitive Church, which yet upon doubts ariſing, are now become perſpicuous, by the diligence of after-times. And that you may ſee, that he ſpeaks of points of Faith, He addes,

No Orthodox man now doubts, whether there be a Purgatory, of which yet among the Ancients there is no mention, or exceeding rarely: It is not believed by the Greeks to this day——Neither did the Latines conceive this Truth at once, but by little and little. Pag. 496.

And for an Epiphonema he cloſeth it thus,

Conſidering that Purgatory was a good while unknown; after, partly by Revelations, partly by Scripture, came little by little to be believed by ſome, and ſo at laſt the belief of it was generally received by the Catholick Churches---Who can wonder concerning Indulgences, that in the Primitive Church there was no uſe of them? Indulgences therefore began, after men had trembled a while at the Torments of Purgatory. Pag. 497.

See, I pray, how will you two agree? You ſay, the Church of Rome receives, but what ſhe claims to be come down to her from the Apoſtles without interruption: He ſaith, ſome of her Doctrines were long unknown, and came in by Revelations and Scripture; you ſay, new Doctrines cannot come into a Church that holds this Principle: He ſaith, Doctrines have come in by little and little: So either ſhe held not always this Principle, or for all that, they might come in: To be ſhort, all, which he hath ſaid, ſeems to me, as if he had purpoſely intended to frame a Ram to batter down that fortification, which you have built about the Roman Church.

Now though he be of ſo great an Authority that he needs no backing, yet I will deſire you to look look into Alphonſus de Caſtro, where he ſpeaks of Indulgences, and ſee if he mend the matter. He confeſſeth, that the uſe of them ſeems to be late received into the Church, yet would not have them contemned, becauſe many things are known to after-commers, of which thoſe ancient Writers were wholly ignorant. Amongſt whom there is rarely mention of Tranſubſtantiation, more rarely of the Proceſſion of the Holy Ghoſt from the Son, of Purgatory almoſt none; For though he ſpeaks after as if he meant, onely that the names of theſe were unmentioned, and not the things, yet it is plain, that if he brought them in to any purpoſe, it was to prove, that ſome Doctrines are after of neceſſity to be believed, which once were not, and Doctrines conſiſt in the Things, not in the Name.

Epiſt. Pag. 1164. I could next tell you of Eraſmus his ſaying, Res deducta eſt ad Sophiſticas contentiones, & Articulorum Myriades proruperunt. Religion is come down to Sophiſtry, and a Myriad of Articles are broken out. But knowing that his words will not find ſo much reſpect, (becauſe he himſelf finds leſs favour) as

Pag. 296. 1 Edit. thoſe of others more allowed among you, let us mark theſe words of Sancta Clara, The Church, when it is ſaid to define any thing, ſhe reſts not upon any new Revelations, but upon the ancient, lying hid in writings and words of the Apoſtles; which he ſays not as his private opinion, but the conſtant belief of Doctours: By which it appears plainly, that there are at leaſt interpretations of what the Apoſtles taught, drawn forth by Reaſon not received by Tradition, which makes now a part of the preſent Roman Religion, a ſufficient Gap for Errours to enter at, when either miſtakings, or ends may become new opinions, and ſtyle them but interpretations of the old. Salmeron a Voluminous Jeſuite, one, neither by his order, nor his inclination an enemy at all to the Roman Church, being preſs'd by the

Tom. 13. Pag. 467. opinions of the Ancients, affirms, Doctores quo juniores, eo perſpicaciores eſſe, That the more modern Doctours are, the more perſpicacious, that per incrementa Temporum nota facta ſunt Divina myſteria, quæ tamen antea multos latuerunt: In proceſs of time Divine Myſteries have been made known, which before lay hid from many; That it is infirm arguing from Authority, and anſwers to the multitude of them, who in times paſt had oppoſed him with theſe words of Exodus, That the opinion of many is not to be followed, leading us out of the way, with ſome other very Anabaptiſtical anſwers, and very contrary to your Tenets, (for ſure it were a ſtrange Tradition, which had ſo many Orthodox Oppoſers) and nothing inferiour to that ſaying of Zuinglius, ſo much exaggerated, Quid mihi cum Patribus, potius quam cum Matribus?

The ſame Authour in the ſame place ſays, that Saint Hierome durſt not affirm the Aſſumption, but Saint Auſtine durſt; and by that means, the Church perſwaded by his reaſon believes it: Such a notable Tradition have all her opinions; for even this affirmation, which he confeſſeth, brought in this belief, is it ſelf not now believed to be Saint Auſtine's, for I take it, he muſt mean his tract of the Aſſumption, counted not his, by your own Divinity-Criticks, the Lovaine Doctours, which have ſet it forth at Cullen.

And becauſe I am willing to ſpend no more time in the proof of ſo apparent a Truth, I will not urge Poza, who to perſwade the defining of an opinion, which hath a great current of the Ancients againſt it, (ſo far it is from having any Tradition for it) reckons many other opinions condemned by your Church, and defended by the Ancients; unleſs you will believe his impudent

In Elucidar. Deiparæ, Pag. 1113. Aſſertion, that they are all corrupted: and will paſs to the Concluſion of this, which ſhall have for a Corollary, the Confeſſion of a Spaniſh Arch-Biſhop, who is to be thought to ſpeak with more authority than his own, becauſe being employed to bring that to paſs, which was deſired by ſo great a Part of your Church, he can ſcarce be ſuppoſed not to have had the advice and conſent of many of them in what he ſays.

Wadd. Pag. 125. He then tells us, Firſt, every Age either brings forth, or opens her Truth: Things are done in their times, and ſeveral Doctrines are unlockt in ſeveral Ages.

Pag. 170. Secondly, To ſhew that though his opinion had no ſuch Tradition as you ſay your Church claims for all her Doctrines, yet it may and ought to be defined; he deſires to know who ever taught the Aſſumption of the Virgin, before Saint Auſtine's and Hierome's time, and by whom was that opinion deduc'd from the Apoſtles: Nay, he abſolutely affirms, that before Nazianzene, no man ever taught any thing of her delivery without pain, yet many thought the contrary.

Pag. 202. Thirdly and laſtly, For your abſolute confutation, he confeſſeth, that ye believe and hold in this Age many things for Myſteries of Faith, which in former Ages did waver under ſmall or no Probability, and many things are now defined for Articles of Faith, which have endured a hard repulſe amongſt the moſt and the weightieſt of the Ancient Doctours, and no light contradiction among the Ancient Fathers; and having reckoned up five Particulars,

The Validity of Hereticks Baptiſm,
The Beatifical Viſion before the day of Judgment,
The Spirituality of Angels,
The Souls being immediately created, and not ex traduce,
And, The Virgines being free from all actual Sin:

Pag. 203. He ſhuts it up thus, Many of theſe kinds of Opinions there are, which ſometimes declined to one Part, ſometimes to the other, and had contrary Favourers, according to ſeveral times, untill a diligent and long diſquiſition being premitted, the Truth was manifeſted either by Pope, or Provincial, or general Councils; nay, and ſays, that the diſquiſition is made by conferring of Places of Scripture, and Reaſon, which is the way which you miſlike.

Pag. 204. Theſe things conſidered, whoſoever ſhall after ſay, that your Church claims all her Doctrines to have come by a Verbal and conſtant Tradition to her from the Apoſtles, I will not ſay that he is very impudent, but I cannot think that a ſmall matter will put him out of countenance; for your part, I eſteem you ſo much, that I am confident you have not ſo little Noſe as not to find the contrary, nor ſo little Forehead as not to confeſs it, having received the Affidavit of ſuch a cloud of Witneſſes.

Object. Whoſoever pretend Chriſt his Truth againſt her, ſaith, that true it is, ſhe had once the true way, but by length of time ſhe is fallen into groſs Errours, which they will reform, not by any Truth which they have received ceived from hand to hand from thoſe, who by both Parts are acknowledged to have received their leſſon from Chriſt and his Apoſtles, but by Arguments, either out of Ancient Writers, or the ſecrets of Reaſon.

This is no farther true, than as it concerns the Proteſtants, for the Greek Church will not ſuffer your propoſition to be general, but forbid the Banes. Reſp.

They pretend not to have made any Reformation, but to have kept ever ſince the Apoſtles, what from them was received: Barlaam ſays, they do σώας καὶ ὁλοκλήρους τὰς τῆς καθολικῆς ἐκκλησίας παραδόσεις φυλάττειν, keep ſafe and whole the Traditions of the Catholick Church; nay, he proves his to be the ſound Part, becauſe by them οὐδὲν οὐδέποτε τῆς καθολικῆς ἐκκλησίας παραδόσεως νενόμισται σεμνότερον, Nothing was ever more eſteemed than her Tradition: And he objects it to your Church, that ſhe doth τὰς τῆς καθολικῆς ἐκκλησίας ἀθετεῖν, καὶ πάντας εἰς οὐδὲν θέμενοι ξενικά τινα, καὶ ἀλλόκοτα ἀνιτ σάγειν δόγματα, diſanull the Tradition of the Catholick Church, and ſetting them at nought, bring in ſtrange and undenizon'd opinions: And that Greek, who is joyned to Nilus, and Barlaam in Salmaſius his Edition diſputing againſt a Cardinal, chargeth you, that you do τῇ τῶν ἀποστόλων, καὶ πατέρων παραδόσει φθαρτείρειν ζιζάνια, ſow Tares among the Tradition of the Apoſtles and Fathers. If when they make this claim they either ſay ſo, and think not ſo, or think ſo, and erre, then this proves, that though the Roman Church did make that claim which you ſay ſhe doth, yet ſhe too might either claim it againſt her Conſcience, or againſt Truth: For this claim of the laſt cannot be denyed, but by him, who will imitate that Hamſhire Clown, of whom you give me warning, and believe no more than he ſees himſelf; eſpecially ſince your own Authours, when they diſpute for Traditions, prove their authority from this profeſſion of the Greeks: but I cannot blame you to forget them, (if we would ſuffer you) ſince they cannot be remembred but by your Religions diſadvantage; For I verily believe, that if they had but one Addition which they want, (I mean Riches) not onely moſt of them who leave the Proteſtants, would ſooner go to them than to you, (unleſs they would take their Religion as we take Boates, for being the Next) but many among you, who (though they diſlike your pretended Infallibility, the Pope's uſurpations upon the rights of other Biſhops, his (not ancient) claim of power to deliver Souls out of Purgatory, &c. And yet are frighted from joyning with the Proteſtants, by want of Succeſſion, Vocation, and ſuch like Bull-beggers) would goe over to them (as I have heard, Spalato meant to doe) if theywere not kept, by an unwillingneſs to change the ſpiritual tyranny of the Pope, for the temporal of the Turk.

But (although there were no ſuch Churches, or they made no ſuch claim, yet having ſhew'd out of your own Authours, that ſome opinions have not been conſtantly delivered by Tradition, but have entered into the Church upon the grounds (which might at leaſt poſſibly deceive them) of Scripture, Reaſon and Revelation, and others knockt apace to be let in) I hope we may be excuſed for making a reveiw of all, and examining what doctrines have been brought in, if not by Scripture (which we think reaſonable) at leaſt by comparing what this age teacheth and requires, with what the firſt Ages did; to which we are encourag'd by your ſelves, who make agreement with Antiquity, the cheif mark of the Church, unleſs you mean your ſelves to be onely Judges, even of thoſe things by which you bid us to judge you: For our examinations by reaſon, I cannot tell why you miſlike it, ſince thoſe who truſt their own reaſon leaſt, truſt it yet to chuſe for them one whom they may truſt, againſt which, all Arguments drawn from her fallibility without queſtion lie. Your Religion is built upon your Church, her authority upon reaſons, which we think ſlight and fallacious, and your ſelves think but prudential and probable; ought we not then, nay muſt we not examine them by Reaſon, or receive them upon your word? And allowing them probable reaſon, yet I have ſtill cauſe to examine further, whether your ſuperſtructions be not more unreaſonable than your foundations are reaſonable, for then I cannot receive a more unprobable doctrine, than that is probable, which it is prov'd by: Yet (in reſpect of things appearing divers, at divers times) I do not like my own way ſo well, as to eſteem it abſolutely infallible, but though I keep it, becauſe I account it the beſt, yet I will promiſe to leave it, when you can ſhew me a better; which will be hard to doe, becauſe you cannot prove it to be better but by reaſon, againſt which proof (and conſequently, againſt whatſoever it proves) your own Objections remain; For to be perſwaded by reaſon, that to ſuch an authority I ought to ſubmit it, is ſtill to follow reaſon, and not to quit her. And by what elſe is it, that you examine what the Apoſtles taught, when you examine that by ancient Tradition, and ancient Tradition by a preſent Teſtimony? Yet when I ſpeak thus of finding the Truth by Reaſon, I intend not to exclude the Grace of God, which I doubt not (for as much as is neceſſary to Salvation) is ready to concur to our Inſtruction; as the Sun is to our ſight, if we by a wilfull winking chuſe not to make, not it, but our ſelves guilty of our blindneſs: Indeed if we love darkneſs better than light, and inſtead of eſteeming it, ſhut it out, it were but juſt in God, if we ſo continue long hardened, not to ſuffer it to ſee after, when we would, ſince ſo obſtinately we would not when we might, like to that that happened to thoſe Engliſhmen, of whom Froiſſard ſpeaks, who having long bound up an eye, and made a fooliſh vow, never to ſee with that till they could ſee their Miſtreſſes, when they returned, and unbound them, they ſaw nothing, but that they could not ſee.

Yet when I ſpeak of God's grace, I mean not, that it infuſeth a knowledge without reaſon, but works by it, as by its Miniſter, and diſpells thoſe Miſts or Paſſions, which do wrap up Truth from our Underſtandings. For if you ſpeak of its inſtructing any other way, though I confeſs it is poſſible (as God may give us a ſixth ſenſe) yet it is not ordinary, and ought not to be brought to diſpute, becauſe ſo we leave viſible Arguments to fly to inviſible, and your Adverſary, when he hath found your play, will be ſoon at the ſame lock, and I believe, in this ſenſe, infus'd Faith is but the ſame thing, otherwiſe apparell'd, which you have ſo often laught at in the Puritans, under the title of private Spirit.

This being ſuppoſed, either this Principle hath remain'd unto her ever ſince her beginning, or ſhe took it up in ſome one Age of the ſixteen; if ſhe took it up, ſhe then thought, ſhe had nothing in her, but what ſhe had receiv'd from her fore-fathers, and if ſhe thought ſo, ſhe knew it. Object.

Resp. This Principle is not yet taken up by her; and ſuppoſe it were, yet ſince ſome other opinions are confeſs'd to have been receiv'd by her, not from a conſtant Tradition, but Scripture, and Revelations, and not at once, but by little and little; this very Principle of receiving nothing but from Tradition, might it ſelf have been receiv'd not from Tradition: nor need it have been in any one Age of the ſixteen, but ſome might have taught it in one Age, more in another, and all at laſt: and this ſo far from being an impoſſibility, that it were no wonder.

Object. Let us add, that the multitude of this Church is ſo diſperſed through ſo many Countries, and Languages, that it is impoſſible they ſhould agree togcther upon a falſe Determination, to affirm with one conſent a Falſity for Truth, no Intereſt being able to be common to them all, to produce ſuch an effect.

Reſp. Although ſo many Countries could not ſo well agree upon it at once, yet ſome might ſo perſwade others, that in time and by degrees the diſeaſe may be grown epidemical: And truly, conſidering in every Country how few there are, who think of Religion at all, or of them again, who walk in it by the directions of their own eyes, even of them who take upon them to ſhew that way to others, but for the moſt part (which they did much more in more ignorant times, when Scriptura ſacra cum vetuſtis authoribus frigebat) are lead by ſome few, whom they reverence for their Piety and learning, ὧν λόγους ἀκινήτους ὑπολαμβάνουσι νόμους, whoſe words are accounted laws, and they again by a Thomas, or a Scot, or at beſt by Auſtin, or Hierome, and think it Tradition enough to have it from them (for elſe why think they to bear us down with the Authority of one or two Fathers, if they think that not ground enough to goe upon themſelves?) it ſeems little ſtranger to me, that whole Countries ſhould let in not ancient opinions, than that a few ſhould, ſince a few in all places have ever govern'd all the reſt; of this I will bring two very known examples out of the Eccleſiaſtical Hiſtory.

The firſt is of Valens the Emperour, who, being himſelf an Arian, and making peace with a Nation which was not ſo, and ſuppoſing that they would never have firm concord with him, to whom in Faith he was ſo oppoſite, was adviſed to perſwade their Biſhop to change his belief, for which end having employ'd both words and money, and effected it, the Biſhop, directly contrary to Saint Peter, being himſelf weakened, weakened his brethren, who yeilded to communicate with the Arians (which before they abhorr'd from) and to eſteem the Father greater than the Son. Theodret lib. 4.

The ſecond, is of that Macedonian Biſhop, who, being perſecuted by the Catholick Biſhop of the ſame place (who was then gone to Conſtantinople to fetch Souldiers, by whoſe aſſiſtance he might afflict the Hereticks the more) reſolved to turn Catholick, and perſwaded all his followers to joyn with him in that Act, and this in ſo ſhort a time, that when the other returned, he found him choſen Biſhop unanimouſly by both Parties, and himſelf (for his cruelty, not undeſervedly) excluded.

There is beſides another thing which helps to let in great errours, which is, that men naturally neglect ſmall things, and ſmall things in time naturally beget great; for which cauſe Ariſtotle ſhewing to us ſeveral cauſes of the Changes of Government, one of them is διὰ τὸ παρέμπιπτον, adding, that πολλάκις λανθάνει μεγάλη γιγνομένη μεταβάσις ὑπὸ νομίμων, ὅταν παρορῶνται μικρόν, Often a great change comes ſtealingly in, when what is little is not conſidered.

Yet beſides the general careleſneſs; The Authority of the Teachers, the Flexibility of the Taught, and the ſmalneſs of the Things themſelves at the beginning, even Intereſt it ſelf (which conſiſts of two Parts, Fears, and Hopes (is able to produce great effects: Of this me-thinks your ſelves may be witneſſes, who uſe to call ours, a Parliamentary Religion, as thinking, that the Will of the Prince, and both Houſes, onely made it to be receiv'd: Whereas in the beginning of Queen Elizabeths Reign, of many thouſand Livings which were in England, the Incumbents of not a hundred, choſe rather to loſe their Benefices for your opinions, than to keep them by ſubſcribing to ours; all who (for the greateſt Part) of neceſſity muſt be ſuppoſed for private intereſt, to have diſſembled their Religion, either then or immediately before.

Secondly, In the Third Book of Evagrius we find, that above five hundred Biſhops ſubſcribed againſt the Council of Chalcedon, which we have reaſon to think, moſt did unwillingly, (eſpecially, if the Infallibility of a general Council were ſo famous a Doctrine for Catholicks as now it is) becauſe we know it was upon Baſiliſcus his commands, and that a conſiderable Part of them (the Biſhops of Aſia) profeſs'd after, they were forc'd to it, though before they had been very angry in another Epiſtle with thoſe, who ſaid that they had done by force, rather than Free-will.

And over and above all this, we may ſee by Eraſmus his words, that many might not oppoſe a Doctrine brought in by great Power, in hope of a time to doe it in, when there might be more likelyhood of prevailing: for he ſaith in one place of his Epiſtles, that thoſe who reſiſt opinions, when there is no probable means of doing good by it, are like thoſe, who out of ſeaſon attempt to break Priſon, who gains nothing by it, but to have their Irons doubled upon them: And the ſame cauſe which he thinks ſhould move them to ſtay (outwardly) contentedly in Priſon, may have made many others not reſiſt, when they were firſt by violence and crowd carryed thither, who might fear leſt their oppoſal might not help their cauſe, but beget a definition againſt it. And there being thus many ſeveral motives which may work upon ſo many ſeveral kinds of men, it is no wonder, if an errour may ſoon over-run all men, or ſeem to do ſo.

Next, Whereas you ſpeak of ſeveral Countries, and Languages, I muſt deſire you to remember, that the Clergy of your Church are as it were all of one Language, (Latine either being, or being ſuppoſed to be, as much theirs, as that of their own People) and being under the Dominion of one, that is the Pope, which makes them as it were one Country, and from them the Laity receive all their opinions: Nay in ancient times almoſt all conſiderable men ſpoke the Language of the governing Nation, (as all of the better ſort of the Iriſh do Engliſh) and the greateſt part of Chriſtians were governed by one man, the Emperour, and ſo a new opinion may eaſily have been received generally, no ſuch bars being ſet up to hinder it, as you alledge.

Object. Chriſtian Doctrine is not a ſpeculative knowledge inſtituted for delight, but it is an Art of living, a Rule of attaining to eternal bliſs; hence it followeth, that no errour can fall, even in a point which ſeemeth wholly ſpecula- ſpeculative in Chriſtian Faith, but ſoon it breedeth a Practical effect, or rather a defection in Chriſtian behaviour.

I wonder much to hear you ſay this, who certainly have a Religion conſiſting of many pionts, which are no way reduced into Practice: Eſpecially from the degrees in which they are held, (which I conceive introduced) could ariſe no change in Chriſtian behaviour; I confeſs that Chriſtian Religion being a Covenant between God and Man, by the entermiſe of Chriſt, we Chriſtians are properly concerned but in the knowledge of what are the Conditions and Reward propoſed and promiſed, what we are to obſerve, and what to hope for; and in ſo far-forth underſtanding the Nature and Attributes of the covenant-maker and bringer, as we may be made ſure, that whatſoever God hath promiſed or threatened, that indeed he hath: But though this principally concerns us, yet the neceſſity of believing the veracity of God, obligeth us moreover to give our Aſſents to any thing, how little ſoever it have to doe with practice (as Saint Paul's having Parchments) if it be once made to appear to us either by Scripture, Reaſon, Tradition, or any way to have been ſaid by God either immediately, or mediately by Chriſt and his Apoſtles: And do not your ſelves count the Greeks Hereticks for denying the Proceſſion of the Holy Ghoſt from the Son, (though many Fathers deny it too) though, I pray, what hath that to doe with Practice or Chriſtian behaviour? and if you ſhould now change your opinion in this point, what outward change would it breed, except onely the blotting out of one clauſe in a Creed in your Liturgy, wherein it was not at firſt? And not ſo much outward change would there be, if you ſhould turn to believe Enoch and Elias, not to be ſtill alive, the contrary to which, Bellarmine ſays, all Catholicks hold now with a certain Faith: And many more are of this kind. Reſp. Cap. 6 Lib. 3 de Romano Pontifice.

Object.

Whether man have Free-will or no, ſeemeth a Queſtion belonging to ſome curious Philoſopher; but upon the Preaching of the Negative part, preſently followed an unknown Libertinage, men yielding themſelves over to all kind of Concupiſcence, ſince they were perſwaded they had no power to reſiſt, Free-will being taken away.

Reſp.

At this time it is not my own cauſe which I plead, Ἐνταῦθα ἂν ὑποπτ]ῶ· γίγνομαι, ἀπὸ τοῦ ἐμαυτῷ κατασκευάζων, ſince in this point I confeſs, I ſhould rather be a Pelagian, than a Calviniſt, ſince the firſt doth not wholly overthrow God's Grace, (for whatever we have by Nature, His grace gives us) but the ſecond wholly everthrows His Juſtice, beſides the direct contrariety of their Doctrine to Scripture, they ſaying in effect, that the Kingdom of Heaven is to take us by violence, whereas that teaches us, that we are to take it ſo: But yet give me leave to ſay thus much for them, that though it be true, that ill life follows very conſequently from that Principle, and thoſe who hold it, muſt be ill Logicians, if they be good men, yet it is plain, that very many of them live as good lives, as any who believe the contrary.

Beſides, this in my opinion concerns as nearly your Dominicans, as our Calviniſts, ſince they uſe Free-will, as Tully ſaith Epicurus did the gods, verbis aſſerunt, re negant; aſſert it in words, but deny it in deed: yet I think you will not ſay that they are the more licentious, for (by direct conſequence) denying Liberty; If therefore an opinion, which is ſo nearly tyed to action, produce no more effects, how much fewer would thoſe other ſo much more unconcerning Tenets bring forth?

I need not inſtance in Prayer to Saints, worſhipping Images, Prayer for the Dead, &c. which it is evident could not be changed without an apparent change in Chriſtian Churches.

Object.

Without change (which though it muſt be then apparent, yet need it not be ſo to us) I confeſs they could not come in, but with little oppoſition they might: the doubtfull eſtate of the dead after this life, before the day of Judgment-audit, being much better that they ſhould have our Prayers, though they want them not, than miſs of them if they want them, may not unlikely (and peradventure not unreaſonably) have brought in that Cuſtom without either giving ſcandal, or being received by Tradition; Though if it had, ye would have gotten little by it, for unleſs ſuch a Purgatory, out of which Indulgences may deliver, will follow out of it, the Pope will not care for the other, as being οὐδὲν πρὸς τὸ ἀλυσιτ, nothing to profit: And though he did eſtabliſh a Purgatory, yet it might be one after the Reſurrection, for ſuch a one, more than one Father ſpeaks of: But it need eſtabliſh none, (no not any third place, which is leſs) for the prayers might be firſt intended for the encreaſe of the happineſs of the Bleſſed, and relaxation of the torment of the Curſed, which latter effect, that the Prayers for the dead have, is ſaid by Prudentius, and confeſs'd to have been ſaid, both by him, and others, by your own Heroe, Cardinal Perron. Reſp. Lib. con. Reg. Jac. Pag. 892.

Of the worſhip of Images I ſhall ſpeak hereafter.

Praying to Saints may have come in upon conſequences drawn out of miſtaken places of Scriptures, or others, which inducing the opinion, that they enjoy'd the beatifical viſion before the day of judgment, ſome might conclude, that then they ſaw all in it, and at firſt pray to them but conditionally; till their number increaſed, and with it, the degree in which they held the opinion, till now to deny it, is accounted Hereſie, though I know no Father which juſtifies our invocating of them (although they ſpeak of their interceding for us) before Nazianzene, whoſe example alone being of ſo great authority might ſpread it much: though, I pray, remember, who (as ſays Nicephorus Calliſtus) it was that brought it firſt into the publick Liturgy.

It is not poſſible, that any material point of Chriſtian Faith can be changed, as it were, by obreption, whilſt men are on ſleep, but it muſt needs raiſe a great ſcandal, and tumult: For ſuppoſe the Apoſtles had taught the world, it were Idolatry to pray to Saints, or uſe reverence to their Pictures, how can we imagine this honour brought in but by a vehement conflict and tumult in a people, which did ſo greatly abhor Idolatry, as the Apoſtles and Diſciples did? Object.

Ἄμαι ἀπάτην δι δ' ἀπηρτύνετο σκάφας: I ſpoke chiefly, not of changing a point of Faith, but of creating one, not of contradicting a doctrine delivered from the Apoſtles, but of introducing one, of which they were wholly ſilent, either as theirs at firſt (as ye muſt ſay Papias did) or onely as True, till being rooted and ſpread, it be believed Apoſtolical upon Tertullian's Argument, that elſe how could ſo many Churches, errare in unam fidem, erre into the ſame belief, which (becauſe leſs time had then been allowed errour to diſperſe it ſelf in) was then, though no concluding proof, yet a better than it was the next Age, and ſo ſtill grew the worſe for the wearing, till now it is worth juſt nothing. Reſp.

But as Himerius ſaith, ῥᾷστον ἀπολογῆσθαι περὶ ὧν ὁ φεύγει τις λέγει, I ſay, tis moſt eaſie to anſwer that which is not imputed, for I am ſo far from ſaying that the Apoſtles taught theſe two things to be Idolatry (ſince on my Conſcience they ſpake not of them directly at all) that I my ſelf will not ſay they are. For Prayer to Saints (ſet aſide your Idolatry-like Expreſſions, ſeeming to beg that of them, which you profeſs, you mean onely to have them beg for you) I ſuppoſe the Queſtion to be but this, whether they hear us or no (which Martyrs might poſſibly do, and yet no other, how holy and canoniz'd ſoever, becauſe many Fathers held that none elſe ſee God yet) If they do, I believe you may as well (or better, becauſe you are more ſure of their being in favour with God) deſire them to intercede for you, as you may deſire the Prayers of any living Friend; but if they do not, then I will not ſay in Chryſoſtome's phraſe, πόσων ἂν ἄξια ταῦτα σκήπτων, what Thunderbolts doth it not deſerve, but how unreaſonable is it to caſt men out of the Church, and ſend them out of the world, for not aſſenting to an opinion, which you cannot prove.

For reverence to the Pictures of Saints, if you mean onely ſome outward civil reſpect, to teſtifie the great honour and love which you bear the Prototypes, It is, I believe, no more Idolatry, than keeping off our hats in the Preſence-Chamber to the Cloth of Eſtate.

Yet this I am ſo far from eſteeming neceſſary, that I think they had better never come in, than have occaſion'd ſo much un-chriſtian turmoile about ſo indifferent a thing. The firſt and pureſt Ages
Tertul. did well enough without theſe Pictures (we hear onely of a Parabolical one of Chriſt in a Chalice) after they came to be made, after to be ſet in Churches, after to be prayed before, nay, at laſt they are come to ſo great an exceſs, that not onely againſt Scripture, but all Antiquity, they are now come to picture God the Father himſelf: Upon a Pope's Letter to an Emperour, wherein he defends the picturing of Saints and Chriſt, and ſpeaks improbably of the Antiquity of their Pictures, and adds the reaſon why they pictured not God the Father, Baronius ſays in the Margent, Yet it hath after happened, that they pictured him as he hath appeared; a way which the Church of that De fide & Symb. time could eaſily have found out, had they thought it lawfull, as it is plain Saint Auſtine did not, unleſs Nefas eſt be an Approbation: This alone may ſerve to ſhew that beliefs may come in, even contrary to that of former time (and yet we not know when they entered) unleſs you will oppoſe a ſuperficial reaſon, that a thing cannot be, to a plain example that it is, and force me to anſwer with Barlaam, νεκρὸν βλέπω, λέγεις μοι ὅτι ἀδύνατον ἀποθανεῖν, You tell me, it is impoſſible for him to die, whoſe Corpſe I look upon.

Object. We remember in a manner as yet, how change came into Germany, France, Scotland, and our own Country, let theſe be a ſign to us, what we may think can be the creeping in of falſe doctrine.

Reſp. This is but a continuance of the ſame Paralogiſm: For at this time, in theſe places, a ſetled Religion being contradicted, the caſe is very different from an Opinions prevailing in the minds of men, when they were yet white Paper, and not filled with any doctrine to the contrary, either becauſe though once the contrary had been taught, yet it had ſlept a good while, or becauſe nothing had before been ſpoken concerning it: We know, that nothing makes Noiſe but Oppoſition and Reſiſtance, and if that be not much, it will not laſt long, and the memory of it as little: Beſides, moſt of theſe points making for the power and wealth of the Clergy, you muſt not expect, that there ſhould have been as great an out-cry and hubbub when they were introduced at firſt, as when expelled after long prevailing, it being a work, both more ſhort, eaſie and ſecret to plant an Acorn, than to cut down or remove an Oak (χαλεπὸν γὰρ μεγάλην μεταφυτεύειν) although thoſe men which govern the reſt, were not in this caſe ſo much intereſſed.

Object. There is no point of doctrine contrary to the Catholick Church rooted in any Chriſtian Nation, that the Eccleſiaſtical Hiſtory doth not mention the times and combats, by which it entered, and tore the Church in pieces.

Reſp. The combats wherein it tore the Church, peradventure it doth, but of the times wherein many entred, they are altogether ſilent. All take notice of Arius his words, when by reaſon of Alexander's hot oppoſition there grew diviſions; but of what the Orthodox-counted Authours (which we have) before the Council of Nice, ſaid (though ask Perron, and he will tell you, how like Arianiſm they look) no Eccleſiaſtical Hiſtory makes any mention, becauſe they made no bounce like the other, and ſo in likelihood took no more notice of other opinions, which made none neither. And what is ſaid of this point, may be ſaid of Eutychianiſm (ſee the ſame place of Perron) for we know how Dioſcorus called upon the Fathers of the Pelagians, and others, whoſe opinions were certainly in the Church before them, who are now counted the Authours of them.

Nay, even of opinions rooted (as you call it) are not the Proceſſion of the Holy Ghoſt from the Father onely, the communicating Infants, the admitting none to the Beatifical Viſion but Martyrs, and other ſuch, rooted in the Greek Church? or can you tell when they entered? at leaſt, was it not long before any combat concerning them? But ſuppoſe this were true, it is but accidentally ſo, for ſome of thoſe writings which deliver this to us, might as well have been loſt, as many others which were, ſo that no man can conclude that, of whatſoever, no beginning can be ſhewed in Eccleſiaſtical ſtory, that hath not been introduced, (eſpecially ſince I ſpeak not ſo much of opinions oppoſing the Ancient Tradition, as of Superfetations, not onely of points indeed Material, but of ſuch as in continuance of time, have grown to be thought ſo) for how can I tell, many of them having been loſt, but ſome of thoſe would have given me notice of it, if I now had them.

Object. Let it therefore remain for evidently conſtant, that into the Chriſtian Church can come no Errours, but it muſt be ſeen and noted, and raiſe ſcandal and oppoſition.

Reſp. Here, Sir, not onely Ἄιξ ἔπω τέτυκεν, ἕειφ' ὑπὸ δώγματα παίζει, you reſolve upon a Truth of a concluſion, before you have proved the Premiſſes; but even that is ſuch a one as follows not out of them, although they were granted: For how follows it, that becauſe all heretofore have been noted, therefore all at all times muſt be ſo; nay, that though at the coming in they found ſcandal and oppoſition, we neceſſarily (many centuries after) muſt know they did ſo (For the knowledge, which we have of these things, is but Reliquiæ Danaum; what was overseen by the zeal and negligence, and how much we want of what we might have known, had the rest scap'd, no man can tell who pretends not to Revelation, and to the ability of knowing what was in Books, whereof he never saw any, and never heard of most: But though it follows not, such a thing hath been done, therefore it must ever be; yet it follows (in spite of the most severe exception) such a thing hath been done, therefore it may be; As for example, since Valentinian the Emperour bringing in, so contrary to Christian Religion, as you will confess Polygamy to be, and establishing it with a law which allowed it, and yet those who tell us both of his actions and his Edict, speaking no tittle of any opposition which was made to it, but he ever accounted a very good and pious Emperour, and his Son by his second wife (his first still living, and undivorced from him) being esteemed legitimate, and succeeding him in a part of his Empire; think you whether his authority could not have drawn the Principal men, (and inclusively the rest) to subscribe almost any opinion, who could keep them from opposing such an Act, or such a law? And if though this be now counted unlawfull, yet we find not, that either any Bishop advised him against it, or excommunicated him for it, or indeed any man disliked it: If any false opinion backt by great Power, have been not onely (like this) introduced, but spread and setled, how unlikely is it that we should now know what scandals it raised, supposing it raised any?

As in our Natural Body, the Principal parts are defended by bones, flesh, skins, and other defences, that no outward Agent can come to offend them, before having annoyed some of these; so in the Catholick Faith, there are in speculations, those which we call Theological Conclusions, and other pious opinions, and in practice; many rites and ceremonies, which stop the Passage unto the main Principal Parts of Christian belief, and Actions. Object.

Either these Theological conclusions, and pious opinions are derived from the same Tradition, or they are not; if they be, then sure they are equally matters of Faith, and so need some other course to defend them, and you must find Quis custodiet ipsos custodes: If they be not, but were onely deductions either of the first Ages Logick, (which was not always excellent) or of that of more Modern times, then may they so easily be false themselves, that I know not how they can serve to preserve the rest certainly from all corruption; indeed, to secure any Truth: But I believe many may be miscounted Hereticks, for onely opposing some of these, what through the over-caution, and too much ardour of some Primum mobile, and of the greater part lead by a few such, what through their being come (having been long) from pious opinions, to be matters of Faith, as in great Families Servants, who have waited long in meaner places, are rewarded with higher: Besides I verily believe, that many Doctrines, which you account necessary, have no such redoubts about them, or at least have not always had; and indeed you onely affirming it, by Tully's Rule, (who was no small Master of Reason) Sat erit verbo negare, It will be enough for me barely to deny it. And for Rites and Ceremonies which you suppose guard your Doctrines, (many used among the Ancients being not now in use amongst you) either some Tenets, which those did guard, and they did hold, ye held not; or if you do still, at least they are now unguarded. Resp.

But still, I speaking most of the easiness, that false and new Doctrines, not contradicting the old, may be brought into the Church; what answer is it, to tell me, how the Principal parts of Christian Religion are sure guarded, since so they may be, and yet such other may be brought in? As Christ's Promises, and chief injunctions may be retained, and yet praying to Saints, and Purgatory, and such like, be superinduc'd.

Let any discreet man consider, what farther evidence he can desire, or peradventure what greater assurance Nature can afford. Object.

Sir, I wish you so well that I cannot but give you warning, that this saying of yours doth Sapere Hæresin, since it seems as if you disclaimed any absolute Infallibility, and pretend onely to grounds of most possibility, which the Protestants doing too, use yet to be accused for making nothing certain, and having no firm foundation to build any thing upon: But as you claim less, than by your own Rules you should, so you claim still more, than either you are able to prove, or we likely to grant. Resp.

The Philosophers say, it is indisciplinati ingenii, to expect in any Science more exactness than the Nature of it affords. Object.

I confess this to be true; but I desire you also to remember, that as it is absurd to expect as exact a proof in the Politicks, as in Geometry, so it is absurd to expect as high a degree of Assent to the first, as to the second: my objections, being intended against those, who will be infallibly believed to be infallible upon probable grounds, for they themselves give them no higher a Title, and indeed that it self, in my opinion, is more than they deserve. Resp.

What shall we expect then in Religion, to see a main advantage on the one Party we cast our selves upon. Object.

Truly such Advantage on your part I cannot see: Neither if I did, could I in reason joyn with you. A main advantage it is, to have more Truth than any other Society of Christians: but supposing you had so (which is but a supposition, for I verily believe, if the Question were but, who had most Title to so much, ye would appear to a dispassionate man, οὐδὲ τρίτου, οὐδὲ τετάρτου, Neither third nor fourth, according to the answer of the Ancient Oracle) yet you withall require, not onely that I should believe, you erre in nothing, but that you never can; and then I had rather remain in their communion, I say not, who themselves erred not, but whose conditions of Communion were less rigorous, and exacted not of me to profess they could not erre, when I believe they do. And if you answer, that it would necessarily follow, that if they had fewest errours, they must have none, because some Society of Christians must be always free from all this; I shall absolutely deny, and the more earnestly, because I know this is a trap, wherein many have been caught, who taking this for granted, have examined the Doctrines of the most known Churches of Protestants, and finding (as they thought, and peradventure truly) some errours in them, some Doctrines no way to be proved but upon Popish grounds, Resp.

and by that juſtifying thoſe, and ſome imputations impoſed upon their Adverſaries, wherein their Tenets, or the conſequences from them were miſtaken, they then by the Doggs Logick have run over, without ſmelling to the Church of Rome, as knowing no other Society but theſe, and being prepoſſeſt, that one of neceſſity muſt be free from all errour: Whereas for my part, as the ἐκλεκτικοὶ, thoſe who bound not themſelves to believe abſolutely the whole Doctrines of any Sect, but pickt out what they thought accorded with reaſon, out of them all, were a wiſe ſort of Philoſophers; ſo they ſeem to me reaſonable Divines, who ſpeak God's will as they did Truth, (for it is not to chuſe by reaſon, and Scripture or Tradition received by Reaſon, which makes a Heretick, but to chuſe an opinion which will make moſt either for the chuſer's Luſt, or Power and Fame, and then ſeeking ways how to entitle God to it) For ſince it would be a Miracle, if the Errours of the Roman Church, being long gathering, could have been all diſcovered in a Day; or if it had been poſſible for the firſt Reformers, (who having their eyes but newly open, it is not ſtrange if (like the man in the Goſpel) they ſaw at firſt men walking like Trees, and had but an imperfect apprehenſion of Truth, eſpecially being in Tully's ſtate Quem fugio habeo, Quem ſequar non habeo, I ſee whom to fly, but not whom to follow,) not to have left ſome opinions untaxt, which yet were errours, nor to have expunged others, which yet were none; I cannot ſee why we may not in ſome points joyn with the one, and with others in other, and beſides find ſome Truths which ly ἐν μεσοτχμίῳ, well in the mid-way between the Parties, ἀφαιροῦντες ἑκατέραν τὴν ὑπερβολὴν, nay in ſome points differ wholly from both: Which Liberty, if it were generally allowed, and generally practiſed, if particular intereſts were trod wholly under foot, eſpecially by the greateſt, and if ſuch ſpirits as thoſe of Caſſander and Melanctbon were more common, no conſiderable things would in a ſhort time be left, but all would flow again in the ſame Chanel; whereas this opinion, that always one part erres not, is both prejudicial to Truth, and the beſt Unity, which is, that of Charity, for it perſwades them who have feweſt errours, to believe thoſe to be none, and to hate all oppoſers as Hereticks; and of this your Church is moſt guilty, which not onely affirms that there is ſuch a one, but that ſhe is it, and propheſies as much of her ſelf always for the future, as ſhe promiſeth for the preſent, and upon this ground (like him who having won nineteen games at Tables, threw the Dice in the fire for not winning him the twentieth) though we ſhould yield to her in all points but one, and that the leaſt conſiderable, ſhe would yet throw us into the fire as Hereticks, for diſſenting from her in that.

Object. You are bidden to put what year, or age, ſuch an errour entered, and it is evidently true, that then that year, or age, the Church conſpired to tell a lie, and deceive their poſterity.

Reſp. You would never be loved, if you were a Poſer, and uſed to ask ſuch hard queſtions; for either you muſt mean by [an opinion entering] when firſt any man profeſſed it, or when firſt by all in communion with your Church it was aſſented unto: If you mean the firſt, it is impoſſible to be anſwered; for if one ſhould ask, who taught firſt that Chriſt was not begotten by God, before he was conceived by the Virgin Mary, (through his power and the over-ſhadowing of the Holy Ghoſt) one who knew little of Antiquity, would anſwer Socinus, a more learned Perſon would ſay Photinus, another Paulus Samoſatenus, another might find before him, Artemon, and another yet before him, Theodorus σκυτεὺς, (with whom curious Logicians, and great Readers of Euclid, Ariſtotle, Galen, and Theophraſtus were joyned) and yet that he was the firſt, we have no certainty, for if a little of Euſebius had been loſt, Theodorus, and Artemon had not been now heard of, which may as well have happened to others before them, either by want of being take notice of by an Hiſtorian, or by the loſs of the Hiſtory, and not onely is this ſo in this, but in all other points.

If you mean the ſecond, (for ſo you muſt, by your Inference, though the words of the Queſtion will bear both ſenſes) it is as impoſſible for you to receive an anſwer. For how ſhall I know when by all it is granted? For ſuppoſe no Authour to have been loſt, and me to have read and remembred them all, yet (as in England, when the Calviniſts opinion prevailed moſt, as wiſe and learned men, as thoſe who writ, though differing in opinion from the Authours, yet oppoſed them not ſo publickly, but that many might believe the more general Tenet to be received by all) how ſhould I know that the opinions of the Authours of ſeveral Ages, did agree with that of all equally wiſe and learned in the ſame times? for if there be no greater certainty of the opinions of all of one Kingdom in our own Age, think what Infallibility can we have concerning an abſolute general conſent a thouſand years agoe. And of this, France may as well be an example as England, wherein many called Caſſandrians, diſſent from the publickly received Doctrines, though with ſo little ſtir, that our poſterity will not know that there now are ſuch; So that all which any man can anſwer to this Queſtion, is, that ſuch a one was the firſt that he knows of, who taught ſuch a Doctrine, and ſuch a time the firſt, wherein he knows not that any contradicted it, or that your Church defines it for a neceſſary opinion, and exacted aſſent to it, as a condition of their Communion; which anſwer will be nearer to Truth or Falſhood, according to the meaſure of the anſwerers learning; And indeed if you pleaſe to remember, that when learning roſe again, and the Reformation began, moſt Manuſcripts of conſiderable Books, had long layn unreguarded by the generality in Popiſh Libraries, and out of them onely had ſome few been Printed, you muſt confeſs, that it was in the power of your Church, what anſwer we ſhould be able to make to that Queſtion which you propoſe, which then it is no wonder if it were not anſwered, for your willingneſs to keep men in darkneſs concerning this, even in times of moſt light, is to be ſeen by your expurgatory Indexes: For there, though you profeſs to meddle with none but Modern Authours, (whereas it is plain you go as high as Bertram) yet both that will ſerve to deceive our poſterity concerning the general opinions of theſe times, and if your Church in former Ages uſed any courſe ſomewhat Analogical to this, upon thoſe Authours who then were modern too, (as likely enough they did, or you have cauſe to hope they did, for your more juſtification) then how can I know when any opinion entered, that is, either firſt was at all, or firſt by all taught: ſince in all times (how little mention ſoever be made of it) there may have been ſome Doctours of that opinion, though either no Authours, or although Authours, yet by this Stratageme may be kept from us.

Neither

Neither indeed can you anſwer this Queſtion your ſelf; for you know not in what Year, or Age, did either the giving the Euchariſt to Infants begin, or end, at leaſt Saint Auſtine knew not the firſt, who believed it an Apoſtolical Tradition: Neither was this a bare Cuſtome, but implyed an opinion of good which Children received, which the change ſhews plainly to have altered; and certainly either the firſt opinion was a Superſtition, or the latter a Sacrilege.

But howſoever, your Conſequence follows not, for though your Church conſpired, and deceived their Poſterity, yet it might not conſpire to deceive their Poſterity, but to inſtruct it, being themſelves deceived. And therefore when you reckon up the Motives which men have to ſpeak falſe, I wonder to ſee Hopes and Fears put in, and errour left out.

Object. It is God's courſe deeplier to root and ſtrengthen thoſe things which he would have moſt flouriſh. Now Chriſtians know, that he made mankind for his Elect, the world for mankind, and therefore he hath rooted thoſe things, which more immediately belong to his Elect (as his Church, Faith, and Holy Spirit in it) than the principles either of man's nature or of the world, which was made for it, himſelf aſſuring us of it, when he told us, That one tittle ſhould not periſh of the holy Writ, though Heaven and Earth ſhould be diſſolved; and ſo ſeeing the latter principle relyeth upon the not failing of God to his Church, which ſhould ever watch upon their actions, that nothing ſhould creep into Chriſtian life, which preſently the zeal of the faithfull ſhould not ſtartle at; I think it needleſs, to ſeek further to qualifie the ſtrength of that part, which receiveth it from the quality of ſo good a workman as the Holy Ghoſt.

Reſp. Ἀρχὴ παιδύσεως ἡ τῶν ὀνομάτων ἐπίσκεψις, I muſt therefore obſerve, that this word [Church] hath ſo many ſignifications even among your ſelves, that it ſeldom comes into the mouth of a Roman Arguer, but there comes withall, four Terms into his Syllogiſm; I could wiſh therefore, that you would ſtill ſet down your Definition of it, and put that (inſtead of the word Church) into what you ſay, leſt what your late Grecian Defender Cariophilus ſays of Hereticks, οἰεῖπορ ἡμῖν δεῖ περὶ τὰ τῶν χαλκιζόντων αἰνίγματα, ἴδιον δὲ μάλιστα τοῦτο συμπάντων τῶν αἱρετικῶν, πάντες ἀσαφείᾳ χαίρουσιν ὠμωνύμοις καὶ ἀμφιβόλοις, that they delight in doubtfull expreſſions, may ſeem more properly to belong to you: Certainly in ſome ſenſe the Elect are God's Church, and in that ſenſe, the Church belongs not to his Elect, but is it; neither indeed know I (define it as you pleaſe) how it doth, ſince you profeſs, that men may oppoſe any company of men, whomſoever you will call the Church, without being obſtinate, or conſequently by hereſie excluded from Heaven, and ſo may, for all that, be elected. Neither indeed know I, how God hath made mankind for his Elect: It is true, that having elected thoſe who ſhall perſevere in Faith and Obedience, and given man Free-will, which (joyned with Grace univerſally offered) might bring him to the condition, and in that to election, and by that to Heaven; God may be ſaid, to have made mankind for his elect, that is, to be his elect, if they ſhut not themſelves out of the way to be ſo; And all men (eſpecially Chriſtians) I believe have, and always ſhall have means enough to perform theſe condition, in ſuch a meaſure (all things conſidered; I mean, either natural defects, as in Ideots; never having heard of Chriſt, as in many Pagans; not having Chriſt's will ſufficiently propoſed, as in many Chriſtians, and whoſoever is not by ſome fault in his will hindred from aſſenting, to him it is not propoſed ſufficiently) as ſhall by God be from them required.

But this hinders not, but that all Chriſtians may ſee what they ſhould, if they ſtand not in their own light. or wilfully wink; and if they neglect Chriſt's Inſtructions or Commands, and make themſelves deaf againſt his voice, charm he never ſo wiſely, they then may fall from neceſſary Truths (much more from others) unto errour, as well as from good life into wickedneſs, from which, without queſtion, God's Spirit is as ready to keep men that will be kept, as from the other, and which is no leſs (if not more) part of the conditions required (for in that epitomy, which Chriſt hath given us of the day of judgment, men are onely mentioned to be puniſhed for want of Charity, and not miſinterpretations of doctrine) though I grieve to ſee ſo many of all parts (whereof I am too much one) live, as if God were ſo obliged to them for their Faith, that he were bound to wink upon their works, and not to be an Idolater, or not a Heretick, were enough not to be damned.

And certainly to ſay, That one tittle of God's Word ſhall not paſs away, is not to ſay, that God will keep here always a known company of men, to teach us all Divine Truths, which from them, becauſe of their authority, we may without more adoe accept (for unleſs you mean the Church in this ſenſe, it concerns not our differences) till you can prove that this word makes ſome ſuch promiſe. For this ſeems to me onely to ſhew the veracity of God's Word, without ſpeaking at all of any Churches continual obedience to it, or true interpretation of it, or the impoſſibility of her receiving the Traditions of men for the will of God.

Beſides in this Paragraph I obſerve three things.

The firſt, That you now draw your Arguments from the ſtedfaſt Truth of Holy Writ, whereas you neither quote out of it any thing to prove your main Aſſertion, and in that way, which you laid before to find out Truth by, you took no notice at all of Scripture, but would have all differences decided, by onely comparing what men had by verbal Tradition, like that Dominican, of whom Eraſmus tells us in his Epiſtles, that when in the Schools any man refuted his concluſion, by ſhewing it contrary to the words of Scripture, he would cry out, Iſta eſt Argumentatio Lutherana, proteſtor me non reſponſurum; This is a Lutheran way of Arguing, I proteſt I will not anſwer to it.

Secondly, You now bring the proof of your certainty, from God's Spirit never failing his Church (though you never define what is there meant by Church, nor do you bring any proof, or ever can, that God's Spirit will ſtay with any, unleſs they pleaſe it, or that this will not conſiſt with the leaſt errour in divine matters) whereas before you made it a Phyſical, or rather ſuperphyſical certainty, that Traditions muſt be delivered from Age to Age uncorrupted, and this, not becauſe of any other aſſiſtance, but ex neceſſitate Rei.

Thirdly, You ſeem to think, that aptneſs to ſtartle in the faithfull, will ſerve to ſecure them from all errours; Whereas I muſt profeſs my ſelf of opinion, that in ſome times, and ſome caſes, that may ſerve to induce it; for (it being truly ſaid, that there is as much folly beyond wiſedom, as on this ſide of it, and Nazianzene telling us truly, that διαιαρπίνουν τῇ σοφίᾳ οἱ πεζοὶ λόγοι ἀεὶ τὴν πίστιν, ἀεὶ ἄντε ὑπερπίπτουσιν, the mark is equally missed by over shooting, as by shooting short) I doubt whether over much caution may not have made some doctrines, and their Abetters, condemned (espetially when they appeared somewhat new) some Truths rejected for fear, lest they did by consequence con-

Arist. Ethick. tradict some points of Faith, when indeed they did, ὥσπερ οἱ κύνες ταχὺ συνιᾶσι εἰ φίλῳ, εἰ μὴν λοιμόν, ὑλακτοῦσιν, as Dogs often bark at a friend for an enemy, upon the first noise he makes, before having considered which he is: This made the Ancients so earnest against the now-certainty of the Antipodes, this in after times, for the same opinion, cost a Bishop his Bishoprick; and truth in all probability, would have then been defined a heresie, if a general Council had been called about it. Since then this aptness to startle, hath inclined Orthodox Christians to condemn, not onely those who had affirmed in terms the contrary to Tradition, but even those, from whose opinions they thought it would result, and consequently to exact an Assent, not onely to direct Tradition, but also to whatsoever else seemed to them reasonable deductions from it; This seems to me a way by which Errours may have entered by shoals, the first Ages (I mean then, Cùm Augustinus habebatur inexpugnabilis Dialecticus, quòd legisset Categorias Aristotelis) not having been so carefull and subtile in their Logick, as these more learned times, both Arminians and Calvinists, Dominicans and Jesuits, Papists and Protestants, seeming to me to argue much more consequently to their own Principles, more close to their present business, and every way more rationally, than the ancient Doctours used to do, I mean those which I have seen: And I am confident, that if two or three Fathers should rise again unknown, and should return to their old Argument against the Arians, from Cor meum eructavit verbum bonum, both Parties would be so far from receiving them for Judges, that neither would accept of them for Advocates, nor trust their Cause to their arguing, who opposed their common enemy no better.

Now that this way of making Deductions out of Tradition, and those both very hasty, and false ones, is very ancient, appears even by an example in the end of the Gospel of John, for there out of Christ's words falsly interpreted, a conclusion was drawn and spread among the Brethren, that Saint John should not dye; and what they did out of these words of Christ, other in other times may have done out of other words of his, and their Collection pass for his Doctrine; which shews the great advantage which we have by God's Word being written, since if it had not, we could not always have gone to a new examination of the very words, which Christ or his Apostles taught, and consequently a consequence of them spread in the place of them, would have been more incurable than now it is. I will also desire you to look in the five hundred eighty fourth Page of the Florentine Council, set out by Binius, and there you will find, that the Latines confess, that they added the Procession of the Holy Ghost from the Son, to the Creed, because the contrary opinion seemed to them by consequence, contrary to a confessed Tradition of Christ's eternal Divinity, to which, yet it will Con. Reg. Jac. Pag. 708. appear out of what Cardinal Perron hath excellently shown, (though upon another occasion) that it doth not contradict, but that this consequence was ill drawn; which may have been in other points too, and have brought in no small multitude of Errours since; neither was their Logick certain to conclude better, nor were they less apt to add to their Creeds accordingly, at any other times than they were at that.

Object. I doubt not but whosoever shall have received satisfaction in the discourse past, will also have received in the point we seek after, that is, in being assured both that Christ hath left a Directour in the World, and where to find him, there being no doubt but it is his holy Church upon Earth: Nor can there be any doubt which is his Church, since there is but one that doth, and can lay claim to have received from hand to hand his holy Doctrine.

Resp. That which makes you expect that your Reader should have received satisfaction by what you have said, is, that since Christ hath a great care of his Elect, he must consequently (most strongly of any thing) have rooted his Church. Now I having shewed, that by your own confession, men may be of his Elect, that are out of your Church, I seemed to my self to have likewise proved, that there is no necessity of any Churches being their Directour. I know you generally think this the more convenient way, to have left such a guide, that because otherwise Dominus non fuisset Discretus, or in Arian. Epictetus his Phrase, θεὸς ἔκαμεν ἐπιμελεῖτο ἡμῶν ὃν δεῖ τρόπον, you conclude that he hath: but we (though indeed in such cases where our κοιναὶ ἔννοιαι the common Notions concerning God, teach us, that such a Thing were contrary to God's main Attributes to doe, some of us conclude upon that ground, that this he hath not done) in these cases which onely concern convenience, of which we have much less certainty, begin at the other end, and considering first what he hath done, conclude that to be sufficiently convenient; and so finding no infallible guide by him instituted, suppose it convenient that there should be none: Truly if convenience were the measure, and our Understandings the measurers, we should resolve that God hath made every Particular man, at least every Pious man Infallible, and so to need no outward guide, which yet it is plain that he hath not done. Though in my opinion, in some sense, he hath made every man (who pleaseth) Infallible, in respect of his Journeys end, though not of all Inns by the way, certain to find Heaven, though he may miss many Truths in Divine matters: For the belief which God requires, of being to be thought true of his word, and that man be ready to believe and obey what he says, as soon as it shall appear to him that he hath said it, and every man being able (according to his means) to examine what he hath said; It follows, unless God should damn a man for weakness of understanding, (which were as strange, as if he should damn him for a weak sight, or a feeble arm) that every man is Infallible in his way to Heaven, so he lay no blocks in it himself, (at least is undoubtedly secur'd of any danger of Hell) For if they neither desire to avoid the trouble of enquiry, through unwillingness to find that to be true, which is contrary to what he now thinks, and so to hazard either the affection of dear Friends, or the favour of great Friends, or the fear of some other humane Inconvenience, as want of present means, Improbability to get more, or of that disparagement so terrible to flesh and bloud, of descending to confess that they Eras. Ep. have so long erred, (like Frobenius, qui potuisset vivere, nisi puduisset agrotare, Who might have lived, but that he was ashamed to confess himself sick) If, I say, none of these or the like things, either keep him him from ſeeking what is God's will, or from daring to profeſs it when he hath found it, then ſuch an Errour having no reference to the will, which is the onely fountain of ſin, cannot by a juſt God be puniſhed as a ſin; and the proof of the neceſſity of an Infallible Directour drawn from God's care of his Church, for his Elects ſake, is eaſily avoided.

But ſay you, if there be a Directour, it muſt be the Church; and again, becauſe you know that all congregations of Chriſtians, pretend to that Title in ſome ſenſe (as even the worſt men call themſelves by better Names than they deſerve, as Ariſtotle ſaith, οἱ λησαὶ ἑαυτὰς προσεκαλοῦντο) and I may miſtake our enemies Camp for our friends, and ſerve againſt Chriſt, whilſt I think I fight under his Banner (though even then, I believe, I ſhould have a ſhare in that prayer of his, to whom none is denied, Father forgive them, for they know not what they doe) unleſs you gave me ſome certain marks to know the Church by; you therefore ſay, what you have before ſaid, that yours is it, becauſe that alone pretends to Tradition; to which I anſwer, what I before anſwered, that the Greeks ſerve me to diſprove the ſufficiency of this Mark, who profeſs, that they hold the conſtant Tradition, and that under that Notion, they have both received what you deny, and not received what you propoſe. Rhetor.

Let us conſider in her, Preſence or Viſibility, Authority, Power; As for the firſt, her multitude and ſucceſſion make the one, that ſhe is ever acceſſible, ever known. Object.

What you now ſay, is not to prove your Church a Directreſs, but having (as you think, and I think not) proved that already, you now mean to ſhew, that ſhe hath the Conditions requiſite in a Directreſs: But this I deny, for neither is her Preſence or Viſibility, (for all her multitude and ſucceſſion) ſuch as were in a Directreſs required: For ſhe (beſides that ſhe muſt bring notice and proofs with her, to prove that ſhe is inſtituted by God to direct men; and thoſe plain and evident, if ſhe require merely but our aſſent; but if ſhe require us to aſſent Infallibly, then thoſe Infallible, which yours cannot doe) muſt alſo be ſo viſible, as to be known to all men, if not as a Directreſs, at leaſt as a Company of men, which yours ſure was not to thoſe Nations, which were lately diſcovered by Columbus: But if you except and ſay, ſhe need onely be viſible to all Chriſtians, (though this exception need a proof) yet even this Condition your Church hath not always had; for I believe, to thoſe Chriſtians whom Xaverius found in the Eaſt-Indies, your Church had been as little viſible, as to thoſe Pagans whom Columbus diſcovered in the Weſt: Beſides, beyond the Abiſſins, how far Chriſtian Religion may be propagated, and yet your Church unknown, who can tell? Beſides, even to moſt of them (for any credible Teſtimony that appears) ſhe may not be very viſible. But above all, that reaſon being anſwered, upon which you conclude, that there is ſome Directour, and that ground being taken away upon which you build, that yours is that, me-thinks it will be unneceſſary to diſpute long upon the Conditions required to that, which hath no entity at all. Reſp.

For Authority, her very claim of Antiquity and Succeſſion, to have been that Church which received her beginning from Chriſt and his Apoſtles, and never being all united under the univerſal government of her forewent it, giveth a great reverence to her among thoſe who believe her, and amongſt thoſe who with indifferency ſeek to inform themſelves, a great Prejudice above others. And if it be true, it carrieth an infinite Authority with it, of Biſhops, Doctours, Martyrs, Saints, Miracles, Learning, Wiſedom, Venerable Antiquity, and ſuch like. Object.

There is no Queſtion, but any Church, true or falſe, which claims to have ever kept the Apoſtles Doctrines uncorrupted, and is infallibly believed to have done ſo, muſt among thoſe Chriſtians who thus believe, have even equal Authority with the Apoſtles. But me-thinks, that this claim before proof, ſhould to others be any prejudice for her, (eſpecially to thoſe who have great Arguments againſt her) is unreaſonable; and if after conſideration it appears otherwiſe, ſhe hath then onely helpt to weaken her Teſtimony, and hath deſtroyed her Infallible Authority in any thing elſe. Reſp.

There remaineth Power, which no man can doubt but he hath given it moſt ample, who conſidereth his words ſo often repeated to his Apoſtles: But abſtracting from that, who doth not ſee that the Church hath the nature and proportion of ones Country to every one? As in a man's Country he hath Father and Mother, Brothers, Siſters, Kinsfolks and Allies, Neighbours and Country-men, (anciently called Cives and Concives) and of theſe are made his Country; So in the Church finds he in way to ſpiritual Inſtruction, and Education, all theſe degrees nearer and further off, till he come unto that furthermoſt of Chriſt his Vicar: and as he in his Country finds Bearing, Breeding, Settling in Eſtates and Fortunes, and laſtly, Protection and Security; So likewiſe in the way of Chriſtianity, doth he find this much more fully in the Church: So that if it be true, that a man oweth more to his Maſter than to his Father, Benè eſſe is better than eſſe; certainly a man alſo (as far as Church and Country can be ſeparated) muſt owe more to the Church, than to his very Country; Wherefore the Power which the Church hath to Command and Inſtruct, is greater than the Power of the Temporal Community, of which he is part. Object.

I wiſh you would have ſet down theſe words of Chriſt, ſo often repeated to his Apoſtles, in which Power to the Church (I mean ſuch a one as yours pretends) is undoubtedly given; For my part, truly I remember none; For I ſuppoſe not, that the Power given to the Apoſtles can reaſonably be claimed by any Society of men now, no not though you ſhould extend the Definition as largely as Eraſmus, (who ſays Eccleſiam voco totius Populi Chriſtiani conſenſum, I call the Church the Conſent of the whole Chriſtian People) unleſs that be meant too in all Ages, and ſo the Apoſtles would come in; They were ſo ſigned, and ſealed to (as I may ſay) from Heaven, by having moſt converſed with Chriſt, and been moſt beloved by him, and choſen eſpecially to teach the World his Will, that it is impoſſible any men could be indeed Chriſtians, and not receive their Doctrine, as that of Chriſt, without any other Proof; but there is no other Church that hath ſuch a Privilege; The Power of propoſing ſhe hath, and ſo have you, and without Queſtion, if you can convince any Chriſtian that what you ſaid, Chriſt ſaid firſt, he is bound both to believe and obey it; and again, let all Churches joyn in propoſal, yet till he be ſo convinced, (unleſs his own fault hinder it) it binds him not, neither is it ſufficiently propoſed, allowing it true, which it is not always neceſſary that it ſhould be, although ſo atteſted. For as a Natural Fool is not bound to obey any Doctrine or Precept, taught or impoſed by God himſelf, becauſe his underſtanding cannot diſcover it to be ſo: ſo in my opinion, whoſe underſtanding ſo- Reſp.

ever is not convinc'd of the ſame, (how plain ſoever to others the thing be) he is for as much as concerns this point, in the ſtate of a Natural Fool, and no more to be condemned.

Neither ſee I what you prove out of the Proportion between the Church, and every man's Country; for if any Church be intended by God to be ſo our Directour, that her propoſitions are to be received, becauſe they are hers, then indeed we owe her much more obedience than to our Country, which if it ſhould require of us to believe an opinion true, becauſe that hath defined it, I believe no man would obey, and he who ſhould preſs us to it, would be accounted ſo mad, that we ſhould ſend him, not to a Doctour of Divinity, but to a Doctour of Phyſick, to be confuted.

And that any Church is ſo intended, appears not at all by this propoſition, ſince the ſame is even amongſt the Church of the Turks, which is, Eccleſia malignantium, for there they find their Metaphorical Fathers, Mothers, Brothers, Siſters, Kinsfolks, Allies, Neighbours, (which all Hereticks do too among themſelves) all theſe degrees nearer and further off, till at laſt they come to that furthermoſt, of being united under the Univerſal Government of Mahomet's Vicar, the Mufty. But to them you would ſay, that this proves not Truth, but at moſt Concord, and that is Factio inter Malos, which is Saluſt. Amicitia inter Bonos; therefore the ſame we anſwer you, ſince Pyrats, and Thieves, have as ſtrict bonds among themſelves, as the honeſteſt perſons, and often greater conſpiracies, and συγκεχυμένως, to deſtroy theſe, than they make to defend themſelves. And whereas you ſay, that we owe more gratitude and obedience to the Church, than to our Country, I have told you, that this may be true without owing obedience to all ſhe teaches; But yet even this in ſome ſenſe is True; To the general Tradition of Chriſtians of the firſt Ages who lived with the Apoſtles, and could not in any likelihood but know their writings, I owe the knowledge of the Scripture, and to that, the knowledge of God's will, and to that, Heaven, if I conform carefully to it both my Life and my Belief; and to the Church in this ſenſe, I owe both as much gratitude as you pleaſe, and believe whatſoever this, as generally, witneſſeth to have received from the Apoſtles: But this concerning any preſent Church, doth as little concern your preſent purpoſe: For let us mean by the Church, that company of men which hath kept Tradition wholly uncorrupted, (and ſuppoſe there is ſuch a one) yet to know that ſhe hath done ſo, I muſt examine her Doctrine; and compare it either with Scripture, or the firſt Antiquity, and ſo rather receive her for it, than it for her: Beſides, that the whole Church teaches nothing, and if ſhe did, yet by the ſame ways from any ſingle learned Orthodox man, I may receive the ſame inſtruction, to whoſe commands nevertheleſs (except when he delivers God's) I owe no obedience.

Thus too, when the Orthodox company commands as they are Orthodox, that is ſomething of the will of God, then they are to be obeyed; and ſo am I; and ſo again, when the choſen Governours for that purpoſe, command indifferent Things; but if they exceed their Commiſſion in commanding, no man is longer bound to obey, no more than if a Mayor of a Town ſhould command the People to make his Hay, they were bound to obedience, ſince commanding more than his Magiſtracy authorizeth him, he in that caſe is no Magiſtrate.

Object. This Church can ſatisfie both learned and unlearned. For in matters of Faith, above the reach of learning, whoſe ſpring is from what Chriſt and his Apoſtles taught, what learned man can refuſe in his inmoſt ſoul, to bow to that which is teſtified by ſo great a multitude to have come from Chriſt? and what unlearned man can require more for his faith, than to be taught by a Miſtreſs of ſo many prerogatives and advantages above all others?

Reſp. The learned cannot reaſonably be ſatisfied with this (eſpecially ſo far forth as to believe it infallibly true,) Firſt, becauſe they ſee great multitudes have and do teſtifie contrary things. Secondly, becauſe
Tom. 13. Pag. 468. they muſt have obſerved with Salmeron, that a multitude of ſome opinion may proceed from ſome one Doctour, eſpecially, if he be Illuſtrious; and ſome again, taken with a pious and an humble fear, chuſe rather againſt their mind, to approve what hath come from others, than to bring forth any new thing out of their own underſtanding, leſt they may ſeem to bring ſomething unwonted into the Church. This they muſt needs ſee, may bring an undelivered opinion to be general, and then the generality may bring it to be thought to come from Tradition, according to Tertullian's rule, Quod apud multas Eccleſias unum invenitur, non eſt erratum ſed Traditum, and that of Saint Auſtine, that of whatſoever no beginning is known, and yet is general, is to be believed to have its original from the Apoſtles. By this way (ſuppoſing that all your Church did witneſs, all their Doctrines to have had ſuch a lineal ſucceſſion, which they know to be falſe) they ſee, that opinions falſly and illogically deduc'd from true Traditions, may be equally believed to be ſuch themſelves, Vincentius Lirinenſis allowing the following Curch to give light to the former, which they might miſtake in doing, at leaſt, the certainty of her Illuſtrations cannot have their force from Tradition: By this way they ſee, that in time, ſuch Doctrines may come to have ſuch a general atteſtation, which had their firſt ſpring from Scripture miſ-interpreted, either by publick miſtakes, or by Councils miſlead, either by fear, errour or partiality; and what proceeded either from conſent, or definition, may ſeem to have been deduc'd from Tradition: In this they will be confirmed, by ſeeing plainly, that more is now required to be believed by the Church of Rome, than in all times hath been; that now among you contrary parties urge for, or expect a general Council to end queſtions, concerning which, neither ſide claims any continued verbal Tradition, and that the greateſt part are ready to receive ſuch a definition, in as high a degree, as any Tradition whatſoever; They will be alſo confirmed by your denying Infallibility to a Council, how general ſoever, unapproved by the Pope, by ſeeing, that if (as you ſay) no man can be ignorant what he was taught when he was a Child, as the ground and ſubſtance of his hopes for all eternity, and if in this, all your Religion were compriſed (or elſe to what purpoſe ſay you this) then no man bred in the Orthodox Church could err, or ever have erred in matter of Faith, without knowing that he had departed from the very Baſis of Chriſtianity; and for Inſtructions in theſe points, not onely all Authours, as Commenters upon Scripture, and the like, were wholly uſeleſs, but it were alſo a vain thing, to go for inſtruction even to Chriſt's Vicar, and Saint Hierome might have reſolved his own queſtion, about the ὑποστάσεις, every whit as well as Damaſus, or Saint Peter himſelf: And for the ſame reaſon, it were wholly impoſſible, poſſible, that at the ſame time the Popes, and moſt notable, and moſt pious, and moſt learned Papiſts living, ſhould have juſtified and applauded Eraſmus for the ſame works (the one by his printed Diplomas, and the reſt by their Letters) for which, at the ſame inſtant, the greateſt part of the Monks counted and proclaimed him a more peſtilent Heretick than Luther, if they had all weighed Hereſie in the ſame balance, and more impoſſible if in yours; which the learned will yet leſs approve of, when they ſee how ſoon the worſe opinion, and leſſer authority may prevail, as how that of the Monks hath done againſt that of the Popes, and Biſhops, and that ſo much, that Eraſmus is now generally diſavowed as no Catholick, and given to us (whom we accept as a great preſent) that Bellarmine will allow him to be but half a Chriſtian, and Cardinal Perron (which I am ſorry for) gives a cenſure upon him, which would better have become the pen of a Latomus, a Bedda, a Stunica, or an Egmundane, than of ſo learned and judicious a Prelate.

Now for the Ignorant, I am ſure you will never be able to prove infallibly to them, that your Church hath any prerogatives above others; the ordinary way cannot be taken with them, becauſe they not underſtanding the Languages, in which the Fathers and Councils are written, cannot be preſs'd by what they cannot conſtrue; and your way as little, becauſe they are not more (though totally) ignorant of the Authours of paſt Ages, than they are of the ſtate, opinions and claims of the preſent time; ſo that I know not how you can attempt them, if they have but a moderate underſtanding to their no-knowledge.

The body of our Poſition ſhoots forth the branches of divers Queſtions, or rather the Solutions of them: And firſt, how it happened, that divers Hereticks pretended to Tradition, as the Chiliaſts, Gnoſticks, Carpocratians, and divers others, yet they with their Traditions have been rejected, and the Church onely left in claim of Tradition; For if we look into what Catholick Tradition is; and what the Hereticks pretended, the queſtion will remain voided. For the Catholick Church calls Tradition, that Doctrine, which was publickly delivered, and the Hereticks called Tradition, a kind of ſecret Doctrine, either gathered out of private converſation with the Apoſtles, or rather pretended, that the Apoſtles, beſides what they publickly taught the world, had another myſtical way, proper to Scholars, more endeared, which came not to publick view, whereas the force and energy of a Tradition, reſiding in the multitude of hearers, and being planted in the perpetual life and actions of Chriſtians, it muſt have ſuch a publicity, that it cannot be unknown amongſt them. Object.

Of the Carpocratians and Gnoſticks, I have ſpoke before, but ſure for the Chiliaſts this is onely ſaid and not proved: Howſoever this undeniably appears, that either Papias and Irenæus thought not this Tradition to have come ſuch a way as you ſpeak of, or elſe they thought it no heretical way, but ſuch a one, as was (at leaſt reaſonably) to be aſſented to; and both what was the way by which Traditions ought to come, and by which this came, they were more likely to know, than thoſe of following ages; which proves, that this Objection (as much as concerns them eſpecially) remains ſtill ſo ſtrong, that (in ſpite of Fevardentius) it will be better to anſwer it, Scalpello quam Calamo, with a Pen-knife than with a Pen, and no Confuter will ſerve for it, but an Expurgatory Index, no non ſi tuus aſſoret Hector, if Cardinal Perron were alive. Reſp.

I muſt by the way take notice of what you ſay here, that Tradition muſt have ſuch a Publicity as cannot be unknown among Chriſtians, and deſire you to agree this with what you ſay in the next Paragraph, that the Apoſtles may not have preached in ſome Countries ſome Doctrines, which we now are bound to receive as Traditions; for ſure thoſe Doctrines were then unknown among many Chriſtians; and if they had been neceſſary, ſure the Apoſtles would no where have forgot (with ſo good a Prompter as the Holy Ghoſt) to have taught them; If they were not then neceſſary, how have they grown to be ſo ſince? Beſides, I appeal to your Conſcience, whether it appear that the Doctrine of the Exchequer of Superabundant merits, of which the Pope is Lord Treaſurer, and by virtue of which he diſpenſeth his pardons to all the Souls in Purgatory, appear to have been known even to any of the beſt Chriſtians, and whether if it had been known to them as a Tradition, (being a Doctrine which neceſſitates at leaſt Wiſedom and Charity, a continual practice of ſuing for them, and of giving them) it were poſſible, that of what they knew, ſuch infinite Volumes of Authours ſhould make no mention.

Suppoſe ſome private Doctrine of an Apoſtle to ſome Diſciple ſhould be publiſhed, and recorded by that Diſciple, and ſome others, this might well be a Truth, but never obtain the force of a Catholick Poſition, that is, ſuch as it would be a damnation to reject, becauſe the deſcent from the Apoſtle is not notorious, and fit to ſway the body of the whole Church. Object.

I confeſs, that to have been no more generally delivered, will prove that the Apoſtles thought not ſuch a Doctrine neceſſary, elſe their Charity would not have ſuffered them to have ſo much concealed it; but yet to any ſuch Doctrine, it is impoſſible that any Chriſtian, who believes the teſtimony, that it came from the Apoſtles, ſhould deny his aſſent, becauſe it were to deny the Authority, upon which all the reſt is grounded; for the Church pretends to her Authority from them, and not they from her; and howſoever, ſuch a Doctrine (although not neceſſary) could not be damnable as you make this: Beſides, here will firſt ariſe a Queſtion not eaſie to be decided, how great a multitude of Witneſſes will ſerve to be notorious, and fit to ſway the body of the Church, eſpecially ſo many having not for a long while been thought fit even by Catholicks, though atteſting Doctrines ſince received by you all, and conſidering that multitude of your Church, which believe the immaculate Conception in as high a degree, as it is poſſible without excommunicating the deniers, who either walk not by that which you count the onely Catholick Rule, or elſe claim ſuch a Tradition, who yet are not thought fit to ſway the reſt. Reſp.

Secondly, I pray obſerve how eaſie it was for the two firſt Ages, at leaſt the chief of them, and all that are extant, to have given aſſent to Traditions ſo unſufficiently teſtified, or to have miſtaken Doctrines under that notion, (for ſo they did to this of the Chiliaſts) and then after, for it to ſpread till it were general, and laſt as long as men laſt, upon their authority; and when once it is ſo ſpread, how ſhall we then diſcover how ſmall an Original it had, when peradventure the head and ſpring of it will be as hard to find, as that of Nilus, ſo that the greateſt part of what you receive, might poſſibly appear to be no certainer, nor better built, if we could digg to the foundation: Wherefore, ſince the delivery of a Tradition by ſubſequent Ages hath its validity onely from the authority of the firſt, me-thinks you ſhould either think that they received none but upon better grounds, or elſe think theſe grounds good.

Thirdly, I know not why you reſolve this opinion of the Chiliaſts, to have had onely ſuch a private Tradition; for though they name John the Diſciple, and mention certain Prieſts who heard it from him, yet they deny not a more general delivery of it, but peradventure leſt men might think that the general opinion (that it came from the Apoſtles) might ariſe from places of Scripture, (which fallacy, their teſtimony, when not ſo fully expreſſed, was ſtill in danger of, concerning any point, but that theſe books were written by theſe men) they therefore thought it fit to name to us their witneſſes, that it came from Chriſt's own mouth, and in what words: And if they had done ſo much on your ſide, for the differences between us, I believe you would now have few Proteſtant adverſaries left, for you would have converted the greater part, and by that, have been enabled to burn the ſmaller.

Object. The ſecond Queſtion may be, How it cometh to paſs, that ſome things, which at firſt bind not the Churches belief, afterwards come to bind it? For if it were ever a Tradition, it ever muſt needs be publick, and ever bind the Church; and if once it were not, it appears not how ever it could come to be, for if this age for example have it not, how can it deliver it to the next that followeth? But if we conſider that the ſcope of Chriſtian Doctrine being great, and the Apoſtles preaching in ſo great varieties of Countries, it might happen ſome point in one Country might be leſs underſtood, or peradventure not preacht, which in another was often preacht, and well both underſtood and retained, we may eaſily free our ſelves from theſe brambles: For the Spirit of Tradition reſiding in this, that the teſtimony be exceptione majus, and beyond all danger of deceit; It is not neceſſary to the efficaciouſneſs of Tradition, that the whole univerſal Church ſhould be witneſs to ſuch a truth, but ſo great a part as could be a warrant againſt miſtaking; ſo that if all the Churches of Aſia, Greece, or Africk, or Ægypt, ſhould conſtantly affirm ſuch a Tradition to have been delivered them from the Apoſtles, it were enough to make a Doctrine exceptione majorem: Whence it enſueth, that if in a meeting of the univerſal Church it were found, that ſuch a part hath ſuch a Tradition concerning ſome matter, whereof the reſt had either no underſtanding, or no certainty, ſuch a Doctrine would paſs into a neceſſary bond of Faith in the whole Church.

Reſp. Your ſword is ſo ſharp, and your ſhield ſo weak, that I can hardly believe they came out of the ſame forge; but when I obſerve how much you have a better right hand than a left, and that not onely you have raiſed an objection which you cannot lay, but your anſwer to it multiplies more, I cannot but compare you to him in Lucian, who travelling with a Magician that had no ſervant, and inſtead of one was daily wont to ſay to a Peſtle, Peſtle be thou a man, and it would be ſo, and when his occaſions were ſerved, would bid it return to be a Peſtle, and was obeyed, thought one time to imitate the Magician, he being abroad, and made indeed the Peſtle a man, and draw water, but could not make it return to the former ſtate, but it continued ſtill to draw, wherefore angry and afraid, he took up an ax and clove the Peſtle-man in two, whereupon ἐγένοντο τὼ μιᾷ ὑδροφόροι, inſtead of one water-drawer there leapt up two: For firſt I pray conſider, what could you have found more certain to deſtroy all, which you had before laboured to ſettle, about the Infallibility of your Tradition, than this diſtinction of Exceptione Major, ſince, if not a general one, but one which ſeemed ſuch, were required, how eaſie it was for falſe opinions to get in, under that colour, teſtified but by a few reputed honeſt men, and ſo received by, and tranſmitted from others of great and general authority? Secondly, how could you have found a better way to anſwer your own Objection againſt the Chiliaſts Tradition, for want of being ſufficiently publick, ſince if that had not ſeemed to them to have had this condition (I mean, if they had thought they ſhould for this cauſe have excepted againſt it) it had been impoſſible theſe Saints ſhould have received it, and concerning the publicity of it, and the number and authority of the deliverers, they muſt of neceſſity have been the beſt Judges who then lived, and who were the more conſiderable Doctours of the moſt conſiderable Ages: ſo that you muſt either confeſs, that a Tradition binds not, unleſs indeed general, or confeſs that this doth, ſuppoſing this not to have been general, which you cannot prove.

Philoſ.

Object. A likely example of this may be drawn from the Canonical Books.

Reſp. I deny it to be now neceſſary to Salvation, to admit of any Books for Canonical, which it was lawfull for Chriſtians in paſt ages to doubt of, and which had no general Tradition; and again, this anſwer helps againſt your ſelf: for it is plain by Saint Hierome's Teſtimony, that the Roman Church received not the Epiſtle to the Hebrews, which the Eaſtern Churches received (whoſe Teſtimony, according to your grounds, ſhe then ſhould have believed to be beyond exception) and it is plain by Perron's Teſtimony, that the Eaſtern Churches received not the Maccabees, when he ſays, the Church of Rome did. Now it is plain, that the Receivers pretended to Tradition, becauſe nothing elſe could make a Book thought Canonical, whereas other opinions might be brought in by a falſe Interpretation of Scriptures, and after being ſpread, might be thought to come from Tradition: So that according to your grounds and theſe Teſtimonies, not onely the Weſtern Church ought to have believed the Eaſtern about the Epiſtle to the Hebrews, and the Eaſtern the Weſtern about the Maccabees, but alſo they ought to have required this aſſent from each other, which they not doing (as they would have done, if they had thought their Teſtimony ſo valid as you do) it follows, that you do differ from the Churches of the fifth and ſixth age, about what is exceptione majus, you thinking that to be ſo, which they thought not; and again, from all the extant Doctours of the two firſt ages, you thinking that not ſo, which they thought was; as alſo thoſe two times agreed about it, as little with each other, as you with them both.

Object. The third Queſtion may be, How Chriſtian Religion (conſiſting of ſo many points) is poſſible to be kept uncorrupted by Tradition, which depending upon Memory, and our memory being ſo frail, it ſeemeth, cannot without manifeſt

manifeſt miracle conſerve ſo great a diverſity of points unchanged for ſo many ages. But if we conſider, that Faith is a Science, a thing, whoſe parts are ſo connexed, that if one be falſe, all muſt needs be falſe, we ſhall eaſily ſee, that contrarily, the multitude of divers points is a conſervation, the one to right the other, wherein we doubt.

As in Judges, when a battel was to be fought between the Children of Iſrael and the Midianites, the Midianites deſtroyed each other, and left nothing to doe for Iſrael, but onely to purſue them; ſo truly, your Objections work ſo ſtrongly upon your own Party, that I have nothing left me to preſs, and much to applaud: For, for this very reaſon, I believe, that all neceſſary points were given in writing, and onely the witneſſing, that theſe were the Apoſtles writings, was left to Tradition, which was both much leſs ſubject to errour (as being but one point, and that a matter of fact) and could no other way be done, becauſe no writing could have witneſſed for it ſelf ſo ſufficiently, that we ſhould have had reaſon to have believed it upon no other certificates; and to this your anſwer ſeems to me no way ſatisfactory; ſince, firſt, I deny Faith to be a Science, it being nothing but an aſſent to God's Revelations; neither are thoſe ſo connexed as you liberally affirm, and ſparingly prove; Nay, ſuppoſe they were, yet though errours would be the leſs likely to enter, yet when any one, by any means were got in, then this connexion would be a ready way to help it to let in all its fellows: Beſides thoſe opinions which may be ſuperinduc'd as Traditions, which ſuch a connexion could not hinder, if they were not contrary to the true ones; and of this ſort is chiefly our queſtion. Reſp.

That therefore you are no better able to wind your ſelf out of this inextricable Labyrinth, is no wonder to me, and no diſgrace to you, ſince a man may as well be a good Logician, though he cannot ſolve an inſolvable queſtion, as he may be exceedingly skilled in Phyſick, and yet not able to cure an incurable Diſeaſe; Beſides, that theſe Objections aroſe ſo at the firſt ſight, out of what was to be conſidered, that it was as impoſſible for to avoid them, as to anſwer them.

Let us conſider in conſtant Nations, their Language, their Habits, &c. how long they continue among them. Object.

Truly there is no Nation that I know, whoſe Language hath not, and doth not daily palpably ſuffer change. Conſider, that of theſe Engliſh hourly denizoning words of all kind of Languages, theſe of the Spaniards, Italians and French, almoſt made up out of Latin, and that of the ancient Greeks, unknown to thoſe of this Age, unleſs they learn it at School: Habits indeed ſome Nations alter leſs, but ſome daily, and none change not ſometimes: But this is little to the purpoſe, ſince thoſe Nations which have remained very conſtant in things, which no conſiderable cauſe appeared to them why they ſhould alter, may yet have received new opinions (eſpecially if not contradicting the old) taught them by ſuch, in whom they wholly relied, (as moſt go more hood-wink'd in theſe matters, than in thoſe which are indifferent, out of a Vicious humility) or proved by Arguments which perſwaded. For when the reaſons are probable (as they may be for a falſhood) the Perſons preſſing them, in themſelves of authority (as they may be and yet err) and the people to whom they are preſt, full of eſteem of their Teachers, then meet the three ways of working perſwaſion which Ariſtotle mentions, whereof αἱ μὲν ἐν τῷ ἤθει τῦ λέγοντος, αἱ δ' ἐν τῷ τὸν ἀκροατὴν διαθεῖναι πῶς, αἱ μὲν ἐν τῷ δεικνύναι ἢ φαίνεσθαι δεικνύναι· Eſpecially when beſides all theſe, the rewards of belief propoſed, are more than extraordinary, as alſo the danger of disbelief. Wherefore I count it by no means reaſonable, ἀκολουθεῖν τοῖς ἧττον πιθανοτέρων ἴχνεσι καθάπερ τὰ πρόβατα, like ſheep (without more examination) to walk in the ſteps of thoſe, who have gone before us. Reſp.

See that forlorn Nation of the Jews, how conſtantly it maintaineth the Scripture, and how obſtinately their Errours. Object.

Truly I thank you, Sir, for this example, ſince it puts me in mind of an Objection, which elſe I had utterly forgot: Many of thoſe errours which they hold, (as the Cabala and others) I pray, upon what other ground hold they them than this, that they have been taught, Moſes delivered them to their Fathers, as unwritten Traditions, and that under that Notion they have deſcended: Now may not they defend themſelves in them, by the very ſame Arguments which you uſe in this Treatiſe for the Church of Rome? May not they ſay that they have received them from their Fathers, who received them from theirs, who muſt either have joined in miſtaking their Anceſtours, or in intending to deceive their Poſterity, whereof neither is credible? May not they ſay, what is ſaid of theſe laſt Ages, may be ſaid upwards and upwards, till they come to that, wherein their Fathers received theſe Doctrines from Moſes, who was ἀξιόπιστος, as worthy of credit in the delivery of theſe, as in that of the ten Commandments, and their Fathers witneſſes beyond exception, that theſe Doctrines be delivered? May they not ask you what year or age, theſe errours entred among them, and ſay it is evidently true, that then their whole Church conſpired to tell a lie? May they not bid you beſides conſider the Notoriouſneſs of the lie? ſuch as he is very rarely found, who is ſo wicked as to venture upon; beſides the greatneſs of the ſubject, and the danger enſuing to himſelf and his deareſt Pledges? May they not add, that the multitude of their Church is ſo diſperſed through ſo many Countries and Languages, that it is impoſſible they ſhould agree together upon a falſe determination, to affirm a falſhood for a truth, no Intereſt being able to be common to them all to produce ſuch an effect? This they may ſay, and if they do, and retort your own words upon your ſelf, I know not, truly, what new ones you will find to anſwer them in, unleſs you change the whole courſe you now ſteer, and come about the ſame way which I now uſe to you, that is, ſhewing by what ways ſuch an opinion may have ſpread among them, although not at firſt received, and proving out of their own Authours, that this hath not been always held a Tradition among them, though now ſo accounted, which is ſometimes (as I remember) your own Galatinus his way, and the beſt that is: But if to that they ſhould again reply out of your own words (the Names onely changed) that if what Moſes delivered were certainly true, and what he delivered be to be ſeen in what they believed who heard him, and ſo till now, it is evident, that they who ſeek for truth in learned diſcourſes, muſt needs forego the moſt certain and eaſie way of attaining what they aim at: That Jew, who ſhould retort this, and much more of this kind upon you, and keep you to Tradition, and make their preſent Tradition (upon your grounds) the Judge of that, I am of opinion, would make you as ſilent, as if (according to the Proverb) Reſp.

you

you had ſeen a Wolf firſt, or were a Pythagorical Freſhman, and you would wiſh you had never put into an enemies hand ſuch a weapon againſt your ſelf, as this preſent diſcourſe: So that in Anna Comnena's Phraſe ἐκατέρωθεν βόθεσν ὤρυξας, you have digged a ditch on either ſide of your ſelf: For either you muſt grant theſe Arguments not to be ſufficient for your Party, or you muſt allow them to be ſufficient for a Jew.

Object. Whereſoever Chriſtians labour to convert Idolaters, they find the onely Argument for their errours that they received them from their forefathers: The King of Socotora thinking to pleaſe the Portugals by reducing a Nation that had the Names of Chriſtians to true Chriſtianity, he found them obſtinately proteſt to him, that they would ſooner looſe their lives, than part with the Religion their Anceſtours had left them.

Reſp. This is no news to me who lived ſeven years in Ireland, where, this is all the reaſon the Vulgar either have or give for their Religion; and it is the leſs ſtrange, when I remember Ariſtotle's Ethicks, where he tells us of one, who defended the beating of his Father, thus, ἐγὼ γὰρ ὅτε (ἔτυπτον) τὸν ἑαυτοῦ κἀκεῖνος τὸν ἑαυτοῦ, becauſe it had been the lineal cuſtom of his Family to doe ſo. Yet for all this, that thoſe who earneſtly deſire to keep the Religion of their forefathers, and think they have done it, may yet be deceived, may appear to a Chriſtian by the example of the Jews, and to any Romaniſt, by the example of the Grecians.

To your example of the anſwer to the King of Socotora, I anſwer,

That either thoſe heterodox Chriſtians had been at firſt converted by Hereticks, or by Catholicks; If by Catholicks, (and your Church be that, and your grounds be hers) then it is plain, that men may grow into great errour, who hold faſt, as they think, upon Tradition, and may ſwerve from that Rule, whilſt they think they walk by it: If by Hereticks, then it ſeems Catholicks (as you call them) are not the onely Religion that have converted Nations, and that note of the Church which is ſo daily and ſo eagerly preſt, appears common to more than it: And ſo you may take which horn of my Dilemma you pleaſe.

Object. To come at length to give an anſwer to him that demands a guide at my hands, I remit him to the modern Viſible Church of Rome, that is, her who is in an extern ſenſible communion with the extern ſenſible Clergy of Rome, and the extern ſenſible Head, and Paſtour of that Church. If he ask me, how he ſhall know her, I muſt counter-interrogate him, who he is? Is he an ignorant man? is he unlearned, yet of good underſtanding in the world? Is he a Scholar, and what Scholar? A Grammarian, whoſe underſtanding hath no other help than that of Languages? Is he a Philoſopher? Is he a Divine? (I mean an Academical one, for a true Divine is to teach not to ask this Queſtion) Is he a Stateſman? For he that can think, one anſwer can, or ought to be made to all theſe, may likewiſe expect, that one cauſe may produce all effects: Yet I deny not but all muſt have the ſame guide, though they are to be aſſured of that guide in divers manners.

Reſp. I confeſs, Sir, you come to the Demander but at length; for till I had read further, I had not known that your Treatiſe was intended for an anſwer to mine, if I had not been told ſo when it was given me. For hitherto, as Baaſh a King of Iſrael, in the Chronicles, when he came againſt Judah, aſſail'd not their Cities, but built Ramoth againſt them, ſo you have not attempted to deſtroy what I had ſaid, but raiſed another conſideration, a City, a Ramoth of your own; againſt which I have brought ſuch battery, as ſeems to me ſufficient to demoliſh it.

Now for your directions to a guide, I anſwer, ſuppoſing that there is one, and that this you ſpeak of, be now it, (for you will not ſay ſhe always is) and not to quarrel with you for giving me an accidental and mutable guide, that being a thing which you ſuppoſe ſo neceſſary to be always known, I will join iſſue upon this with you, whether ſhe be to be known to be a guide by any Infallible Notes, for ſuch are required by reaſon, to beget ſuch an aſſent, as is required by you, all other being termed by your ſelves, not Faith, but Opinion. To your contra-interrogation therefore, who I am? that is, in whoſe Name I ſpeak, I anſwer and profeſs my ſelf one of the notably ignorant; but though I act my own part onely, when I ſpeak in his perſon, yet for once I will adventure to anſwer you, in the name of the ſeveral perſons you ſpeak of, and will ſhew, that none of them have ſufficient cauſe to receive the guide which you propoſe upon the reaſons which you alledge.

Object. If the ignorant man ſpeaketh, I will ſhew him in the Church of God, decency, and Majeſty of ceremonies, above all other Sects and Religions, whereby dull capacities are ſweetly enſnared to believe the truth they hear, from thoſe whom they ſee to have the outward ſigns of Vertue and Devotion.

Reſp. To this I anſwer, in the ignorant man's perſon (that is, in my own) thus, I for my part, neither ſee what you ſay you ſhew me, (for in all decency and Majeſty of ceremonies, the King's Chapel ſeems to me to equal the Queen's, and our Cathedral Churches, much to ſurpaſs your Cock-lofts) and if I did, yet the decency of them would not prove your Church to be a good guide, ſo well as a good miſtreſs of ceremonies, and if by their majeſty you mean their Magnificence, then that would onely prove her rich, and not orthodox, ſince this is ſuch a note, that (her Doctrine remaining as true as it is) one perſecution would ſerve to deſtroy it, and with it, all that means which you allow the Ignorant to find his guide by; And whereas you ſay, that dull capacities are by this ſweetly enſnared to believe the Truth; I anſwer, that by the ſame means they may be as ſweetly, and as eaſily enſnared to believe falſhoods, unleſs you could ſhew that Majeſty and Truth are inſeparable Companions.

Object. If the unlearned ask, I ſhew him the claim of Antiquity, the multitude, the advantages of Sanctity, and Learning, how the World was once of this accord, and thoſe who oppoſed, when they firſt parted, firſt began the contrary Sects; how the points of difference be ſuch, as on the Catholick ſide help devotion, and on the contrary ſide diminiſh the ſame; and ſuch like ſenſible differences, which will clearly ſhew an advantage on the Catholick ſide, which is the proportional motive to his underſtanding.

Reſp. I ſee indeed you claim Antiquity, but do you think it reaſonable that I ſhould take your word? Our Divines (whom becauſe I know more, I have more cauſe to truſt than you, in a caſe of which I my ſelf can take no cognizance) abſolutely deny it, and to me you cannot diſprove them, unleſs I had at leaſt ſome learning to enable me to judge, who quotes that truly which now I cannot conſtrue: For multitude, I find not what that proves; it may work upon my fear rather than upon my aſſent; yet I am told, told, that many more Christians disagree from your Church in this main Question of her being a guide, than she consists of; that the Turks are more than both, and the Pagans more than all three; so that if they relate the state of the world aright, multitude must rather seem an argument against truth than for it: And forasmuch as I can see my self, your Religion is the least in this Kingdom, and I know no other: For the advantages of sanctity and learning, to the first I answer, that since in a Country where the State is their adversary, and where for fear of scandal, and hope of gaining numbers to their Church, (to help both to the surety and ornament of it) by commending their Doctrine by their lives, in likelihood they are more vigilant against vice, than where they have no such thorns against their breasts to keep them awake, even here I can find no such advantage as you pretend, I have no cause to guess that I should find it where the incitement of emulation and such like, are absent, and the charms of greatness, wealth, power, and by consequence likelihood of impunity, are present: For the advantage of learning, I answer, that speaking to me with the fore-knowledge of my being unlearned, I wonder you should make use of such a motive, which (how true soever it were in it self) I am not capable of discerning to be so, any more than a blind man is likely to assent to an argument drawn from Colours, of which he could have no possible notion. Now whereas you say that the world was once of this accord, it is more than I know: we are told that whole Churches in the East, had long denied this, when Luther first left you; and howsoever, that it could not be brought in time by arts, propt by power, to accord in an errour, is more than you have proved. Whereas you say, that those, who opposed this, when they first parted, first began the contrary Sect: I answer, that our men pretend, that they began no new Doctrine, but onely scoured off the rust which time and worldly ends in some, and negligence in others, had suffered to grow on. Which Question again remains to be tried, (if you refuse Scripture, as your side useth to do) by a Jury of such who are for the most part untranslated, or those which are, by Parties, and whose language I cannot spell, nor consequently determine by their evidence. Now whereas you say, that the points in controversie on your side help Devotion, and on ours diminish it, I wish you had instanced which, and wherein, for I for the most part see nothing towards it, they being mere speculative opinions, and not reducible to life, as especially this whereof we most differ, which is, your Church's being a general guide: Those, which most may seem such, are either Confession, (which yet we deny onely to be necessary, not profitable, if well used, which is practised by some of us, and recommended to all, and which as you have tempered it, making contrition sufficient for his salvation, who hath till his hour of death lived in all sin, and making attrition with absolution, of the same force as contrition, and requiring to attrition, (as I am told you do) onely sorrow for sin, though arising from the fear of Hell, so some love of God being joyned to it, (which none can want but an Infidel) will not help Devotion much, but rather diminish it) or Monastick life, (which was grown into great excess and disorder, which yet many wise and modern Protestants think might as well have been reformed as the other parts of the Church, without total abolition, and so upon this is left no Question) or Fasting, (which if you think Protestants are against, I pray reade Bishop Andrews his Lent Sermons, and which if it be not so much used among us as it should, is not so much the fault of the Religion, as of the Men) and all these things considered, I find none of your motives to shew a main advantage on your side, and therefore I have yet no cause to leave my own: And if in some of these things you should seem to have more truth than we, yet that would not free you from having more errour in other points than this comes to, much less from having any at all, without the belief of which, I should not be received among you, though I were willing to come: And this lieth upon you to prove, and that not by probable, but by infallible arguments, if you require (as they say your side useth to do) an assent of that Nature.

To the Grammarian I will give two Memorandums; first, that seeing the Catholicks were first in possession both of the Scriptures, and the Interpretations; The adverse part is bound to bring such places as can receive no probable Exposition by the Catholicks. For who knoweth not, that is conversant in Criticks, how many obscure and difficult places occur in most plain Authours, and the Scripture of all Books (the greater part of the men that wrote them, especially the New Testament, being not eloquent, and writing not in their native Tongue) for the most part are subject to much impropriety: The other Memorandum is, that, to prove a Catholick point by Scripture, it is sufficient, that the place brought, bear the Exposition the Catholick giveth, and if it be the more probable by the very letter, it is an evincent place. The reason is, because the question being of a Christian law, the Axiome of the Jurists taketh place, that Consuetudo optima Interpres Legis, so that if it be manifest, that Christian practice (which was before the Controversie) be for the one sense, and the words be tolerable, no force of Grammar can prevail to equalize this advantage: The Grammarian therefore, who will observe these Rules, I turn him loose to the Scriptures and Fathers, to seek there what is the Faith of Christ and properties of his Church to know her by. Object.

To your first Memorandum, I answer, that you have grounded it wholly upon begging the question: for if those of your Religion had first been in possession of the Scriptures, then the Christians had been of it in the Apostles times, which if you could prove, you would need to prove no more, but all would easily follow: and then for your consequence, that is equally false, for though I confess, to make any Doctrine a point of Faith, it is required, that the place be as plain as you please, yet to the making it the more probable opinion (and consequently, excluding the contrary from being necessary) so much is not required. The greatest cause of the obscurity of those books, in which Criticks are conversant, is the negligence and ignorance of Transcribers, so that some Authours would scarce know their own books, if they were revived; whereas the great care of Christians about so dear a pledge, hath much, if not wholly hindred, the same cause from perverting, and so obscuring Scripture: At least, if it have not, it seems your Church is not so faithfull a Guardian of her deposit, as her dear friends (moved by partiality or ends) would make us believe: Besides, till now I ever thought, that Eloquence rather led men to speak improperly, than the want of it, since ignorant persons keep themselves within the bounds of what precisely they mean, whereas the eloquent wander into figures, which are so many, and have gotten such footing in language (whilst in the search of significancy propriety is lost) that those, who use them, are obliged to those who will please to understand, because all they say may bear two Resp.

ſenſes, the one proper, the other improper: And though it be true, that they have overflown, even into the language of the ignorant, yet it is as true, that both they are much leſs uſed among theſe, and that they had not hence their beginning, but from Eloquence: And though the Apoſtles write not in their native Tongues, yet they write in an inſpired language, ſo that they were not likely to commit, at leaſt, any ſuch ſolœciſms as ſhould deſtroy the end of the Inſpirer, which was, that they ſhould be underſtood by it.

To your ſecond Memorandum I anſwer, that ſince every man is free till ſomething binds him, you (who pretend, that we are bound to receive more Doctrine as neceſſary, than appears to us to be ſo) are in all reaſon to give us plainly evincent proof, that what you thus require, God requires too; for till then (to return you to another Axiome, for yours) præſumitur pro libertate; whereas we (the burthen of the Negative proof not lying upon us) if we bring probable Arguments, we doe it ex abundanti, and bring more than we need to bring; And whereas you ſtand upon Cuſtome's having power in Law matters, I anſwer, that in all caſes, that is not of force; for we hold, that it muſt not prevail againſt a Statute, which ſhews, that they may be contradictory; and as Nullum tempus occurrit Regi, is thought to be a good civil topical Law, ſo me-thinks, Nullum tempus occurrit veritati, is a good publick divinity Law, your own Scripture too telling us, that Truth is ſtronger than the King; Beſides, where it is of force, it is in ſuch caſes as the law hath appointed that it ſhould be ſo, and if you can prove out of Chriſt's Law, that there it is ſo appointed to be in matters of Divinity, we ſhall willingly yield; but ſeeing that our law, which allows this force to cuſtome, ſets down alſo in how long time it is, before it become of force, and I have cauſe to think, that Chriſt would have been as carefull as our law, and have ſet down this too, if he had had any ſuch meaning, and if it were ſettled to be a cuſtome of ſuch a ſtanding (as by Saint Auſtine ſometimes is ſpoken of) as that in no time it be known that ever it was otherwiſe; in moſt of your affairs this would ſtead you a little, though one ſide have burnt the evidences of the other, to which in likelihood you owe it, if this ſtead you in any; of queſtions, whereof Scripture and Antiquity are wholly ſilent, or merely ſpeculative, and unreducible unto act (of which ſort are the greateſt between us) or not concerning the lawfulneſs, but the neceſſity of an Action, to the firſt kind no ancient cuſtome can belong, nor other to the others, than a cuſtome of Interpretation of ſome Text concerning it, not enough to conclude upon (beſides, that it is not that which you ſpeak of) ſince daily your men differ, and defend their differing from all that went before them, about more than many Texts, as Cajetane, Salmeron and Maldonate ſhall bear me witneſs, unleſs, like Sampſon, you may break thoſe Ropes by which others muſt be bound: And adding to all this, that our cuſtome may ſerve to ſhew the meaning of the law, when our ſelves were Authours of it, though not when God is, and that our general cuſtome arguing our united conſent (which onely gives force to our laws) may be as fit to bind, as a law in civil caſes, and yet not in divine, where the laws proceed from a higher fountain; that ſuch a rule may be good in civil reſolutions, which require but probable proofs, and yet not in divine ones, where (according to the grounds of your Party, which requires an undoubting aſſent to her Doctrines as infallible) infallible proofs are neceſſary, eſpecially this, like other Topical arguments, having onely force cæteris paribus; and again, good, where it is not ſo neceſſary, that the will of the Legiſlatour be followed, as that peace and quiet be preſerved, to which, all alterations, even to the better, are enemies, and yet not in theſe caſes, where we are to prefer the will of our Law-maker before any humane convenience; or good, if the cuſtome paſt unqueſtioned, when the Law was firſt promulgated, but not, if crept in after by negligence, or plainly appearing to have been brought in by power; all this perſwading me not to be ſo far ſwayed by your Rules as you would have me, I ſuppoſe you have ſmall hope, that not being ſo, I ſhould find either in Scripture, or the firſt Antiquity, either that Faith which your Church propoſeth, or theſe properties of Chriſt's Church, by which your Church proves, or rather ſtrives to prove, that ſhe it is: Give me leave beſides to ask you one Queſtion, and that is, What we ſhall conclude, when the Chriſtian practice of ſeveral places hath ever differed, as that of Greece from that of Rome, which it may alſo do in more places than we are acquainted with, the extent of Chriſtianity being unknown to us, as are the cuſtoms of ſome remote Chriſtian Countries which we know.

Object. Of the Philoſopher, I exact to go like a Philoſopher, and to ſearch out the ſpecifical differences of every Sect, and when he hath found them (if any one but the Catholick hath any rule of faith and good life, which I remit to him to enquire) but at leaſt, when he hath found the Catholicks to be this claim of Tradition before declared, then if this do not bring him as demonſtratively as he knoweth any Concluſion in Philoſophy, and Mathematicks, to the notice that this is the onely true Church of Chriſt, for my part I ſhall quit him before God and Man.

Reſp. I have examined the differences between all parts as you bid me, and find the Proteſtants to have a ſufficient rule of Faith, and good life, yea ſuch a one as by Maſter Knotts confeſſion, (Quem honoris cauſa nomino) is as perfect as a writing can be: And ſince a writing may contain all Doctrines, and onely cannot give teſtimony to it ſelf, nor be αὐτόπιστος, I have no reaſon to think it inferiour to that of their adverſaries: Your claim of Tradition I ſee plainly enough, and as plainly, that it is but a claim, many of your ſide overthrowing it, and others not of your own, pretending to it: Biſhop Fiſher confeſſeth, that Scripture and Miracles brought in the Doctrine of Purgatory, and that again the Doctrine of Indulgences.

Eraſmus, who though himſelf no Martyr, yet one who may paſs for a Confeſſour, having ſuffered, and long, by the Bigots of both Parties, and a dear Friend both to Fiſher, and his Collegue in Martyrdom, Sir Thomas Moore, (who were the Deucalions of learning in this our Country) makes yet a larger confeſſion: Non obſcurum eſt, quot opiniones invectæ ſunt in orbem, per homines, ad ſuum Quæſtum callidos, confictorum Miraculorum præſidio. Theſe reaſons alone (allowing for brevities ſake, that I had no more) would make me believe, not onely that what you ſay, concludes not geometrically, but perſwades not probably, and conſequently, you by your promiſe have quitted me, which without it I doubt not but God would have done.

The Divine, if he hath truly underſtood the Principles of Faith in the nature of a Divine, (I mean Trinity, Incarnation, Redemption, Euchariſt, Beatitude, the Creation and Diſſolution of the World,) and hath ſeen the exact conformity of the deepeſt Principles of Nature, with an unſpeakable wiſedom of the Contriver: If he doth not plainly confeſs it was above the nature of man to frame the Catholick Religion, and ſeeth not, that onely that is conformable to Nature, and it ſelf; I ſay, he hath no ground ſufficient to be of it. Object.

Suppoſing the greateſt part of what you ſay to be true, (for I ſee not how a bare conſideration even of theſe Doctrines will ſerve to prove them to come from God's Revelation) it might prove the Chriſtian Religion againſt Pagans, but for yours againſt Proteſtants, I can draw out of it no Argument; which if upon your explanation, it appears not to be through the default of the Lymbeck (which I expect) then the better I think of you, the worſe I ſhall think of your cauſe, which would have miniſtred to ſo ſharp an Inquirer, better proofs, but that the old Axiome hindered it of, Nihil dat quod non habet: Theſe Principles of Faith you ſpeak of, are agreed on by both Parts; ſo, out of their Truth, and the impoſſibility of their being forged, all the other points cannot be proved, which have upon them no neceſſary dependence: and that your Religion is conformable to the deepeſt Principles of Nature, I am ſo far from ſeeing, that I conceive your own opinion of Tranſubſtantiation contradicts them almoſt all: Neither ſee I any ſuch unſpeakableneſs in the contriving, but that ordinary underſtandings by ſeveral degrees, in a long tract of many ignorant negligent ages, egged on by ambition, cloak'd over by hypocriſie, aſſiſted by falſe miracles, and maintained by tyranny, might eaſily both induce and eſtabliſh them; ſo that though we have hitherto differed in our premiſſes, yet we meet in the Concluſion, which is, that I have no ſufficient ground to be of your Religion. Reſp.

The Stateſman, who is truly informed of the Church, how far is really of Chriſt's Inſtitution, and what either pious men have added, or peradventure ambitious men encroach'd, if he doth not find a government of ſo high and exotick ſtrain, that neither man's wit dare to have attempted it, neither man's power could poſſibly have effected it; If he find not eminent helps, and no diſadvantage to the temporal government, I ſhall think there wants one ſtar in the heaven of the Church, to direct theſe Sages to Bethlehem. Object.

I anſwer now in the perſon of a Stateſman, (a part which but for this occaſion, I am ſure never to have acted) Thus, Reſp.

I find ſo much policy in your Church, for moſt part really, and always in voto, aimed at, although miſs'd, that of no body of men did ever Ariſtotle's ſaying appear to me truer, παρ' ἐνίοις, ἡ πολιτείας ἕνεκεν ὄρος ἐστὶ νόμων, ἵνα δεσπόται ὦσι τῶν πέλας, Among ſome men it is the end of the Laws of their Commonwealth, to be maſters of their neighbours; but I find nothing in the government, that ſhould prove it to proceed from a divine fountain: An Eccleſiaſtical Monarchy you have, ſo have alſo the Turks; the Pope pretends to a power of ending all Controverſies, ſo doth alſo their Mufty; and ſince man's wit attempted that, and man's power effected it, why it might not doe the ſame in the Weſt, it did in the Eaſt, (having the aid of ſome Tinſel-reaſons, and ſome not wholly averſe places of Scripture) I cannot conceive: And what help is by your Church given to temporal government, I ſee not, unleſs giving the Pope power in temporals, even to depoſe Kings, be the helps you mean: I know that ſome of your ſide are not concerned in this, but it is grown ſo general, that though it be as yet no neceſſary part of your Religion, it is like to be ſhortly; And truly throughout I find ſome things which pious men have added, many, which ambitious men have encroach'd, (though of your Church I could not be informed in this, who hath not decided the Queſtion) but nothing that you alone hold, inſtituted by Chriſt; and ſo to your Bethlehem, for want of a ſtar, I am not likely to travel.

Let every man conſider which is the fit way for himſelf, and what in other matters of that way he accounteth evidence, and if there be no intereſt in his ſoul to make him loath to believe, what in another matter of the like nature he would not ſtick at, or heavy to practiſe what he ſeeth clearly enough; I fear not his choice; but if God ſend him time and means to proſecute his ſearch any indifferent while, it is long ago known of what Religion he is to be of. Object.

I ſee yet no cauſe to think, that your Religion is that which will be choſen, though we agree about the State, in which every Inquirer's ſoul ought to be, and in which thoſe of few are; I ſee all parents labour to fix opinions into their Children before they come to an age fit to judge of any greater doubts, than what may happen at ſpan-counter, or cherry-pit; and they again ſeldome labour to ſet right, what Education hath ſwayed: Neither are they wrought upon onely by prejudice, but ſome becauſe of gain, like Demetrius, ὅτι ἐκ ταύτης τῆς ἐργασίας ἡ εὐπορία ἡμῖν ἐστὶν, becauſe by this craft they have their goods; ſome becauſe of temporal honour, like the Phariſees, ἵνα μὴ ἀποσυνάγωγοι γένωνται, leſt they be caſt out of the Synagogue, loving the praiſe of men more than the praiſe of God; ſome for fear, like the High Prieſts, ἀφίσονται οἱ Ῥωμαῖοι, καὶ ἀροῦσιν ἡμῶν καὶ τὸν τόπον καὶ τὸ ἔθνος, The Romans will come and take away both our Place and Nation; Some becauſe of the contradiction in the true Doctrine to their vain or wicked deſires, and ſo, as ſome Diſciples ſaid, though ſomewhat upon another occaſion, they account it, σκληρὸς λόγος, a hard ſaying, (which made Epictetus ſay, τοῦ μαλακὸς οὐ δεῖ περιτρέπεσθαι ῥᾳδίως, ὅταν δὲ τύχῃ ἀγωνίσῃ λαβεῖν,) indeed moſt Chriſtians, who oppoſe any of Chriſt's Commands, either for ſome of theſe reaſons, dare not enquire whether Chriſt hath commanded them, φοβοῦνται ἐρωτῆσαι περὶ τοῦ ῥήματος τούτου, or enquiring, find, but confeſs it not, like thoſe I ſpoke of before, who ὀλίγευται μὴ οὐκ ὁμολόγωσι· As Epictetus therefore ſaith, that we ſhould enquire of God, who is our guide, as Travellers do of them they meet, οὐκ ἔχοντες ὄρεξιν πρὸς τὴν δεξιὰν μᾶλλον φέρειν ἢ τὴν ἀριστερὰν, having no deſire to turn rather to the right hand than to the left; or again, as we enquire of our eyes concerning what is to be ſeen, ὃ παραναλίσκεις αὐτοῖς, ἵνα τοῦτο μᾶλλον ἡμῖν δηλώσωσιν· not perſwading them to ſhew us one thing rather than another; ſo ſay I, ought we to go to reaſon to find God's will, indifferent, which is Truth, or elſe we are likely very lazily to ſeek what we are unwilling to find; and a probable argument for what we deſire, will ſeem a Demonſtration, and a Demonſtration againſt it, ſcarce a probable Argument. This I inſiſt upon the more, becauſe I think we have more cauſe to put you in mind of this, than you us, being too little practiſed on both parts, but not moſt by yours, whereof the greateſt part commonly arrives not ſo far, as at the fault of not ſeeking as they ſhould, becauſe commonly they have not leave given them to ſeek at all: for beſides thoſe who neglect to ſeek and may, no Bible being allowed by you to moſt, as no Smith was ſuffered by the Philiſtines in Iſrael, they fearing leſt the Hebrews ſhould make them ſwords and ſpears, and you leſt they ſhould make out of it, Arguments to perſwade them to revolt from you; It is no wonder if your Church, be like the Congregation in the Acts, ἐκκλησία συγκεχυμένη καὶ οἱ πλείους οὐκ ἤδεισαν τίνος ἕνεκεν συνεληλύθεισαν, the moſt part know not why they are come together. And truly if thus it were not, if all had liberty to ſeek Truth, and if all who ſought it, were indifferent in their ſeeking, and their judgments were abſolutely unbridled by their affections, and unſwayed by prejudice, I cannot perſwade my ſelf that ſo many could meet in thinking it fit to receive (for ſo they ſeem to me) ſuch impoſſible Doctrines upon ſuch improbable grounds, or to require a more than probable aſſent to but probable Doctrines, (allowing them to be ſuch) and ſhould not ſee, what is grounded upon them, (if not impoſſible) is at leaſt much more improbable, than the Motives are probable, which kind of Aſſent cannot be expected by God, who as he requires onely λατρείαν λογικὴν, a reaſonable ſervice, ſo alſo λογικὴν πίστιν, a reaſonable faith.

Here followeth the Third Part of this Diſcourſe, which is a Reply to ſuch Anſwers as you have been pleaſed to make to a little of that little, which I at firſt oppoſed.

Reſp. SPeaking of the Church of Rome, as this day it is the true Church of God, I anſwer the doubter, ſhe neither hath, nor can have any errour which he need to fear, and be ſhie of.

The which two limitations I add, for avoiding Queſtions impertinent unto our buſineſs.

The firſt, for thoſe which concern the connexion of the See of Rome to the Univerſal.

The latter, to avoid ſuch Queſtions as touch that point, whether the Church may err in any Philoſophical or other ſuch matter; which Queſtions are not ſo pertinent to our Matter.

Repl. Meaning by the true Church a company of men, which hold all (and no more) that Chriſt taught (for other interpretation, I believe, you will not give it) then there is no queſtion, but that not onely it hath no dangerous errour, but none at all; but that yours is ſuch, remains unproved, and I believe, manet æternúmque manebit. For upon examination, I doubt not, it will appear, that as I have read of a Cohort of Perſians, which they called σπεῖραν ἀθάνατον, the Immortal Cohort, which all died in one battel; ſo your infallible Church will be found to abound in errours, and to belie equally her title, being troubled her ſelf, with what ſhe undertakes to ſecure others from, like the Apothecary in Lucian, who undertaking to cure all men of the Cough, αὐτὸς μεταξὺ σπῶμαν καὶ βήσσης ἐφαίνετο, could himſelf ſcarce preſcribe his Medicine for coughing the while. Beſides, of what ſort ſoever the errour be, yet ſince the Condition of her Communion is, to profeſs a belief that ſhe hath none, ſuch a one as to them, who indeed believe ſo, would not be dangerous, yet to me, who cannot profeſs this but againſt my Conſcience, how ſlight a one ſoever, may be an occaſion of damnation: Again, as to me your anſwer appears falſe, ſo to thoſe of your own ſide it will appear heretical; to me it would give no ſatisfaction (though you had proved what you but affirm) becauſe I deſire to know an eternal, not a temporary Guide, whereas if in your Church there ſhould happen any Schiſm, your anſwer then would give me no means to reſolve my ſelf which part were the guide (that is, the true Church) without a new, and peradventure (by the way) an endleſs ſearch: To them it will give ſcandal, becauſe, firſt, you preſuppoſe that we muſt know the Church by the Doctrine, and the Doctrine by the Church; and ſecondly, you imply a poſſibility, that the Church of Rome is now but by accident (and may come not to be) the true Church, and ſo all their confidence built upon her, as the Directreſs of all Churches, and the eternal Admiral of God's Fleet, will appear to have a very fallible foundation: Beſides, in the cauſe of your Limitation, I find more reaſon to commend your Diſcretion, than your Ingenuity: for, for the firſt, if you had ſaid, that the Univerſal Church of Chriſt muſt always be connected to the particular one of Rome, which were to allow her Infallibility, you knew Antiquity to have ſaid much againſt you; and beſides, that this being not yet de fide among your ſelves (nor evident in it ſelf) could not ſerve for a foundation to the whole body of our faith; if you had abſolutely denied it, you knew, that you ſhould incur the diſpleaſure of the moſt prevailing part of your own men, and that then the main (and to the Ignorant, the onely viſible) ſign would be taken away. For the ſecond, if you had affirmed, that the Church could err in nothing, how ſlight ſoever, you would both have contradicted many of your own ſide, as Stapleton by name, and have aſſerted more than there were any colour of proof for, and would have wanted this diſtinction to retire to, if you were confuted in any particular; if you had reſtrained her Infallibility to things neceſſary, or weighty, or the like, then the queſtion would again have riſen, which are thoſe (for many errours, which we lay to her charge, concern not things indeed neceſſary, though ſhe add to the errour, that other, of thinking, that whatſoever ſhe holds, becomes neceſſary by her holding it) and then for all you have ſaid, the Doctrine of Purgatory might be falſe, and yet ſhe the Church, and that infallible, as far as by your Doctrine her Infallibility had need to be extended.

Reſp. Neither do I remit the Queſtioner to Scripture for his ſatisfaction, although I hold Scripture a very ſufficient means to ſatisfie the man, who goeth to it with that preparation of underſtanding and will which is meet and required. Howſoever this I may anſwer for them who prove it out of Scripture, that becauſe they diſpute againſt them who admit of Scripture, and deny the authority of the Church, if they can convince it, they doe well, though they will not themſelves admit generally of a proof out of Scripture, as not able to prove every thing in foro contentioſo.

Repl. If you hold Scripture to be ſo ſufficient a mean, I wonder, Sir, why you think not fit to remit me to it, unleſs you think, that you have ſeveral ſufficient ways to prove ſo evident a Truth by, or think me not to come with meet preparation: Indeed if that be (as among you it is counted) to come reſolved, not to judge of what the Roman Church holds, by what the Scriptures ſay, but to believe, that they ſay whatſoever ſhe holds, then I confeſs, I come not with the Conditions required; but if it be to come deſirous to find the Truth, and to follow and profeſs it when I have found it, in ſpite of all temporal reſpects, which might either fright or allure me from ſo doing, then I ſuppoſe, that Charity (which hopeth all things) will encline you to believe, that I come as I ought to come, untill ſome evident reaſon perſwade you to the contrary: That the Scripture cannot prove every thing in foro contentioſo I believe, but all neceſſary Truths, I believe it can; for onely thoſe, which it can, are ſuch: I deny not, but that a contentious perſon may deny a thing to be proved, when his own Conſcience contradicts his words, but ſo he may Arguments drawn from any other ground as well as Scripture; ſo that if for that cauſe you refuſe to admit of proofs from thence, you might as well for the ſame, refuſe to admit of any by any other kind of Arguments: And certainly, if the Scriptures (I mean the plain places of it, cannot be a ſufficient ground for ſuch and ſuch a point, ſurely it cannot be a ſufficient ground to build a ground upon, as the Churches Infallibility, and therefore, though it ſeems you deſire ſo much that this be believed, that ſo it be, you care not upon what proof, yet a conſidering Proteſtant, who is not as hot to receive your Religion, as you are that he ſhould, may preſently ſay, when he is preſs'd by you with Scripture to this, Since this is a way of proof which your ſelves admit not of, an Argument from hence may bring me from my own Religion, but never to yours, becauſe it is a beam which that relies much upon, that by any other way, than the authority of the Church, no man can be ſufficiently ſure of the meaning of Scripture.

That they ſay, the Church is made infallible that we may have ſome guide, I think it very rational; for Nature hath given ever ſome ſtrong, and uncontrollable Principle in all Natures to guide the reſt. The Commonwealth hath a Governour not queſtionable, our Underſtanding hath Principles which ſhe cannot judge, but by them judgeth of all other verities. If there ſhould not be ſome Principle in the Church, it were the onely maimed thing God had created, and maimed in its Principal part, in the very head. And if there be ſuch a Principle, the whole Church is Infallible by that, as the whole man ſeeth by his eyes, toucheth by his hands. Reſp.

Chriſt is our unqueſtionable, and infallible Governour, and his Will the Principle by which we are guided, and the Scripture the place where this Will is contained, which if we endeavour to find there, we ſhall be excuſed, though we chance to miſs, and therefore want not your guide, (who either is not, or as hard to find as the way: and again, when he hath defined, the certain meaning of that definition, as hard to find as herſelf.) Neither is a company of men thus believing, maimed in the head, though having no other more uncontrollable Principle: If your guide were evident of her ſelf, as thoſe Principles are by which we judge all things elſe, then your Similitude would hold a little, whereas being neither knowable in her ſelf, nor provable by ought elſe, what you have ſaid, onely ſhews, what an ill match is made, when Wit is ſet againſt Truth. Repl.

It is ſufficient for a Child to believe his Parents, for a Clown to believe his Preacher, about the Churches Infallibility: For Faith is given to mankind, to be a means of believing, and living like a Chriſtian, and ſo he hath this ſecond, it is not much matter in what terms he be with the firſt. Reſp.

To what you ſay, I anſwer, that I confeſs that it is not poſſible that without particular Revelations, or Inſpirations, the ignorant, even of the Orthodox party, ſhould receive their Religion upon very ſtrong grounds, (which makes me wonder, that even from them you ſhould exact an aſſent of a higher nature, and a much greater certainty, than can be miniſtred to them by any arguments which they are capable of) yet if they believe what they receive, with an intention of obedience to God, and ſuppoſal that their opinions are his Revelations, and uſe thoſe means which they in their Conſcience think beſt to examine whether they be or no, (though it be, when they find themſelves unable to ſearch, by truſting others whom they count fitteſt to be truſted) I believe they are in a very ſaveable eſtate, though they be far from having of the Truth of their Tenets any Infallible certainty; and the ſame I think of thoſe which are in errour; for ſince you cannot deny, but that a Child, or a Clown, with the ſame aptneſs to follow God's will, may be taught by his Parents, or his Preacher, that what God forbids, he commands, that Chriſt's Vicar, is Antichriſt, or the Church, Babylon, and ſcarce teacheth any truth, though it could not teach the leaſt errour; why ſhould ſuch a one be damned for the misfortune of having had heretical Parents, or a deceiving Preacher? For no more, it ſeems, is required of ſuch, than to give his belief to thoſe; (And indeed the ſame reaſon extended, will excuſe him, who though learned, impartially aimeth at God's will and miſſeth it) for though you ſeem to inſinuate, by the cauſe you give of what you ſay, that ſo men believe and doe what they hear God command, he careth not upon what grounds, yet I, who know that God hath no other gain by our ſo doing, than that in it we ſacrifice to him our ſouls and affections, cannot believe, but that they ſhall be accepted, who give him that which he moſt cares for, and obey him formally, though they diſobey him materially, God more conſidering and valuing the Heart than the Head, the end than the actions, and the fountain than the ſtreams; And truly elſe he who through ſtupidity or impotence abſtained from any vice, or through negligence or prejudice miſs'd ſome errour, would be as well accepted of by God, as he that by a care of his ways and of obedience to him who ſhould rule them, did avoid the firſt, and by a ſtudious ſearch, the ſecond. Repl.

I cannot part from this Theme without one conſideration more, and that is, that if ſo Fallible a Directour as you ſpeak of, may be cauſe enough of aſſent to one Truth, why may they not be ſo to another, and why ſhall not the belief of our ignorants, upon their teſtimony, that the Scripture is the Word of God, be as well founded, as that of yours to the Infallibility of the Church upon the ſame? And yet it is daily objected to us, that this belief of ours is not ſurely enough founded, ſince not received from their Church, although the unlearned among us receive it from their Parents and Preachers, and the learned from Tradition; as from the firſt of thoſe your unlearned do, and from the ſecond of which, your unlearned pretend they do receive the authority, and infallibility of the Church it ſelf: Although we be ſo much more reaſonable than you, that we require them not to be ſo ſure upon it, as they are of what they know by ſenſe, but onely to give them ſo much credit, that they may give up their hearts to obedience.

Resp. Neither do I remit him to a general and constant Tradition, as if himself should climb up every age by learned Writers, and find it in every one. I take it to be impossible. Testimonies one may find in many ages, but such as will demonstrate and convince a full Tradition I much doubt: Neither do I find by experience, that who will draw a man by a rope or chain, giveth him the whole rope or chain into his hands, but onely one end of it, unto which if he cleave hard, he shall be drawn which way the rope is carried. Tradition is a long chain, every generation or delivery from Father to Son being a link in it, &c.

Repl. Of this opinion I was wholly before, First upon my own small observation (which also perswaded me, that no controverted opinions had so much colour for such a Tradition out of antiquity, as some which now are by both parts condemned) and after, by consideration of what hath been so temperately, learnedly and judiciously written by our Protestant Perron, D' Aille; But though I think that nothing is wholly provable by sufficient testimonies of the first ages, to have had Primary and general Tradition, (except the undoubted books of Scripture, or what is so plainly there, that it is not controverted between you and us) yet the Negative is easie to be proved, because any one known person dissenting, and yet then accounted a learned and pious Catholick, shews the Tradition not to have been general, and that the Church of this Age differs from that of those times, if it Anathematize now, for what then was either approved of, or at least thought not so horrid but it might be born with. And again, though we agree upon what will not serve to convince a full Tradition, yet we disagree about what will serve; for allowing there were any controverted opinions delivered, with equal Tradition to the Scripture (which I deny to have been, but would receive, if it so appeared) yet sure you begin at the wrong end, in the examination of what those are, which ought to be done, by considering the testimonies of the first ages, and not of the last; for in your own similitude of a rope, though to help me to climb by it, you put but one end into my hands, yet you must shew me, that the other end is somewhere fastned, or else, for ought I know, instead of getting up by it, I may onely get a fall, and this fastning appears not to me, till I be shewed some more certain connexion between the Opinions of this Age, and those of the Apostolick times, than yet you have done, or till you have answered those Arguments, by which, as I perswade my self, I have made it appear, that it cannot be done.

Resp. As for the two places concerning the Pope's and Council's Infallibility, it is not to my purpose to meddle of them, because of one side, the way I have begun beareth no need of those discourses, and on the other, I should engage my self in Quarrels between Catholick and Catholick, obscure the matter I have taken in hand, and profit nothing in my hearers, more than to be judged, peradventure, to have more learning, than wisedom to govern it withall.

Repl. With your favour, Sir, these places concern, not onely questions between your selves, but between you and us; for I thought you had all agreed (though I knew you had not always done so, and though it seems by your declining to speak about it, that you do not yet) that general Councils, confirmed by the Pope, are infallible, and the Doctrines defined by them, are to be believed de fide, which if you be not, then the Glew, which it is so bragged you have, to keep you still at Unity, is dissolved; and if you be, then you should both have answered upon what grounds you are so, and have destroyed my Objections against the possibility of certainly knowing when it is, that these (which used to be called the Church) have defined: finding therefore Altum Silentium, where there was so much cause of speaking, makes me believe, that the cause why you have not answered, is onely because you could not, and then you have a ready Apology, that Nemo tenetur ad impossibilia; which I believe the rather, because I know, that to so clear a judgment as yours, that place of Scripture, When two or three are gathered together, &c. which is so often press'd for the Infallibility of Councils, must appear to make as much for the Synod of Dort, as for the Council of Trent; and to so great a learning as yours, it cannot be unknown how few (if any) of the Ancients have asserted their Infallibility, and how many, both of the Ancients, and your Moderns, have denied it; I am confirmed in this belief too, because you, I know, would never have accepted that as a sufficient excuse from me, if I had avoided to answer an Argument so, because Protestants are not agreed upon the point, if you had thought it such, as that they ought to have been agreed upon it, and truly this is as great and considerable a question, as any among us.

Resp. As for the place of Fevardentius, which alloweth many Fathers to have fallen into errours, I think it will not trouble him who is acquainted with the course of this present Church, wherein divers, who be thought great Divines, fall into errours, for which their Books are sometimes hindred from the print, sometimes recalled, or some leaves commanded to be pasted up; the reason is, the multiplicity of Catholick Doctrine which doth not oblige a man to the knowledge of every part, but to the prompt subjection to the instruction of the Church; wherefore many men may hold false Doctrine inculpably, not knowing it to be such, even now after the learned labours of so many that have strived to open and facilitate by Method, what is true, and what is false; much more in the Fathers times, when there was great want of so many Compilers as these latter Ages have produced.

Repl. First, What Fevardentius confesseth, proves plainly that, for which I intended it, which was, the ridiculousness of proving their Doctrine to be true, by being conformable to that of the Fathers, and yet making themselves Judges of those Judges they appeal to, and confessing, that many of them erred in many points, which if they did, they might as well doe the same in those about which we differ, although they agreed with you, and dissented from us.

Secondly, What both he confesseth, and you confess with him, disproves that way of knowing Divine Truths which you propose, for neither the Doctours of the ancient Church (who were sure more likely to know what was then taken for Tradition, than any late Compilers) nor of the Modern, who had a mind to deliver truth, and trac'd and followed your way of finding it, could err in points of faith, if Qui docet ut didicit, he that teacheth as he hath been taught, must still be in the right; for publick Tradition, no learned man, at least, can be ignorant, not any man (say you) of what he was taught when a Child, as the substance of his hopes for all eternity, and so cannot in reason have his Books either forbidden or pasted up, for delivering any thing contrary to it.

Thirdly,

Secondly, Who are theſe Cenſors who forbid and puſte up Books? certainly not the Univerſal Church, nor yet the Repreſentative; the latter is not always in being, nor when it is, at leiſure to conſider and judge all Authours; and of the firſt theſe Authours are a part; if then they be fallible, (as they muſt be, if they be not the Church) why may not they err, and the Martyr-books ſpeak truth, which yet will eaſily by this means be kept from Poſterity, if thoſe in the Dictatory Office diſſent from it, as they will be ſure to do, if the opinion contradict never ſo little the power or greatneſs of the Pope, upon whoſe favour theſe Oecumenical Correctours muſt depend, or they not long remain in their places: and yet you expect that your adverſary ſhould produce ſucceſſion of their opinions in all ages, though nothing be let paſs but what a few pleaſe, and though when in time all of you are agreed (as you will ſoon be, or appear to be, if one ſide appear to be gag'd) then this conſent, though thus brought about, becomes the conſent of the Church, and a very notable Motive.

And ſince you ſay, that what all are bound to, is onely a prompt ſubjection to the Church, why leave you it ſo in doubt, what is the Church, as if men were tyed to be ſubject, but muſt not know to what; you ſay indeed, that the adherers to the Church of Rome are now the Church, but what they may be, you will not plainly declare; So that if a Schiſm among them ſhould happen, we are all as far to ſeek as if you had been wholly ſilent, for ſince the infallibility lies not in the particular Church of Rome, and conſequently the adhering to her is not ever a ſufficient note of the Church, (as you will not ſay) nor is it among your ſelves de fide, ſince the Univerſal Church (whatſoever ſhe be) can never define any thing, and of the authority of the definitions of the Repreſentative, and of what conſtitutes both her and her Decrees, you refuſe to ſpeak, what remains there, to which this prompt ſubjection is to be the onely everlaſting Note of the true Church, but onely the Truth whenſoever ſhe appears? Thus as the Prieſts of Apollo (therefore peradventure called Loxias) uſed to ſpread lies, and ſecure his reputation, the firſt by the antiquity, and the ſecond by the darkneſs of his Oracles, ſo doth your Religion gain upon many men, and ſecure her ſelf from many objections, by the manifold acceptions, and conſequently, difficulty of this term Church; For whatſoever is ſaid in Scripture concerning her being free from all ſpot, or prevailing againſt the gates of Hell, or their danger who reſiſt her, the firſt meant (as I believe, and the place denies not by any circumſtance) of the Church Triumphant, the ſecond of the Church of the Elect, and the third, of the Profeſſours of Chriſtianity in general, or at moſt of thoſe who are in all neceſſary points Orthodox among them; That they without ſufficient proof reſolve to be ſpoken of the Church in their ſenſe they have fancied; that is, ſome ever known body of Chriſtians which muſt be ſtill guide to the reſt, and then claim to be that, becauſe no other (all elſe being more ingenuous) claims it beſides themſelves; whereas, if (conſidering that ἀρχὴ παιδεύσεως ἡ περὶ ὀνομάτων ἐπίσκεψις, and the Oraculous truth of my great Lord Bacon's obſervation, that unleſs men in the beginning of their diſputes agree about the meaning of their terms, they muſt end about words, where they ought to have begun) they had marked what other ſenſe theſe words were capable of, (for if it will here bear another, then this cannot hence be concluded but by leave) they would then ſoon have ſeen the weakneſs of their building, by the ſlightneſs of their foundation. Again, they prevail much by working upon mens aſſents, by the means of their modeſties, and preſs it to be an intolerable pride to oppoſe their opinions to the conſent of the Catholick Church; whereas, if it be weighed how ſmall a part of it they mean by that word, and yet of them how many follow blindly the decrees of one, and how ſoon thoſe prevail againſt that few, not backed by any power, who do not, it will then appear, that not onely other Churches, but even a John or a Thomas have as much reaſon to be lead by their own underſtandings, as by the opinions and decrees of an Urbane or a Gregory, upon which that conſent is ſo often founded; And as they make their advantage of this word in their offenſive wars, ſo do they in their defenſive, for when they are preſs'd unto the abſurdity of their Tenets, then (though indeed they be general) yet they pretend, that they are the opinions but of private, though many men, and not of the Church; and again, when any Fathers (who yet ſometimes they ſay are wholly theirs) are ſhewed to contradict ſome of their Doctrine ſo plainly, that none of thoſe ſubterfuges, which in one of their expurgatory Indexes, they confeſs they often uſe, will ſerve to palliate it; then they ſtrive to ſcape by anſwering, that the Church had not then defined it; whereas if it be examined, how far they conſent about what is the Church, and what are her Definitions (whereof they are not yet agreed, for ſome ſay, ſhe hath defined, what, others ſay, ſhe hath not) this onely will be certainly found, that it never can be certainly found, what are her opinions of any point, or when ſhe hath declared her ſelf: As (beſides many other Arguments, ſome preſs'd by my ſelf, and others, by other Pens more fit to treat of ſo weighty a matter:) appears by your refuſing to leave your Latibula; and declare plainly your opinion concerning it, which if you ſaw defenſible, and you were all agreed about it, you would quickly have done, and not incurred the reprehenſion of that Axiome, which teacheth, that Doloſus verſatur in generalibus, which makes me think, that if this were generally enough mark'd, you would no longer be able to dazle any man's eyes with the ſplendid title of Sons to the Catholick Church, as Alexander hoped to do thoſe of the Barbarians, with ſtyling himſelf Παῖς Διὸς, the Son of Jupiter, although indeed he was ſo much the more moderate than the ſecond, as never to deny, that any other could be Son to the ſame Father, whereas you will not allow, that any may have intereſt in your Mother beſide your ſelves.

To conclude this Paragraph, give me leave to ask one queſtion, and that is, how your ſaying, that Truth is more eaſie to find now than in the Fathers times, will agree, either with the way which you ſay, is the onely Catholick one to find Truth by (for ſure ſuch a Tradition was always equally eaſie to find, and if the firſt ages had erred in it, we muſt of neceſſity, following your advice, have followed their errour too) or with the ſaying of ſo many of your ſide, that if I ſhould reckon them up, I ſhould make a Catalogue of Authours, equal to thoſe of Photius, or Geſner, or Poſſevine, who all joyn, that Truth was moſt likely to be moſt certainly known that time, which was, in Campian's words, Chriſto proprior, ab hac lite remotior, nearer to Chriſt, and conſequently to Tradition, and to which, for that cauſe, all think fit to appeal againſt us, or with that cuſtome of your Church, which ſuffers none to take take Orders before they have vowed to interpret Scriptures according to the Fathers, which if men now-adays be more likely to find the Truth, than at that time they were (as they muſt be, if Truth in this age be more eaſie to be found, whether through greater abundance of Compilers, or what elſe ſoever) then this Vow is as much, as if they had vowed to leave the beſt way of Interpretation and teaching, to follow the worſt.

Reſp. As for the two points, he ſaith, avert him from Catholick Doctrine, I am miſtaken, if he be not miſtaken in both. The firſt is, that the Catholicks do damn all who are not in the Union of their Church. He thinks the ſentence hard, yet I think he will not deny me this, that if any Church does not ſay ſo, it cannot be the true Church. For call the Church what you will; the Congregation of the Elect, the Congregation of the Faithfull, the Congregation of Saints, or Juſt; call it, I ſay, or define it what you will, doth it not clearly follow, that whoſoever is out of the Church cannot be ſaved, for he ſhall not be the Elect, Juſt, Faithfull, &c. without which there is no ſalvation. How then can any Church maintain theſe two Propoſitions, I am the true Church, and yet one may be ſaved without being in me?

Repl. This is, by your favour, a mere Paralogiſme; for though thoſe who define the Church by qualities, which both Parts agree, to be the conditional Keys to the Kingdom of Heaven, muſt needs affirm, that none out of the Church can be ſaved, yet what is this to them, who mean by the Church, the Company of the Orthodox in all points, and by them your ſelves, out of which (allowing that there be ſuch a one, which I doubt of, and that to be yours) I ſhall believe, that ſome may be ſaved, till I ſee ſome more cauſe to think all errour in Religion always damnable, which it is plain, by what after you ſay, that you think not your ſelf, and the Church taken in this ſenſe, which is your ſenſe, may maintain both Propoſitions; or to ſhew you, how much, what you ſay, would make againſt your ſelf, thus I argue; The true Church muſt hold that none can be ſaved out of her; but your Church denies not, but that ſome out of her may be ſaved; therefore yours is not the Church: My Major, is included in your own ſaying, that thoſe two Propoſitions are not maintainable together: My Minor, though falſe, yet is alſo your confeſſion (where you ſay, that the Churches Propoſition is not ſo cruel as it ſeems, though the words be rough) and therefore ſo ought you to make my concluſion too: Beſides, thoſe who exclude all from Salvation, who are out of the Church in the other ſenſe, meaning by it the Elect, as they are not like them in the wrong, ſo they are not occaſion of much harm, like them, who ſtyling the Church, a company of men of ſuch a belief, and under ſuch a government, affirm an impoſſibility of being ſaved out of it; for they giving no viſible ſign of who is in the Church (for who can know the Elect, but the Electer) cauſe no want of Charity, nor frequency of War, and Perſecutions by it, as the others do, who having made firſt a viſible partition, leſt thoſe who are out of it, may draw others out too, they ſend them out of the world by way of prevention.

Reſp. But peradventure he is ſcandalized, that the Catholick Church requireth actual Communion external with her, which he thinketh may in ſome caſe be wanting without detriment of Salvation. But how would he have the Church ſpeak, which ſpeaketh in common, but abſtracting from ſuch particular caſes as may change wholly the Nature of the Queſtion?

Repl. I am ſcandalized, not becauſe you require to Salvation joining with you in Communion, but becauſe alſo you require joining with you in opinions; and if it were onely this, yet am not I any whit ſatisfied with what you ſay for it, for with the true Church, that is, the Company of true believers, in points any way material (or rather the trueſt) I conceive it not damnation ſometimes not to communicate: For if they have any never ſo ſlight errours, and which appear ſo to me, which yet they will force me to ſubſcribe to, if I communicate with them, my aſſent would be damnable; or if they require the ſame ſubſcription to ſome truths, which yet after my real indeavours in inquiry, appear errours to me, I doubt not but my refuſal is no way damnable: Neither can I abſolve your Church concerning this her ſaying, for your reaſon, becauſe ſhe ſpeaks in general, wholly abſtracting from particulars, which change the nature of the Queſtion; for why doth ſhe ſo, why doth ſhe not expreſs her exceptions, or at leaſt tell us, that the rule is not ſo general, but that it will bear ſome, and not make men (who know not that ſhe intends to reſtrain at all, what ſhe ſo abſolutely pronounceth, and who will find no cauſe to take your bare word for her intentions) many times, at leaſt to hate them as God's enemies, whom he loves as his friends, and believe them to fry in Hell, who ſhine in Heaven? Howſoever if ſhe uſe to expreſs her ſelf in rougher words than her meaning is, how apt may ſhe be to be miſtaken in ſeveral of her reſolutions; and conſequently, how eaſie is it for ſome age to have miſunderſtood the paſt, and deceive the following? Neither do I like your example, becauſe that is not to differ from the Church, but to miſtake her meaning; though even he, who ſhould deny that there were three Gods, if he thought that by the Trinity your Church ſo meant, muſt conſequently think her not infallible, and ſo by your grounds be conſequently a Heretick.

Reſp. The current of Catholick Doctours, that no man ſhall be damned for infidelity, but he who doth wilfully misbelieve, and that to doe ſo, it is required that Faith be ſufficiently propoſed unto him, and what is to be ſufficiently propoſed, is not determined amongſt them. There wanteth not Divines who teach, that even ignorantia affectata, doth excuſe from Hereſie. On the other ſide it is moſt certain, that no man is damned for not profeſſing, what he is not damned for not believing. Wherefore, profeſſion being that which engrafteth a man exteriourly in the Church, according unto the ordinary opinions of the Catholicks, it followeth, that no man is condemned for not being of the Church, who is not for infidelity, for which it is a very uncertain caſe who be damned, and who be not.

Repl. As the King of Spain, after long calling the Hollanders Rebels, at laſt for his own ſake deſcended to treat with them as free States; ſo thoſe of your Religion, when they hope to gain a Proſelyte, thunder out to him crudely, and without any of theſe Mollifications which you now uſe, that extra Eccleſiam Romanam nulla eſt ſalus, there is no ſalvation out of the Roman Church. And Maſter Knot peremptorily avers, that no Catholick of an entire fame ever taught, that a Proteſtant ſo dying could be ſaved; yet when they are preſs'd with the conſequences, they can (as it ſeems) vouchſafe to give us better words, and find μαλάγματα enough to ſoften this opinion, though ſuch as bring them more diſadvantage in other conſiderations, than help in this. For firſt, as before it ſeemed that you are not fully agreed either about the authority of the Councils, or what conſtitutes the Church, (by your avoiding to ſpeak concerning it) ſo now it ſeems, that neither are you reſolved of what conſtitutes an Heretick; and then what remains there for you to know, if what you account infallible, and what damnable, be yet both uncertain to you?

Secondly, Since you confeſs none to be a Heretick, but he to whom the truth is ſufficiently propoſed, and when that is, you are not reſolved; what a more than Sythian Barbarouſneſs is it, to make a coal of a Chriſtian, onely upon ſuſpicion of Hereſie? eſpecially ſince the Pagans themſelves had Chriſtian Charity enough to perſwade them, that it was much better that a guilty perſon ſhould eſcape, than an innocent be puniſhed: much more ſhould you rather ſuffer the tares to grow, than venture to pluck up the corn with it, and believe the beſt, when the truth lies hid in a place ſo hard to ſearch into, as is the heart of man, into which (as none entered the Sanctum Sanctorum but the High Prieſt) God onely can have admittance.

Reſp. The other point was, of putting Hereticks to death, which I think he underſtandeth to be done vindicatively, not medicinally, I mean, impoſed as a puniſhment, and not in way to prevent miſchief, and oppreſs it in the head.

Repl. I ſuppoſe it ſmall ſatisfaction to a poor man, carried to the ſtake for his Conſcience, to know by which member of a diſtinction he is put to death; and that this as little excuſeth you, as it ſatisfies them, I hope to ſhew before we have ended the conſideration of this preſent Paragraph.

Reſp. If the Circumcellians were the firſt, that is ancient enough for the juſtification of the fact; although for Baniſhment, which alſo he ſeemeth to reprehend, we know the firſt that could ſuffer it, did ſuffer it, Arius I mean, by the hand of Conſtantine, whom he praiſeth for a ſpeech he uttered before he knew the conſequence of the danger, and ſeemeth to reprehend for his after and better wits.

Repl. I wiſh to you what Eraſmus wiſh'd to Auguſtinus Steuckius, which is, that you were but equally in probando diligens, as you are in aſſeverando fortis: For how unlikely is it that we ſhould give you credit without proof, onely ἀποδεῖξιν φέρειν τὸ ἀρχαῖον, that the antiquity of a thing, which began ſo long after Chriſt's Apoſtles were all dead, is enough to prove it lawfull: Howſoever it would at moſt but prove it lawfull, to put ſuch Hereticks to death, as force men to doe ſo in their own defence; for ſuch were they: Beſides, I object not onely againſt this cuſtome, the not being ancient, (for I confeſs there might have been before a power to doe ſo too, though not uſed to the uttermoſt, though in likelihood what perſwaded you to uſe it, would have perſwaded them to the ſame, if they had thought they had it) but as being alſo condemned by Hilary, and Athanaſius, and other Orthodox: For though ſome puniſhment of a leſs degree were inflicted upon others too by their own ſide, (as you truly inſtance) when their power prevailed; yet Conſtantine ſays, not onely in an Edict for liberty of opinions, (which he, who was then Pope, never appeared to ſtomach, as his ſucceſſour, undoubtedly would now doe the like) μηδεὶς τὸν ἕτερον παρενοχλεῖτω, ἕκαστος ὅπερ ἡ ψυχὴ βούλεται τοῦτο καὶ πραττέτω, let no man trouble another, but let every one doe as his own ſoul will: but alſo gives this concluding reaſon againſt you for it, ἄλλο γὰρ ἑκὼν τὸν ὑπὲρ ἀθανασίας ἆθλον ἐκκοῖλως ἐπαναιρεῖσθαι, ἄλλο τὸ μετὰ ποινῆς ἐπαναγκάζειν· For it is one thing willingly to take upon them this combat for immortality, and another to force them to it with puniſhment; and ſo in whatſoever he did contrary to this in any caſe, wherein this reaſon held, his words condemn his action: And whereas you ſay, that when Conſtantine made ſo ſlight of the queſtion between Arius and Alexander, it was, becauſe he knew not the conſequence of the danger; I ſhall deſire to know of you whether you muſt not confeſs, that there is now no King of your Religion ſo ill inſtructed in it, (though none of them be never ſo learned, or curious as Conſtantine was) who, if any man in his Dominion ſhould ariſe, denying Tranſubſtantiation, would not preſently know the danger of the conſequence, and reſolve him for an Heretick, and to the ſtake inſtantly, and not ſpeak againſt his opinion onely as impertinent, and de lana caprina, and περὶ ὄνου σκιᾶς· And if this had been as reſolved a thing then among Chriſtians, to have come from Tradition, as Tranſubſtantiation is now amongſt Papiſts, he would neceſſarily as ſoon have diſcovered it too: Howſoever I believe his after-wits to have been his worſer wits, in puniſhing, though not in condemning of Arius, and to me it yet ſeems (for to be ſure, not to ſpeak Heretically, I will not ſpeak obſtinately) that to have laboured in ſtopping of diſputes on both parts, and tying them to Scripture Phraſes, and to ſpeak of God onely in the Word of God, had been at leaſt in reſpect of Unity, not a worſe way, than to have given an example to what after followed, I mean, the frequent explication (with Anathema to boot) of inexplicable myſteries; Neither would then ſo many queſtions have ſo long troubled the Church, which for their ſlightneſs were unworthy ever to exerciſe the Schools; But for that or any other mere errour, as it may be, for ought any one knows, unlawfull in any to puniſh at all, I by no means like not to put to death, for the ſame ſeems to me it ſelf ἁμαρτία ἁμαρτῶν πολὺ καὶ ὑπερβολήν, a ſin above meaſure ſinfull, though even the act of it proceeded from an opinion of doing God ſome ſervice, and that opinion from a mere errour too, then I conceive but a material no formal ſin for the ſame cauſe, and ſo, neither this material Murtherer, nor that material Heretick, be guilty before God, who onely can diſtinguiſh, and to whom it is fit to be left. Howſoever the long doubt of ſome, and oppoſal of other Orthodox to this courſe, and that ariſing not from their Policy or Compaſſion, but their Conſcience, not as thinking it unprofitable or unfit, but unlawfull, ſhews, that there was then no Tradition that the Apoſtles taught it to be lawfull ſo to uſe Hereticks, upon which onely, all the Infallibility, which you claim for any belief or cuſtome of your Church, is founded.

Reſp. Saint Auſtine juſtifieth ſuch proceedings againſt Hereticks.

Repl. Truly for putting them to death (unleſs when they firſt aſſaulted, which makes a wide difference, for then it was not done as to Hereticks, but as to Aſſaſſines, from whom Nature teaches us to defend our ſelves, and conſequently to re-offend them whenſoever Religion bars it not, experience ſhewing us the danger of merely defending, to be near to that too, of not doing it at all) I know not that ever he did, nor do I believe it: That ſome degree of puniſhment ſhould be inflicted upon them, I confeſs he at laſt conſented, but chiefly to force them to come and ſee what the Church did, (whoſe actions the Hereticks impudently belied; as if they ſet pictures upon the altar, and did what you both doe and defend, and they did not, i. e. denied it.) Howſoever we have Saint Auſtine againſt Saint Auſtine, and not onely his authority, but his reaſons, more valid by much than that, when he ſaith, that ſuch oppreſſions would make them think themſelves vi victos, non veritate convictos, overcome by force, not convicted by truth, and conſequently diſlikes it, ne fictos Catholicos habeamus, quos apertos Hæreticos novimus, leſt they become from open Hereticks, but feigned Catholicks: Reaſons, which (though theſe be not all we have) in my opinion it was as impoſſible for him reaſonably to anſwer when he was living, as it would be now for him to do it when he was dead. Beſides, as he uſeth theſe ſtrong arguments againſt it, ſo he is himſelf a ſtrong example againſt it; for the Church had loſt this her ſo notable Champion, if they then had been as ſevere to the Manichees as you are to us.

Reſp. Saint Gregory uſeth the like againſt Pagans, (if I remember) and the Church laterly hath rather encreaſed, than decreaſed in the practice of it.

Repl. I believe your memory deceives you in this, which you have cauſe to hope it doth, for elſe the Church of Rome differs from that of Saint Gregory's times, it being now with her a judged caſe, that Infidels may not be compelled to the Faith, as I am told is ſhewed by Valentia, Saint Thomas, Hartado, and others, the Church having no power over thoſe who are out of it, and therefore they pleaſe to ſay, that (like them who among the Romans were onely Cives ad onera, liable to the taxes of Citizens, without Intereſt in their Privileges) Baptiſm hath made us of the Church enough to be liable to her Puniſhments, though not to be benefited by her Communion: Though indeed the ſame cauſe why you would have Hereticks put to death, for fear of harming others with their opinions, me-thinks ſhould extend to their puniſhment too, unleſs you believe us to be as bad as Malefactours, and not them, or that their opinions are ſo irrational as not likely to ſpread, and ours ſo reaſonable, that againſt them the ſword is the beſt ſhield, and therefore (as Brennus did his) you put that into the ſcales for want of weight, it being of giving Reaſons as the Poet ſaith it is of giving Requitals, Iraſci quam donare vilius conſtat.

Another reaſon which perſwades me that you are miſtaken in what you ſay of Gregory, (as this miſtake facilitates my belief, that you are ſo about Auſtine's too) is that Bede tells, that ſome Romaniſts, having converted the King of Kent, that King did not yet force any to become Chriſtians, for (ſaith he) he had learned of theſe his Maſters, that the ſervice of Chriſt (WHICH REASON EXTENDS FARTHER THAN TO PAGANS) muſt be voluntary, and not forced; Now if theſe received what they taught from Gregory, as you often tell us) then either he did not as you often ſay, or thought that unlawfull which himſelf did; And howſoever this Cuſtome hath encreaſed ſince, is very unconſiderable; for unleſs it have its authority explicitely or implicitely from the Apoſtles, it can give none ſince, and unleſs it be proved to be well done at firſt, no continuance can give this, or any other action more juſtification than at firſt it had.

Reſp. Moſes ſpeech I believe is miſtaken, the force of it being, that the baniſhment of Biſhops ſhewed his faith, becauſe the baniſhed were Catholicks, which ſhewed Lucius to be none.

Repl. If Moſes had meant as you would have him, he ſhould not have ſaid, onely τῶν ἐπισκόπων, but τῶν ἐπισκόπων τῶν καθολικῶν, not indefinitely the baniſhing of Biſhops, but the baniſhing of Orthodox Biſhops; the leaving therefore of that out, wherein, according to you, the whole ſenſe of his Argument lay, ſeems to me plainly enough to ſhew, that he meant what they and you deny: eſpecially he adding (as you may ſee in Sozomen) their being puniſh'd by labour, as well as puniſhment, and then ſaying, ἃ πανταχῶς ὄντων ἀλλότρια χριστοῦ, καὶ τῶν ὀρθῶς περὶ θεοῦ δοξαζόντων, which things are wholly abhorring from Chriſt, and all right Believers concerning God, and in Socrates, δοῦλον γὰρ κυρίου οὐ δεῖ μάχεσθαι, for God's ſervant ought not to fight, for ſo he counted to puniſh.

Reſp. But what can be ſaid, if the Church uſeth that for the prevention of a greater and more dangerous evil, which all politick Eſtates uſe for the remedies of leſs, and leſs dangerous evils, and are commended for it? For if Faith be the way to Salvation, and Hereſie be the bane of Faith; if Salvation the greateſt good, then the danger of a Country's being over-run with Hereſie, is the greateſt of dangers, greater than the multiplicity of Thieves, greater than the unſurety of the ways, greater than a Plague, or Invaſion; why then doth not reaſon force us to uſe means to prevent it, which the ſame reaſon and experience teacheth us to be moſt efficacious in this, and all other contagious and gangrening maladies of the Commonwealth. I hope reaſon it ſelf, and the zeal of the Authour to his own, and Country's Salvation, will ſupply my ſhortneſs in this point; for ſuppoſing a Church be aſſured ſhe is in the right, and that the doctrine preached by another, leadeth to damnation; I know not why Caiaphas his words ſhould not be prophetical in this caſe, and that truly it doth expedire, that Unus moriatur pro populo, & non tota gens pereat.

Repl. I wiſh heartily you were as good a Caterer as a Cook, I mean, that you brought as good reaſons, as you dreſs artificially what you bring; For I find there is in your words a very notable δεινωσις, able to ſteal a man into your opinion, before he hath ask'd himſelf why; but if he ſtay to do ſo, then all your excellent embroidery will not keep him from diſcerning many bracks in your ſtuff: To prove which, I will bring many reaſons (beſides what I have taught already) by which it ſhall, I hope, appear, why thoſe, whom you call Hereticks, ſhould not be put to death, although Malefactours may, although even the lawfulneſs of that (ſince other puniſhments, which would not ſhorten their time of repentance, might peradventure ſerve to repreſs them) is not abſolutely certain.

Firſt, Malefactours plainly offend againſt their Conſciences; at leaſt think not themſelves bound by them to commit their villanies (neither pretend they otherwiſe) which they, whom you call Hereticks, either bona fide follow, or do for ought at leaſt you can know.

Secondly, What are Malefices, muſt be known before Malefactours, and Hereſies before Hereticks; now of the firſt, Mankind agrees, but of the ſecond but you onely, a ſmall part of Chriſtians, and yet you differ too about the ways of knowing them, and conſequently, whether ſome things be Hereſies or no (as for example, whether the Oath of Allegiance contain any) wherein ſince ſome of you are deceived, me-thinks it ſhould incline you to think it not impoſſible for you all to do ſo, in what you all agree to be ſuch.

Thirdly,

Thirdly, Malefactours are not, or ſhould not be puniſhed for ſuch, without a plain knowledge that ſuch they are; but although there were an impoſſibility of miſtaking what is Hereſie, yet there is no poſſibility of knowing who are Hereticks, the form of which is obſtinacy, a ſecret, and (to man) an undiſcoverable quality, whom he onely ſhould puniſh who onely knows.

Fourthly, Malefactours are certain to hurt others, whereas neither are Hereticks ſure to perſwade any, and if they do, yet they may hurt none, ſince who receives their belief bona fide, and through mere errour, is unharmed by it.

Fifthly, Whom they do harm, it muſt be through their own fault, and by their own conſent, whereas without either, the Malefactours are cauſe of much miſchief, even to the moſt guiltleſs.

Sixthly, Malefactours paſſing wholly unpuniſh'd, peradventure not put to death, would bring a certain deſtruction to the State, which temporal Magiſtrates are appointed to watch over, which yet in ſpeculative opinions is not concerned.

Seventhly, The puniſhment even by death, of Malefactours, brings not any temptation of ſinning upon them; the ſame to others is in all probability a cauſe to keep many from a careſull ſearch of God's Truth, (leſt they might find the puniſhable belief to be the true one) and from profeſſing it, when they think they have found it; both which are ſins of the firſt magnitude.

Eighthly, This courſe with Malefactours was not, for ought appears, ever thought unlawfull in the pureſt times of Chriſtianity, and was then in uſe; whereas towards errours in belief, it was diſallowed of them by the chief, and long before death was at all inflicted upon them, though they underſtood as well the danger of Hereſie, and were as careſull to preſerve their flocks from all danger by all lawfull ways, as any ſince.

Ninthly, It no way redounds to Chriſt's Glory, that Malefactours be unpuniſh'd, but it makes much for it, that his Army appears to conſiſt of Voluntiers, and not of Preſs'd men, that his Truth ſhould prevail by no humane force, but onely by the power of the firſt teacher, and the light of the Doctrine, which for us unbidden ſo to aſſiſt, is to think the Ark muſt fall, if we hold not forth our hands to hold it up, and takes from it the honour of ſubſiſting by the way, by which it took root, when (to borrow Saint Chryſoſtome's words) οἱ ἀσθενεῖς ὑπὸ ἰσχυρῶν οὐκ ἐγένοντο, καὶ οἱ δώδεκα τῆς οἰκουμένης, The weak were too hard for the ſtrong, and twelve for the World, and that γυμνοὶ πρὸς ἐνόπλους ἀγωνίζοντο, They being naked, and their adverſaries armed.

Tenthly, That death is the moſt effectual way to ſuppreſs Malefactours, you ſay reaſon and experience ſhews, and it is generally agreed of; but in this caſe it ſeems even to your beſt men the worſt courſe, as appears by Iburranes's reſolution concerning the Hyperephanians, by the 267 Page of grave and judicious Cardinal D' Oſſat his Letters, by the Epiſtle of Cardinal Richelieu to his King before a Book of Controverſie, and by Eraſmus his Teſtimony, who tells us, that a Carmelite having then this power in his hands, Ubicunque ſævitiam exercuit Carmelita, ibi diceres fuiſſe factum Hereſeon ſementum, whereſoever he exerciſed his cruelty, he ſeemed to have ſowed Hereſie. All which reaſons make me believe, that there is much difference between the ſtriving to deſtroy theſe two ſorts of men; and if there were not, yet for fore-touched reaſons, and others which I will touch at, I ſhould as ſoon think it unlawfull to put Malefactours to death, as lawfully to kill Hereticks. For indeed ſince ἄχμιον μίσει ὁ φονεὺς τοῦ θάνατος, it diſadvantageth what you would aid; to ſeem to believe, that truth, without other aſſiſtance, would not ſooner root out falſhood, than that it, that the Orthodox are not more likely to cure the ſeduced, than to be infected by them; and that there is no way to end the Hereſies, but by ending the Hereticks: And thus you run into three inconveniences;

Firſt, You put reaſonable ſcruples into conſidering mens minds, leſt as a Greek Oratour ſaith againſt Ulyſſes for ſtriking Therſites, τὸ μηδὲν ἔχειν ἐλέγχειν ὁμολογία τὸ πλήξαι, It was a ſign he could not confute him, that he ſtruck him; ſo, that it be want of arguments, which makes you fall to blows, and cauſe them to ſuſpect, that if you were not (peradventure for ſome better reaſons than appear to them) diffident of your cauſe, you would give your adverſaries leave to ſpeak as loud as them pleaſed, and not ſeek ſo ſuſpiciouſly to ſtop their mouths, whilſt they diſpute with you at as much odds, and upon terms of as much diſadvantage, as Saint Paul did with the Grecian Jews, συνεζήτει πρὸς τοὺς ἑλληνιστὰς, οἱ δὲ ἐπεχείρουν αὐτὸν ἀνελεῖν, he diſputed againſt them, but they went about to ſlay him.

Secondly, It deſtroys thoſe plauſible Arguments ſo often uſed, of Unity, and Tradition, and Multitude; for, firſt Uniformity may be induced by power, but Unity and Impunity can never be parted; all other agreement being but as a thief and a robbed perſon agreed, the one to take his purſe, and the other to give it again. Again, Tradition it lames as much, for how can any man tell, but that two parts claiming contrary Traditions, or one part claiming it upon falſe grounds, and the other denying it, the truth may not by this force have been over-born, when we receive not what men would have delivered Poſterity, but what Power would ſuffer them. Again, how ſhall we know but that the greater part of your multitude believes not as they profeſs; no man knowing his Neighbour to be of his mind; when it is ſo probable, that many may not think as they ſpeak, when it is not lawfull for all to ſpeak as they think.

Thirdly, By this way you are cauſes, that you ſuffer often where you have not the State on your ſide, as much as you inflict when you have; for though you will ſay that none ſhould puniſh but the Church, yet every divided company of Chriſtians, thinking themſelves to be that, (that is to be the orthodox) will uſe your own cuſtome to your harm, and you will be ſhot like the Eagle in Æſope, οἰκείοις πτεροῖς, with your own feathers; and ſo Truth whereſoever ſhe be (if all follow this way) will by force by many parties be oppoſed, and but by one propagated and defended; ſo that not onely in conſideration of Chriſtianity, but even of Policy, I miſlike this courſe, as being always wicked, and often hurtfull, and more often uneffectual: And for my part, I deſire ſo much that good be done for evil, that (though you be moſt fit of any to be ſo uſed, who uſe us ſo, where your power extends, and whoſe cruelty will extend with your acquiſition, if you make any, and you hold your ſelves, that impendens periculum is cauſe enough for a war) yet I heartily wiſh all laws againſt you repealed, and truſt, that diſarmed Truth would ſerve to expell Falſhood, whereas now they being in force againſt you, give you the honour of a perſecution, and not being executed, give you the fear of one: It is truly ſaid, Militia Chriſtiana eſt Hæreſes expellere, but it needs this limitation, ſed armis Chriſtianis, that Chriſtian warfare employ onely Chriſtian arms, which are, good arguments, and good life; elſe if they uſe ſuch a courſe, as is more properly κατ' το δίκαιον ἐν τῇ χειρὶ πεπιθόων, and go to force that part of man, which is liable to no power but that of perſwaſion, (which if it do not beget a true and pious aſſent, in likelihood it will a damnable diſſimulation, and which, if Chriſt had meant for a prop for his Doctrine, he would as ſoon have at firſt made it a part of the foundation, and have charged his Apoſtles not to ſhake the duſt off their feet, but to draw their ſwords out of the ſcabbard at thoſe, who rejected what they taught) then it often (though ſometimes by reaſon of the different diſpoſitions which reign at ſeveral times among men, and may happen otherwiſe) miſſeth of the intended end, and works not often ſo much as upon mens Tongues, and never upon their Heads and Hearts: A great example of which happened not long ſince; Calvin with all his works ſince the time they were written, having ſcarce made ſo many Proteſtants in France, as I have credibly heard it reported, as the Maſſacre made in a Night, which act though I impute not to all thoſe of your Religion, for many of them I know did, and do miſlike it, yet it both had its fountain from the Pope's Legate, (and conſequently in all likelihood from the Pope, who gave God publick thanks for it) as one of his ſucceſſours confeſs'd to Cardinal D' Oſſat, Page 432, and it may be juſtified as well as any judicial proceeding, upon that reaſon which you give, why Hereſie may be ſtopped with the ſword, leſt they who are wrought upon by it, may work upon others.

To conclude, I ſhould be better contented with this courſe, if the opinions were infallibly errours, and infallibly damnable, and this were always an effectual way, (and no other could be found more mercifull) to ſtop their ſpreading; but ſince you have no infallible way of knowing the Church to be infallible in her definitions, and conſequently, that the contrary opinions are falſe; ſince you know not infallibly which is ſhe, (for you pretend but prudential Motives) ſince your knowledge, having defined, is likewiſe fallible, as depending upon many uncertain circumſtances; ſince not onely the matter of Hereſie is thus uncertain, but the form too, for you confeſs you doubt whether Ignorantia affectata be it or no; and ſince though the form were certain, yet in whom, it is by no means plain, but rather impoſſible to be known, (as who is obſtinate, and conſequently to whom it is damnable) ſince this courſe often gives growth, and ſtrength to that, from which it would take even Being and Subſiſtance: I cannot but think you have cauſe to change your proceedings, leſt not onely you expell not, but leſt you encreaſe Hereſie; and again, leſt you oppoſe it not, but miſtake the Truth for it, and applaud your ſelf for cutting off a Gangren'd member, when you deſtroy a ſound one, and inſtead of ending a Heretick make a Martyr; and again leſt (allowing this to be the Truth) yet you put to death innocent perſons inſtead of guilty; eſpecially ſince if the opinions were damnable in whomſoever they were, yet ſome better way might be found, (as cloſe impriſonment or the like) to keep them from harming with them, rather than (as you do by putting them to death, when elſe they might live to be converted) to damn them certainly, leſt they may poſſibly damn ſome others; Again for Proteſtants, who joyn with me in believing that there is no way to know the true Church, but by true Doctrine, nor to know that, but by the Scripture, (for Univerſal Tradition ſeems to us to deliver nothing but what is ſo plainly contained there, that it is agreed upon) in them I believe it muſt be intollerable Pride, and raſhneſs, (and the ſame in Papiſts concerning thoſe places out of which they would prove the Churches infallibility) to conclude, this ſeems to me the ſenſe of this place of Scripture, therefore this infallibly it is, and no man can deny it, who either gainſays not his Conſcience, or hath it not miſlead by ſome ſinfull paſſion or affection, and therefore the deniers muſt be damned, and therefore leſt they damn others, we will ſend them through one fire to another. And this, though it be an equal fault in both Proteſtants and Papiſts to ſay and doe, yet it is more Illogical in the former, as contradicting at firſt ſight all their Principles, and deſtroying the whole Platform upon which the Reformation was built.

Reſp. He urgeth afterwards againſt the Unity of the Church, that it is none ſuch as we brag of, And I confeſs we brag of it, and think we have Reaſon. And if it pleaſe him to look into the difference of our Country of England, and ſome land of Barbarians, as Braſile, or ſuch other, where they live without Law or Government, I think he will find our bragging is not without ground. For wherein is the difference betwixt a Civil Government and a Barbarous Anarchy? Is it either that in a Civil Eſtate there be no Quarrels, or amongſt Barbarians there is no Quiet? The former would prejudice our Courts and Juſtice; the latter is impoſſible even in Nature. What is then the goodneſs of a Government, but in a well Governed Country there is a means to end Quarrels, and in Anarchy there can be no aſſured peace? This therefore is it we brag of, that amongſt us if any Controverſie ariſe, there is a way to end it, which is not amongſt them who parted from us. And Secondly, That there is no aſſured agreement amongſt thoſe who parted from us, for although to day they agree, there is no bond or tie why to morrow they may not diſagree. Theſe two things we brag of, and I think the Authour will not deny it. For he confeſſeth that we all agree, in that the Church is an infallible Miſtreſs. Then it is evident, that if in any Controverſie ſhe interpoſeth her judgment, the Controverſie is ended. He likewiſe confeſſeth, that who part from us, have no ſuch definitive authority amongſt them, and that Scripture, whereon they rely, hath no ſuch virtue to take up Controverſies clearly.

Repl. Suppoſing that we agreed much leſs than you, yet a little, all in earneſt, that is unforced, is more conſiderable, than much conſtrained, and ſo peradventure much of that much but in appearance; Beſides, that you all agree in thoſe points, wherein if any diſagree, he becomes none of you, is no more than is ſo common to all Religions, that even the very Anabaptiſts may ſay as much for themſelves; For either all the Parts of them remain of aſſent, inſomuch that they are all ſtill of the ſame Religion, and ſo agree as well as your Dominicans and Jeſuites, or elſe their differences are ſuch, as to make them of ſeveral Religions, and then, why is want of Unity objected to them any more than it is to Chriſtians in general, among whom are ſo many diviſions, and yet not the whole, but the faulty party taxed? And truly in my opinion ſome Queſtions among your ſelves are as great, not onely as any among your adverſaries, but as any between you and them. I but you anſwer, we have a way of being agreed; we reply, Is it a way ſure to lead to Truth as well as to Unity, or elſe ſo might we have by going to moſt at three throws, and reſolving to ſtand to that. Beſides, if you have, and make no more uſe of it, it ſeems there is no ſuch need that Queſtions be ended, as for that purpoſe to introduce a neceſſity of an Ender. But ſay you, neither are all ſuits in the Commonwealth ended; We reply, that yet truly thoſe Judges, who ſhould make no more haſte to end them, than your Judge doth theſe, would deſerve to loſe his place; but this they doe as faſt as the nature of the thing will permit; which being or depending upon matter of Fact, cannot be known enough to be judged, before examination of Witneſſes, and the like, be ended, and if they willingly defer the ending, they are confeſs'd to be in fault by all men, but thoſe who hold Perjury to be none. But you ſeem to conceive our grounds faulty, as not leading even to a poſſible Unity, whereas to a poſſible one I am ſure they do, (ſince what is concluded out of them by many, may be by all) nay indeed am confident, that all who receive the Scripture for the onely rule, and believe what is there plain to be onely neceſſary, would if they truly believed what they profeſs, and were not lead aſide either by prejudice, or private ends, or ſome Popiſh relicks of holding what they have long been taught, or following the authority of ſome by them much eſteemed perſons (either alive or dead) ſoon agree in as much as is neceſſary, and in concluding no neceſſity of agreeing in more, there being no doubt, but it would ſoon appear plainly what is plain.

Beſides, if no grounds be ſufficient for Unity, which produce not the effect, then it ſeems, the grounds of your grounds, thoſe Arguments, by which you prove, that there is a Judge, and a general Council is it, are inſufficient, ſince they are not able to make all Chriſtians about this queſtion: Again, although a Judge, and this Judge be received, yet this is ſtill an inſufficient ground for Unity, ſince the Greek Church agree thus far with you (which is as far as you agree with one another) and yet are not ſo bound by it to any univerſal Unity with them, but that they eſteem you Hereticks, and are eſteemed ſo by you: and if you ſay, that it is not, becauſe the grounds, upon which the Infallibility of the Church are built, lead not ſufficiently to Unity, that we joyn not with you in believing them to be infallible, not becauſe the determination of general Councils is not a ſufficient means of Unity, that the Greek Church admitting their authority, admits not of your opinions, but it is the fault of us (and of them) hardning our hearts againſt the truth; then we may as well ſay, that ſome of thoſe, who agree in our grounds, yet diſagree from our Doctrine, not that the grounds lead not to Unity, but that our Adverſaries will not be lead; or if (as you doe, and ſome others of you ſometimes) you confeſs, that they through an innocent errour diſſent from you, and doe this without any imputation in this reſpect to your grounds, I hope it will be lawfull for us to allow the ſame poſſibility, without any diſadvantage or prejudice to ours: Beſides, ſay you, though we agree to day, yet we may not to morrow, which to prove, were μάτην τὸ ὕδωρ ἀναλίσκειν, pains wholly loſt, we confeſs: For though Tully make it an expreſſion of his contempt to Piſo, in an Epiſtle to Atticus, Ità nihil eſt, ut planè quid erit, neſciat, yet I take it to be a true ſaying of man in general, who knows little of preſent things, and nothing of future; but this is common to us both, for if we change not our opinions, we ſhall agree as we do, and if you change yours, you ſhall not; which is poſſible, for not onely that opinion of the Infallibility of your Judges Decrees, may it ſelf be altered, which holdeth together all the reſt, but ſome of you may, holding that ground (like the Greek) either change their opinions concerning the authority of ſuch or ſuch a Council, as believing it unduly called, factiouſly carried, or not general as is pretended, or not ſo conſenting as is requiſite, or differ from the reſt, concerning the ſenſe of the Decrees: For whereas you ſay, you agree that the Church is an infallible Miſtreſs, and when ſhe interpoſeth her judgment, the Controverſie is ended: I anſwer, that, firſt, ſome of you, with whom I have ſpoken my ſelf, hold, that the Churches authority in defining, extends no farther than to ſuch points, whereof Tradition is of one part (as in many controverted there is, I believe, no ſuch) and that this rule ſhe may tranſgreſs, and ſo err.

Secondly, Neither the Dominicans nor their Adverſaries, are very ready to remain in ſuſpence to await her deciſion, but define all ready concerning her definitions, Cùm utraque pars tenax contendat ſuam non aliam poſſe definiri ſententiam, either part tenaciouſly urging, that the contrary opinion cannot be defined, which if they did to fright the Pope from defining, leſt the condemned party being even before, ſhould after make a Schiſm, they obtained their end.

Thirdly, What are you the nearer to Unity for your Infallible Miſtreſs the Church, when you neither agree of any certain and proper marks to know her by, nor when it is that ſhe interpoſeth her judgment? ſome take it to be the particular Church of Rome, others (of which number you are) all which communicate with her; ſuppoſing the firſt to be true, yet not being de fide, it will ſerve but ill, by your rules, to build our faith upon; and even when ſhe delivers her opinion, is not certainly agreed, whether the people of Rome be to have Votes, or onely the Clergy, or of them, onely the Pope with the Cardinals, or the Pope onely without them, if the Pope, whether onely in his Chair, and what circumſtances are required to his decreeing in Cathedra, would beget more queſtions. If all that communicate with her (as you ſay it is, as things now ſtand,) Firſt, I would know whether they be ſure to be at all times the Church; to that you refuſe to determine, and ſo incluſively deny.

Secondly, It is not poſſible, that ſuch a multitude ſhould ever give any ſentence explicitly, nor can we ever know, that it hath even tacitly done ſo; if they be to decree onely by repreſentation, then how large a company repreſents them with all their power, of whom that company is to conſiſt, how many of them are to agree to make it a binding ſentence, &c. are things yet undefined, and like to be, and if any go about to determine them, their power being it ſelf ſtill a queſtion, could not end theſe: Therefore, whereas you ſay, that we have no definitive ſentence (beſides that truly to have one, and not to know when we have one, is much alike;) I anſwer, that whenſoever the Scripture ſhall ſeem to us to have defined, we are according to our Doctrine ready to yield, and ſo the Controverſie is ended (and ſure the Scripture may be ſaid to be a definitive ſentence, as well as the written Council of Trent) and till then, though we differ about interpretations of not plain places, we have as much Unity as you, who are not reſolved upon the ſenſe of many Decrees of that and other Councils: and if a deſire and diligence to find the true meaning of them, and an aptneſs to aſſent when it is found, be thought to ſecure among you, thoſe who miſtake the true ſenſe of theſe Councils, why ſhould not the ſame diſpoſition in us towards the Scripture, be thought every whit as ſufficient, not onely to keep us in unity, but to ſecure us from danger?

To conclude, though Unity be a thing much ſpoken of by you, yet I find it chiefly onely in your diſcourſe; your differences are many and great, onely you ſay, you agree in what is neceſſary, and make the meaſure of things neceſſary what you agree in; ſo the ſum is, you agree in what you do agree (which it is impoſſible you ſhould not, though you had carried away the bays from Bibrias his Tomb) eager againſt us, and yet divided among your ſelves, like the ſtate of an Army in Tacitus, Manente Legionum auxiliorumque, ubi adverſus Paganos certandum foret, conſenſu; and if your Church brag of ſuch an Unity, I perceive a ſmall matter will make her brag.

Reſp. Again, I do confeſs moſt Engliſh-men confeſs a Trinity, the Incarnation and Paſſion of our Saviour, but if to morrow, any one or more of them light upon ſome Book of an Arian, Trinitarian, or other Sect, ſo wittily written that he putteth probable ſolutions for the places of Scriptures, ſhews ſlight ways how our well meaning fore-fathers may have ſlipped into ſuch an Errour, what is there to retain thoſe men from diſagreeing with the reſt of their Brethren, and betake themſelves to the Arians? And when the heat is paſt, light upon ſome Rabbi, who ſhall cunningly exaggerate the abſurdities, (as he ſhall term them) of the Trinity, Incarnation; Say our Saviour did ſtrange things in virtue of ſome Conſtellation, and delivering theſe things ſo Oratorically, that for a new heat, ſome of theſe things ſhall ſeem more conformable than his Arianiſm, what then ſhall hinder this man to become a Jew, and at laſt to prove himſelf ſo great a Clerk as to write de tribus Impoſtoribus? Take away the power of the Church, which every man doth who taketh away the Infallibility, what can retain any man why he ſhould not yield to that diſcourſe which ſeemeth faireſt, ſeeing nothing is certain?

Repl. And if you ſhould meet with a Book which ſhould give probable ſolutions to the places of Scripture, and reaſons which you now think prove the authority of the Church, and bring other (though ſuppoſe but ſlight, yet ſuch as may ſeem ſtrong) Arguments to prove it not infallible, and ſhew ways of the ſame kind, how your Anceſtours may have ſlipt in that, and by that into other errours, what is there to retain you with the reſt of your Brethren, from betaking your ſelf to us? If you ſay this is impoſſible to be done, ſo think the Proteſtants, that the Arians can give them no probable anſwer to their places of Scripture, and ſuch as will ſeem ſo to ſome, is no imputation to their grounds, ſince ſo may, and do our Anſwers and Objections to ſome of you, who thereupon leave you, and yet you count not your grounds diſparaged. For my part, I profeſs my ſelf not onely to be an Anti-Trinitarian, but a Turk, whenſoever more reaſon appears to me for that, than for the contrary, and ſo ſure would you be too; for the pretended infallibility of your Church could no longer hold you, if you thought you ſaw reaſon to believe it fallible, as you muſt do, if all weighed, more reaſon appeared of her adverſaries ſide, either your proofs of her authority not to be probable, or elſe your Doctrines taught by her, more contrary to reaſon, than her authority (though probably founded, yet not upon demonſtrations) is ſufficient to caution, and anſwer for; It is true, ſo long as you ſtick to this hold upon the Roman Church, you are ſure to receive no errour, but which ſhe offers you, (and indeed you need not, for thoſe are enough) but that deſtroyed (which is apter to be deſtroyed than moſt of the Proteſtants, as weaklier ſupported by reaſon) then no errour that a Proteſtant may fall into, but ſo may you too, and the other is but ſuch a Privilege, as I may have by ſticking to the Engliſh Church, as well as you to the Roman; And though this following your guide, may be able, as long as ſhe keep her ſelf, to keep you from ſome Ditches, into which you might otherwiſe fall, yet it may lead you unto others; and indeed there is no errour but by this way you are liable to, yea even of thoſe which ſhe now condemns, ſince though ſhe changed her opinion, which is neither impoſſible, nor unlawfull, yet you are by your blind obedience to believe that ſhe had not, and to ſubmit your underſtanding in this Queſtion to ſome diſtinction, though without a difference. Theſe things then I diſlike in what you ſay:

Firſt, Your ſaying, as though there is nothing to retain a Proteſtant from being of any errour, when it ſhall appear more probable to him than Truth, therefore there were nothing to keep him from thoſe errours; whereas you ſhould have conſidered, that the greater probabilities may ſerve reaſonably to hold him without a demonſtration, and the evidence of the thing, without a guide, and that if thoſe be not ground enough for a man to fix upon, in how ill eſtate are thoſe of your Church, in the Queſtion concerning the Church, in which they follow no guide, nor have any demonſtration, but profeſs they yield to her authority, but upon prudential motives, which kind of arguments ſure may as well, and as fixedly preſerve a Proteſtant in an Orthodox opinion againſt a Heretick, as the authority of the Church no ſurelier founded, can you againſt us: That every man ſhould yield to that diſcourſe which ſeemeth faireſt to him, I confeſs, it is always, not onely ſafe and fit, but alſo neceſſary, even for them who receive the Infallibility of the Church, ſince thoſe who believe that, believe it, becauſe that appears faireſt to them; and as you object to us, the poſſibility of being perſwaded from the truth by ſome witty Authour, why think you not the ſame Authour may poſſibly too, appear to you to deſtroy your prudential Motives, and ſo conſequently your whole Faith, which is built upon the Church, which is built upon them.

Secondly, I diſlike your ſeeming to believe, that any grounds, which are not demonſtrative, are too ſlippery to reſt upon, as not onely being contrary to reaſon, but to your ſelf, who told me before, that no more was required, than a main advantage on one ſide, and that we had reaſon to be ſatisfied with Probabilities to guide our Actions in Religion, ſince by them we were content to regulate all the other Actions of our life.

Thirdly, I diſlike, in your own parties behalf, your ſaying, that a Proteſtant is in good likelihood to turn Arian (for if you mean onely that it is poſſible, it concerns you as much as them) ſince this ſeems to infer, that the Scriptures do make more probably for them (which if they did, it is not Hereſie) and to contradict all thoſe, whom both parts call Fathers, who think enough plain in Scripture, not onely onely to keep, but alſo to convert men from Arianiſm, as it appears, by their employing ſo ſolely thoſe Arms againſt them, that they needed the admonition of a Heretick, to counſel them to the uſe of another.

Fourthly, I diſlike your ſaying, that after being made an Arian, he is not unlikely to turn Jew, eſpecially, that he is likely to be perſwaded by any exaggeration of the Abſurdities in the Trinity, ſince both Grotius and other Authours, ſeem to ſay, that the Jews have their Trinity too in the ſame Notion; and howſoever the Arian is ſo fully perſwaded already, that thoſe are abſurdities (that perſwaſion being almoſt the form of that opinion which conſtitutes him an Arian) yet the exaggeration of them can never work upon him; And for the Conſtellation you ſpeak of, it were ſo irrational, and ſo unprovable a Crotchet, that no Oratory could ever make it ſeem to a reaſonable man, to have any inclination to ſenſe (and a fool may be made believe any thing, how contrary ſoever to his grounds) unleſs he be of thoſe, who are given over to vain imaginations, becauſe they love darkneſs better than the light; and the fault of no particular mens underſtanding or will, is to lead any man to condemn his grounds, for they are to be accuſed, not of whatſoever he concludes who holds (or rather in this caſe hath held) them, but onely of what he concludes reaſonably according to them. Beſides, for this cauſe it appears ſtrange to me, that truſting to Scripture alone, and without meaning the Church for my certain guide, ſhould bring a man into danger of parting with his Chriſtianity, ſince nothing can hold a man longer than he believes it, and as long as our ground, the Scripture, is by him believed, no man can poſſibly turn either Atheiſt, or Jew; and he who leaves to believe your ground, the Church, cannot by that be any more with-held from either: Beſides that, I think it is impoſſible (I am ſure it is irrational) that any of you ſhould believe in Chriſt, upon the authority of Chriſt's Church, ſince believing the latter (which claims no authority but from Chriſt) preſuppoſeth the belief of him, and ſo Chriſtianity is not the apter to be overthrown through the abſence of that, upon which it is not built: I fear rather, leſt your Doctrine known to be grounded it ſelf upon Tradition by ſuch a way, according to which, a Jew would have much advantage of a Chriſtian, may incline a man to Judaiſm, and your ſides general ſlighting all ways of knowing God's will, but onely by the Church, and then neither proving her power ſtronglier, nor teaching how to know her plainer, may make men ſink into Atheiſm, by being perſwaded by you, in letting go other ſtrong holds upon Truth, and receiving ſuch weak ones from you. Not to ſpeak of your loading Chriſtianity with ſuch impoſſibilities, as the Pillars of it, which are not abſolute Demonſtrations (of which, it may be, ſcarce any thing is in nature capable, but lines and numbers) are not able to bear, and uſing all your Wits and Induſtries to perſwade men, that it is equally unſafe to refuſe any part of your Religion, as to receive none; and ſo inſtead of making theſe your beliefs admitted for the ſake of Chriſtianity, cauſing Chriſtianity to be rejected becauſe of them.

But peradventure ſome may attribute Power to the Church without Infallibility; whom I would have conſider but what himſelf ſaith. For his Church by the Power it hath, muſt either ſay, I command you to believe, or I command you to profeſs this, whether you believe me or no. The ſecond, I think no enemy of equivocation will admit, and the former it is as much as if it ſhould ſay, I know not whether I ſay true or no, yet you muſt think I ſay true. Reſp.

We having received a command, that all things be done decently, and in order, and this being to be appointed by them, whom either the Law of the Land, (if that conſiſt of faithfull) or the conſent or cuſtome of Chriſtians hath appointed, for Eccleſiaſtical Rulers in this matter, in every place the Church (thus reſtrained to the Governours of the Church) may have in ſome caſes (though not to your purpoſe) Power without the leaſt Infallibility. And for inſtruction (which you aim at) no Church can give it, yours eſpecially, being too large a body ever to meet or joyn in doing it; and if you reſtrain the Church to the Clergy, (whereof yet many teach not, and they too are too many for any man to be ſure what they all agree in teaching, and when they differ, how ſhall I know which to follow, otherwiſe than by your Rule which I have anſwered) their duty indeed, but not theirs onely, (though Principally) is to inſtruct us in the way to Heaven, which they doing in the Perſons of Embaſſadours between God and us, and having no abſolute Letters of Credence to bid us to believe that God ſays, whatſoever they ſay, he ſays, (as much as can be wreſted out of Scriptures for any preſent Church, being ſaid of the Scribes and Phariſees, who yet proved themſelves not infallible) our beſt way is in my mind to examine their Commiſſion, and if they can ſhew that they treat according to that, to ſubmit to them, (as in the ſame caſe we muſt to any of the Laity) or rather to God, of whoſe commands they are but Organs, and if not, to beware of their Leaven. Yet it may be that ſome man may hold that ſuch an opinion is to be believed onely, becauſe ſuch a Church propoſeth it, and yet not believe her Infallible, ſince he may think her authority (by reaſon of her Learning, Multitude, Sanctity, Unity and Liberty) to be more probable than any contradicting argument, and that men are to aſſent to what is moſt probable; and truly if he could prove to me his Major, I am already ſo much of the opinion of his Minor, that I ſhould joyn with him in his Concluſion. Repl.

So that if I underſtand any thing, where there is no Infallibility, there is no Power; where no Power, no Unity; where no Unity, no Entity; where no Entity, no Church. Reſp.

How you tie Power to Infallibility I gueſs; but cannot how you tie Unity to Power: For how many things are all men even at Unity about, though one have no Power over another in them, onely cemented together by their clear evidence: And how many more do whole Bodies, and Sects of men agree about, without any ſuch power, though they differ in other points, as ſo do you too; Do not Proteſtants agree with you about many, and the chiefeſt credenda, and about almoſt all the merely facienda? Though not perſwaded to this agreement by the Power of any Judge which they do acknowledge; Nay if men could be at Unity about no thing, which were not propoſed by ſome Guide, or defined by ſome Judge endued with ſuch a power, how came all you to agree, that there is ſome ſuch Guide and Judge required, ſince ſure you receive not that upon its own authority; and if men may find the neceſſity of a Guide and Judge, without any Guide or Judge, and remain in Unity about Repl.

that,

that, why may they not alſo about whatſoever is clearly taught by God, which reaſon aſſures us to be all that is neceſſary? and if you ſay that all things neceſſary are not clearly taught, becauſe we do not (though it proves not that we might not) agree upon them, then I reply, that I may as well ſay, that neither is it clear that there is a Guide, becauſe we diſſent from you in it, although receiving the authority of the Scripture (out of which Cardinal Perron confeſſeth, that Saint Auſtine ſaith, that both the neceſſity of your Guide, the Church, and ſhe her ſelf, are to be known) and reaſon, which as they may be plain in this point for you, and yet perſwade us not, ſo may they be in all neceſſary points, and yet we who make theirs our ground, not perſwade one another.

As little ſee I why there can be no Entity nor Church, where there is no Unity.

For the firſt, though there be ſmall Unity among Chriſtians, yet certainly Chriſtians and their Religion have ſome Entity; indeed if what you ſay were true, there were no Entity in yours.

For the ſecond, I know not why two parties over-valuing their differences, may not conceive each other to be none of the Church, and ſo declare even by excommunications, and yet remain both Parts of it, (for if a Husband miſ-ſuſpecting his Wife of Adultery, declare her to be no longer his Wife, this cannot make her give over being ſo, if the bond be indeed not broken) as well as Chryſoſtome and Epiphanius, both excommunicated by each other, and yet both Saints, or as particular men may by your own confeſſion be interiourly in the Church, although ſeeming out of it, even to the Church her ſelf, and ſo thoſe be both of the Church, between whom there is no Unity: For not onely in your own Cariophilus his words τὸ πεμπόμενα βέλη ἐκ χειρὸς μὴ ἐχούσης τὸ κῦρος ἢ αἰδυτίαν, ἄσθενὸς ἄξια, but alſo though the perſons have power, yet if the cauſe have not ſufficiency, I take you to agree, that an excommunication is but a brutum fulmen, as Victors of the Aſian Biſhops: The beſt therefore and ſtricteſt definition (and which I think you will not refute) which I can give for the Church, is (eſpecially in that ſenſe, as out of it there can be no ſalvation) thoſe who are deſirous to know God's Will, (or Chriſt's at the ſtricteſt, for I am not certain, nor I believe is it defined among you, whether an explicite knowledge of Chriſt be abſolutely neceſſary to ſalvation, though I know no guiltleſs ignorance of him, can bring unavoidably upon any man eternal torments) and ready, when known, to believe and follow it; and ſure many of theſe may eternally diſagree even in points which are neceſſary, abſtracting from particular caſes, and yet their differences not exclude them from the Church, and conſequently a Church may be without Unity, Quod erat demonſtrandum.

Reſp. Now for the Controverſies mentioned, beſides that there is a means to terminate them, they be ſuch as bring no breach of the ancient life and action of Chriſtians, which all thoſe opinions do, which for the moſt part are reputed to make Hereticks.

Repl. You ſaw very well, that if [no Unity, no Church] were a true Propoſition, yours hath in it differences enough to deſtroy its being a Church, and therefore are fain to apply what ſalves you can; but all in vain: For your means to terminate them, doth not make them not to be, before they are terminated, and conſequently by your Rule yours is no Church till then. Beſides, their bringing no breach of the ancient life and action of Chriſtians, proves not but one of them may be a Hereſie, ſince you ſay not your ſelf, that all Hereſies are ſuch, but onely for the moſt part; and indeed to prove that, you muſt be able to ſet down what thoſe opinions are, which before a definition, may make a Heretick, which I believe you will not venture to doe in haſte, though we much deſire it at your hands, that we may know if none of them be ſuch.

Reſp. That ſome Controverſies amongſt us are not reſolved, is a thing neceſſary amongſt humane affairs, where things muſt have a time to be born, to encreaſe, to fall, and the greater things are, the greater is their Period.

Repl. It is true, that ſome time to be taken notice of muſt paſs between an opinions riſing, and being condemned; but that ſo long they ſhould run on, and many of your Councils having ſince been held, is ſure not neceſſary, and ſhews, that you eſteem not Unity ſo neceſſary as you pretend: ſome opinions I am ſure you can ſoon enough quaſh, as that not long ſince riſen in Spain concerning Fornication being but a Venial Sin: And whereas you ſay, the greater things are, the greater their period, though this be true in ſome things, yet not in this, for ſure the greater a difference is, the greater neceſſity is there that it be ſoon decided, and ſo if your deciſion have power to effect it, as you pretend among you it hath, it muſt fall as ſoon as it is born, like the ζῶα ἐφήμερα, Creatures that live but a day.

Reſp. Wherefore I do not ſee why this may hurt the Church, more than the Suits which hang in our Courts, prejudice the government of the Land.

Repl. If any of theſe opinions be of that importance, as that though uncondemn'd, the Holders are Hereticks, as ſome may be, and my definition being concluded of ſuch among you, ſome of theſe may be ſome of them, then ſure they hurt the Church much, and more than the Suits hurt the Government, which their hanging hurts not at all, though it hurts (ſometimes unavoidably) the Parties. But if where there is no Unity, there were no Commonwealth, as you ſay, where there is no Unity, there can be no Church, then the Government were much prejudic'd by the Suits, as your Church by this Rule, is made no Church by the differences; And indeed if men were not agreed about the power of the Governours (as you are not about ſome of your queſtions) it muſt be a maim to the Government of any Commonwealth, as conſequently theſe are to the Government of your Church.

Reſp. The laſt point of the Authour's Diſcourſe is, to ſhew how errours might have crept in, wherein I ſhall have no oppoſition with him, for I do not think the queſtion is, how they ſhould creep in, but how they ſhould be kept out.

Repl. Here, Sir, I cannot but believe, that you intended to refreſh your ſelf with ſome Mirth, as with Muſick between the Acts; for though both our ends be, that errours ſhould not creep in, yet the queſtion was, whether it were poſſible that they might creep in, and to my affirmative part it conduced to ſhew thoſe ways, by which either they have entred, or eaſily might do ſo, this ſhewing how they may ſteal in, teacheth how to keep them out, as it is an aid to the ſaving of a Town, to diſcover the breaches, which cannot be guarded without they be firſt known.

For the Fluxibility of humane Nature is ſo great, that it is no wonder if errours ſhould have crept in, the ways being ſo many; but it is a great wonder of God that none ſhould have crept in. This nevertheleſs I may ſay, if the Authour will confeſs, as I think he will not deny, but that it is diſputable, whether any errour in ſixteen Ages hath crept in, this very thing is above Nature. For if there were not an excellency beyond the nature of corruptible things, it would be undeniably evident, that not one or two, but thouſands of errours had quite changed the ſhape of the Church in ſo many years, tempeſts, diſ-unions, want of Commerce in the body of the Church. Reſp.

The greater wonder it were, if your Church had no errour, the greater it is to me, that upon one, at moſt but probable, Reaſon, you ſhould require all men to believe ſhe hath none; Neither doth it appear to me diſputable, whether ſhe have or no, but evident, that ſhe hath, not by Demonſtrations, yet by Probabilities of that multitude, and weight, upon which you ſay (and ſay truly) that in all other caſes we relie, and venture that we moſt eſteem: whereas indeed you, as you are of the impoſing Party, ought to bring at leaſt ſuch proofs, that you are fallen into none, and as you are of the Infallibility-pretending-party, your proofs are likewiſe to riſe from probable to Infallible: Neither do I conceive it to be probably argued, It is diſputable, whether this body of men have ever let in any errour, therefore it can never let in any, ſince it is at leaſt as diſputable, whether the Grecians have let in any, yet you will not allow, that upon this we ſhould adjudge to her Infallibility: Nay if it were demonſtrative, that your Church had yet never erred, yet it would but unwillingly follow, that ſhe never could, ſince all things neceſſary are ſo plain (without the confeſſion of which you ſeem to tax God) and it is naturally ſo plain what is plain, that I cannot but think it a miracle, that ſome one body of Chriſtians among ſo many, ſhould be free from any ſuch dogmatically-defended errour, eſpecially if Truth were ſo indifferently ſought after as it ought to be, and Paſſion were not often called to counſel, and Reaſon ſhut out of doors. Repl.

But this one Maxime, that ſhe receiveth her Faith by Tradition, and not from Doctours, hath ever kept her entire: And he that will ſhew the contrary, muſt ſhew how it ſhould come to paſs, that thoſe, who lived in ſuch an Age, would ſay unto our Children, this we received from our fore-fathers, as taught them by their fore-fathers, to have been received from Chriſt and his Apoſtles from hand to hand; which if it could not be, the queſtion is reſolved, that no errour is in the Church of God, which holdeth her faith upon that Tenure. Reſp.

Not to repeat, uſque ad nauſeam, what I have heretofore anſwered, as that others differing from you, hold upon the ſame Tenure that your ſelves have not always held, nor hold not upon it, &c. I will onely tell you what Cardinal Perron tells me of the Jews out of Iſidore, and that is, that they ſeeing in the Book of Wiſedom ſo clear proofs of Chriſt, plotted together to put it out of the Canon; which ſerves not ſo much his turn, if it were ſo, as it makes againſt yours, and ſhews how that might come to paſs, which you judge impoſſible, the Poſterity of the Jews having been deceived by this Complot; although pretending at leaſt, and for ought appears, believing that the Tradition of their Church is ſtill uncorrupted. Repl.

And truly if the Authour deſires to examine divers Religions, let him look their main ground wherein they rely, and ſee whether that be good or no: And I think amongſt Chriſtians he ſhall find but two, Tradition, and Scripture. Reſp.

Firſt, I allow not of your diviſion, for not to ſay now that you rely not onely upon Tradition, theſe Proteſtants, whoſe part in this I take, depend not onely upon Scripture, but upon Univerſal Tradition too, from which they receive that, and would more, if more ſeemed as clearly to them ſo to be delivered. Repl.

Secondly, I think it reaſonable not onely to examine what their Principles are, but whether they do conſtantly follow them, for a man may write awry, that hath a ſtreight Ruler, if he obſerve it not carefully.

And the Catholicks onely to rely upon Tradition, and all the reſt upon Scripture; and he ſhall ſee, that relying upon Scripture cannot draw to an Unity thoſe who rely upon it, and more than one cannot rely upon Tradition. Reſp.

If all that rely upon Tradition be Catholicks, you muſt admit the Eaſtern Churches into your Communion, although you now account them both Schiſmaticks and Hereticks: If all Catholicks do rely upon Tradition as their onely ground, and Tradition be ſo ſure and infallible, and unmiſtakable a deliverer, as you would perſwade us, how come ſo many differences between you, ſome ever counting thoſe things matter of Faith which others do not? which differences ſhew, if they all rely, in theſe Queſtions, upon the ground you ſay they do, that more than one may rely upon Tradition; and neither can Tradition, any more than Scripture, draw to an Unity, thoſe who rely upon it; if either neither part do, or either do not, then Tradition is not the Common Tenure of Catholicks, (not onely in different opinions, but even in ſuch as are moſt de fide, and as both parts think nothing but a definition (and ſome, ſcarce that) to make the Holders of the contrary to them, Heretick) ſince if it were, neither could one part of Catholicks rely upon any other than the Catholick ground, neither is it to be doubted, but that ſide which builds their opinion upon an Heretical foundation, againſt another, believed upon a Catholick ground, would long agone have been among you exploded, and the Pope have been not onely with ſo much pains perſwaded, but even of himſelf ready to have paſt his cenſure upon them; if not for their ſuperſtructions, yet for their foundation. Repl.

If I will be a Chriſtian, I muſt be of one ſide. Reſp.

If you mean I muſt be of one ſide, that is take one of theſe grounds, I anſwer, That I take both, one from the other, Scripture from Tradition, though not from the preſent Tradition of a Part, but from the Univerſal one of the firſt Chriſtians, oppoſed by none, but by them, who were inſtantly counted by the generality heterodox, and as ſoon oppoſed as known. If you mean that I muſt be of one ſide in points, I wholly deny any ſuch neceſſity. Repl.

By falling on the one ſide, I ſee my fortune in thouſands who have gone before me, to wit, that I ſhall be to ſeek all my life time, as I ſee they are, and how greatly they magnifie very weak pieces. On the other ſide, I ſee every man who followeth, as far as he followeth it, is at quiet. Reſp.

I ſee not but the greateſt part of thoſe who take the ground which you miſlike, are yet ſettled and confident enough in their opinion; and if they continued always ſeeking Truth for the love of it, I know not why they ſhould be the leſs likely to find Heaven: Neither think I that you will ſay (nay it is plain by your own words, that you will not ſay) that Saint Auſtine had been damned if he had died in his ſearch, nor conſequently any other in his caſe. And whereas you ſay, that all who follow the other, are at quiet as far as they follow it, I anſwer, So are all who fixedly believe themſelves to follow an infallible (although indeed a falſe) Guide, as the Mahumetans, being led by their Mufty: Which proves Quiet, no ſufficient caution for Truth, nor Security for Safety; and that, ſuppoſing yours the more eaſie and ſatisfying way, it follows not that it is the more reaſonable: And for what you ſay of a man's duty to judge himſelf rigorouſly, whether he ſeek as he ought, I ſubſcribe to that opinion, and approve of your Counſel.

Reſp. Beſides this, he muſt have this care, that he ſeek what the Nature of the ſubject can yield, and not as theſe Phyſicians, who when they have promiſed no leſs than immortality, can at laſt onely reach to ſome conſervation of health, or youth in ſome ſmall degree; So I could wiſh the Authour well to aſſure himſelf, Firſt, that there is poſſible an infallibility, before he be too earneſt to be contented with nothing leſs. For, what if humane nature ſhould not be capable of ſo great a good, would he therefore think fitting to live without any Religion, becauſe he could not get ſuch a one as himſelf deſired, though with more than a man's wiſh?

Repl. What you now ſay, I confeſs is very rational, (as indeed all you ſay, is as much as your cauſe will ſuffer) and I require you not therefore to prove your opinions to be infallible by infallible arguments, as neceſſary to be done in it ſelf, but as neceſſary to be done by them, of whoſe opinions their Churches infallibility is not onely a part, but a ground, and that the chief, if not the onely one, and of which an infallible certainty is the firſt and main condition of their Communion, and our want of it, one of their main Objections againſt us.

Reſp. He that will make a judgment in an Art he is not Maſter in, if he be deceived, it is to be imputed to himſelf. The Phraſe commandeth us to believe every man in his Art, he who knoweth and underſtandeth himſelf, believeth not. Therefore when we ſee Maſters in an Art, we are not skill'd in, oppoſe us, we may believe we are in the wrong, which will breed this Reſolution in the Authour of the diſcourſe, that if himſelf be not skill'd in all thoſe ways in which he purſues his ſearch, he muſt find himſelf obliged to ſeek Maſters, who be both well skilled, and the matter being ſubject to faction alſo, very honeſt, and upright men, or elſe he doth not quit himſelf before God.

Repl. Truly I am far from being Maſter either in this or any other Art, but if for this cauſe I ought to doubt, and becauſe much learneder perſons oppoſe me, I ought to believe my ſelf in the wrong, then ſo ought thoſe of your part to do, who are as Ignorant as I, we having many much more learned than they who oppoſe them, and take our part; though therefore I think not of my ſelf (what Tully in a Complement would perſwade one of his Friends,) that Nemo eſt qui ſapientiùs mihi poſſit ſuadere meipſo, yet I dare not chuſe (as you would have me) ſome Maſter to ſearch for me, and believe him blindfold, (though if I would, I ſee no cauſe why to chuſe any from among you, who have ſo many able Teachers at home) for you confeſſing that the matters are ſubject to Faction, and it being certain, that not onely, who are honeſt, is impoſſible to be known, but that eagerneſs and deſire to have, what they think Truth, prevail, makes even the honeſt men ſometimes deviate from the line of exact honeſty, and lie for God, which he not onely needs not, but forbids, (as is to be ſeen too frequently in the Quotations of both ſides) I conceive it the beſt way to follow my own Reaſon, ſince I know I have no will to cozen my ſelf, as they may have to cozen me: Eſpecially ſince neither could I build upon ſuch a way, an aſſent of ſuch a degree, as your Church requires, ſince ſuch Maſters, although learned, which I being unlearned may be deceived in, and honeſt, which all men might be deceived in, yet not infallible, could not in reaſon make me infallibly certain of the Orthodoxneſs of that ſide, which they ſhould chuſe for me: So that what was ſaid by the Pagan Solomon, Socrates, (who yet was no confident man of his knowledge) ἐγὼ οὖν τοιοῦτῳ οἵῳ μηδένα πείθεσθαι ἢ ἐμὸν λογισμὸν βελτίων φαίνεται, is my reſolution too, and indeed, in effect, if not wholly, yet almoſt every man's; for thoſe who truſt their Reaſon leaſt, yet truſt it in this, that ſome other inſtead of it, is to be truſted, and ſo chuſe who they are to truſt; againſt which the Arguments either from the fallibility of Reaſon in general, or in this particular, remain equally, an ignorant man being as likely to be deceived in the choice of his Guide, as in that of his Way, and that courſe being rather the ſhorter than the better, as venturing in the ſame, and no ſtronger a Bark, onely venturing all his wealth at once.

Reſp. It is not all one not to incur damnation for infidelity, and to be in ſtate of damnation; for the man to whom infidelity is not imputed, may be in ſtate of damnation for other faults; as thoſe were, who having known God by his works, did not glorifie him as they ought.

Repl. That men may be damned for other faults, concerns not our Queſtion, nor indeed is any.

Reſp. Nay, they may be damned for want of Faith, and yet not be damned for incredulity; As for example ſake, if when they have ſinned, they know not what means to have them forgiven, though they be without fault in not believing, nevertheleſs dying without Remiſſion of ſin, they are not in ſtate to come to life everlaſting.

Repl. This concerns no Chriſtians, none of which that I know differs from you in the neceſſary means of obtaining forgiveneſs for ſins; for though you require Confeſſion, yet you allow that Contrition will ſave without it: Neither do I believe, but an imperfect Repentance cauſed through faultleſs Ignorance, of what it is for it to be perfect, will ſtill be accepted by him who regards the Heart more than the Action; indeed, onely the Action, becauſe of the Heart; and knows, that if he uſe not the appointed means, it is onely becauſe he knows it not; elſe conſidering the many impoſitions from above, the great frailty within, and the great and many temptations without, ſo that to fall into no ſin, were morally impoſſible, he who ὡς ἐπὶ τὸ πολὺ, generally obſerved what he counted himſelf bound to obſerve, if for ſome faults which he was after heartily ſorry for, and had ſincerely reformed, he ſhould be damned for want of knowing more, how to purge himſelf from them, than he could poſſibly know, God would not be deſirous of the Salvation of all men, and it would ſeem agreeable to no Mercy, nor to any Juſtice, except that Summum jus, which ever hath been thought condemnable in man, and conſequently incompatible in God.

Reſp. As the man who ſhould venture into a wood without a Guide, although he did his beſt to have a guide, nothing leſs might fall out of his way, as well as he who neglected the taking of one; ſo if God ſent us his Son to ſhew us the way of Salvation, as well is he like not to be ſaved who never heard of ſuch a way, as he that heard of it and neglected it, for neither of the two goeth that way: And who goeth not on the way, is not like to come to the end.

Repl. The way is believing and obeying Chriſt, for them to whom He and his Commands are ſufficiently propoſed; I mean, ſo, that it is their fault if they know them not: In general then, it is ſeeking the Truth impartially, and obeying diligently what is found ſincerely, and who treads this way, though he miſs of Truth, ſhall not miſs of his favour who is the Father of it; and if he be excluded Heaven, ſure God meant that he ſhould never come thither, and deſires not that he and all elſe ſhould, elſe he would not have propoſed onely ſuch a way, which it were poſſible for any to miſs without his own fault, and which he knew that many would. Truly, that opinion, that no errour is a ſin without the cauſe of it be one; and that God is not diſpleaſed with any man for not ſeeing what it is not his fault that he doth not ſee, is agreeable to the common Notions of Juſtice, and God; and it is a very good Negative way to trie ſuperſtructions by, to ſee whether they agree with theſe grounds of all Religion, whereof, rather than believe ſuch men ſhould be damned, I would believe they ſhould be annihilated, or keep your Children company, and have pœnam damni, though not ſenſus.

Reſp. I know God is good and mercifull: But I know his decrees, as far as we know, are diſpenſed by the order of ſecond Cauſes, and where we ſee no ſecond Cauſes, we cannot preſume of the effects; and how am I aſſured he will ſend Angels to illuminate ſuch men as doe their endeavours, that their Souls may not periſh.

Repl. A carefull ſearch of God's, and incluſively Chriſt's will, and readineſs to obey it, is ſecond Cauſe enough; For, for want of that ſecond cauſe, we muſt not ſuppoſe any thing to the diſhonour of the Firſt. As to believe, that they ſhould be ſo puniſht who doe their endeavours, is to lay their damnation to God's charge: One of the chief ways with which the Ancients oppoſed the Pagans, was ſhewing them that their Religion taught ſuch things of their Gods, as no Reaſon would allow not to be diſhonourable to the Deity. Now truly, if when by this Argument we have rooted out the Pagan Gods, we lay as ſtrange imputations upon the God of the Chriſtians, what effect is it likely to produce, but onely to make men call for their old Gods again, and think that we had as good kept thoſe, who delighted in the Sacrifices of men, who depoſed their Fathers, and ate their Children, as have changed hardly for the better. It is reported in the Eccleſiaſtical Hiſtory, that a Painter for drawing Chriſt in the likeneſs of Jupiter, had his hand dried up; and certainly they who figure him to themſelves, and others, with Attributes ſo contrary to his, and more fit for a Jupiter, do him much more wrong, than if they had drawn him Tela triſulca tenentem, with a thunder-bolt in his hand. What Maſter, Father, or King, would not be eſteemed a Tyrant, who ſhould inflict not onely an infinite, and an eternal, but a ſlight and a ſhort puniſhment upon a Servant, Child, or Subject, for not doing when commanded, what the Commanders ſaw, with all his endeavours, which he had diligently applied, he could not doe? and ſhall we lay ſuch an aſperſion upon that God, (who though he be Juſtice it ſelf, is more Mercifull than Juſt, who is Πατὴρ οἰκτιρμῶν, the Father of Mercies) as that like a Pharaoh, he ſhould exact Brick, when there is no poſſibility of getting Straw? You may believe what you think fit, but rather than I will believe that any man's Soul that hath done his endeavours, not onely ſhall, but that it is poſſible it ſhould periſh, (although not illuminated by Angels, which yet, if illumination were neceſſary, I know, ſome way or other he ſhould have) rather than I will believe, either that any be damned for what is no ſin, or that ſin is τι ἔξω ἐφ' ἡμῖν, ſomewhat out of our power, (which if we thought, it would be ſoon out of our care) rather than when God hath ſo often told us, That he deſires not the death of a ſinner, I will give him the lie, and ſay, that he deſires his damnation, even as a Creature without any reference to his ſin, by chalking out onely ſuch a way from Hell, which it was impoſſible for his ſearch to lead him into, and ſo make him as much a worſe Father than Satan, as to damn is worſe than to devour; rather I ſay than this, I will make yours, or the Pagan Legend, Ovid's Metamorphoſis, my Creed; nor would I be a member of the Chriſtian Church, if this belief were a neceſſary part of Chriſtian Religion, but ſhould cry out with Averroes, (whom Tranſubſtantiation kept a Pagan) Sit anima mea cum Philoſophis; for the excellency, and purity of the doctrine in all other points tending wholly to the honour of God, and the common happineſs of man, the ſanctified life, conſtant ſufferings, and wonderfull Miracles of the Divulgers of it, the wonderfull progreſs of it, (not a much leſs Miracle than they) the weak things of the World confounding the ſtrong, and Fiſhermen confuting Philoſophers, that a Doctrine ſo ſtrict and contrary to humane deſires, and not onely barring from ſo much pleaſure and glory, but alſo making the Sectatours liable to ſuch cruelty and contempt, ſhould perſwade ſo many, and ſo wiſe perſons, to leave preſent things in hope of future; all this and whatſoever elſe, any Raimond Sebund, Vives, Pleſſis, Charron, or Grotius, could either more ſharply deſign, or more eloquently expreſs, would not reaſonably prevail, if ſuch a block as ſuch a Doctrine were laid in the way, (of which ſort your Religion hath yet more) and that one dead flie would corrupt the whole ointment; the excellency of the reſt of the Doctrine of Chriſtianity would be thought the Art, and the great and many miracles would be thought the Act of ſome evil Genius, ſuch as befriended Apollonius, to enſnare men by thoſe means into the belief of that opinion, which ſo much derogates from the Maker of things, and the prevailing of it, though a very probable argument, would not ſerve for a Paſs-port to ſuch an impoſſibility.

Reſp. But far more do I doubt, whether ever man, who had not the way of Chriſt, or even of thoſe who walked in it, did ever doe his beſt (except ſome few, and very few, perhaps not two of Chriſt his greateſt Favourites) and was not ſo culpable, that his Perdition would not have been imputed unto himſelf. God of his mercy put us in the ſcore of thoſe of whom he ſaith, He will take pity upon whom he pleaſeth, and compaſſion of them he pitieth.

Repl. How few their number is, we will not diſpute, ſince God's juſtice is in them vindicated, and they, not He, the Authour of their damnation. But neither believe I, that God is ſo rigorouſly juſt, as to ſtand ready to catch at a ſlip, (like an Uſurer for the forfeiture of a bond) but is of long ſuffering and Patience, and will as well accept our Repentance, (joyned with amendment) for this neglect in our ſearch, as for other ſins: Howſoever I am ſo far from thinking your prayer needleſs, that I both thank you for it humbly, and joyn with you in it heartily; but ἄλλος ῥυθμός.

To conclude, I am to make two very contrary excuſes; The one that my Paper hath left ſome things in yours unanſwered: The other, that I have anſwered others too often.

Of the firſt, I proteſt (which the Reader will believe me in) nothing is left out, in which I conceived any weight of Argument lay, but onely ſuch things, as though they were ſuperfluous for the Logick, yet conduced to the Rhetorick of your Work; an eloquent Treatiſe, being always like a hopefull young Man, in quo aliquid amputandum.

Of the Second, My Method, or rather my no Method was one, and your own Repetitions another Reaſon, ſo that you may the better pardon me that fault, of which your ſelf are a party-cauſe.

But to ſeal up all, I deſire you, that how little aſſent ſoever you give to my Arguments, you will be pleaſed to give credit to my Aſſertions, when I ſeriouſly profeſs my ſelf,

Your very much obliged and thankfull Servant.

A LET-

A LETTER OF Mr. Walter Montague TO HIS FATHER [H.E. of MANCHESTER] Concerning the Change of his Religion; WITH The Anſwer of his Father: And Another ANSWER OF The Lord of Faulkland.

Mr. Montague's Letter to his Father.

My Lord,

After much debate concerning the fitteſt expreſſion of my duty to your Lordſhip, whether I ought by ſilence ſeek to ſuſpend the belief of the declaration of my ſelf, I have made here, or by a clear profeſſion of it, aſſure you of what I may onely fear to preſent you with, as apprehenſive of a miſ-interpreted affection; I concluded what was moſt ſatisfactory to my firſt, and immediate duty to God, was moſt juſtifiable to my ſecond, and derivative to Nature, therefore I reſolved ſo ſoon to give you this ingenuous account of my ſelf.

The greateſt part of my life capable of diſtinction of Religions, hath been employed in places, and converſant with perſons oppoſite to the Faith I was bred in; therefore it had been ſtrange, if natural curioſity, without any ſpiritual provocation, had not invited me to the deſire of looking with mine own eyes upon the foundation I ſtood upon, rather than holding faſt blindfold by my education, to agree to be carried away always after it, inſenſible of all ſhocks I met to unfaſten me; and beſides I was ſolicited with the reproaches Proteſtants preſs upon Catholicks, that they blindly believe all the Impoſitions of the Church, without any illumination of their judgments; this methought enjoyned the cleareſt information of my ſelf, of the differences between us, I could propoſe to my capacity.

So at my laſt journey into Italy, I did imploy all my leiſure to a more juſtifiable ſettlement of my belief, as I then imagined, by a confirmation of my judgment, in what had been introduced by my birth and education. I began with this conſideration, that there were two ſorts of queſtions between the Catholicks and Proteſtants, the one of Right or Doctrine, the other of Fact or Story; as this, whether Luther were the firſt erecter of the Proteſtants Faith; or whether it had a viſible appearance of Paſtours and Teachers before his time? I reſolved to begin my enquiry with the matter of Fact, for theſe Reaſons;

Firſt becauſe they were ſo few, and ſo comprehenſible by all capacities; and the controverſies of Doctrine intricate, and ſo many, as they required much time, and learning for their diſquiſition onely; and I found my ſelf unprovided of both thoſe Requiſitions, for this undertaking: and for the deciſion of the other, I needed not much preſumption to believe my ſelf a competent Judge, when it conſiſteth onely in a peruſal of authentick teſtimonies;

Secondly, I conſidered, that there was no one point of controverted Doctrine, whereon all the reſt depended; but that this one queſtion of Fact was ſuch, as the deciſion of it, determined all the reſt; for if Luther could be proved to be the Inventer of the Proteſtants Faith, it was neceſſarily evicted of not being the true, ancient, and Apoſtolical Religion; Therefore I began with this enquiry which Proteſtants are bound to make, to anſwer this Objection, to find out an exiſtence of ſome Profeſſours of the Reformed Doctrine before Luther's time; for finding the Catholicks were not obliged to prove the Negative, it was my part to prove to my ſelf the Affirmative, that our Religion was no Innovation, by ſome Pre-exiſtence before that time.

But in the peruſal of all the Stories or Records Eccleſiaſtical or Civil, as I could chuſe, I could find no ancienter a diſſention from the Roman Church, than Waldo, Wickliffe and Huſſe, who ſcarce had relation to the now-profeſſed Proteſtancy, ſo as I could find an interval of about 800 years, from the time that all Proteſtants confeſs an unity with the Church of Rome, down to thoſe perſons, without any apparent profeſſion of different Faith. To anſwer my ſelf in this point, I read many of our Proteſtant Authours who treated of it; and I found moſt of them reply to this ſenſe, in which I cite here one of the moſt authentick, Doctour Whitaker, in his Contr. 243. pag. 479. Where they ask of us, where our Church was heretofore for ſo many ages? We anſwer, that it was in ſecret ſolitude, that is to ſay, it was concealed and lay hid from the ſight of men; and farther the ſame Doctour Chap. 4. pag. 502. Our Church always was, but you ſay it was not viſible; doth that prove that it was not? No, for it lay hid in a ſolitary concealment. To this direct ſenſe all the anſwers were, that ever I could meet with, to this objection; I repeat no more; thoſe places being ſo poſitive to our point.

This confeſſion of Inviſibility in our Church for ſo many ages, did much perplex me; it ſeemed even to offend natural Reaſon; ſuch a derogation from God's power or providence, as the ſufferance of ſo great an eclipſe of the light of his true Church, and ſuch a Church as this is deſcrib'd to be, ſeeming to me repugnant to the main reaſon why God hath a Church upon earth, which is, to be a conſerver of the Doctrine of Chriſt, and his Precepts, and to convey it from age to age, untill the end of the World. Therefore I applied my ſtudy to peruſe ſuch Arguments as the Catholicks brought for the proof of the neceſſity of a continual Viſibility of the true Church down from the Apoſtles time in all ages, and appearance of Doctours teaching and adminiſtring the Sacraments; In proof of this, I found they brought many Prophecies out of the Scripture, but this Text moſt literal, out of the fourth of the Epheſians: Chriſt hath placed in his Church Paſtours and Doctours, to the conſummation of the Saints, till we meet in the unity of the faith.

And next, the diſcourſe upon which they infer this neceſſary viſible ſucceſſion of the Church, ſeemed to me to be a moſt rational and convincing one, which is to this effect: Natural reaſon not being able to proportion to a man a courſe that might certainly bring him to a ſtate of ſupernatural happineſs; and yet ſuch a courſe being neceſſary to mankind, which otherwiſe would totally fail of the end it was created for; there remained no other way, but that it muſt be propoſed unto us by one whoſe authority we could not doubt of, and that in ſo plain a manner, as even the ſimpleſt might be capable of it, as well as the learned. This work was performed by our Saviour, from whoſe mouth all our faith is originally derived. But the ſucceeding age not being able to receive it immediately from thence, it was neceſſary it ſhould be conveyed unto them that lived in it, by thoſe that did receive it from Chriſt's own mouth, and ſo from age to age untill the end of the World; and in what age ſoever this thread of Doctrine ſhould be broken, it muſt needs be acknowledged, for the reaſon above mentioned, that the light which ſhould convey mankind through the dark paſſage of this world, was extinguiſht, and it left without a guide to inevitable ruine; which cannot ſtand with God's providence and goodneſs; which Saint Auguſtine affirms for his opinion directly in his Book de Util. cred. cap. 16. ſaying, If divine providence does preſide over our humane affairs, it is not to be doubted, but that there is ſome authority conſtituted by the ſame God, upon which going as upon certain ſteps, we are carried to God; Nor can it be ſaid, he meant the Scriptures onely by theſe ſteps, ſince experience ſhews us by the continual altercation about the right ſenſe of ſeveral of the moſt important places of it, that what is contained there, cannot be a competent rule to mankind, which conſiſteth more of ſimple than learned men; and beſides, the Scripture muſt have been ſuppoſed to have been kept ſafe in ſome hands, whoſe authority muſt beget our acceptance of them; which being no other than the Church of all ages, we have no more reaſon to believe that it hath preſerved the Scripture free from all corruption, than that it hath maintained it ſelf in a continual viſibility; which Saint Auguſtine concludeth to be a certain mark of the true Church, in theſe words in his Book contra Petil. c. 104. The true Church hath this certain ſign, that it cannot be hid; therefore it muſt be known to all Nations; but that part of the [Proteſtant] Donatiſts is unknown to many, therefore cannot be the true; No inference can be ſtronger than from hence, that the concealment of a Church diſproves the truth of it.

Laſtly,

Laſtly, not to inſiſt upon the allegation of the conſent of all the Fathers of the Church in every ſeveral age, which ſeemed to me moſt clear; that which in this cauſe weighed much with me, was the Confeſſion and Teſtimony of the approved Doctours themſelves of the Proteſtant Church; as Hooker in his Book of Eccleſ. Pol. pag. 126. God always had and muſt have ſome viſible Church upon earth. And Doctour Field the firſt of Eccle. cap. 10. It cannot be but thoſe that are the true Church, muſt be known by the Profeſſion of the truth: and farther the ſame Doctour ſays, How ſhould the Church be in the World, and no body profeſs openly the ſaving truth of God? And Doctour White in his Defence of the Way, cap. 4. pag. 790. The providence of God hath left monuments and ſtories for the confirmation of our Faith; and I confeſs truly, that our Religion is falſe, if a continual deſcent of it, cannot be demonſtrated by theſe monuments down from Chriſt's time. This appeareth unto me a direct ſubmiſſion of themſelves to produce thoſe apparent teſtimonies of the publick profeſſion of their Faith, as the Catholicks demand; but this I could never reade, nor know of any that performed it; For D. White himſelf for want of proof of this, is fain to ſay in another place in his Way to the Church, p. 510. The Doctours of our Faith have had a continual ſucceſſion, though not viſible to the world; ſo that he flies from his undertaking of a conſpicuous demonſtration of the monuments of his Faith, to an inviſible ſubterfuge, of a belief without appearance: for he ſaith in the ſame Book in another place, pag. 84. All the external government of the Church may fail, ſo as a local and perſonal ſucceſſion of Paſtours may be interrupted; and pag. 403. We do not conteſt for an external ſucceſſion; it ſufficeth that they ſucceed in the Doctrine of the Apoſtles, and the Faithfull, who in all ages did embrace the ſame truth; So as here he renounceth abſolutely all external proofs of ſucceſſion, which before he conſented to be judged by. I cannot ſay I have verbally cited theſe Authours, becauſe I have tranſlated theſe places, though the Originals be in Engliſh, yet I am ſure their ſenſe is no way injured; and I have choſen to alledge Doctour White's authority, becauſe he is an Orthodox [Divine, and a] profeſſour of the Proteſtant Church.

The reflexion of the ſtate of this queſtion, wherein I found the Proteſtants defend themſelves onely by flying out of ſight, by confeſſing a long inviſibility in their Church in appearance of Paſtours and Doctours, [the ſame interruption] left me much looſned from the faſtneſs of my profeſſed Religion, but had not yet tranſported me to the Catholick Church; for I had an opinion that our Divines might yet fill up this vacuity with ſome more ſubſtantial matter than I could meet with. So I came back into England, with a purpoſe of ſeeking nothing ſo intentively, as this ſatisfaction; and to this purpoſe, I did covertly (under another man's name) ſend this my ſcruple to one in whoſe learning and ſufficiency I had much affiance, in theſe terms, Whether there was no viſible ſucceſſion to be proved in the Proteſtant Church ſince the Apoſtles time down to Luther; and what was to be anſwered to that objection, beſides the confeſſion of [a latency and] inviſibility for ſo many ages? To this I could get no other anſwer, but that the point had been largely, and learnedly handled by Doctour White, and many others of our Church.

Upon this I reſolved to inform my ſelf in ſome other points, which ſeemed to me unwarrantable and ſuperſtitious in the Ceremonies of the Church of Rome, ſince I had ſuch an inducement, as ſo little ſatisfaction in a point which ſeemed to me ſo eſſential: And in all theſe ſcruples, I found mine own miſtake in the belief of the Tenets of the Catholick Church, gave me the onely occaſion of ſcandal, not the practice of their Doctrine; and to confirm me in the ſatisfaction of all them, I found the practice and authority of moſt of the ancient Fathers, and in the Proteſtant Refutation of theſe Doctrines, the Recuſation of their Authorities, as men that might err; So that the queſtion ſeemed then to me, whether I would rather hazard the erring with them, than with the later Reformers, which conſequently might err alſo in diſſenting from them.

I will not undertake to diſpute the ſeveral Tenets controverted, nor doubt that your Lordſhip will ſuſpect, that I omitted my ſatisfaction in any of them, ſince my reſolution of reconciling my ſelf to the Roman Church, is not liable to any ſuſpicion of too forward or precipitate reſignation of my ſelf, my judgment may perchance be cenſured of ſeducement, my affection cannot be of corruption.

Upon theſe occaſions I did ſoon after my return laſt into England, reconcile my ſelf to the Roman Catholick Church, in the belief and convincement of it to be the true, ancient and Apoſtolical Church, by her external marks, and her internal objects of Faith and Doctrine; and in her I reſolve to live and die, as the beſt way to ſalvation. When I was in England, I did not ſtudy the diſſimulation of my Faith ſo dexterouſly as if my fortune had read it to me; nor do I now profeſs it ſo deſperately as if it were my fortunes Legacy; for I do not believe it ſo dangerous, but it may recover; For I know the King's wiſedom is rightly informed, that the Catholick Faith doth not tend to the alienation of the [heart of a] ſubject, it rather ſuper-infuſeth a reverence and obedience to Monarchy, and ſtrengtheneth the bands of our obedience to our natural Prince; and his grace and goodneſs ſhall never find any other occaſion of diverſion of them, from the natural and uſual exerciſe of themſelves upon thoſe that have had the honour to have been bred with approbation of fidelity in his ſervice; nor can I fear that your Lordſhip ſhould apprehend any change in my duty: even your diſpleaſure (which you may apprehend upon this miſ-interpreted occaſion) ſhall never give me any of the leaſt receſſion from my duty; in which profeſſion I humbly ask your bleſſing, as Paris, 21. Novemb. 1635.

Your Lordſhip's moſt obedient Son,

W. Montague.

THE

Anſwer of his Father.

Walter,

YOUR Letter ſent from Paris tells me how much debate you had with your ſelf, whether with ſilence to ſuſpend my belief, or by a clear profeſſion to aſſure me what you feared to preſent me; but what was moſt ſatisfactory to your firſt duty to GOD, that you thought moſt juſtifiable to your derivative duty to nature, therefore reſolved to give me an ingenuous account of the declaration you had made then: Had you asked my counſel, before you ſignified the reſolution, it would have ſhewed more duty in you, and bred leſs diſcontent in me; but think, how welcome that Letter could be, that at once tells of the intention, and ſignifies the reſolution.

Say, you could not expect from me ſo much Theological Learning as to ſatisfie your ſcruples, yet it had been a fair addreſs, of a Son to a Father, in a matter of that importance; nor are you ignorant of my care, I dare ſay knowledge ſtudied, for the ſettlement of my Children in that true Faith which their Father profeſſed, and the Church of England hath eſtabliſhed: Therefore it would have been your greater juſtification, and my leſs ſorrow, [ſo] to have loſt your ſelf with love, if I could not have held you in with religious reaſon. Haply you will return upon me the miſconſtruction of that ſpeech, If any man come to me, and hate not his Father, he cannot be my Diſciple. But I muſt tell you that by this poſt-dated duty, you have treſpaſſed both upon love and duty; for you have robbed me of the means of helping you with mine advice; which as it is the beſt part of a Father's portion to give, ſo it is not the leaſt teſtimony of filial duty to ask.

Now to lay ſuch a blemiſh upon all the cares of your former education, as not to think me worthy to ſee your aim, untill you have ſet up your reſt, is ſuch a neglect, that without over-much fatherly candour, cannot be forced into an excuſable interpretation. It makes me ſuſpect that ſome politick reſpects, or private ſeducements, if not diſcontentments, have wrought upon you. Policy and Religion as they do well together, ſo do they as ill aſunder, the one being too cunning to be good; the other being too ſimple to be ſafe: But upon policy to change Religion, there is no warrant for that, leſs for diſcontentments, or upon ſeducements.

When I look upon your Letter, which you termed an ingenuous account of your ſelf, it ſeems to me not an account of your new profeſſed Religion, but rather an exprobration of mine, and ſo of ours of the Church of England.

Had I known the doubts before, I might have been an Adviſer, but objecting them after you had reſolved, you call me up now to be a Diſputer: although I be of his opinion who thought that truth did oftentimes ſuffer by too much altercation, it being a common errour amongſt great Clerks, to contend more for victory, than for verity: yet ſince you have ſo punctually led me into it, though it be contrary to my firſt reſolution of ſilence (elſe you had heard from me ſooner) and finding that the Letter you ſent me, had a farther reach than to give me ſatisfaction, (elſe the Copies of it would not have been divulged before I came to receive it, and uſes made of it to my diſcomfort) I therefore thought my ſelf tied to give you an anſwer, leſt thoſe of your new profeſſion ſhould think (as ſome of them ſay) that a new lapſarian was more able by a few days diſcipline to oppoſe our Religion, than an old Father and long profeſſour was able to defend it.

Having this tie upon me, I hope, on the one ſide, our learned Divines will pardon me, if for my Son's ſake I dip my pen in their ink; and you on the other ſide will lay mine arguments more to heart, as proceeding from the bowels of a Father, than if they had been framed by the brains of a learned Divine.

In this caſe alſo I have ſome advantage of other men, who though they might write more learnedly, yet cannot doe it ſo feelingly: for mine intereſt is not onely in the cauſe, but in the perſon, for whom I muſt give an account, if there be failing in my part to reduce him to truth: A perſon whoſe Letter I take into mine hands, as he did the Urn of his Son's aſhes, to ſhed over it veras lachrymas, as arguments of the truth; both which I hope ſhall perſwade forceably, if there be any of that bloud left in you that I gave you. It is true, affection is not to rule Religion: yet in this way, nature may cooperate with grace.

Your Letter ſays truly, the greateſt part of your life capable of diſtinction of Religions, hath been in places, and converſant with perſons oppoſite to the Faith I bred you in; therefore, you ſay, it had been ſtrange, if natural curioſity, without any ſpiritual provocation, had not invited you with deſire of looking upon the foundation you trode on, rather than holding faſt blind-fold by your education, to be always carried away after it.

In your education, God knows, my firſt care was to ſeaſon you with true Religion, wherein from a boy you attained unto ſuch knowledge, as Spain will witneſs, (when you were but a youth) how ſtrong a champion you were for the Proteſtant profeſſion. The Court of France, nor yet all the Princes Courts of Chriſtendom (moſt of which you have viſited) could never till now taint your Faith, but always rendred you ſound in the Religion which you carried with you hence.

But now Italy hath turned you, becauſe England hath diſcontented you.

In

In your laſt journey into Italy, as you ſaid, you applied all your leiſure to confirm your judgment in the doctrine introduced by your education; which if you had done ſeriouſly, you could not ſo ſoon, nor would not at all, upon ſo weak motives, have let go your hold; for of all other their Tenets the two you mentioned are the weakeſt, and have received cleareſt ſatisfaction: whereby it appears, that you were reſolved to give up the cauſe, before you came at it; and what you would not hold blind-fold, to give up blind-fold, which is worſt.

Could that be a motive to your deſertion of our Church, as perſwaded that Luther was the Father of our Faith? your ſelf cannot forget, how that we build our Faith upon Chriſt, not upon Luther, upon the Doctrine of the Scriptures, not upon the inventions of men. Could it be proved againſt us, that Luther or any other man, how gray-headed ſoever, were the inventer of our Faith, there needed no more to be ſaid; we would contend no longer: But we renounce all men alike as inventers of Religion, or any part of it; but hold onely the Apoſtolical Doctrine of the ancient Primitive and Catholick Church, and preſume not to coin any new Creed.

Yet we are not unwilling to grant that Luther was one, but not the firſt of many, that reſtored the purity of the Doctrine, which had been long ſmothered by the Papacy: our Faith, if you take in the whole, is no other but what is exiconized in the Apoſtles Creed, included in the Scriptures: If you take it in a lower and ſtraiter way, for ſo much of it as is oppoſed to the corruption of Popery; you muſt remember, that theſe points are neither the whole nor greateſt points of Faith; there are not any points of our Faith, but we are able to ſhew they had maintainers, few or many, in all ages ſince the Apoſtles time; and every of theſe ages, thoſe ſubſtructures of Popery oppoſed, ſome by one man, ſome by another.

I wonder therefore to ſee you carried away with that common and trivial calumny, that Luther was the inventer of our Faith; and why ſay you, that for the intervall of 800 years before there was no apparent profeſſion of Faith different from Rome? and this you collect by hiſtorical ſearch of all the Stories and Records Eccleſiaſtical and Civil. It ſeems, Italy affords you no Copies of our Writers, elſe might you ſee in them a liſt which they carry out through all theſe ſpaces, and ſhew you, that moſt of our Tenets have had the ſuffrage of the learnedeſt of Romes ſide, and how many men in the decurſion of time, from the ancienteſt of Fathers, have declared themſelves, and ſome of them apparently, yea earneſtly contended for the truth of our Doctrine.

And where you object, that Waldo, Wickliffe, and Hus, had ſcarce any relation to the now-profeſſed Proteſtancy; if you mean, becauſe we diſclaim thoſe horrid opinions which are put upon them, (how true God knows) therein you ſay truly, Neither they to us, nor we to them have any relation: but in the main points of Doctrine touching Faith, and oppoſition of the ſuperſtitions and uſurpation of the Papacy, we have a joynt conſent of all the beſt Writers, Hiſtorians, and Divines, of both ſides, that they and we conſent in one.

It is ſtrange therefore to ſay, that theſe [and we] had no relation to the Proteſtant profeſſion, who for ſubſtance of Religion held as we do, their errours onely we own not: and the conſent of times do all agree, that the Waldenſes flew out againſt their corruptions 400 years before Luther was born; nay, ſaith Reynerius, Quidam dicunt quòd ſecta illa duraverit à tempore Sylveſtri, alii quod à tempore Apoſtolorum, deriving their fundamental Doctrine from the time of the Apoſtles: nor were they few, ſed multiplicati ſuper arenas maris; nor Plebeians onely, ſed principum favore armati, as the Kings of Arragon, the Earls of Tholouſe, and many moe. So that, there are witneſſes more than ſufficient, that there were many who oppoſed themſelves to the Papacy in the Proteſtants Tenets, long before Luther. This [is the] firſt ſuppoſition failing, I will now let you ſee the miſtakes in the ſubſequent paſſages, and open to you my ſenſe, hoping yet that I may draw you again to me.

You, as you conceive, having ſhewed a defect of Viſibility in our Church till Luther's time, labour to prove a neceſſity of Viſibility to every true Church: If it were granted, that it were ſimply neceſſary to the eſſentiating of a Church, to be able to demonſtrate in all times, both the viſible number of profeſſours of the truth, as alſo a viſible ſucceſſion of Paſtours, we are able to demonſtrate both theſe, for our defence, to be as unqueſtionable in our Church as in the Church of Rome: they that are otherwiſe minded will account this a bold undertaking, but it is no hard matter to doe: Wherefore the vanity of that queſtion, to ask, where our Church was before Luther, becomes not any man that hath read any thing of our Church Monuments.

But you would ſeem to me to prove it two ways; firſt, by the teſtimony of our own Divines; ſecondly, by argument.

By teſtimonies of our Divines you would have Doctour Field, Doctour White, and Maſter Hooker, to confeſs needfulneſs of Viſibility: and yet, for their own Church, fly to latency. For this ſecond, you inſtance Doctour Whitaker, and Doctour White, one of them, to confeſs our Church for many ages to have been in a ſecret ſolitude; and the other to let go his defence of viſible ſucceſſion by flying to an inviſible ſubterfuge of non-apparency: If you had better peruſed the Tracts of thoſe Writers, they would have given you full ſatisfaction; but you miſtake both the perſons and the points. Theſe made a demonſtration of thoſe three points: Firſt, that neither the Churches obſcurity is repugnant to the Viſibility of it: Secondly, nor the Viſibility of it, ſuch as excludes all latency: Nor yet the latency of Orthodox Chriſtians in the ſwaying time of Popery, ſuch as had not requiſite lineaments of an accountable Viſibility.

But you muſt know, that Viſibility doth not always carry the ſame height, but admits of degrees, ſo that we cannot ſay, that that wants viſibility, which hath it in a lower degree. The Sun compared with it ſelf, is in a degree viſible, though in a miſt, yet not ſo clearly viſible as when it ſhines out: ſo it is with the ſtate of the Church, becauſe her ſplendour is not in termino, but ſuch as receives degrees by augmentation or diminution; like as the Sun is as truly viſible under a cloud, as in his brightneſs, though not ſo clearly viſible; ſo not to admit the Church to be viſible, except ſhe be glorious, is an errour; for there's a variation of the Churches Viſibility, in reſpect of her object: the want of which conſideration, I believe is one cauſe why ſo many deceive themſelves in this point. Secondly, there is another diverſity, which ariſeth from the viſive organs; ſome may ſee, and will not; there the fault is not in the object, but in the beholders. Philoſophers ſay, Viſibilia non ſunt minus viſibilia cum non videntur, quam quando videntur, The objects of ſight remain ſtill diſcernible, when they are not diſcerned: ſo it is with the Church, there are ſtrictures of viſibility diſcernible in her obſcure condition, but it is as viſibile non viſum, which falls out when men will not open their eyes, or they ſhut them on purpoſe, which hapned in the prevailing times of Popery, when this notwithſtanding, yet there were lights which appeared for the defence of the truth, and the diſcovery of errour, in every age of the intervall.

But ſure our men labour in vain to demonſtrate that Viſibility, whilſt they of the Papacy are ſo diſaffected, as not to acknowledge it upon any terms; otherwiſe this controverſie had long ſince been ended, if they had been as well diſpoſed to ſee, as we ready to ſhew our Viſibility.

In this queſtion men are to conſider that there is a double ſplendour of the Church, which makes way for the viſibility of it.

The proper ſplendour of a Church conſiſts in purity of Doctrine.

The common ſplendour of a Church conſiſts in the outward accommodations, which appertain not to the being, but the well-being of the Church, as temporal peace, multitude of profeſſours, local ſucceſſion of Paſtours; yet perſecution may interrupt this ſucceſſion of Paſtours, it may cut off the multitude of profeſſours, Hereſie may ſo far prevail as to make the Orthodox Church pull in her head, witneſs the time of Arianiſm, when few but godly Athanaſius, and ſome with him were fain to keep in corners. And of this our Divines are to be underſtood, when they ſpeak of our latency, that for this outward ſplendour, it ſuffered a great obſcurity, for divers hundred years; yet when it was at the loweſt, the Doctrine was viſible, and ſome profeſſours ſtill in the eye of the World, I would wiſh you well to conſider the things which I ſhall tell you.

1. The ſtate of the Church is ſo ordered by our great Maſter Chriſt, that ſhe is to expect her times of obſcurity, as well as her times of ſplendour, he hath made her eſtate militant, and appointed her to a paſſive condition, as well as an active: deſigned her to viciſſitudes of obſcurity, as well as luſtre, and ſhews her no leſs glorious in her obſcurity than in her triumph, as Tertullian ſaith of vertue, Extruitur duritia; deſtruitur mollitia.

2. This Viſibility repreſented by an innumerous multitude, local Succeſſion, ſecular Eſtate, theſe were not conſidered in the firſt times, when the Church ſtood ſound, nor in the later times, when ſhe got ſome recovery; onely in the intermediate, when ſhe lay under the croſs: And were theſe the probats of Faith, it had been ill with the Iſraelites Church, in the time of Elias; worſe with the Apoſtolical Church, when the Scribes and Phariſees ſate in Moſes Chair; worſt in the time of Arianiſm, and in times of Antichriſtianiſm, which ſhall come, as moſt Writers ſay.

3. This glorious ſucceſſion, which Rome ſo much brags of, is a deceitfull medium whereby to meaſure the truth of a Church; becauſe a Church may be a true Church without it; and be alſo a falſe Church with it. Non colligitur ibi neceſſariò eſſe Eccleſiam, ubi eſt ſucceſſio, ſaith Bellarmine; though Stapleton be of another mind: Alexandria challengeth ſucceſſion as well as Rome; the Church of Conſtantinople takes her pedigree from Saint Andrew the Apoſtle, and brings it down to our times. A falſe Church may have ſucceſſion, and a true Church may want it; otherwiſe you will grant that Rome is no true Church: the Chair at Rome hath ſometimes lain empty, ſometimes it hath carried double, and both of them have been depoſed; theſe broken links mar the chain of that ſucceſſion. But becauſe this rather concerns the perſons, not the thing, It is otherwiſe to be clearly ſhewed, that it may be a true Church that hath not this uninterrupted ſucceſſion: for elſe no Church at all could be true in her firſt plantation. For ſucceſſions are by deſcent, deſcents have no place in firſt originals, whereas the Orthodox Faith doth the very firſt day put her in poſſeſſion of Apoſtolical ſucceſſion, as Tertullian well ſaith, That Churches which have not their original deſcent from the Apoſtles, are Apoſtolical, propter conſanguinitatem doctrinæ. The place which you cite out of the fourth to the Epheſians, proves clearly the neceſsity of orthodox Paſtours, not of local Succeſsion; you may hereby ſee, how in the informing of your ſelf in this particular, you are overtaken.

This thing alſo much troubles me, that your Letters ſaid, that when you laſt came back out of Italy, you ſought nothing ſo attentively as ſatisfaction in theſe points of controverſie, eſpecially that touching the Viſibility of our Church in all ages, but could receive none. Could you never in all the while of your laſt being in England, find the time to acquaint me with your deſire? doubtleſs, I muſt ſay, you did in this time ſtudy the diſſimulation of your intention, otherwiſe I muſt have known it.

I was heretofore more indulgent towards you, for God knows it, Walter, the Son of my body was never ſo dear unto me, as the ſalvation of my ſon Walter's ſoul; your younger years can witneſs, how I ſhewed you the way which I my ſelf took to ſettle mine own ſalvation: for though it was my happineſs to be derived from vertuous and religious Parents, yet I took not my Religion merely by deſcent, but ſtudied and examined the ground on which I was to found my Faith; I read both Papiſts and Proteſtants, I found both confident, and contradictory. Et quoties palpitavit mihi tremulum cor, before I ſettled either way? ſometimes thinking ſafeſt to mean well, and to keep unſettled either way; yet I ſaw a neceſsity laid on me, to be of one of the two Churches, but how to find out which of them was the true Church, whereof I muſt be a member if I would ſecure my ſalvation, hic labor, hoc opus eſt: I eaſily reſolved, there was not two Churches whereof a man might chuſe which to be of; and after long ſtudy I found clearly that to be the true Church, which conſtantly held the common Faith, which Faith had the Scripture for the rule; this known and reſolved, which is undoubted, then I was not ſcared with that fearfull cenſure of the Roman Church, which pronounced all damned that are not of that Church.

But how much am I diſtaſted to find ſeveral arguments made in the Letter, all to inſinuate that the Scriptures are not a competent rule of Faith? and firſt, variety of interpretation; ſecondly, obſcurity of ſome places; thirdly, inauthentickneſs of themſelves; fourthly, their authority dependent on the Church; fifthly, the purity of them warranted by the viſibility of the Church; ſixthly, made authentick

by the Churches authority: ſtrange aſſertions; as if the true Church were not to be tried by the true Faith, but the true Faith by the Church. I know my ſelf bound to believe the authority of that Church which makes Scripture the rule of Faith; but as for the act of any Church, though it be a fit Miniſtery to ſhew me the way, yet it is not of authority ſufficient of it ſelf to ſecure me of my ſalvation; From true Faith the true Church is inferr'd, and which is the true Church, when all is done, muſt be tried by the Scripture: but it is now with us, as it was in the time of Chryſoſtome, when there was ſo much queſtion, which was the true Church, and men were of ſo many different opinions about it, as none could tell what Church to be of, or what Religion was ſafeſt to truſt to; ſo ſaith the Father of the Scriptures, which in matters of Faith neceſſary to ſalvation ſpeak ſo truly, ſo fully, ſo plainly, as it is but a ſhift for a man to ſay, he underſtands them not; and good Saint Auſtine finding that from controverſies in Religion, there came no other fruit, but indeterminata luctatio, ſaid with ſorrow, Why do we ſtrive about our Father's Will? Nos ſumus fratres, and our Father is not dead inteſtate, but hath left his Will and Teſtament in writing: let it be followed, and all controverſies will ſoon be ended.

Flatter not your ſelf, Walter, the Remonſtrance you make, ſhews that the reſignation you made of your ſelf to the Church of Rome, was precipitate, and then the reſolution to live and die there, deſperate; yet you give ſome hopes when you ſay, nor do you now ſo deſperately profeſs, as if it were your fortune's legacy, for you do not believe it ſo dangerous but it may recover. The King's benignity and goodneſs is always to interpret the beſt; but know, that his Majeſty hath a better opinion of thoſe who are bred ſuch, than of thoſe who become ſuch by relapſe. Nor am I willing to apprehend any change of your duty; yet take this for a caveat, that commonly all changes follow change of Faith. I never travelled of you till now, and it is with a great deal of pain; I thought you ſhould have wept over me, when Nature had called for her due; but you have prevented me; And yet, my Son, you may yet return to me, but I ſhall never go to you in this way, nor had I ever gone ſo far into this queſtion, but to fetch you again, my Son, otherwiſe a loſt Child.

Thus as your Letter began, ſo do I end; after much debate concerning a fit expreſſion of my ſelf, whether was better, by not writing to ſhew my diſlike, or by long writing to labour your recovery; this laſt was moſt ſatisfactory to my conſcience, though the other more agreeable to nature diſpleaſed; I have therefore reſolved, as you ſee, to give you this anſwer; and I pray God that he may bleſs you and me ſo in it, that my pen may have the fruit my heart wiſhes.

Your loving Father

Mancheſter.

Lord of Faulkland's Anſwer.

A Letter of Maſter Montague, juſtifying his change of Religion, being diſpers'd in many Copies, I was deſired to give my opinion of the Reaſons, and my reaſon if I miſliked them: Having read and conſider'd it, I was brought to be perſwaded; Firſt, becauſe having been ſometimes in ſome degrees mov'd with the ſame inducements, I thought that what ſatisfied me, might poſſibly have the ſame effect upon him: Secondly, becauſe I being a Layman, a young man, and an ignorant man, I thought a little reaſon might in likelihood work more from my pen, than more from theirs, whoſe profeſſion, age and ſtudies might make him ſuſpect, that it is they are too hard for him, and not their cauſe for his: Thirdly, becauſe I was very deſirous to doe him ſervice, not onely as a man, and a Chriſtian, but as one whom all that know him inwardly, eſteem of great parts (and I am deſirous ſomewhat to make up my great want of them, by my reſpects to thoſe that have them) and as an impartial ſeeker of Truth which I truſt he is, and I profeſs my ſelf to be. And ſo much for the cauſe of this paper: I come now to that which it oppoſeth.

Firſt then, whereas he defends his ſearch, I ſuppoſe he is rather for that to receive praiſe, than to make apologies, all men having cauſe to ſuſpect that gold, which were given with this condition, that the Receiver ſhould not try it by any touchſtone.

Secondly, He ſaith, that there being two ſorts of queſtions, the one of Right or Doctrine, the other of Fact or Story, as whether the Proteſtants Faith had a viſible appearance before Luther, he reſolved to begin his enquiry with the matter of Fact, as being ſooner to be found (becauſe but one) and eaſier to be comprehended: To this I anſwer by ſaying, that if they would not appeal from the right Tribunal, or rather Rule, which is the Scripture, thoſe many might eaſier be ended than this one, (we building our Faith onely upon plain places, and all reaſonable men being ſufficient judges of what is plain;) but if they appeal to a conſent of Fathers, or Councils, whereof many are loſt, many, not loſt, not to be gotten, many uncertain whether Fathers or no Fathers, and thoſe which we have, and know, being too many for almoſt any induſtry to reade over, and abſolutely for any memory to remember, (which yet is neceſſary, becauſe any one clauſe of any one Father deſtroys a conſent) and being beſides, liable to all the exceptions which can be brought againſt the Scriptures being the Rule, as difficulty, want of an infallible interpreter, and ſuch like; and being denied to have any infallibility (eſpecially when they ſpeak as witneſſes, which a conſent of them never doth againſt us) by one party, which the Scripture is allow'd to have by both; then I wonder not if he think ſuch a way ſo uncertain, and ſo long, that he was willing to chuſe any ſhorter cut rather than travel it. Neither do I believe this to be ſo ſhort, or ſo concluding as he imagines; for if he conſider the large extent of Chriſtian Religion, ſo that we know little, from any indifferent Relater, of the opinions of the Abiſſines, ſo great a part of Chriſtendom; if he conſider the great induſtry of his Church in extinguiſhing thoſe whom they have call'd Hereticks, and alſo their Books, ſo that we know ſcarce any thing of any of them, but from themſelves (who are too partial to make good Hiſtorians) if he conſider how carefully they ſtop mens mouths (even thoſe of their own) with their Indices Expurgatorii; it will then appear to him, both a long work to ſeek, and a hard one to find, whether any thought like Luther in all ages; and that he concludes very raſhly, who reſolves there was none, becauſe he cannot find any, ſince they might have been viſible in their times, and yet not ſo to us (for men are not the leſs viſible when they are ſo, for not being after remembred) as a man may be a Gentleman, though he know not his pedigree: ſo that as I will not affirm that there were always ſuch, becauſe I cannot prove it, ſo neither ought they to make themſelves ſure there were none, without they could prove that, which is impoſſible; and therefore no argument can be drawn from thence: and if it could be proved, that ſuch a no-ways erring Church muſt at all times be, I had rather believe that there were ſtill ſuch, though we know them not, which may be true, than that theirs is it, which in my opinion cannot.

Thirdly, He ſays, he could find no one point of controverted Doctrine, whereupon all the reſt depended, but that this one queſtion of fact was ſuch, as the deciſion of it, determined all the reſt. To this I anſwer, that the queſtion of the Infallibility of the Pope, at leaſt of thoſe who adhere to him, which they call the Church, is ſuch a one, as if determin'd, muſt determine all the reſt, and not onely ſo to us, but to all men; whereas this (though granted neceſſary, and determin'd to his wiſh) would indeed conclude againſt us, but not for them; ſince the Greek Church would put in as good plea upon the title of Viſibility, as that of Rome; and he would be to begin a new with them, when he had ended with us.

Fourthly, He gives his reaſon: If Luther could be evicted to be the Innovatour, his Religion was then evicted of not being the true ancient and Apoſtolical; To this I anſwer, by confeſſing the conſequence; but he might be the Renovatour, and not the Innovatour; and then, no ſuch conſequence follows.

Fifthly, He ſaith, we are bound to find an exiſtence of ſome Profeſſours of the Reformed Religion before Luther, which requiry is grounded upon his ſuppoſition of the neceſsity of a continual ſucceſsion of a viſible and no-ways-erroneous Church. Now I will firſt examine the ſenſe of his terms: By the

firſt,

firſt, I conceive, by a place he cites out of Saint Auguſtine, that he means Viſible to all Nations; but I pray hath his been always ſo? I mean (at leaſt for many Centuries) to thoſe Nations which Columbus hath not long ſince diſcovered? By the ſecond term Church, I ſuppoſe he means a company of Chriſtians holding neither more or leſs than Chriſt taught (for in a more large ſenſe no man denies the Church to have been always in ſome degrees viſible) and in this ſenſe I not onely deny it neceſſary, that it ſhould always be viſible, but that it ſhould always be, for I doubt whether there be, or for a long while have been any ſuch. Next, that ſuch a one [as] he means, appears, becauſe when Catalogues have been brought of ſome who in all ages have differed from them in things which we hold, his ſide would not accept of them, becauſe they agreed not with us in all things; and yet when Campian intends to prove all the Fathers to be his, he uſeth onely this courſe, of inſtancing in ſome wherein they agree with him (though ſometimes not ſo much, but rather the contrary ought to be inferred, as in the inſtance of Polycarpus, for comparing his words with the Hiſtory, it will appear, that he concluded him a Papiſt for not being perſwaded by the Pope) though they differed from them in many other, as indeed all the notable Fathers do in more than one point. I will therefore ſay, that if this be required to ſhewing that a Church hath been ever viſible, it is more than either part can doe, and therefore I hope they will come, upon better conſideration, to confeſs that not neceſſary for us to doe, which is impoſſible for themſelves: For let any man look into Antiquity, I will not ſay without all prejudice, but without an abſolute Reſolution of ſeeing nothing in it that contradicts his preſent belief, and if he find not ſome opinions of the Church of Rome, as unknown to Antiquity, as either he or I, as the Popes Indulgences having power to deliver out of Purgatory (confeſt by Biſhop Fiſher, and Alphonſus de Caſtro, where they treat of Indulgences) if he find not others at firſt unknown, after known, but not held de fide, which are yet ſo at Rome, as prayer to Saints, their enjoying the beatifical viſion before the day of Judgment, the Aſſumption of the Bleſſed Virgin, and her being free from all actual ſin; If he find not ſome wholly unknown and abſolutely condemned, which we condemn, as the lawfulneſs of picturing of God the Father, whereof the firſt is confeſt by Baronius in the Margin, to an Epiſtle of a Pope, which ſays the ſame, and the latter is to be found in many places of Saint Auſtine, Lactantius, and others; nay, if he find not that all the Doctours, Saints and Martyrs of the two firſt ages (I mean as many as are now extant, and ſpeak of it) held ſomething which both parties condemn, as the opinions of the Chiliaſts; If, I ſay, he find not this, or I ſhew him not that he might have found it, I profeſs I will be ready to ſpend my life for that Church, againſt which I now employ my pen: So that this will be the end, Neither of our Churches have been always viſible; onely this is the difference, that we are troubled to ſhew our Church in the latter and more corrupt ages, and they theirs in the firſt and pureſt, that we can leaſt find ours at night, and they theirs at noon. And whereas he expects that D. White ſhould ſtand to this, to confeſs his Religion falſe, if a continual deſcent of it could not be demonſtrated; if he himſelf pleaſe to grant as much as he exacts, if he but continue in his Reſolution, and in this ſearch, I doubt no more but that he will ſoon leave to be a Papiſt, than I ſhould doubt if I ſaw him now receiving the Communion in the King's Chapel, that he had done it already.

Tom. 9. An. 726. De fide & ſymb. 2. lib. 2. c.

Sixthly, his reaſon for the neceſſity of the Viſibility follows, becauſe the contrary were a derogation from God's power or providence; I anſwer, to ſay he could not keep the truth exactly in mens belief, were to derogate from God's power; to ſay, he had not given ſufficient means to find the truth, and yet damned men for errour, the firſt would be a derogation from his Providence, the ſecond from his Juſtice; but to ſay, he ſuffers men to err, who neglect the means of not erring, and that he damns none for a mere errour, in which the will hath no part, and conſequently the man no fault, derogates from none of the three. But ſays he, this is repugnant to the main reaſon why God hath a Church upon earth, to be the conſerver of the Doctrine of Chriſt, and to convey it from age to age; I anſwer, to conſerve it, is every man's duty, but ſuch, as they may all fail in; and is indeed rather the form of the Church, than the end of the Church, an exact conſervation making an exact Church, as a leſs perfect conſerving, a leſs perfect Church. As for conveyance of Doctrine, the whole Church conveys none, whereof many (if his be it) have had but little convey'd to them. Particular Chriſtians (eſpecially Paſtours) teach others, which it is every man's duty to do, when he meets with them who want inſtruction which he can give, and they are likely to receive; yet is not the inſtruction of others, every man's main end.

But I know Maſter Montague perſwades himſelf, that ſome body of men are appointed to convey this Doctrine, which men are to receive, onely becauſe they deliver it; and this I abſolutely deny; for we receive no Doctrine from the Church, upon the Churches authority, becauſe we know her not to be the Church, till we have examined her Doctrine, and ſo receive rather her for it, than it for her. Neither for the conveyance of the Truth, is it neceſſary that any company of men in all times hold it all, becauſe ſome may convey ſome truths, and others other, out of which, by comparing their Doctrine with the Scripture, men may draw a perfect body of Truths: and though they delivered few other Truths, yet in delivering Scripture (wherein all neceſſary Truth is contain'd) they deliver all, and by that rule whoſoever regulates his life and Doctrine, I am confident, that though he may miſtake Errour for Truth in the way, he ſhall never miſtake Hell for Heaven in the end.

Seventhly, His next reaſon is their common Achilles, the fourth of the Epheſians, which he chuſeth onely to employ like his Triarios, his main Battel, leaving his Velites, his light armed Souldiers, ſome places too allegorical, even in his own opinion, to ſtand examination. The words are theſe, He hath given ſome Prophets, ſome Apoſtles, ſome Evangeliſts, ſome Paſtours, and ſome Doctours, for the inſtauration of the Saints, for the work of the Miniſtery, for the edification of the body of Chriſt, till we all meet in the unity of Faith, and the knowledge of the Son of God unto a perfect man, and unto the meaſure of the age of the fulneſs of Chriſt; That we may be no more children toſt and carried away with every wind of doctrine, &c. Verſe 11, 12, 13. Now out of this place I ſee not how a ſucceſſion may be evinced; rather I think it may, that the Apoſtle meant none: For firſt, he ſaith, not he will give, but he hath given; and who could ſuppoſe that the Apoſtle could ſay, that Chriſt had given then, the preſent Pope, and the Doctours who now adhere to him? Secondly, allow that by he hath given, were meant, he hath promiſed (which would be a gloſs not much unlike to that which one of the moſt witty and moſt eloquent of our modern Divines, Doctour Dun notes of Statuimus, i. Abrogamus) yet ſince theſe ſeveral Nouns are all governed by the ſame Verb, and no diſtinction put, it would prove as well a neceſſity of a continual ſucceſſion of Apoſtles, Prophets and Evangeliſts, as of Paſtours, and Doctours; which is more than either they can ſhew, or pretend they can; ſo that it ſeemeth to me to follow, that theſe were then given to doe this, till then, and not a ſucceſſion of them promiſed till then, to doe this; and ſo we receiving and retaining the Scriptures, wherein what they taught is contain'd (as we would any thing elſe, that had as general and ancient a Tradition, if there were any ſuch) need no more; for if he ſay, that men are toſt, for all the Scriptures, I anſwer, ſo are they for-all their Doctours; nay, if theſe keep any from being toſt, it is the Scripture which does it, upon which their authority is by them founded upon their own interpretation, and reaſon, who yet will not give us leave to build any thing upon ours out of plainer places; and though they tell us that we cannot know the Scripture, but from the Church, they are yet fain (as appears) to prove the Authority of the Church out of Scripture, which makes me ask them in the words of their own Campian, and with much more cauſe, Nihilne pudet Labyrinthi?

Eighthly, There follows another reaſon to this ſenſe, that Reaſon not being able to ſhew a way to eternal happineſs, and without ſuch an one, man would fail of the end to which he was ordained, it muſt be propoſed by an infallible authority, in ſo plain a manner, as even the ſimple might be capable of it; which being performed by our Saviour, it muſt be conveyed to ſucceeding ages by thoſe who heard it from him; and whenſoever this thred failed, mankind was left without a guide to inevitable ruine: I anſwer, that though all this be granted, it proves not againſt us; for we have the Scripture come down to us, relating Chriſt's Doctrine, and written by thoſe that heard it, and which the ſimple are capable of underſtanding (I mean, as much as is plain, and more is not neceſſary, ſince other Queſtions may as well be ſuffered without harm, as thoſe between the Jeſuites and Dominicans about Predetermination, and between the Dominicans, and almoſt all the reſt, about the Immaculate Conception) and thoſe who are not, neither are they capable out of Scripture to diſcern the true Church; much leſs by any of thoſe notes, which require much underſtanding and large learning, as conformity with the Ancients, and ſuch like.

Ninthly, The ſame anſwer I give to this, ſerves alſo to the following words of Saint Auſtin, for whereas Maſter Montague concludeth, that he could not mean the Scriptures as a competent rule to mankind, which conſiſteth moſt of ſimple perſons, becauſe there hath been continual altercations about the ſenſe of important places; I anſwer, that I may as well conclude by the ſame Logick, that neither is the Church a competent guide, becauſe in all ages there have alſo been diſputes, not onely about her authority, but even which was ſhe; and to whatſoever reaſon he imputes this, to the ſame may we the other, as to negligence, pride, prejudication and the like; and if he pleaſe to ſearch, I verily believe he will find, that the Scriptures are both eaſier to be known than the Church, and that it is as eaſie to know what theſe teach, as when that hath defined, ſince they hold no Decrees of hers binding de fide, without a confirmation of the Pope's, who can never be known infallibly to be a Pope, becauſe a ſecret Simony makes him none; no not to be a Chriſtian, becauſe want of due intention in the Baptizer, makes him none; whereof the latter is always poſſible, and the firſt in ſome ages likely; and in hard Queſtions, a readineſs to yield to the Scriptures when they ſhall be explained, methinks ſhould ſerve as well, as a readineſs to aſſent to the Decrees of the Church, when thoſe ſhall be pronounced.

Tenthly, He ſaith the Scripture muſt be kept ſafe in ſome hands, whoſe authority muſt beget our acceptance of them, which being no other than the Church of all ages, we have no more reaſon to believe, that it hath preſerved that free from corruption, than it ſelf in a continual viſibility: I anſwer, that neither to giving authority to Scripture, nor to the keeping of them, is required a continual Viſibility of a no-ways erring Body of Chriſtians; the writers of them give them their authority amongſt Chriſtians, nor can the Church move any other; and that they were the writers of them, we receive from the general Tradition, and teſtimony of the firſt Chriſtians, not from any following Church, whō could know nothing of it but from them (for for thoſe parts which were then doubted of, by ſuch as were not condemned for it by the reſt, why may not we remain in the ſame ſuſpence of them that they did?) and for their being kept and conveyed, this was not done onely by their Church, but by [others, as by] the Greeks; and there is no reaſon to ſay, that to the keeping, and tranſmitting of Records ſafely, it is required to underſtand them perfectly, ſince the old Teſtament was kept and tranſmitted by the Jews, who yet were ſo capable of erring, that out of it they lookt for a temporal King, when it ſpake of a ſpiritual: and methinks, the teſtimony is greater of a Church that contradicts the Scripture, than of one which doth not, ſince no man's witneſſing is ſo ſoon to be taken, as when againſt himſelf, and ſo their teſtimony is more receivable, which is given to the Scripture by which themſelves are condemned: Beſides, the general reverence which ever hath been given to theſe Books, and the continual uſe of them (together with ſeveral parties, having always their eyes upon each other, ready and deſirous to have ſomewhat to accuſe in their Adverſaries) gives us greater certainty that theſe are the ſame writings, than we have, that any other ancient Book is any other ancient Authours, and we need not to have any other unerring company preſerv'd to make us ſurer of it: yet the Church of Rome, as infallible a Depoſitary as ſhe is, hath ſuffer'd ſome varieties to creep into the Copies in ſome leſs material things, nay and ſome whole Books (as they themſelves ſay) to be loſt; and if they ſay, how then can that be the rule, whereof part is loſt? I anſwer, that we are excus'd if we walk by all the rule that we have; and this makes much againſt Traditions being the rule, ſince the Church hath not lookt better to God's unwritten word than to his written, and if ſhe pretend ſhe hath, let her tell us the cauſe why Antichriſt's coming was deferred, which was a Tradition of St. Paul to the Theſſalonians, and which without impudence ſhe cannot pretend [not] to have loſt; and if again they ſay, God hath preſerved all neceſſary Traditions, I reply, ſo hath he all neceſſary Scripture; for by not being preſerved, it became to us not neceſſary, ſince we cannot be bound to believe and follow, what we cannot find. But beſides, I believe that all which was ever neceſſary, is contain'd in what remains; for Pappias ſays of S. Mark, that he writ all that S. Peter preach'd; as Irenæus doth, that Luke writ all that S. Paul preach'd; nay Vincentius Lirinenſis though he would have the Scripture expounded by ancient Tradition, yet confeſſeth that all is there that is neceſſary (and yet then, there was no more Scripture than we now have) as indeed by ſuch a Tradition as he ſpeaks of, no more can be proved than is plainly there, and almoſt all Chriſtians conſent in; and truly I wonder that they ſhould brag ſo much of that Authour, ſince both in this and other things he makes much againſt them, eſpecially in not ſending men to the preſent Roman Church, a much readier way (if he had known it) than ſuch a long and doubtfull one as he preſcribes, which indeed it is impoſſible that almoſt any queſtion ſhould be ended by.

Eleventhly, He brings S. Auſtine's authority to prove, that the true Church muſt be always viſible; but if he underſtood Church in Maſter Montague's ſenſe, I think he was deceived. Neither is this impudence for me to ſay, ſince I have cauſe to think it but his particular opinion, by his ſaying (which Cardinal Perron quotes) that before the Donatiſts, the queſtion of the Church had never been exactly diſputed of, and by this being one of his main grounds againſt them, and yet claiming no Tradition, but onely places of Scripture, moſt of them allegorical; and if it were no more, then I may better diſſent from it, than he from all the firſt Fathers, (for Dionyſius Arcopagita was not as yet hatcht) in the point of the Chiliaſts, though ſome of them (Pappias and Irenæus) claimed a direct Tradition, and Chriſt's own words. Secondly, as he uſeth this kind of liberty, ſo he profeſſeth it in his nineteenth Epiſtle, where he ſaith, that to Canonical Scriptures he had onely learnt to give that reverence, as not to doubt of what they ſaid, becauſe they ſaid it, and from all others he expected proof from Scriptures, or reaſon. Thirdly, the Church of Rome condemns ſeveral opinions of him, and therefore ſhe ought not to find fault with them who imitate her examples.

Twelfthly, He adds two reaſons more, the conſent of the Fathers of all ages, and the confeſſion of Proteſtants: To the firſt I anſwer, that I know not of any ſuch, and am the more unapt to believe it, becauſe Mr. Montague vouchſafes not to inſiſt upon it, nor to quote any, which I gueſs he would have done, but that he miſdoubted their ſtrength. Secondly, ſuppoſe that all the Fathers which ſpeak of this, did ſay ſo; yet if they ſay it, as private Doctours, and claim no Tradition for it, I know not why they ſhould weigh more than ſo many of the now-learned, who having more helps from Art, and no fewer from Nature, are not worſe ſearchers into what is Truth, though leſs capable of being witneſſes to what was Tradition. Thirdly, they themſelves often profeſs they expect not to be read as Judges, but as to be judged, by their and our rule, the Canonical Scriptures. Fourthly, Let him pleaſe to reade about the immaculate conception Roſa, Salmeron and Wadding, and he will find me as ſubmiſſive to antiquity, even whilſt I reject it, as thoſe of his own Party; for they, to prefer new opinions before old, are fain to prefer new Doctours before old, and to confeſs the latter more perſpicacious, and to differ from thoſe of former times, with as little ſcruple as he would from Calvin (whom Maldonat on purpoſe to oppoſe, confeſſeth he chuſeth a new Interpretation before that of all the Ancients, which no witneſs but my eyes could have made me believe) nay, and produce other points wherein their Church hath decreed againſt the Fathers, to perſwade her to doe ſo again, although Campian with an eloquent brag, would perſwade us, that they are all as much for him, as Greg. the 13th. who was then Pope. In 6. cap. Joh.

To the ſecond I anſwer, that Infallibility is not by us denied to the Church of Rome, with an intention of allowing it to particular Proteſtants, how wiſe and learned ſoever.

Thirteenthly, He ſays next, that he after inform'd himſelf in other points which ſeem'd to him unwarrantable, and ſuperſtitious, and found, onely his own miſtakes gave him occaſion of ſcandal; To this I anſwer, that I cannot well anſwer any thing, unleſs he had ſpecified the points; but I can ſay that there are many, as picturing God the Father (which is generally thought lawfull, and as generally practiſed) their offerings to the Virgin Mary (which onely differs from the hereſie of the Colliridians in that a candle is not a cake) their praying to Saints, and believing de fide that they hear us, though no way made certain that they do ſo, and many more, which without any miſtake of his, might have given him occaſion to be ſtill ſcandalized; for whereas he ſaith, that theſe points were grounded upon the authority of the ancient Fathers, which was refuſed as inſufficient by Proteſtants, I anſwer, that none of theſe I name, have any ground in the Ancienteſt, nay, the firſt is by them diſallowed; and if any other ſuperſtition of theirs, have from them any ground, yet they who depart from ſo many of the Ancients in ſeveral opinions, cannot by any reaſon be excuſed for retaining any errour, becauſe therein they have conſent; nor have the Proteſtants cauſe to receive it from them, as a ſufficient Apology, neither hath he to follow the Fathers rather than Proteſtants, in a caſe in which not the perſons, but the reaſons were to be conſidered: For when Saint Hierome was by this way both brought into, and held in a ſtrange errour, though he ſpake ſomething like Maſter Montague, Patiaris me errare cum talibus, Suffer me to err with ſuch men, yet he could not obtain Saint Auguſtine's leave, who would not ſuffer him, but anſwered their reaſons, and neglected their authorities.

Fourteenthly, He ſpeaks of his Religion ſuper-infuſing loyalty, and if he had onely ſaid, it deſtroyed or weakned it not, I (who wiſh that no doubt of his allegeance may once enter his mind to whom we all owe it, but profeſs my ſelf his humble ſervant, and no ways his enemy though his adverſary) would then have made no anſwer; but ſince he ſpeaks as if Popery were the way to obedience, I cannot but ſay, that though no tenet of their whole Church (which I know) makes at all againſt it, yet there are prevailing opinions of that ſide, which are not fit to make good ſubjects, when their King and they are of different perſwaſions. For beſides that Cardinal D' Oſſat (an Authour which I know Maſter Montague hath read, becauſe whoſoever hath but conſidered State matters, muſt be as well skilled in him, as any Prieſt in his Breviary) tells us, that it is the Spaniards maxime, that faith is not to be kept with Hereticks, and more, that the Pope intimated as much in a Diſcourſe intended to perſwade the King of France to forſake the Queen of England; he ſays moreover, ſpeaking in another place about the Marquizat of Saluces, that they hold at Rome, that the Pope, to avoid a probable danger of the increaſing of Hereſie, may take away a territory from the true owner, and diſpoſe of it to another; and many alſo defend, that he hath power to depoſe an Heretical Prince, and of Hereſie he makes himſelf the Judge:

ſo that though I had rather my tongue ſhould cleave to the roof of my mouth, than that I ſhould deny that a Papiſt may be a good Subject, even to a King whom he counts a Heretick, ſince I verily believe that I my ſelf know very many very good; yet Popery is like to an ill air, wherein though many keep their healths, yet many are infected (ſo that at moſt, they are good ſubjects but during the Pope's pleaſure) and the reſt are in more danger, than if they were out of it.

To conclude, I believe that what I have ſaid may at leaſt ſerve (if he will deſcend to conſider it) to move Maſter Montague to a farther ſearch, and for Memorandums in it; which if it do, he will be ſoon able to give as much better reaſons for my concluſion [that ſuch a viſible Church neither need, nor can be ſhewed] as his underſtanding is degrees above mine. I hope alſo, by comparing the body of their belief, and the ground of their authority, that little that can de drawn out of the fourth of the Epheſians, with the Myriads of contradiction in Tranſubſtantiation, he will come to ſee that their pillars are too weak to hold up any building, be it never ſo light, and their building is too heavy to be held up by any pillars, be they never ſo ſtrong; and truſt, he will return to us, whom he will then find that he hath cauſeleſly left, if he be (which I doubt not) ſo ingenuous, as not to hold an opinion, becauſe he turned to it, nor to ſtay, onely becauſe he went.

A REPLY TO The Catholick Gentlemans Anſwer TO THE Book of Schiſm.

Whereunto is Annexed,

An Account of H. T. his Appendix to his Manual of Controverſies concerning the Abbot of Bangor's Anſwer to Auguſtine.

The Introduction.

THE Letter from the Catholick Gentleman, which undertakes to have anſwered the moſt material parts of the Book of Schiſm, is ſaid to expect ſome account from me. And I ſhall give it, if not quite with the ſame brevity, yet directly in the ſame method which he hath choſen, attending him, as he ſhall pleaſe to lead, not by reſuming the whole matter again, but by reflecting on thoſe few paſſages, which he hath thought good to take notice of, and freeing them from all, though the lighteſt exceptions, which he hath made to them. Numb. 1.

Upon this account, I ſhall ſay very little to his Proœm in theſe words, 2.

SIR,

You have been pleaſed to ſend me Doctor Hammonds Book of Schiſm, or a Defence of the Church of England, againſt the exceptions of the Romaniſts, as alſo your Letters, wherein you lay commands on me to read it, and thereupon to give you my opinion: Truly, Sir, both the one and the other could never have come to me in better ſeaſon; for having heard from ſome of my friends in England a good while ſince, of another Book, written by Doctor Ferne to the ſame purpoſe, as alſo one lately come out, of the Biſhop of Derries, and of this which you have ſent me, I was wondring what thoſe, who call themſelves of the Church of England, could ſay to defend themſelves from Schiſm; but now through your favour of letting me ſee this of Doctor Hammond's, I am freed from my bondage, and ſatisfied, in ſuppoſition, that the moſt can add little to what hath been upon that ſubject of Schiſm ſaid by him, whom you ſtile Wiſe and Learned, and well may he be ſo; but here he hath failed, as all men muſt that take in hand to defend a bad cauſe, which I think to make appear to you, or any indifferent judge, and which I will do rather upon ſome obſervations of ſeveral paſſages in his Book, than conſideration of the whole, which I will leave for ſome other, who hath more leiſure. In the mean time I muſt ſay with the Poet, ſpeaking of ſome Lawyers in his time,

Fur es, ait Pedio, Pedius quid? Crimina raris
Librat in Antithetis:

The Roman Catholick ſays to Doctor Hammond, You are an Heretick, you are a Schiſmatick, and Doctor Hammond replies good Engliſh, ſome Criticiſms, much Greek, with many citations out of Antiquity, indifferent to both parts of the queſtion.

I ſhall not here need ſolemnly to avert the good words beſtowed on me, becauſe 1. if they had been meant in earneſt, they have yet no influence on the matter in hand; As unlearned a Man as I, and as learned as he, which is by ſome characters thought to be the Author of this Anſwer, may agree in this common fate, that as one is not able to defend a bad cauſe, ſo the other hath not in any eminent manner betrayed a good: 3.

2. becauſe 'tis evident, that it was deſign and artifice to beſtow the good words on me, that ſo he might get himſelf the eaſier task: And therefore the only thing that is here neceſſary for me to tell the Reader, by way of Proœm, is, that ſince the publiſhing this Tract of Schiſm, that moſt excellent diſcourſe on the ſame ſubject, written by the Biſhop of Derry, hath truly made that former care of mine very unneceſſary, and ſo ſhould in all reaſon have been undertaken and anſwered by this Catholick Gentleman, if he had really deſigned to ſatisfie conſcience in this queſtion. And ſhould it be believed by him, what here he ſaith in the Title page, that he hath anſwered the moſt material parts of Doctor Hammond's Book of Schiſm, yet I can aſſure him he is ſo much miſtaken in his ſuppoſal, that there can little be added by any to what hath been ſaid by him, that he is in all juſtice to undeceive the Reader, and make him amends by giving him not a ſlight, but punctual anſwer to every part of that Biſhops Book, before he think he may ſafely charge the Church of England with Schiſm, as ſtill he adventures to do.

4. Having ſaid this, I ſhall make no kind of Reply, to the reſt of his Proœm, but proceed immediately to his firſt and only exception, wherein the firſt Chapter is concerned.

CHAP. I.

Of the Cauſe of Schiſm being left out of this Debate.

SECT. I.

No Cauſe able to juſtifie Schiſm. Every voluntary Diviſion a Schiſm, whatſoever the motive were. Maſter Knot's Teſtimony.

Numb. 1. HIS words are theſe,

But to draw near your ſatisfaction, His firſt Chapter is, for the body of it, common to both parts, yet I cannot omit one ſtrange piece of Logick at the end of the firſt Chapter, Sect. 9. where he concludeth, that the occaſion or motive of Schiſm is not to be conſidered, but only the fact of Schiſm, Of which poſition I can ſee no connexion to any premiſſes going before, and it ſelf is a pure contradiction, for not a Diviſion, but a cauſeleſs diviſion is a Schiſm, and how a Diviſion can be ſhewed to be unreaſonable and cauſleſs, without examining the occaſions and motives, I do not underſtand, nor (with his favour) I think he himſelf.

2. What want of Logick there is in that concluſion of the firſt Chapter, which extorted this animadverſion from the Romaniſt, and what ſtore of that faculty (ſomewhat neceſſary to the managing of a Controverſie) we are to expect from him, will ſoon be diſcernible by the view of that place which is accuſed by him, where having premiſed the criminouſneſs and weight of Schiſm, and unexcuſableneſs of all, that, upon what provocation ſoever, break the unity of the Church, I conclude that he that ſhall really be guilty of it, and the fact, wherein that guilt conſiſts, proved againſt him, will no way be able to defend himſelf by pleading the cauſe or motive to his Schiſm, there being no ſuch cauſe imaginable, which can juſtifie this fact of his, as both out of Irenæus and Saint Auguſtine had been newly vouched. Upon which, my reſolution there, was (as to me ſeemed) but neceſſary, to devolve the whole debate into this one quære, whether we of the Church of England were de facto, guilty of this crime, were Schiſmaticks or no? concluding that if we were, there were nothing to be ſaid in excuſe of us.

3. From this view of the τὸ λογικὸν the rational importance of that Section, 1. It is evident (what the Romaniſt profeſſeth not to be able to ſee) what is the connexion of my poſition to the premiſſes foregoing, viz. this, no cauſe can excuſe the Schiſmatick, therefore the examination of the cauſe is unneceſſary, whatſoever can be pretended on that head, is not worth the producing or heeding in this matter.

4. 2. 'Tis as evident how far the poſition it ſelf is removed from being a contradiction, which yet the Romaniſts Logick hath pronounced to be a pure one. A pure contradiction is in our Logick, eſt and non eſt, It is a Schiſm, and It is not a Schiſm, It is cauſleſs, and it is not cauſleſs, and the like. But certainly my concluding that no cauſe can juſtifie a Schiſm, or if the Schiſm be proved, 'tis in vain to plead that we had cauſe for it, contains no ſuch contradictory enuntiations. He that ſhould ſay that a Seditious perſon or a Rebel is worthy of death, whatſoever cauſe it were that incited him to that villany, doth neither affirm the Rebel to be no Rebel, nor the cauſe he pretends, to be no cauſe, only he ſaith indeed, that whatſoever the cauſe be, 'tis incompetent to juſtifie ſo foul a fact.

5. 3. The proof, which he adds to conclude this poſition to be a pure contradiction, is very far from proving it. The proof is this; For, ſaith he, not a diviſion, but a cauſleſs diviſion is a Schiſm. But this hath been ſhewed to have no truth in it, becauſe Diviſion and Schiſm being exactly the ſame, one a Latine, the other a Greek word, every Diviſion is and muſt neceſſarily be, in him who is guilty of it, a Schiſm, and if a voluntary Diviſion, a criminous Schiſm, whatſoever were the motive or cauſe of it, by Diviſion or Schiſm underſtanding (as I declare my ſelf to do) a ſpontaneous receding, or dividing from the unity of the Church, not being cut off or driven from it.

6. Laſtly, What he adds as a conſectary of his proof, that [he doth not underſtand how a Diviſion can be ſhewed unreaſonable and cauſleſs, without examining the occaſions and motives] he may now, if he pleaſe, without much difficulty comprehend, viz. by conſidering, that no cauſe or reaſon, how weighty ſoever, is ſufficient to juſtifie a diviſion. For as long as this is either proved or granted, the concluſion will be indubitable, without examining of the motives, that the diviſion is unreaſonable and cauſleſs. Let it once be granted or proved by the known Laws of a Nation, that every act of Sedition is a tranſgreſſion of Law, criminous and puniſhable, whatſoever the motive be that incited it, and then there will need no more than conviction of the fact, to conclude that fact unreaſonable. That which is in it ſelf ſo culpable and inexcuſable, that no reaſon whatſoever can be able to juſtifie it, is ready for the ſentence of condemnation, without farther proceſs; when 'tis reaſonably reſolved, that no reaſon can excuſe ſuch a fact, what reaſon can there be to loſe time in examining reaſons? This is the very caſe in hand, as 'tis apparent to any that will but view the the place, and 'tis not much for my incouragement in this task, that the Gentleman, to whom I muſt reply, was willing to think this ſo deep a riddle, ſo much above common underſtandings.

I ſhall here only add, that what was thus ſaid, was not in reaſon to provoke the Romaniſt, being a conceſſion that cut me off from many viſible advantages, and ſo deſerved his reward, much better than rebuke, and being thus early and unexpectedly fallen under his ſhort diſpleaſure, by my endeavour to oblige him, I have yet a ſhield, which promiſeth me ſecurity from the continuance of it, I mean not the evidence of the truth affirmed by me, (for that is not an amulet always to be depended on, when it is againſt intereſt to acknowledge it) but the ſuffrage of his own great Champion Maſter Knot, who hath directly affirm'd what I affirmed (and therefore I may be allowed not to underſtand, how this ſhould be ſo unintelligible) citing it out of St. Auguſtine, That there is no juſt neceſſity to divide Unity, and that it is not poſſible that any man ſhould have juſt Cauſe to ſeparate, —Infidel unmasked, cap. 7. num. 5. And ſo it is as manifeſt that this part of the firſt Chapter is common to both, as the former of which he affirms it, the Concluſion in all reaſon being involved in the ſame condition which belonged to the Premiſes, and it was only my ill luck or his willingneſs to find fault, that it was not formerly apprehended to be ſo. 7.

CHAP. II.

Concerning Hereſie, Excommunication, Infallibility.

SECT. I.

Of paſſing ſlightly over the difference betwixt Hereſie and Schiſm.

THE exceptions to the ſecond Chapter are three; the firſt concerning Hereſie, the ſecond concerning Excommunication, the third concerning Maſter Knots Conceſſion, which uſhers in a Diſcourſe of Infallibility. Numb. 1.

The former in theſe words, 2.

He ſlightly paſſes over the diſtinction of Hereſie and Schiſm, as if he would not have it underſtood, that all Hereſie is Schiſm, though ſome Schiſm be no Hereſie.

What is here called the ſlight paſſing over the diſtinction of Hereſie and Schiſm, is one piece of injuſtice in him, and the cauſe to which it is affixt, my unwillingneſs that it ſhould be underſtood that all Hereſie is Schiſm, will ſoon appear to be another. 3.

For the firſt, It is evident that in that Sect. 3. of Chap. 2. I do not at all conſider the diſtinction of Hereſie, and Schiſm, nor could, without abſolute interruption and diſturbance of the Diſcourſe in hand, and direct tranſgreſſion of all Rules of method, ſay any thing to that Subject, in that place. The thing that I there manifeſt, is, the difference betwixt Excommunication and Schiſm (and ſure that is not Hereſie and Schiſm, unleſs Excommunication be Hereſie, and ſo the puniſhment of the Sin, be the Sin it ſelf) between the paſſive and the active, or reciprocal diviſion or ſeparation; and all that I ſay in that Section which can relate to Hereſie, is, that where the offence, for which a man is excommunicated, is Hereſie and not Schiſm, there it is evident, that his Excommunication, which ſtill is his puniſhment and not his ſin (the cauſe of it alſo being not Schiſm, but ſomewhat elſe, Hereſie, or the like) cannot be the guilt of Schiſm in him that is ſo puniſhed. 4.

Now it is evident, that I cannot be ſaid to paſs over that ſlightly, which I do not ſpeak to at all, and to which I had no occaſion to ſpeak, and conſequently that I was no way liable to this exception. 5.

And that being ſaid, the ſecond part of the ſame exception, that of the ground on which I do this, muſt needs be as cauſeleſs as the former. For 1. 'tis certain, that my thoughts, or wiſhes, or deſigns, are not things which can duely fall under this Objectors cognizance (he cannot upon any ſure grounds, divine or affirm, what I aimed at in ſuch or ſuch a ſlight paſſage) and 2. 'tis yet more certain, that no collection can juſtly be made from my doing that ſlightly, which I did not meddle with at all. But then 3. to remove all ſcruple or poſſible occaſion of jealouſie in this matter, 'tis the deſign of Chapter 8. (the method then leading to it) under a ſecond ſort of Schiſm, to conſider the departure from the Unity of the Faith, which being but a periphraſis of Hereſie, is conſequently the defining all Hereſie is Schiſm, and ſo the profeſt avowing of that, which he ſuſpected me unwilling to have underſtood. And ſo ſtill there is not the leaſt appearance of juſtice in this ſuggeſtion. 6.

SECT. II.

Excommunication how it differs from Schiſm. Wilful continuance under cenſures, is Schiſm. The Biſhop of Rome is not our lawful Governour. The ſevere Conditions of their Communion.

HIS ſecond Exception is perfectly of the ſame making with the former, thus, Numb. 1.

Again, ſaith he, treating of Excommunication, he eaſily ſlideth over this part, that wilful continuance in a juſt Excommunication, maketh Schiſm. 2.

Here again 'tis evident, that I treat not of Excommunication, nor have any occaſion fitly to treat of it, farther than to ſhew, That Schiſm, being a voluntary ſeparation, the word in no propriety pertains to that act of the Governour of the Church, whereby he ſeparates or cuts off any by way of Cenſures. Certainly, he that is put to death by Sentence of Law, cannot be adjudged a Felo de ſe, one that hath voluntarily put himſelf out of the number of the living, or be liable to thoſe forfeitures. 3.

feitures which by the Law belong to ſuch. He that is baniſhed out of the Kingdom, cannot be guilty of the breach of that Statute, which forbids all Subjects going out of it; nor be puniſht juſtly, for that which is his ſuffering, not his deed; his puniſhment, not his delinquency.

4. As for his wilful continuance under juſt Cenſures, the wilfulneſs of that, certainly, makes him culpable, and the continuance in Excommunication, being alſo continuance in ſeparation from the Church, which is Schiſm, whenſoever it is voluntary, I make no doubt of the conſequence, that ſuch wilful continuance in Excommunication, be it juſt or unjuſt, is actual Schiſm, ſuppoſing (as the word wilful muſt ſuppoſe) that this continuance is wholly imputable to the will of the Excommunicate, i. e. that if he will ſubmit to that which is lawful for him to ſubmit to, he may be abſolved and freed from it.

5. If this were it, that he would have had more explicitely affirmed, then I anſwer, that as there I had no occaſion to ſpeak to it, ſo now upon his ſlighteſt demand, I make no ſcruple to give him my full ſenſe of it, that he, which being caſt into Priſon for juſt cauſe, may upon his Petition, and Promiſe of Reformation be releaſed, or if the cauſe were unjuſt, may yet without doing any thing any way unlawful, regain his Liberty, from thenceforth becomes not the Magiſtrates, but his own Priſoner, and is guilty of all the damage, be it diſeaſe, famiſhing, death it ſelf, which is conſequent to his impriſonment. And the Analogie holds directly in Excommunication; He that continues under the Cenſures of his Eccleſiaſtical Ruler, when he might fairly obtain abſolution from them, is by himſelf ſentenced to the continuance of this puniſhment, as by the Governour of the Church, to the beginning of it. But then all this while, this is not the condition of our Church, in reſpect of the Church of Rome, they being not our lawful Superiours, indued with juriſdiction over us; and for other communion, ſuch as alone can be maintained or broken among fellow-brethren, or Chriſtians, it is carefully maintained by us, as far as it is lawfully maintainable.

6. And both theſe being there evidenced in that, and the enſuing Chapters, I did not warily or purpoſely abſtain from (becauſe I had nothing that ſuggeſted to me any opportunity of) ſaying any thing more to this purpoſe. The ſevere Conditions which are by the Romaniſts required of us to render us capable of their Communion, ſubſcription of errour, or profeſſion againſt Conſcience, make it impertinent to propoſe or diſcuſs either of theſe two Queſtions, 1. Whether we lye under a juſt Excommunication, 2. Whether, if we did, we would wilfully continue under it, or conſequently, whether we be now guilty of Schiſm in this Notion?

SECT. III.

Mr. Knot's Conceſſion and Concluſion. The power of a fallible Church to require belief. Of Antiquity, Poſſeſſion, Perſwaſion of Infallibility, Motives for Union. Uncertainty of the Proteſtants Reaſons. The grand Hereſie and Schiſm of not believing Rome infallible. Belief ſufficient without infallibility. Fictions of Caſes.

Numb. 1. THE third Exception enlargeth to ſome length in theſe words,

2. What he calls Maſter Knot's Conceſſion, I take to be the publick profeſſion of the Roman or Catholick Church, and that Nature it ſelf teacheth all rational men, that any Congregation that can lye, and knoweth not whether it doth lye or no, in any Propoſition, cannot have power to bind any Particular to believe what She ſaith, neither can any man of underſtanding have an obligation to believe what She teacheth, farther than agrees with the Rules of his own reaſon: Out of which it followeth, that the Roman Churches binding of men to a profeſſion of Faith (which the Proteſtants and other Heretical multitudes have likewiſe uſurped) if She be infallible, is evidently gentle, charitable, right, and neceſſary; as contrariwiſe, in any other Church or Congregation, which pretends not to infallibility, the ſame is unjuſt, tyrannical, and a ſelf-condemnation to the Binders: ſo that the ſtate of the Queſtion will be this, Whether the Catholick or Roman Church be infallible or no, for She pretendeth not to bind any man to tenets or beliefs upon any other ground or title. By this you may perceive much of his Diſcourſe — to be not only ſuperfluous and unneceſſary, but alſo contrary to himſelf; for he laboureth to perſwade that the Proteſtant may be certain of ſome truth, againſt which the Roman Catholick Church bindeth to profeſſion of errour, which is as much as to ſay, as he who pretendeth to have no infallible Rule by which to govern his Doctrine, ſhall be ſuppoſed to be infallible, and he that pretendeth to have an infallible Rule, ſhall be ſuppoſed to be fallible; at moſt becauſe fallible Objections are brought againſt him: now then conſider what a meek and humble Son of the Church ought to do, when of the one ſide is the Authority of Antiquity and Poſſeſſion (ſuch Antiquity and Poſſeſſion without diſpute or contradictions from the Adverſary, as no King can ſhew for his Crown, and much leſs any other perſon or perſons for any other thing) the perſwaſion of infallibility, all the pledges that Chriſt hath left to his Church for Motives of Union: on the other ſide uncertain Reaſons of a few men pretending to learning, every day contradicted by incomparable numbers of men Wiſe and Learned, and thoſe few men confeſſing thoſe Reaſons and themſelves uncertain, fallible, and ſubject to errour; certainly without a bias of intereſt or prejudice, it is impoſſible for him to leave the Church if he be in it, or not return if he be out of it: for if infallibility be the ground of the Churches power to command belief, as She pretends no other; no time, no ſeparation within memory of Hiſtory, can juſtifie a continuance out of the Church: You may pleaſe to conſider then how ſolid this Doctors Diſcourſe is, who telleth us, for his great evidence, that we (ſaith he) who do not acknowledge the Church of Rome to be infallible, may be allowed to make certain ſuppoſitions (that follow there.) The Queſtion is, Whether a Proteſtant be a Schiſmatick, becauſe a Proteſtant? and he will prove he is not a Schiſmatick, becauſe he goeth conſequently to Proteſtant, that is Schiſmatical grounds: I pray you reflect, that not to acknowledge the Church to be infallible, is that for which we charge the Doctor with Schiſm and Hereſie in Capite, and more than for all the reſt he holds diſtinct from us, for this Principle taketh away all belief, and all ground of belief, and turneth it into uncertainty and weather-cock opinion, putteth us into the condition to be circumferri omni vento Doctrinæ, ſubmitteth us to Atheiſm and all

ſort

ſort of miſcreancy, let him not then over-leap the Queſtion, but either prove this is not ſufficient to make him a Schiſmatick and an Heretick too, or let him acknowledge he is both.

This Diſcourſe thus enlarged to the conſideration of fallibility and infallibility in a Church, is 3.
certainly a digreſſion in this place, and taking the occaſion from ſome words of mine, Sect. 6. of a conceſſion of Maſter Knot's, it is a little neceſſary to recount, what conceſſion that was, and the uſe that I there made of it, that ſo it may appear, whether there were any thing blameable in my procedure.

The Subject I was upon, Sect. 5. was the undoubted lawfulneſs of being and continuing excluded 4.
from any ſuch Church, the conditions of whoſe Communion contain Sin in them. To this head of Diſcourſe I mentioned a conceſſion of Maſter Knot's, that it is perfectly unlawful to diſſemble, equivocate, or lye in matters of Faith; and this, as a confirmation of my then preſent Aſſertion, that when I am not permitted by the Romaniſts to have external communion with them, unleſs I do thus diſſemble, equivocate and lye, affirm my ſelf to believe what I do not believe, I may lawfully continue thus excluded from their Communion. But then I could not juſtly conceal what Maſter Knot there added as his concluſion from hence (together with the acknowledged unlawfulneſs of forſaking the external communion of Gods viſible Church) that therefore the Church of Rome is infallible, becauſe otherwiſe men might forſake her Communion.

Here indeed I thought it very ſtrange, that this concluſion ſhould be thus deduced from ſuch pre- 5. miſſes, that it ſhould be deemed lawful to ſeparate from a Church for every errour, or for no more but being ſubject to errour, being fallible, though it were actually guilty of no errour, which I conceived to be the ſame in effect, as to affirm it lawful to forſake the communion of all but Saints, and Angels, and God in Heaven, becauſe all others were peccable and fallible. But yet I thought not fit to go farther out of my way to preſs the unreaſonableneſs of it, but contented my ſelf with that, which was for my preſent turn, his confeſſion that it was lawful to ſeparate or continue in ſeparation from the Church of Chriſt, in caſe we could not without lying, &c. be permitted to communicate with it.

This being the whole buſineſs, as it lyes viſible to any in that fifth and ſixth Section, Let us 6.
now ſee what a confuſion is made to gain ſome ſmall advantage from hence, or excuſe for a long digreſſion.

Firſt it is the concluſion, viz. [that any Congregation that can lye, &c. cannot have power to bind any 7.
to believe what She ſaith] which he ſaith is called by me Maſter Knot's conceſſion. But this is a great miſtake; I never lookt on this as his conceſſion, never called it by that title, but as a concluſion that he made a ſtrange ſhift to deduce from another conceſſion.

A conceſſion, this Gentleman ſhould in reaſon have underſtood to be ſomewhat which the Adverſary 8. yields, and which the Diſputer gains advantage by his yielding it; ſuch was his Aſſertion, that all lying and diſſembling was unlawful, and that rather than that ſhould be admitted, it were lawful to forſake the external communion of the Church of Chriſt. And that, and nothing but that, was by me cited as his conceſſion.

Secondly, That concluſion it ſelf, that the Congregation that is fallible, cannot have power to bind to 9.
believe,— is not ſo much as conſidered by me in that place or elſewhere; I ſaid not one word againſt it, which might provoke this Objector to take it up, and confirm it; neither was it in the leaſt needful, or pertinent to the matter then in hand, to enter into the conſideration of it. All that was by me taken notice of (and that but in paſſing) was the conſequence or coherence betwixt the premiſſes and that concluſion, which naturally inferred a third thing, that it was in Mr. Knot's opinion, lawful to forſake the Communion of any fallible Church, which I thought by the way, would be ſure to excuſe us (though we ſhould be granted to have forſaken and continued wilfully in Separation from the Roman Church) if it might but appear, that either that were guilty of any one errour, or liable to fall into any one. And this being intirely all that was there ſaid by me, there is no reaſon I ſhould ſo far attend this Gentleman in his digreſſion, as to conſider what here he proceeds to ſay, upon his new-ſprung Subject of Diſcourſe, very diſtant from that of Schiſm, to which I endeavoured to adhere, having elſewhere purſued at large, the Romaniſts other Hypotheſis concerning their Churches Infallibility.

Were it not thus remote from our matter in hand, and perfectly unneceſſary to the defence of 10. our Church from Schiſm, I might diſcover farther many infirm parts in this procedure. I ſhall but briefly touch on ſome of them.

1. For the truth of that Propoſition [that a Congregation that can lye, i. e. a Church that is fallible, 11.
and knoweth not (i. e. hath no infallible certainty) whether it lye or no in any Propoſition, cannot have power to bind any to believe what She ſaith] I may certainly affirm, 1. That this is no infallible truth, being no where affirmed by any infallible Speaker, or deduced from any infallible Principle. For as to the Scripture, it is not pretended to be affirmed by that; and for Natural Reaſon, that cannot be an infallible Judge in this matter of defining what power may be, or is by God given to a Church, without defining it infallible. A Prince may no doubt be impowered by God to give Laws, and thoſe Laws oblige Subjects to obedience, and yet that Prince never be imagined infallible in making Laws. And natural reaſon cannot conclude it impoſſible, that a Church ſhould have a proportionable power given it by God to bind belief, &c.

As for the Catholick or Roman Church, 1. That is a miſpriſion, the Catholick is not the ſingle 12.
Roman Church, nor the Roman the Catholick. 2. There no where appears any ſuch definition, either of the Catholick, i. e. Univerſal Church of God, or particularly of the Roman Church, no Act of Council repreſentative of that Church, no known affirmation of that diffuſed Body under the Biſhop of Rome's Paſtorage, that all authority to oblige belief is founded in Infallibility. 3. If any ſuch definition did appear, it could no way be foundation of belief to us, who do not believe that Church, or any definition thereof, as ſuch, to be infallible.

2. If we ſhall but diſtinguiſh and limit the terms, 1. What is meant by [can lie] 2. By knowing or 13.
not knowing whether it lie or no, 3. By power to bind, 4. By belief (as every of theſe have a latitude of ſignification, and may be eaſily miſtaken, till they are duly limited) It will then ſoon appear that there is no unlimited truth in that which he ſaith is the whole Churches affirmation, nor prejudice to our pretenſions from that limited truth, which ſhall be found in it.

that

14. 1. The Phraſe [can lye] may denote no more than ſuch a poſſibility of erring, as yet is joined neither with actual errour, nor with any Principle, whether of deficiency on one ſide, or of malignity on the other, which ſhall be ſure to betray it into errour. Thus that particular Church, that is at the preſent in the right, in all matters of faith, and hath before it the Scripture to guide it in all its deciſions, together with the traditions and doctrines of the Antient and Primitive Church, and having skill in all thoſe knowledges, which are uſeful to fetch out the true meaning of Scripture, and ability to enquire into the antient Path, and to compare her ſelf with all other conſiderable parts of the Univerſal Church, and then is diligent and faithful to make uſe of all theſe ſuccours, and in uprightneſs of heart ſeeks the truth, and applies it ſelf to God in humble, and ardent, and continual Prayer for his guidance to lead into all truth, This Church, I ſay, is yet fallible, may affirm and teach falſe, i. e. this is naturally poſſible that it may, but it is not ſtrongly probable that it will, as long as it is thus aſſiſted, and diſpoſed to make uſe of theſe aſſiſtances, and means of true defining.

15. 2. That Churches knowledge, whether it define truly or no in any Propoſition, may ſignifie no more than a full perſwaſion or belief (cui non ſubeſt dubium, wherein they neither doubt, nor apprehend reaſon of doubting) that what they define, is the very truth; though for knowledge properly ſo called, or aſſurance, cui non poteſt ſubeſſe falſum, which is unerrable or infallible in ſtrictneſs of ſpeech, it may not have attained, or pretend to have attained to it.

16. 3. By power to bind, may be meant no more, than authority derived to them from the Apoſtles of Chriſt, to make deciſions, when difficulties ariſe, to preſcribe Rules for Ceremonies or Government, ſuch as ſhall oblige Inferiors to due obſervance and obedience, by force of the Apoſtles πείθεσθε ἡγουμένοις, his Precept to obey the Rulers ſet over us in the Church, which we may do, without thinking them ſimply, or by any promiſe of God, inerrable or infallible; as the obedience which is due to Civil Magiſtrates, which ſuppoſes in them a power of binding Subjects to obey, doth yet no way ſuppoſe or imply them uncapable of erring and ſinning, and giving unreaſonable commands, and ſuch as wherein it is unlawful to yield obedience to them.

17. Beſide this, there may farther be meant by it, a general obligation that lies on all men, to believe what is with due grounds of conviction propoſed to them, ſuch as the diſbelieving or doubting of it, ſhall be in them inſeparable from obſtinacy; and this obligation is again the greater, when that which is thus convincingly propoſed, is propoſed by our Superiors, from whoſe mouth it is regular to ſeek and receive Gods will.

18. Laſtly, Believing may ſignifie, not an implicite, irrational, blind, but a well-grounded, rational, explicite belief of that which, as the truth of God is duely propoſed to us; or again, where there is not that degree of manifeſtation, yet a conſent to that which is propoſed as moſt probable, on the grounds afforded to judge by, or when the perſon is not competent to ſearch grounds, a bare yielding to the judgment of Superiors, and deeming it better to adhere to them, than to attribute any thing to their own judgment, a believing ſo far as not to diſbelieve. And this again may rationally be yielded to a Church, or the Rulers and Governours of it, without deeming them inerrable or infallible.

19. Nay, where the Propoſition defined is ſuch, that every Member of that Church cannot, without violence to his underſtanding, yield any ſuch degree of belief unto it, yet he that believes it not, may behave himſelf peaceably and reverently, either duely repreſenting his grounds, why he cannot conſent to it, or if his ſubſcription or conſent be neither formally nor interpretatively required of him, quietly enjoy his contrary opinion. And this may tend as much to the peace and unity of a Church, as the perſwaſion of the inerrability thereof can be ſuppoſed to do.

20. By this view of the latitude of theſe terms, and the limitations they are capable of, it is now not ſo difficult to diſcern, in what ſenſe the propoſition under conſideration is falſe, and in what ſenſe it is true, and by us acknowledged to be ſo.

21. A Congregation that is fallible, and hath no knowledge or aſſurance (cui non poteſt ſubeſſe falſum) that it is not deceived in any particular Propoſition, may yet have authority to make deciſions, &c. and to require Inferiors ſo far to acquieſce to their determinations, as not to diſquiet the peace of that Church with their contrary opinions.

22. But for any abſolute infallible belief or conſent, that no Church, which it not it ſelf abſolutely infallible, and which doth not infallibly know that it is infallible, hath power to require of any.

23. By this it appears in the next place, in what ſenſe it is true, which in the following words is ſuggeſted of Proteſtants, that they bind men to a Profeſſion of Faith, and how unjuſtly it is added, that, ſuppoſing them not to be infallible, it is unjuſt, tyrannical, and ſelf-condemnation to the Binders. The contrary whereto is moſt evident, underſtanding the obligation with that temper, and the infallibility in that Notion, wherein it is evident we underſtand it. For what injuſtice or tyranny, &c. can it be in any lawful Superior, having defined what verily he believes to be the truth of God, and no way doubts of his having deduced it rightly from the Scripture, but yet knows that he, as a man, is fallible, and that it is poſſible he may have ſome way failed in this, as in any other his moſt circumſpect action, what injuſtice, I ſay, can it be, authoritatively to direct this definition to thoſe, who are committed to his charge, and expect their due ſubmiſſion to it? meaning by ſubmiſſion what I have here expreſt to mean by it.

24. So again it appears of the Roman Church, how far it is from gentle or charitable in them, to bind men to profeſs, as matter of faith, whatſoever is by that Church defined, upon this one account, that the Church is infallible and can't err; when this very thing, that it is infallible, is not at all made probable, much leſs infallibly deduced from any reaſon or teſtimony that is infallible.

25. Next then, when he ſaith, that the ſtate of the Queſtion will be this, Whether the Roman Church be infallible or no; I am not ſure I know what Queſtion he means, whether the main Queſtion on which the Tract of Schiſm was written, i. e. whether the Church of England be ſchiſmatical or no, or whether the particular Queſtion which this Gentlemans haſte hath framed to himſelf in this place, Whether ther a fallible Church may have power to bind any to believe what She ſaith? But I ſuppoſe by ſome indications, that the latter is it, and then, as from hence I learn what he means by infallible, a Church that cannot poſſibly err, all whoſe definitions are ſuch, quibus nequit ſubeſſe falſum, ſo until this be proved of that Church, I muſt be allowed to ſpeak like one who think not my ſelf obliged to the belief of it, and being ſure of this, that a Proteſtant is or may be verily perſwaded of ſome truth, againſt which the Roman Church bindeth to profeſſion of errour (meaning by verily perſwaded, ſuch a certainty only, cui non ſubeſt dubium, he hath no doubt, nor reaſon to induce doubting of it) I cannot imagine how that part of my Diſcourſe, wherein I have ſuppoſed or aſſerted this, can be either ſuperfluous, unneceſſary, or (whatever other weakneſs it be guilty of) contrary to my ſelf. For certainly I that think I am fallible, may yet verily believe, without all doubt, the truth of many Propoſitions, which if I ſhould affirm my ſelf not to believe, I muſt doubtleſs lie, and then ſin, by Mr. Knot's former Conceſſion. And 'tis as certain on the other ſide, that he that pretendeth to have an infallible Rule, may yet foully miſtake, both in that general, original, and in many other particular, derivative pretenſions; His ſuppoſed infallibility, if it be not rightly ſuppoſed (and till it be proved, it will not be ſo) will be ſo far from an amulet to keep him ſafe from all errour, that it is the likelieſt way to deliver him up to it, as the premature perſwaſion of his particular election may be the ingulphing any, through ſecurity and preſumption, in the moſt certain ruine.

In the proceſs of this diſcourſe he is pleaſed to mention four advantages of the Roman Church above any other, Antiquity, poſſeſſion, perſwaſion of Infallibility, the pledges that Chriſt hath left to his Church for motives of union; and nothing but uncertain reaſons on the other ſide, which ſaith he, muſt make it impoſſible for any, without intereſt or prejudice, to leave the Church, if he be in it, or not return, if he be out of it. 26.

To this imaginary ſetting of the Scales between them and us, and particularly to the fourth advantage pretended to, the pledges that Chriſt left for motives of union, it is ſufficient to reply in general, that for us, which have not voluntarily ſeparated, but are by them violently removed from communion with them, and cannot be admitted to reunion, but upon conditions, which without diſſembling and lying we cannot undergo, it is in vain to ſpeak of motives or obligations to return to their communion. We that are bound, as much as in us lies, to have peace with all men, muſt not admit any known or wilful ſin, in order to that moſt deſirable end. And this one thing as alone it is pertinent to the matter in hand, that of Schiſm, ſo it is neceſſarily the concluding of this Controverſie, We that are not permitted to return, (and ſo we are, if the Conditions of our return be ſo incumbred, as to include ſin,) cannot with any juſtice or equity be charged for not returning. 27.

Againſt this, here is nothing ſaid, any farther than the bare mention of the three other advantages on their ſide. And none of theſe are of any force to perſwade our return, upon ſuch conditions as theſe, much leſs to exact it as a Duty from us. 28.

By Antiquity and Poſſeſſion, as here they are ſpoken of, I am apt to ſuppoſe he means not antiquity of the Roman Church, or the preſent Doctrines (and therefore I ſhall not ſpeak of them) but the antiquity of our communion with them (if he mean a Poſſeſſion in the belief of the Popes Univerſal Paſtorſhip, I ſhall have occaſion to ſpeak of that * hereafter.) And if this be granted, (as, for fraternal communion, and ſuch as is due from one Siſter Church to another, it is willingly granted,) then this will devolve the blame on thoſe who are guilty of this breach, who have caſt us out, and permit us no way of returning with a good conſcience; And ſo this is little for the Romaniſts advantage. 29. * Chap. 7. Sect. 1.

But if inſtead of fraternal communion, it be ſubjection to the Roman See, that is by his words claimed, and pretended to by poſſeſſion; then, as we willingly grant to that See, all that the antient Canons allowed to it and ſo cannot in that reſpect offend againſt Antiquity, ſo what, contrary to thoſe Canons, they have at any time aſſumed, and unlawfully poſſeſt themſelves of, can no way be pretended to be their Right, or they to be bonæ fidei Poſſeſſores, true or fair Poſſeſſors of it, which qualification and condition is yet abſolutely neceſſary to found their Plea from Poſſeſſion, and which alone can bear any proportion with that, which Kings can ſhew for their Crowns, or Proprietaries for their inheritances. 30.

Of this Head of poſſeſſion, or preſcription, it were eaſie to add much more, by conſidering that claim and title, by the known Rules whether of the Canon, or Civil Law. The Civil Law, which is generally more favourable to Preſcription, doth yet acknowledge many ways of interrupting it, as by calling it into queſtion, and that is ſufficiently done in ſome Caſes, per ſolam conventionem, by citing, or ſummoning the Poſſeſſor; and when conteſtatio litis, the entring a Suit, is actually required, yet ſtill he that appears to have cauſed the impediment, and kept it from coming to this conteſtation, is not to gain any advantage by his guilt, but adverſus eum lis habetur pro conteſtato, he ſhall be look't on, as if the Suit had been actually conteſted againſt him. See Bartolus in l. ſi eum § qui injuriarum in fi. ff. ſi quis caut. 31.

But as to the Canon Law, which in all reaſon the Catholick is to owne in this Queſtion, it is known that it admitteth not any the longeſt preſcription, without the bonæ fidei poſſeſſio, (he that came by any thing diſhoneſtly, is for ever obliged to reſtitution) and for the judging of that, allows of many ways of probation, from the nature of the thing (the courſe we have taken in this preſent Debate) and from other probable indications, and where the appearances are equal on both ſides, the Law, though it be wont to judge moſt favourably, doth yet incline to queſtion the honeſty of coming to the poſſeſſion, and to preſume the diſhoneſty, upon this account, becauſe mala fides, diſhoneſty is preſumed induſtriouſly to contrive its own ſecreſie, and to lye hid in thoſe receſſes, from which at a diſtance of time it is not eaſily fetcht out. So Felinus in C. ult. de præſcript. per leg. ult. C. unde vi. And in a word, it is the affirmation of the Doctors, preſumi malam fidem ex antiquiore adverſarii poſſeſſione, the preſumption is ſtrong that the poſſeſſion was not honeſtly come by, when it appears to have been antiently in the other hands, and the way of conveyance from one to the other is not diſcernible. See Panormit. and Felinus in c. ſi diligenti X de præſcript. Menochius arbit. Quæſt. Caſu 225. n. 4. and others referred to by the learned Grotius in Conſil. Jurid. ſuper iis quæ Naſſavii—p. 36. &c. But I have no need of theſe nicer diſquiſitions. 32.

As

33. As for the perſwaſion of Infallibility, meaning, as they muſt, their own perſwaſion of it, that can have no influence upon us, who are ſure that we are not ſo perſwaded, unleſs the grounds, on which their perſwaſion is founded, be ſo convincingly repreſented to us, that it muſt be our prejudice, or other vicious defect, or affection in us, that we are not in the like manner perſwaded of it. But on this we are known to inſiſt, and never yet have had any ſuch grounds offered to us: As may in ſome meaſure appear by the view of that Controverſie as it lyes viſible in the Book, intituled, The view of Infallibility.

34. As for the uncertainty of the reaſons on the Proteſtants ſide, by uncertainty, meaning fallibility, and the poteſt ſubeſſe falſum, whilſt yet we are, without doubting, verily perſwaded that our reaſons have force in them; that cannot make it poſſible for us to believe what we do not believe, or lawful upon any the faireſt intuition to profeſs contrary to our belief. I believe that Henry VIII. was King of this Nation, and the reaſons on which I believe it, are, the teſtimonies of meer men, and ſo fallible; yet the bare fallibility of thoſe teſtimonies cannot infuſe into me any doubt of the truth of them, hath no force to ſhake that but humane belief; and while I thus believe, I am ſure it were wilful ſin in me, though for the greateſt and moſt precious acquiſitions in my view, to profeſs I do not believe it. The like muſt be ſaid of any other perſwaſion of mine, denied by the Romaniſts, and the denying whereof is part of the condition required of me to make me capable of communion with them.

35. But it is not now time to inſiſt on this, both becauſe here is nothing produced againſt it, and becauſe here follows a much higher undertaking, which ſwallows up all theſe inferior differences between us, viz. that not to acknowledge the Church (that muſt be the Roman Church) to be infallible, is the great crime of Schiſm and Hereſie in capite, and more than all that I hold diſtinct from the Romaniſts.

36. This I acknowledge was not foreſeen in the Tract of Schiſm, and may ſerve for the una litura, the one anſwer to remove all that is there ſaid. For if our grand Fundamental Schiſm and Hereſie be all ſummed up in this one comprehenſive guilt, our not acknowledging the Church of Rome to be infallible, then it was and ſtill is impertinent to diſcourſe on any other Subject, but that one of Infallibility; for if that be gained by them to belong to their Church, I am ſure we are concluded Schiſmaticks; and till it be gained, I am ſure there is no reaſon to ſuppoſe it.

37. But then as this is a compendious way of anſwering the Tract of Schiſm, and I wonder, after he had ſaid this, he could think it ſeaſonable to proceed to make exceptions to any other Particulars, this one great miſtake of the Queſtion being diſcovered, made all other more minute conſiderations unneceſſary (as he that hath ſprung a Mine to blow up the whole Fort, need not ſet Wiſps of Straw to ſeveral corners to burn it) ſo it falls out a little unluckily, that this doth not ſuperſede, but only remove this Gentleman's labour, it being now as neceſſary that he ſhould defend his Hypotheſis of the Church of Rome's Infallibility, againſt all that is formerly ſaid by me on that Subject, as now it was to make this Anſwer to the Book of Schiſm, and till that be done, or attempted to be done, there is nothing left for me to reply to in this matter.

38. For as to his bare affirmations, that the not acknowledging their Infallibility, takes away all belief and ground of belief, turns all into uncertainty, &c. nay, ſubmitteth to Atheiſm and all ſorts of miſcreancy.] It is, ſure, but a miſtake or miſunderſtanding, as of ſome other things, ſo particularly of the nature of belief; For beſide that I may have other grounds of belief, than the affirmations of the Roman Church; the authority of Scripture, for the Severals contained in it, and the Teſtimony of the univerſal Primitive (that ſure is more than of the preſent Roman) Church, to aſſure me that what we take for Scripture is Scripture, and to derive Apoſtolical Traditions to me, and ſo I may believe enough without ever knowing that the Roman Church defines any thing de fide, but much more, without acknowledging the truth of all She defines, and yet much more, without acknowledging her inerrable and infallible: Beſide this, I ſay, it is evident that belief is no more than conſent to the truth of any thing, and the grounds of belief, ſuch Arguments as are ſufficient to exclude doubting, to induce conviction and perſwaſion, and where that is actually induced, there is belief, though there be no pretence of infallibility in the Argument, nor opinion of it in him that is perſwaded by it.

39. That all that God hath ſaid is true, I believe by a belief or perſwaſion, cui non poteſt ſubeſſe falſum, wherein I cannot be deceived, and there I acknowledge infallibility, upon this ground, whether of nature or of Grace, of common dictate, or of Religion, that it is impoſſible for God to lie, to deceive, or to be deceived; But that the whole Canon of Scripture, as it is delivered to us by the Laodicean Council, is the Word of God, though I fully believe this alſo, and have not the leaſt doubt to any part of it, yet I account not my ſelf infallible in this belief, nor can any Church that affirms the ſame, unleſs they are otherwiſe priviledged by God, be infallible in affirming it, nor any that believes that Church, be infallible in their belief; And as that priviledge is not yet proved, by any donation of Gods, to belong to any Church, particularly to the Roman; ſo till it be proved, and proved infallibly, it can be no competent medium to induce any new act of infallible belief, the want of which, may denominate us either Hereticks or Schiſmaticks.

40. In the mean time, this is certain, that I that do not pretend to believe any thing infallibly in this matter, not ſo much as that the Church is not infallible, muſt yet be acknowledged to believe her fallible, or elſe I could not by this Gentleman be adjudged a Schiſmatick for ſo believing: And then this ſuppoſeth that I may believe what in his opinion I believe untruly, that ſure is, that I may believe what I do not believe infallibly. The matter is viſible, I cannot think fit to enlarge on it.

41. One thing only I muſt farther take notice of, the ground which he here had, on which he founds his exception againſt the ſolidity of my Diſcourſe, calling it my great evidence, that we that do not acknowledge the Church of Rome to be infallible, may be allowed to make certain ſuppoſitions that follow there.

42. The matter in that place Chap. II. Sect. 12. lies thus. In examining the nature of Schiſm, I have occaſion to mention one (not real, but) fiction of Caſe; Suppoſe firſt, that our Anceſtors had criminouſly ſeparated from the Church of Rome; and ſuppoſe, ſecondly, that we their Poſterity repented, and deſired to reform their ſin, and to be reunited to them; yet ſuppoſing, thirdly, that they ſhould require to our reunion, any condition which were unlawful for us to perform, in this conjuncture, I ſay, we could not juſtly be charged for continuing that ſeparation.

This

This fiction of Case, I could not think had any weak part in it; for as it supposed that on one side, which I knew a Romanist would not grant, viz. that they should require any condition unlawful for us to perform, so it supposed on the other side, that which we can no way grant, viz. that our Ancestors criminously separated; But this I knew was ordinary to be done in fictions of Cases; Suppositio non ponit, is the acknowledged Rule, my supposing either of these, was not the taking them for granted; And yet after all this, I foresaw that Objection, that the Romanist, who acknowledges not any such hard condition required to our reconciliation, will conceive this an impossible Case; And to this I answered, that we, that acknowledge not their Church to be infallibile, may be allowed to make a supposition (meaning as before, a fiction of Case) which is founded in the possibility of her inserting some errour in her confessions, and making the acknowledgment of it, the indispensable condition of her Communion. What I have offended herein, I cannot imagine; for 1. I only set a fiction of Case, do not take their infallibility for a thing confestly false, nor in that place so much as dispute against it. Only I say that which was sufficiently known before I said it, that their Infallibility is not acknowledged by us, and so that her inserting some errour in her Confessions, is to us, i. e. in our opinion, a thing possible, and so for disputation sake supposable, in the same manner as I suppose that which I am known not to believe; and if this Gentleman be thus severe, I shall despair to approve my Discourses to him. 43.

Secondly, That I make it my great evidence, is not with any appearance of reason suggested by him; it comes in merely as an incidental, last branch, the least necessary, most unconsiderable of any, and that which might have been spared then, or left out now, without any weakning of, or disturbing the Discourse. 44.

Thirdly, Whereas he adds, that I proceed to make certain suppositions that follow there, this is still of the same strain; I make but one supposition, viz. in case She make any unlawful act the indispensable condition of her Communion, And that one, certainly, is not in the plural, more, or indefinitely certain suppositions. 45.

That I put this one Case as possible, and then proceeded to consider, what were by the Principles acknowledged by all, particularly by Mr. Knot, to be done in that one Case, was agreeable to the strictest Laws of Discourse which I have met with. And if in compliance with this Gentleman, I must deny my self such liberties, and yet yield him so much greater, on the other side; If I must at the beginning of a defence of the Church of England, be required to grant the Church of Rome infallible, i. e. to yield not only that She speaks all truth, but also that it is impossible She should speak any thing but truth, whom yet, by entring on this Theme I undertake to contradict, and to prove injurious in censuring us for Schismaticks; this were, as I have said, an hard task indeed; The very same as if I were required to begin a Duel by presenting and delivering up all weapons into the enemies hand, to plead a Cause, and introduce my defence by confessing my self guilty of all that the Plaintiff doth, or can have the confidence to charge upon me. 46.

And if these be the conditions of a Dispute, these will questionless be hard, whatsoever the conditions of our reunion be conceived to be; and moreover, this Gentleman will be as infallible as his Church, and then 'tis pity he should lavish out medicines, that is so secured by charms, that he should defend his Cause by reasons, which hath this one so much cheaper expedient, to answer a whole Book in one Period. 47.

And so much for his Animadversions on this second Chapter, which are no excellent presage of that which we are to expect in the ensuing. 48.

CHAP. III.

Exceptions to the third Chapter answered.

SECT. I.

The Division of Schism justified. Of Schism against the authority of Councils. Of unanimity of belief in the dispersion of the Churches.

THE Exceptions against the third Chapter are reducible to four Heads: The first about the insufficiency of the division of Schism, in these words, Numb. 1.

In his third Chapter, what is chiefly to be noted to our purpose, is, that his division is insufficient, for he maketh Schism to be only against Monarchical power, or against fraternal charity, which is very much besides the Principles of those Protestants, who pretend so much to the authority of Councils; methinks he should have remembred there might be Schism against conciliatory authority, whether this be called so when the Council actually sitteth, or in the unanimity of belief in the dispersion of the Churches; so that the Doctor (supposing he concluded against the Pope) hath not concluded himself no Schismatick, being separated from the Catholick World. 2.

And again in the next Page, by way of recollection or second thoughts, thus,

But I must not forget here what I omitted to insert before, that in his division of Schism he omitteth the Principal, if not indeed, and in the use of the word by the Antients, the only Schism, which is, when one breaketh from the whole Church of God; for though a breach made from the immediate superior, or a particular Church, may in some sort, and in our ordinary manner of speaking be called a Schism, yet that by which one breaketh away from the communion of the whole Church, is properly, and in a higher sense called Schism, and is that out of which the present Question proceedeth, whereas other divisions, as long as both parts remain in communion with the Universal Church, are not properly Schisms, but with a diminutive particle, so that in this division he left out that part which appertained to the Question.

3. My diviſion of Schiſm is that which I could not conceive ſubject to the exceptions of any rational man, of what perſwaſions ſoever; Schiſm being a breach of unity and communion; as many ſorts as were conceivable of unity and communion, ſo many, and no more, I ſet down of Schiſm, ſome as breaches of the ſubordination which Chriſt ſetled in his Church, others of mutual charity, which he left among his Diſciples.

4. For is it not evident, that all men in the World are either our Superiors, or Inferiors, or our Equals? and can I break communion with any, as long as being an Inferior, I live regularly under all my Superiors, and brotherly with all my Equals? There is certainly no place of doubt in this. When therefore in his ſecond period here ſet down, he mentions it, as the principal, (and in the Antients uſe of the word) the only Schiſm, when one breaketh from the whole Church of God, It is ſtrange he ſhould think that man was not comprized in either member of my diviſion, when certainly he is guilty of both. For how can he ſeparate from the whole Church, unleſs he ſeparate both from his Superiors and his Equals too? And if he ſeparate from both, then queſtionleſs he ſeparates from one, and from more than one of them.

5. Was it poſſible for any care more ſolicitouſly to have prevented this exception, than that which by me was uſed, when among the branches of equality, with which every one is obliged to preſerve unity and communion, I reckoned up, not only the Believers of the ſame Congregation, &c. but the ſeveral Communities of Chriſtian men from Pariſhes and Dioceſes, to Climes of the whole Chriſtian World, Chap. 3. §. 5. And indeed it is a great piece of auſterity, that when I have endeavoured to prove that we of the Church of England have not voluntarily ſeparated (and that only is the crime of Schiſm) from any one particular Church, and no one of thoſe proofs is invalidated, nor as yet ſo much as excepted againſt; it ſhould yet be thought ſeaſonable to reply, that we have broken off from the whole Church of God.

6. Is not that whole made up of theſe ſeverals, as a Body of Limbs, the Univerſal of Particulars? And can the hand be broken off from the whole Body, when it is not broken off, but remains in perfect union with every part of the Body? If the arm be broken from the Body, the hand, which remains united to the arm, may yet be ſeparate from the whole Body, becauſe by being faſtned to the arm 'tis united but to one, and not to all the Members of the Body. But an union to all the Members of the Body ſuppoſes a ſeparation from no one part that remains in the Body, and ſure that muſt be an union with the whole Body, which is nothing elſe, but all the Members together.

7. And ſo as his ſecond thoughts were effects, not remedies of his forgetfulneſs, the very ſame, which he had mentioned before under the Style of ſeparation from the Catholick World, ſo certainly they were again effects of his inobſervance, that his principal ſort of Schiſm, ſeparation from the whole Church, was comprehended by me under this Style, ſeparation from the ſeveral communities of the whole Chriſtian World.

8. As to the former branch of his exception, that in my diviſion of Schiſm, into that which is againſt Monarchical (I ſaid, and when he recites my words, he ſhould do ſo too, paternal) power, and that which is againſt fraternal charity, I omit to mention the authority of Councils, It is evidently a cauſeleſs ſuggeſtion. For 1. if Councils, as he ſaith, have any authority, that will certainly be reducible to paternal power. And if they have none, any farther than by way of counſel and advice, that will directly fall under the Head of fraternal charity.

9. Secondly, If by Councils he mean Provincial Councils, it is evident that the power which ſeverally belongs to the Biſhops of each Province, is united in that of a Provincial Council, where all the Dioceſan Biſhops are aſſembled, and the deſpiſing of that, is an offence under the firſt ſort of Schiſm, a breach of the ſubordination to the Biſhop, yea, and the Metropolitan too, who preſides in the Provincial Council.

10. So again, if he mean National Councils, the power of the Biſhops of all the Provinces there aſſembled, devolves upon this Aſſembly, compounded of all of them, the deſpiſing thereof is the deſpiſing of theſe Eccleſiaſtical Superiors of the whole Nation, and culpable, and ſchiſmatical upon that account.

11. As for Oecumenical or General Councils, if they be truly ſuch, the power of all the Biſhops of all the Provinces in all Chriſtian Nations devolves upon that, and ſo cannot be deſpiſed without deſpiſing of all Ranks of our Eccleſiaſtical Superiors, Biſhops, Metropolitans, Primates or Patriarchs; and therefore this ſort of Schiſm could not be deemed to be omitted, where all thoſe other branches, of which it is made up, were ſo particularly handled.

12. That any more ſpecial conſideration was not taken of General Councils in that Diſcourſe, the account (beſide that which is now given) is more than intimated in that Tract of Schiſm, pag. 60. firſt becauſe they were remedies of Schiſm, and extraordinary, not any ſtanding Judicatures, to which our conſtant ſubordination and ſubjection was required. 2. Becauſe theſe were ſuch, as without which the Church continued for the firſt three hundred years, and ſo could not belong to a general Diſcourſe, which ſpake of all the certain and ordinary and conſtant ſorts of Schiſm, and ſuch as all times were capable of, and enlarged not to thoſe other of accidental emergencies. 3. Becauſe they are now morally impoſſible to be had, the Chriſtian World being under ſo many Empires, and divided into ſo many Communions, that it is not viſible to the eye of man how they ſhould be regularly aſſembled.

13. As for thoſe that are already paſt, and are on due grounds to be acknowledged truly Oecumenical, the communion, which is poſſible to be had or broken with them, is that of compliance with, or receſſion from their definitions, and our innocence in that reſpect is avowed, p. 160. as the congregating of the like (when poſſible, and probable toward the end) is recommended, p. 158. as a ſupply, when there ſhould be need of extraordinary remedies.

14. Laſtly, If none of this had been done, or if this had not been undertaken ſo ſolemnly and formally, as ſome other ſuppoſed branches of Schiſm were, in that Tract, yet the account of that is viſible to any, becauſe the principal ſort of Schiſm charged by the Romaniſt on the Church of England, is that of caſting out the Biſhop of Rome, not contemning the authority of Councils, and therefore I was in reaſon to apply my Diſcourſe moſt largely and particularly to that Head, to which their Objections, not my own choice directed me. So evidently contrary to the notoriety of the fact, is this complaint of this Gentleman, that my diviſion of Schiſm was inſufficient, and that I took no notice of this (as he pleaſes to call it) conciliatory authority.

not

That to make his ſuggeſtion ſeem more probable, he adviſedly choſe to change the terms of my diviſion from that which was againſt Paternal, to that which is againſt Monarchical Power, upon this apprehenſion, that Paternal power would viſibly include that of the Fathers in Council aſſembled, as well as in ſeveral; but Monarchical power could not ſo fitly bear it, I ſhall not enter into his ſecrets to divine. This I am ſure of, that the unanimity of belief in the diſperſion of the Churches, cannot with any propriety (as by him it is) be defined a branch of Conciliatory authority; for certainly the Churches diſperſed are not met together the διασπορὰ or diſperſion of the Jews differed much from the Council aſſembled at Jeruſalem, and the Chriſtian Church at this day is without Queſtion no Oecumenical Council. 15.

And then what authority ſcattered Members can have, which never legally command, or exerciſe authority, but when they are in conjunction, I ſhall not here make ſtay to demonſtrate: whatſoever there is of this nature will moſt properly be comprized under the Head of Communion or unity fraternal, and the Schiſm which is a tranſgreſſion of that, being at large handled alſo, Chap. 8, 9, 10. there was no inſufficiency, in any juſtice, to be charged on this diviſion. 16.

SECT. II.

Of the extent of the Roman Province. The Biſhops of Italy diſtinct from thoſe that belong to Rome. The Eccleſiaſtical diſtributions agreeable with the Civil. Ruffinus vindicated.

THE ſecond charge on this Chapter is about the extent of the Roman Patriarchy, in theſe words: Numb. 1.

In this Chapter he telleth us many things, ſome true, ſome not ſo, but all either common to us both, or not appertaining to the Controverſie, until he concludes, that certainly the Roman Patriarchy did not extend it ſelf to all Italy, and this he does out of a word in Ruffinus, which he ſuppoſeth to be taken in a ſpecial propriety of Law, whereas indeed that Author's knowledge in Grammar was not ſuch as ſhould neceſſarily exact any ſuch belief, eſpecially learned men ſaying the contrary. 2.

The place, to which this exception belongs, is not ſet down by this Gentleman, but by annexing the teſtimony out of Ruffinus, I diſcern it to be that of pag. 52. where ſpeaking of the Picenum ſuburbicarium and Annonarium, I ſay the former belonged to the Præfecture of Rome; the latter, with the ſeven Provinces in the broader part of Italy, belonged to the Dioceſe (as it was antiently called) of Italy, of which Milan was the Metropolis. 3.

This being the affirmation which he excepteth againſt, I did not, nor yet do make any queſtion of vindicating, and defending it againſt any objection. 4.

That learned men ſay the contrary, is here ſuggeſted, in the cloſe, but as there is not one learned man named, nor teſtimony produced (which therefore amounts no higher than the bare opinion or affirmation of this one Gentleman, without any one reaſon or authority to ſupport it) ſo when any ſuch learned mens names and teſtimonies ſhall be produced, it will be eaſie to ſhew, that there is very little of their learning expreſt in ſo ſaying. 5.

On the other ſide I had (pag. 50. in the margent) referred to ſome teſtimonies whereon my Aſſertion was founded, viz. thoſe which manifeſtly diſtinguiſht the Province of the Biſhop of Rome, from the Province of Italy, which could not have had truth in them, if the Province of the Patriarch of Rome extended to all Italy. 6.

Such was that of * Euſebius diſtinctly mentioning the Biſhops of the Cities of Italy, and the Biſhops that belong to the City of the Romans. The teſtimony out of the Edict of the Emperour Aurelian, in the Controverſie betwixt Paulus Samoſatenus and Domnus, where it is decreed, that the houſe, about which they contended, ſhould be delivered οἷς ἂν οἱ κατὰ τὴν Ἰταλίαν καὶ τὸ Ῥωμαίων πόλιν ἐπίσκοποι * ᾧ δόγματι ἐπιτάλοιεν, to thoſe to whom the Biſhops through Italy and the City of the Romans ſhould decree it. 7. * l. 7. c. 30. * γρ. διὰ

The like was that of the Council of Sardice ſet down in * Athanaſius in the title of their Epiſtle to the Alexandrians, Thus, Ἡ ἁγία Σύνοδος ἡ κατὰ θεὸν χάριν ἐν Σαρδικῇ συναχθεῖσα ὑπὸ Ῥωμῆς καὶ Σπανίων Γαλλίων, Ἰταλίας, &c. The holy Synod by God's grace aſſembled at Sardice, from Rome, and Spain, France, Italy, &c. 8. * Apol. 2. ad Imp. Conſt. Edit. Par. Tom. 1. p. 756.

So in * Athanaſius's declaration of his own affairs, and the (συμφωνία) agreement of many Biſhops with him, he ſpecifies, who and how many they were, πλείους δὲ ἦσαν ὑ. ἀπὸ τῆς μεγάλης Ῥώμης, καὶ τῆς Ἰταλίας πάσης, Καλαβρείας τε, &c. There were more than four hundred both from great Rome, and from all Italy, and from Calabria, &c. Where the Biſhops of the Roman Province are diſtinguiſht from the Biſhops of Italy, as thoſe again from the Biſhops of Calabria, &c. 9. * Ἐπιστ. τοῖς μονήρη βίον ἀσκοῦσι. Pariſ. Edit. Tom. 1. p. 827. C.

So among the names prefixt to the * firſt Council of Arles, we have ex Provincia Italiæ, Civitate Mediolanenſi, &c. ex Urbe Româ, quos Sylveſter Epiſcopus miſit ex Provincia Romana, Civitate Portuenſi, &c. of the Province of Italy, from the City of Milan, &c. from the City of Rome thoſe whom Biſhop Sylveſter ſent, of the Province of Rome, from the City of Porta, &c. ſuch and ſuch were aſſembled at that Council, where again the matter is clear as to the diſtinction of thoſe Provinces of Rome and Italy, the former under the preſidency of the Biſhop of Rome, the later of the Biſhop of Milan. 10. * Concil. Tom. 1. p. 266.

By this it might have appeared to this Gentleman (if as he pleaſed to mention the much Greek, in his Preface, ſo he had been at leiſure to conſider the importance of it) that beſide the teſtimony (which he will call a word) of Ruffinus, I had made uſe of other ways of proof, that the preſidency of the Biſhop of Rome (I ſuppoſe that he muſt mean by the Roman Patriarchy) did not extend it ſelf to all Italy. 11.

12. Again, after the teſtimony of Ruffinus, I mentioned another evidence, from the proportioning Eccleſiaſtical juriſdictions to the Temporal of the Lieutenants; This may appear in theſe, by the words of
* Cont. Celſ. l. 3. * Origen, of which I ſhall now, becauſe I did not there, take notice, ὅτω ἡ κὴ ἀρχοντα ἐκκλησίας ἑκάστης πόλεως ἄρχοντι πρὸ ἐν τῇ πόλει συγκείσθαι, It is fit that the Prefect of the Church of each City, ſhould correſpond to the Governour of thoſe which are in the City. And that ſo it was, appears by the ſecond Canon of the Council of Conſtantinople, where the juriſdictions of the Biſhops are ſtill proportioned to the condition of the Cities where they were, the Biſhop of Alexandria to have power over all Ægypt, the Metropolis whereof was Alexandria, and ſo in the reſt. And this is in the Tract of Schiſm largely deduced and cleared alſo, p. 54, 55, &c. and need not be here again repeated. And ſo here was more again than the word of Ruffinus, for what I ſaid.

13. Laſtly, That for which Ruffinus was cited, being but this, that the Biſhop of Rome was authorized by the Nicene Canon to take care of the ſuburbicarian Regions, I could not ſure be miſtaken in thinking, that he took the word ſuburbicarian in ſuch a propriety (I ſay not of Law, but) of common language, as will conclude the Picenum ſuburbicarium to belong to the Roman Prefecture, as the Annonarium did to the Dioceſe of Italy.

14. And certainly Ruffinus, that lived ſo near the Council of Nice, and that in Italy, a Preſbyter of Aquileia, (and of whom * Palladius affirms ὃ γνωσιώτερον ἢ ἐπικίνδυνον ἐν ἀνδρᾶσιν ἐκ ἠνείσκετο) knew how
* Hiſt. Lauſ. c. 118. that was diſtributed in his time, better than this Gentleman at this diſtance can pretend to do; may alſo be allowed to know ſo much of Grammar, as to expreſs his own ſenſe (in a Paraphraſe) of that Nicene Canon.

15. In a matter ſo clear I ſhall add no more, but the words of a moſt excellent perſon, Jac. Leſchaſſerius in his Conſultatio ad Clariſ. Venet. Ruffino Bellum indicunt Scriptores Romani hujus temporis, &c. The Romaniſts of this time are diſpleaſed with Ruffinus, not knowing what Churches they were, which the Nicene Canon underſtands to be under the firſt and ordinary power of the Pope. Whereas Ruffinus underſtood it of the Churches of the ſuburbicarian Provinces and Regions, which are four, the firſt the Roman, with the bounds of the Prefecture of the City, and three other with which that is incompaſt, All Campania, Picenum ſuburbicarium, and Tuſcia ſuburbicaria, of which there is frequent mention in the Notitiæ of the Roman Empire. And of this the ſame Authour hath written a learned Tract; And ſo here is a diſtinct teſtimony of a very learned man, and this is a ſufficient Anſwer to his bare indefinite affirmation that learned men ſay the contrary.

SECT. III.

The Identity of the Office of Primates and Patriarchs, the authorities of Gratian, and Anacletus, and Anicetus.

Numb. 1. THE third charge wherein this third Chapter is concerned, remains about the identity of the Office of Primates, and Patriarchs, in theſe words:

2. Then he telleth you, that the Office of Primates and Patriarchs was the ſame, only authorizing that affirmation from an Epiſtle of Anacletus, the which, as ſoon as occaſion ſerveth, he will tell you is of no authority, but fictitious.
He urgeth Gratian too.

3. What I ſaid of Primates and Patriarchs, that though the Patriarchs had the precedence in Councils, the deference in reſpect of place, yet the power and juriſdiction of Primates was as great as of Patriarchs, and the Office the ſame, I thought had ſufficiently been evidenced to the Romaniſt, p. 58. For as one manifeſt indication of it was there mentioned, viz. that in Authors the very titles are confounded, witneſs Juſtinian who commonly gives Primates the name of Patriarchs of the Dioceſes, ſo the reference to thoſe two authorities ſo acknowledged and owned by the Romaniſts, the Epiſtle of Anacletus, and the Decree of Gratian, ſeemed to me to put it out of all queſtion.

4. For in the Body of their Canon Law corrected and ſet out by Pope Gregory XIII. as Gratian's Decree makes up the firſt and principal part, ſo in that par. 1. diſt in. 99. we have theſe words, De Primatibus autem quæritur quem gradum in Eccleſia tenuerint, an in aliquo à Patriarchis differant, The Queſtion is made concerning Primates, what degree they have in the Church, and whether in any thing they differ from Patriarchs. And the Anſwer is, Primates & Patriarchæ diverſorum ſunt nominum, ſed ejuſdem officii, Primates and Patriarchs are of different names, but of the ſame office.

5. What could have been ſaid more punctually and expreſly to the buſineſs in hand? What more authentick and dilucid teſtimony could have been produced to any Romaniſt, with whom I had to do? And 'tis a little ſtrange, that this Gentleman ſhould ſay, that I only authorize my affirmation from an Epiſtle of Anacletus, and then either he, or ſome Superviſor for him put as in a marginal Note, He urgeth Gratian too; When 1. If I urged Gratian, I did not urge Anacletus only; and 2. it is evident I did urge Gratian as punctually as Anacletus; and 3. Gratian's words are ſo expreſs as nothing can be more; and 4. Gratian's authority with them is as great as any could have been produced; and 5. there is not one word offered to avoid the force of Gratian's teſtimony, as to that other of Anacletus there is, which argues that this Gentleman was concluded by Gratian, yet would not conſent to the Propoſition unanſwerably inferred from him. And this may ſuffice to be noted concerning that teſtimony.

6. Then for Anacletus, 1. his words are theſe, Provinciarum diviſio ab Apoſtolis eſt renovata, The diviſion of Provinces was renewed by the Apoſtles, Et in capite Provinciarum — Patriarchas vel Primates, qui unam formam tenent, licèt diverſa ſint nomina, Leges Divinæ & Eccleſiaſticæ poni & eſſe juſſerunt, ad quos Epiſcopi, ſi neceſſe fuerit, confugerent, eoſque appellarent, And in the Head of the Province — Patriarchs, or Primates, who hold the ſame form (are of the ſame nature) though they be divers names, are placed by Divine and Eccleſiaſtical Laws, ſo that to them the Biſhops, when 'tis needful, may reſort and make their appeals. This teſtimony again is as punctual to the purpoſe as could have been deviſed.

And

And then secondly, this being by the Romanists received as a Decretal Epistle of that Pope and antient Bishop of Rome, was in reason, whatsoever it were to us, to stand with the Romanist in full authority. 7.

Thirdly, This being in perfect concord with the Decree of Gratian, is in the aforesaid Body of their Canon Law approved, and set out by Pope Gregory XIII. annext to that Decree of Gratian, Distinct. 99. c. 1. 8.

And fourthly, whereas this Gentleman saith, that as soon as occasion serves, I will tell you this Epistle of Anacletus is of no authority, I must say, 1. that I have no where, that I remember, ever said so. 2. That this Gentleman cannot without divining tell me now, what I shall do hereafter. 3. That occasion not yet requiring it of me, but Anacletus affirming what I affirm, I have no temptation to do so, and so as yet he can have no pretence to make use of this subterfuge. 4. That there are things called argumenta ad homines, arguments that may bind him who acknowledges the authority, from which they are drawn, though they conclude not him that allows not those authorities; and such is this of Anacletus's Epistle, to a Romanist. 9.

And by the same Logick that he can inferr that Anacletus's authority was unduely produced by me, who (as he but thinks) will not stand to Anacletus's authority, I may sure conclude that Anacletus's authority was duely produced by me, because against him, who, I have reason to presume, must stand to Anacletus's authority. 10.

A third testimony of the same nature, I shall now add, which must again have force with a Romanist, that of Anicetus ad Episcopos Galliæ, which follows there in the * Corpus Juris Canonici. Primarum Civitatum Episcopos Apostoli & Successores Apostolorum regulariter Patriarchas & Primates esse constituerunt. The Apostles and their Successors regularly appointed that the Bishops of the Prime Cities should be Primates and Patriarchs. And till somewhat be produced to the contrary, as 'tis sure here is nothing offered by this Gentleman, this may at the present suffice in this place. 11.

* Decret. Grat. par. 1. dist. 92. c. 2.

SECT. IV.

The Supreme Ecclesiastical power of Patriarchs. The power of convoking Councils, a Prerogative of Supremacy. That the Bishop of Rome is not over Patriarchs. Proofs from the Councils, and Canons Apostolick; and the Corpus Juris, and Pope Gregory*'s arguing.*

THE last exception concerns the supreme Power of Patriarchs, or the no superiority of any Ecclesiastical Power over them, Thus; Numb. 1.

Then he saith, there was no power over the Patriarchs; his proof is, because the Emperour used his secular authority in gathering of Councils, concluding, that because the Pope did not gather General Councils, therefore he had no authority over the Universal Church; which how unconsequent that is, I leave to your judgment. 2.

That there was no supreme power in the Bishop of Rome, nor in any other above that of Primates and Patriarchs, but only that of the Emperour in the whole Christian World, as of every Sovereign Prince in his Dominions, I thought sufficiently proved by this, that the power of convoking Councils did not belong to the Bishop of Rome, but to the Prince in every Nation, and the Emperour in the whole World. And I deemed this a sufficient proof, not because there are no other Branches of a supreme Authority imaginable, or which are claimed by the Bishop of Rome, save only this; but 1. because this of convoking Councils is certainly one such Prerogative of the supreme power, inseparable from it, and he that hath not that, hath not the supreme power (as in any Nation some Prerogatives there are which always are annext to the Imperial Majesty, and wherever any one of them truly is, there is the supreme power, and 'tis treason for any but the supreme, to assume any one of them, and one of that number is calling of national Assemblies) And secondly, because the Bishop of Rome doth as avowedly challenge this power of convoking General Councils, as any other I could have named or insisted on. And truly that was the only reason why I specified in this, because this of all others is most eminent in it self, most characteristical of the supreme power, and most challenged by the Bishop of Rome, and most due to him, in case he be the Universal Pastor. 3.

And then where there be several Branches of a power, all resident in the same Subject inseparably; from the absence of one, to collect the absence of all, I must still think, a solid way of probation, and cannot discern the infirm part, or inconsequence of it. If I could, it would be no difficult matter to repair it, and supply the imperfectneß of the proof, by what is put together in the Corpus Juris Canonici (even now cited) Decret. par. 1. dist. 99. c. 3, 4, 5. 4.

The thing that I had to prove, was, that there was not antiently any summum genus, any supreme either of, or over Patriarchs, beside the Prince or Emperour. To this, as far as concerns the negative part, that the Bishop of Rome is not this summum genus, I now cite from that third Chapter. Primæ sedis Episcopus non appelletur Princeps Sacerdotum, vel summus Sacerdos, The Bishop of the first Seat ought not to be called Prince of the Priests, or supreme Priest. And this testified out of the African Council, Can. 6. where the very words are recited with this addition of [aut aliquid hujusmodi] he is not to be called by any other title of the same kind, sed tantum primæ Sedis Episcopus, but only Bishop of the first See; and there were three such at that time, (those named in the Nicene Canon) Alexandria, Rome, Antioch, as is sufficiently known. 5.

And that he may see, the practice of the Church was perfectly concordant with that definition, I refer this Gentleman to the Milevitan Council, cap. 22. where speaking of appeals from their Bishops, the Rule is, non provocent nisi ad Africana concilia, vel ad Primates Provinciarum suarum, They must appeal to none but the African Councils or the Primates of their own Provinces. Ad transmarina autem qui putaverint appellandum, à nullo intra Africam in communionem recipiantur. But if any shall think fit to appeal to any transmarine (foreign) judicature, they are not to be admitted to communion by any within Africa. 6.

And

7. And indeed the same had been before defined by the first Nicene Council, c. 5. where the Sentence pronounced against any by the Bishops in each Province, was to stand good according to the Canon (I suppose the 12. Apostolick) which pronounces τὰς ὑφ' ἑτέρων ἀποβληθείσας, ὑφ' ἑτέρων μὴ προσίεσθαι, that they which are excommunicated by some, shall not be received by others. And accordingly in the Synodical Epistle of the African Council to Pope Celestine, which is in the Book of Canons of the Roman Church, and in the Greek collection of the Canons of the African Church, we find these words, ἱκετεύομεν, ἵνα τοὺς λοιπὸν παρ' ὑμῶν τοὺς ἐνθένδε παραγινομένους εὐχερῶς μὴ προσδέχησθε, μηδὲ τοὺς παρ' ἡμῶν ἀποκοινωνήτους εἰς κοινωνίαν τοῦ λοιποῦ δεδήσασθε δέξασθαι, ἐπειδὴ τοῦτο καὶ τῇ ἐν Νικαίᾳ Συνόδῳ δεδοκται εὐχερῶς εὑρεῖν ἢ σὺν εὐσεβασμιότητι, We entreat you (the style of one Church to another) that for the future you will not easily admit those who have come to you from hence, and that you will not receive to your communion those who are excommunicated by us, seeing the Council of Nice hath thus defined, as you may easily discern.

8. By all which put together, by the African out of the Nicene, and by the Nicene out of the Apostolick Canon, it is evident that the Bishop of Rome hath not power to absolve any person excommunicate by any Bishop of another Province, and that 'tis unlawful for any such to make appeal to him; which certainly will conclude against every the most inferior Branch of his pretended authority over the Universal Church.

9. If this be not enough, then add the 34 Apostolick Canon, τοὺς ἐπισκόπους ἑκάστου ἔθνους εἰδέναι χρὴ τὸν ἐν αὐτοῖς πρῶτον καὶ ἡγεῖσθαι αὐτὸν ὡς κεφαλὴν. The Bishops of every Nation must know him that is the first among them, i. e. their Primate, and account him as their Head. Which sure infers that the Bishop of Rome is not the one only Head of all Bishops. The same is afterward transcribed by the Ninth Canon of Antioch.

10. But to return to their Corpus Juris; so again Decret. par. 1. dist. 99. c. 4. Nec etiam Romanus Pontifex universalis est appellandus. The Pope of Rome is not to be called Universal Bishop, citing the Epistle of Pope Pelagius II. Nullus Patriarcharum Universalitatis vocabulo unquam utatur, quia si unus Patriarcha universalis dicatur, Patriarcharum nomen cæteris derogatur. No Patriarch must ever use the Title of Universal, for if one be called universal Patriarch, the name of Patriarch is taken from all the rest. And more to the same purpose; the very thing that I was here to prove.

11. So again Ch. 5. out of the Epistle of Pope Gregory to Eulogius Patriarch of Alexandria, where refusing the title of Universalis Papa, Universal Pope, or Father, or Patriarch, and calling it superbæ appellationis verbum, a proud title, he adds, si enim Universalem me Papam vestra Sanctitas dicit, negat se hoc esse, quod me fatetur Universum, If the Patriarch of Alexandria call the Pope Universal Father, he doth thereby deny himself to be that which he affirms the Pope to be universally; The meaning is clear, If the Pope be universal Patriarch, then is he Patriarch of Ægypt, for sure that is a part of the Universe; and then, as there cannot be two Supremes, so the Bishop of Alexandria cannot be Patriarch of Ægypt, which yet from St. Mark's time was generally resolved to belong to him, and the words of the Nicene Canon are expres to it, that according to the ἀρχαῖα ἔθη, original, Primitive customs, the Bishop of Alexandria should have power over all Ægypt, Libya, and Pentapolis, adding ἐπειδὴ καὶ τὰ ἐν τῇ Ῥωμῇ ἐπισκόπῳ τοῦτο συνηθὲς ἐστιν, &c. seeing this is also customary with the Bishop of Rome, of Antioch, &c. τὰ πρεσβεῖα σώζεσθαι ἐκκλησίαις, that the priviledges should be preserved to the Churches.

12. All which arguing of that Pope, yea, and that great Council, were perfectly unconcluding (inconsequent, as mine was said to be) if the Bishop of Rome, or any other, had power over Patriarchs, or authority over the universal Church, which here this Gentleman is pleased to affirm, and so sure must think Gregory more than fallible, when he thus protested, and disputed the contrary.

13. How much higher than this the same Gregory ascended in expressing his detestation of that title, is sufficiently known from his Epistle to Mauritius the Emperour, In regist. l. 4. Ep. 3. I shall not here trouble him with the recitation of it.

14. What is after these passages set down in their Body of the Law, shews indeed that the Popes continued not always of this mind; Neither was I of opinion that they did, the Story being known to all, how Boniface III. with much ado obtained of Phocas the Emperour an Edict for the Primacy and Universal Jurisdiction of the Church of Rome (see Paul. Diac. de Gestis Romanorum, l. 18.) which yet is an Argument that till then it had no foundation.

15. Whether there were antiently any such, higher than Patriarchs, and whether now there ought to be, was the Question before me; and both those I must think concluded by what I have here set down, as far as relates to any true, i. e. original right, from any appointment of Christ, or title of succession to St. Peter.

16. Much more might be easily added to this Head, if it were not evident that this is much more than was necessary to be replied to a bare suggestion, without any specifying what that power is, which may belong to the Pope over the Universal Church, though convoking of Councils did not belong to him, and without any offer of proof, that any such did really belong to him.

CHAP.

CHAP. IV.

An Answer to the Exceptions made to the fourth Chapter.

SECT. I.

The Romanists pretensions founded in St. Peter's Universal Pastorship. Of Possession without debating of Right. What power the Pope was possest of here.

IN the fourth Chapter, his Objections begin to grow to some height; they are reducible to three Heads, the first is by way of Preface, a charge of a very considerable default in the whole Discourse, that I remember not what matters I handle; the other two are refutations of the two evidences I use, to disprove the Popes claim of universal Primacy from Christ's donation to S. Peter. Numb. 1.

The first of the three is set down in these words:

In the fourth Chapter he pretendeth to examine whether by Christ his donation S. Peter had a Primacy over the Church, where not to reflect upon his curious division, I cannot omit that he remembers not what matters he handles, when he thinketh the Catholick ought to prove that his Church or Pope hath an universal Primacy; for it being granted that in England, the Pope was in quiet possession of such a Primacy, the proof that it was just belongeth not to us, more than to any King, who received his Kingdom from his Ancestors, time out of mind, to prove his pretension to the Crown just: for quiet possession, of it self, is a proof, until the contrary be convinced, as who should rebel against such a King, were a Rebel, until he shewed sufficient cause for quitting obedience; with this difference, that obedience to a King may by prescription or bargain be made unnecessary, but if Christ hath commanded obedience to his Church, no length of years, nor change of humane affairs can ever quit us from this duty of obedience, so that the charge of proving the Pope to have no such authority from Christ, lieth upon the Protestants now as freshly, as the first day of the breach, and will do so until the very last. 2.

My method in the beginning of Chap. 4. is visibly this; The Church of England being by the Romanist charged of Schism in departing from the obedience of the Bishop of Rome, and this upon pretence that he, as Successor of S. Peter, hath a supremacy over all the Churches in the World; I undertake to examine the truth of two Branches of this suggestion, one whether Saint Peter had this universal Supremacy given him by Christ; the second, whether this power, if supposed to be instated on Saint Peter, devolved on the Bishops of Rome. The former of these I examined in that Chapter. And I must now discern, if I can, how I have failed in any Particle of my undertaking. 3.

First, saith he, he will not reflect on my curious division. And I that know there was no curiosity in any division of mine, but on the other side, such perspicuity as was agreeable to a desire and endeavour to set down the whole matter of Debate between us as distinctly and intelligibly as I could, that the Reader might be sure to judge whether I answered their charge, or no, I have no reason in the least to suspect the fitness and usefulness of my Division, nor consequently to be impertinently solicitous in reflecting on it. 4.

That which he saith he cannot omit, I shall make haste to consider with him, viz. my great mistake, in thinking the Catholick ought to prove his Church or Pope hath an Universal Primacy. 5.

To this I answer, 1. that there is no manner of foundation or pretence for this exception here. For I no where say the least word towards this purpose of requiring the Romanist to prove his pretensions, or to prove them by this medium; Only I take it for granted, that he doth actually produce Arguments to infer the Pope's Universal Primacy, and that Christ's donation to S. Peter is one of those Arguments. And that I was not herein mistaken, I shall, instead of a larger deduction of evidences from all sorts of Romish Writers, make my appeal to the Objector himself, in several places of this little Tract, particularly p. 20. where he hath these words, We relie on the first, as the foundation, and corner-stone of the whole Building. And what that first is, appears by the words immediately precedent, that the pretensions for the Pope's supremacy in England, must be founded as Successour to S. Peter in the universal Pastorship of the Church, so including England as a Member thereof. From whence instead of recriminating and retorting on him the charge of the ill memory, I shall only make this undeniable Inference, that I was not mistaken in thinking that the Romanist doth actually found his pretensions in the universal Pastorship of Saint Peter; and consequently, If I prove that to fail, I have removed that which in his own Style is the foundation and corner-stone of his whole Building. 6.

But then 2. because he here pretends that it belongs not to a Romanist to prove his pretensions just, but that it sufficeth that he hath the possession, I desire to propose these three things to his consideration, 1. By demanding whether at this time, or for these hundred years, the Pope hath had the possession of the obedience of this Nation; I suppose he will say he hath not; And if so, then by the force of his own Argument, that possession, and all the Arguments deducible from thence, are now lost to him, the prescription being now on our side, as before on theirs, and there is nothing left him to plead, but the original right on his side, against the violence of the succeeding possession: And if he come to the pleading of the right, then that is the very method that I proposed, and so did not offend or forget my self in so doing. 7.

Secondly, Concerning their possession before Henry VIII. his days, I shall demand how long they had it, and how they acquired it; If he will not at all think fit to answer this Question in either part, then I confess he hath made an end of the Dispute, and by refusing to give account of the right he had to his possession, he will leave every man to catch and hold what he can, and then to imitate him, and give no account to any how he came by it; which as it is an unchristian method, every man being obliged to clear his actions from manifest charges of injustice and violence, so again 'tis an evil Lesson against himself, and unless we will confess our selves Schismaticks in casting off their obedience, 'tis impossible for him 8.

him ever to prove us such; this kind of Schism, which now we speak of, being by all acknowledged to be a separation from our lawful Superiors, and no way being imaginable to prove the Pope to be such to this Nation without offering some proof to the Point of right, as well as adhering to his possession.

9. To which purpose it is farther observable, 1. That even in secular things it is not every possession that gives a right, but 1. either the bonæ fidei possessio, a possession honestly come by, or the unjustness of whose original is not contested or made to appear. And 2. whatsoever privilege by humane Laws belongs to prescription, yet in Divine or Ecclesiastical matters prescription can be of no force against truth of right, and so this Gentleman seems to acknowledge here, extending the force of possession no farther than till sufficient cause be shewed to the contrary. 3. That though whilst I am in possession I need not be bound to prove my right, yet when I am out of possession, there is not, beside absolute force, any way possible to recover a possession, but this of contesting and evidencing the right of it; and that, 'tis evident, is the present Case.

10. But if he shall think fit to answer the Question in either part of it, then by the Answer to the first part of it, he must be forced to set down the original of it; and by Answer to the second, the right of that original (and so he hath been fain to do, as elsewhere, so in this very Paragraph, where he speaks of Christ's commanding obedience to his Church, I suppose he must mean the Church of Rome) and that is again the very method in which I proposed to debate, and consider this matter.

11. Thirdly, For the power, of which the Pope was possest in this Kingdom, either it was no more than an Ecclesiastical Primacy, such as by the antient Canons belongs to a Primate or Patriarch over Metropolitans and Bishops, or else it was a supreme power over the King himself, whether in Spiritual, or also in Temporal affairs.

12. If it pretend only to be the former of these, then the power of Kings to erect or translate Primacies or Patriarchates, which is insisted on and evidenced in the Tract of Schism, c. 6. § 9. was sufficient then to justifie what here was done, no possession being pleadable against the King, to restrain or exclude this exercise of his power, and so now to free us from Schism (by this Gentleman's Rule) this act of the Kings in translating the Primacy, being sufficient cause for quitting our obedience, supposing the Bishop of Rome formerly to have been our Primate.

13. But if the pretensions be higher, even for the Supremacy it self, either in whole, or in part, then 1. I may surely say, they were never bonæ fidei Possessores of that; And 2. that the King, who by being so, is supreme in his own Kingdom, and cannot admit of another supreme either in or out of it, hath all the advantages of possession, which are here spoken of by this Gentleman, and must not be divested of his right, nay must not, cannot (remaining a King) divest himself of it, nor might any without the guilt of rebellion quit his obedience to him.

14. Lastly, to remove all appearance of reason from this whole exception, 1. It is manifest that at the time of casting out the power of the Pope out of this Kingdom, there were (I must have leave to suppose, convincing) Reasons given for the doing of it, A Breviate of which the Reader may find in that one Treatise (mentioned in the Tract of Schism, p. 135.) De vera differentia Regiæ & Ecclesiasticæ potestatis, then composed and published by the Bishops, and since reprinted by Melchior Goldastus in Monarchia, tom. 3. p. 22. under the title of opus eximium, a very notable excellent Work. 2. That how meanly soever it hath been performed, yet this was one special design of the Tract of Schism (which this Gentleman saith will always lye upon Protestants) to prove the Pope to have no such authority from Christ, as the Romanist pretendeth him to have. And this I hope may suffice to be said to his σκιαμαχία, his prelusory skirmish against this fourth Chapter.

It had the same Title in the first Edition, 1534.

SECT. II.

The condition of S. Peter's Province. The Apostles distribution of their great Province, the World, into several Portions. Κληρὸς. Κληρὸς Ἀποστολῆς. Ὁ τόπος ὁ ἴδιος, Act. 1. the Interpretation thereof vindicated.

Numb. 1. I Proceed now to his refutations of the first evidence I make use of, to disprove the Pope's claim to universal Primacy from Christ's donation to S. Peter.

2. My evidence is taken from the condition of S. Peter's Province, as by Agreement betwixt him and his Fellow Apostle S. Paul, it was assigned him, Gal. 2. 7, 9. that he should be the Apostle of the Circumcision or Jews (which certainly was not the whole World) exclusively to the Gentile part, or the Uncircumcision, which was remitted to S. Paul both there and Rom. 11. 13. and this, as is * there specified, in every City where they met together. And because the universal extensive commission of Christ to all and every Apostle, giving them authority to go and preach to the whole World, might seem to be contrary to this special assignation, I took care to prevent this Objection, by premising that this Commission given by Christ indefinitely, and unlimitedly, and extending equally to the whole World, was restrained by some subsequent act or acts of the Apostles themselves, who distributed their universal Province into several Portions and assignations, called κληρὸς Ἀποστολῆς, Portions of Apostolacy, and the several Provinces where they were thus to labour, styled each of them ὁ τόπος ὁ ἴδιος, to each an assigned peculiar place, Act. 1. 25.

* Of Schism p. 74.

3. Now to this ground-work of my ensuing probation, he makes his first exception in these words:

Sect. 5. As for his Proofs, which he calls Evidences, he telleth us first that S. Peter was the Apostle of the circumcision exclusively to the uncircumcision or Gentiles; To prove this, he saith the Apostles distributed their Universal Province into several κληρὸς Ἀποστολῆς, that is, by his interpretation, lesser Provinces, and citeth Act. 1. 25. where S. Peter with the other Apostles prayeth God to shew which of the two proposed he was pleased to have promoted to the dignity of being an Apostle, this they call κληρὸν Ἀποστολῆς, and this rigorous Interpreter saith, it signifies the special Province S. Matthias was to have, though the Scripture it self expresseth the contrary, saying the effect was that afterwards he was counted amongst the Apostles; Could any man

man not blinded with errour make ſo wretched an interpretation? but he goes on preſently adding that S. Peter in the ſame place calleth theſe particular Provinces τόπον ἴδιον, and will you know what this τόπος ἴδιος or proper place is, read the Text, and you ſhall find that S. Peter ſpeaketh of Judas's going to Hell to receive his eternal damnation: Methinks you ſhould wonder I can go on without aſtoniſhment at ſuch blaſphemous explications, for ſure it can be no leſs ſo to abuſe the Word of God; and after this what do you expect?

Here are two great charges, the firſt introduced by ſtyling me a rigorous Interpreter, and proſecuted, 4.
by affirming me blinded with errour, my interpretation wretched, and contrary to what the Scripture expreſſeth. But the ſecond is of no leſs than blaſphemy, and abuſing the Word of God; and his Friend is to wonder that he is not aſtoniſhed, and after I have been guilty of ſuch crimes as theſe, 'tis in vain forſooth to expect any thing from me, the whole enſuing Diſcourſe is utterly defamed and blaſted, like * the * A.Gel.l.18.c.
good counſel in the Senate of Lacedæmon, by being delivered by ſo ill a man, ſo infamous a perſon, as 3.
a Blaſphemer is juſtly deemed by him.

But I am not to be diſquieted with this, or to prepare any Reply to the Rhetorical paſſionate part of 5.
it; if the interpretations ſhall be found agreeable to Scripture, the aſtoniſhment and the outcry will be ſoon at an end. And therefore that is the only care that I ſhall here aſſume on me.

And 1. I ſhall ſuppoſe it evident from the Story, and from the very end to which this commiſſionating 6.
ſo great a number of twelve Apoſtles was deſigned, that all the Apoſtles were not to go together, in conſort, to preach unto all the World; It would have been long e're the Faith would have been propagated to all the World, if this ſlower method had been taken.

To this it is conſequent, that our Saviour having left the World in common before them, the di- 7.
ſtribution of that one wider into ſeveral leſſer Provinces muſt be an act of the Apoſtles themſelves; as when God had given the Land of Canaan to the twelve Tribes of Iſrael, Eleazer, and Joſhuah, and the Heads of the Fathers of the Tribes, diſtribute to every Tribe their κλῆρος or portion (which becauſe it was to continue to their Poſterity, we ordinarily ſtyle their inheritance) Joſ. 14. 1.

And as there is no doubt of the truth of this fact, ſo if this one thing be granted me, there is no 8.
more incumbent on me to prove in this matter; and though neither of thoſe Phraſes, Act. 1. 25.
ſhould be for my turn, yet my concluſion remains good to me, as far as it pretendeth to be deducible from thoſe Phraſes, viz. that the Apoſtles diſtributed their great Province, the whole World, into ſeveral leſſer Provinces, one, or poſſibly more than one, to go one way, the other another.

It was therefore ex abundanti, more than was neceſſary, that I annexed the uſe of thoſe Phraſes to 9.
that purpoſe, not undertaking to prove this (as this Gentleman ſaith) by thoſe Texts, much leſs Peter's being Apoſtle of the Circumciſion (which was a conſectary, and had its ſeveral probation afterwards) but only accommodating thoſe phraſes to the matter in hand, and by the way aſſigning what I thought the moſt probable Notion of them.

And although it be ſtill as unneceſſary to impoſe my explications on this Gentleman, the concluſion 10.
having as yet no uſe of them, yet being obliged to give him ſuch an account of my actions, as may free me from blaſphemy, and abuſe of the Word of God, I ſhall here adventure to make my Apology by premiſing 1. not out of Grammarians only, but out of the Scripture it ſelf, the Notion of the word κλῆρος, which ſignifying originally a lot, or way of diviſion (into ſeverals) of that, which belongs to all in common (one means of ſetling propriety among men) it comes next by an eaſie figure to ſignifie that which is thus divided, or which in the diviſion falls to every man as his portion.

So ſaith Phavorinus, κληροῦται, διαιροῦται and κληρώσει, μεείσει, the Verb ſignifies diſtribution, both active and paſſive: and accordingly in the Son of Syrach we have διαίρεσις κλήρου diviſion of, or, by lot, Eccl. 14. 15. and by that we may underſtand a leſs obvious expreſſion, c 37. 8. beware of a Counſeller, &c. μήποτε βάλῃ ὄπ σοὶ κλῆρον, leſt he caſt the lot upon thee, i. e. leſt he help another to cheat thee, and then go ſharer with him, divide thee betwixt them.

So in like manner ſaith Phavorinus of the Subſtantive κλῆρος, μέρος, λαχμὸς and μέρις, it ſignifies a 12.
part, that which falls to one's lot, a portion, As Act. 8. 21. μέρις and κλῆρος portion and lot are all one.
And he that hath a poſſeſſion thus ſetled on him, and dominion by that means, or he that undertakes to dreſs or till ſo much Land, δεσπότης and γεωργὸς, the Lord and the Husbandman, are both the interpretation of κληροῦχος, he that hath ſuch a lot or portion aſſigned him.

Proportionably, thoſe that any Governour of the Church is ſet over, are called his κλῆροι or lot, and 13.
1 Pet. 5. 3. ſuch Governours are commanded μὴ κατακυριεύειν τῶν κλήρων, not to behave themſelves as the Roman Pretors were wont to do over their ſeveral Provinces, oppreſſing and tyrannizing over them.

To this it is agreeable, that κλῆρος διακονίας Act. 1. 17. ſhould denote ſuch a portion of miniſterial 14.
Office, as belonged to one that was ſent or commiſſionated by Chriſt περὶ ἔργου to a task or work, expreſt v.
20. by ἐπισκοπὴ αὐτοῦ his Epiſcopal Office (for that though it be a Rule, yet is alſo διακονία a miniſtery, Matth. 23. 11. in the Church.

Hence again, that portion of employment in preaching the Faith, teſtifying the reſurrection of Chriſt, 15.
which belonged to one ſingle Apoſtle, ſuch as Judas was, and ἐξ ἧς παρέβη from which he departed by his ſin, and to which another ſucceeds by way of ſurrogation, is as fitly ſtyled κλῆρος Ἀποστολῆς a portion of Apoſtolacy, a μέρις or diviſion of that grand employment.

And what either one ſingle errour or act of blindneſs was committed in thus interpreting, much 16. more occœcation or being blinded with errour, which I ſuppoſe the compound accumulation (whether only ſin or puniſhment alſo) of many errours, what rigour or wretchedneſs of interpretation, I am ſtill ſo blind as not to diſcern, and this Gentleman is not ſo charitable, as to give me his leaſt directions to recover to my way, or my eyes again.

For as to the Scriptures expreſſing the contrary, in ſaying he was counted among the Apoſtles, that ſure 17.
is no evidence againſt my interpretation; for Matthias may become one of the twelve, ſucceed to Judas's Office and lot, that which did, or ſhould, if he had lived, have belonged to him, and yet neither he, if he had lived, nor now Matthias in his ſtead, have more than a particular Province, this or that Region (not the whole World in common) aſſigned for his apartment.

So that as yet I cannot diſcern that I have done the leaſt injury to the Text, in thinking κλῆρον Ἀπο- 18.

σολῆς, the lot or division of Apostolacy, to be the several task that belonged to any of the twelve Apostles, or that portion of labour, that by consent at their parting one from another should be assigned to each of them.

19. And then the Analogy will still hold perfectly, that as this distribution of tasks consisted in going to several Quarters for the preaching of the faith of Christ, one, one way; another, another; so he that had received his κληρὸς ἀποστολῆς portion of Apostolacy, should be said to have ἴδιον ἢ τόπον a peculiar or proper place, and having so, should (not immediately, but soon after the Holy Ghost's descent) πορευθῆναι εἰς αὐτὸν, go, or, betake himself to it.

20. This therefore, and upon these grounds of fitness, both in respect of the words, and the context, I take to be the meaning of that Phrase πορευθῆναι εἰς ἢ τόπον ἢ ἴδιον, to go to his proper place, his peculiar assignation; And I cannot imagine the least inconvenience that can lye against this rendring.

21. For 1. in Case it should not be the true, yet it can be any thing as soon as blasphemy, thus to interpret it. 'Tis certainly nothing to the dishonour of God, to say that Matthias went and preacht the Gospel in such a Region peculiarly, and so there is no blasphemy in that, viz. the matter of the interpretation; and for the abusing of the Word of God, it is hard to divine how that can be deemed such, which affixeth nothing to the Word of God, but that which is notoriously true (for so it is, that Matthias went one way to preach the Gospel, and S. John and S. Bartholomew each of them another) and would be acknowledged to do so, if this Text were not applied to it.

22. As for the other interpretation of the words (which this Gentleman is pleased to prefer, and might have enjoyed his own judgment, without censuring them as Blasphemers, that differed from him in expounding one difficult Phrase) by affixing it to Judas, and not to Matthias; 1. there is no indication in the Context that favours that; it was sufficient to say of Judas, that which had been said, v. 16, 17, 18, 19. to set out the horror of his fact, which soon attended it in his own breast, and the bloody death which it brought upon him, but he needed not proceed to revealing of secrets, the sadder consequents, which remained in arrear after death, and 'tis Chrysostome's observation on v. 16. behold, saith he, τὸ φιλόσοφον τῆς ἀνδρὸς, the wise Christian carriage of S. Peter, πῶς οὐχ ὑβρίζει, οὐδὲ ἐνυβρίζει, how he doth not reproach, and insult on him, calling him μιαρὸν ἢ παμμιαρὸν, villain, or detestable villain, ἀλλ' ἁπλῶς τὸ γινόμενον δηλοῖ, but sets down the fact simply, and on v. 18, ὅτι τῆς παρούσης δίκης διαλέγεται, he sets down, saith he, his present vengeance, that, sure, is it which befel him in this World, which, by the way, cannot well consist with the interpreting it of Hell.

23. 2. The use of Parentheses in Scripture is very ordinary, and if that be here admitted (which it well may, without any more formal expression of it, than by putting a comma after Ἰούδας, as it is already in the printed Copies) then the interpretation is clear and unavoidable, to receive the lot or portion of his Ministery and Apostleship (from which Judas by transgression fell) to go, or that he may go to his proper place.

24. 3. Hell being the κοινὸς τόπος, the common place or lot of all wicked men, it cannot fitly be expresst with such a double emphasis, ἢ τόπον ἢ ἴδιον, the place, the proper place, i. e. the place peculiar to him, which yet may very fitly be affirmed of Matthias's Province, so his, as it was not any mans else.

25. Lastly, It is not near so proper to say that he sinned πορευθῆναι to go to Hell, as that the other was chosen and surrogated into Judas's place πορευθῆναι to go to preach to such a Quarter of the World, or that the Apostles desired God to signifie his pleasure whom he had chosen, that so he might take his portion of labour and go; His going was visibly the end intended in all this, but damnation or punishment, going to Hell, was never intended by Judas in his transgression, though it be supposed the deserved reward and consequent of it.

26. All this amassed together, may, I hope, vindicate an innocent, and, I hope, obvious (far from wrested) interpretation from such an accumulation of charge, as is laid upon it, without any tender of reason against it, but the ὦ κακόδαιμον, O wretched (blasphemous, &c.) in Lucian. And so much in answer to that Paragraph.

SECT. III.

Saint Peter the Apostle of the Circumcision; The Agreement betwixt the Apostles. Peter's preaching to Cornelius.

Numb. 1. HIS second exception is to the Position it self, of Peter's being the Apostle of the Jews exclusively to the Gentiles, and it is in these words:

2. His Position is as directly against Scripture, as if he had done it on purpose, the Scripture telling us how by a special vision S. Peter was commanded to preach to Cornelius a Gentile first of all the Apostles, and himself in the Council of Jerusalem protesting the same; and yet this Doctor can teach he was made Apostle to the Jews, exclusively to the Gentiles, though all Story say the contrary.

3. The Position, which is here said to be so directly against the Scripture, was to my understanding the express affirmation of Scripture it self, I am sure from thence it was that I learnt it, and I must fail very much in my expectation, if this Gentleman himself do not acknowledge the testimony produced, Gal. 2. 7. to be sufficient ground to infer it. There Peter is said to be πεπιστευμένος τὸ εὐαγγέλιον τῆς ἀκροβυστίας, intrusted with the Gospel of the circumcision; That the circumcision there signifies the Jews, and the εὐαγγέλιον, which we render Gospel, the office of preaching or revealing the faith to them, ἀποστολὴ ἀκροβυστίας, the Apostolacy of the circumcision, v. 8. if it be not of it self plain enough, 'tis made so by ver. 9. where it is added that Peter, &c. were by agreement to go εἰς περιτομὴν to the circumcision, where circumcision, being the object or term of his motion, must needs be the Jews, not circumcision it self, and so Saint Chrysostome at large expounds it, ὃ τὸ πρᾶγμα ἄλλα τοὺς Ἰουδαίους, not to signifie the thing, circumcision, but the persons, the Jews, in opposition to τὰ ἔθνη the Gentiles, in the former words, and then going to them must needs be preaching to them, going to them as to a Province, the care of which was

was intrusted to him; and the right hands of fellowship, the agreement that was made betwixt them, James the Bishop of Jerusalem, and Peter, and the beloved Disciple on one side, and Paul and Barnabas on the other side, is sure the interpretation of the περιτετμημαι the being intrusted or having that, as a Province, committed to them.

And this is the special importance, saith S. Chrysostome, of the ἀλλὰ τουναντίον, but contrariwise (the beginning of ver, 7.) as that is opposed to the προσανέθεντο, their adding to him, v. 6. James, saith he, and Peter and John, ‖ were so far from opposing any thing that he had done, from advising any thing more, from telling him any circumstance more than before he knew, that they * not only approved, but commended what he had done; and to set the things the more unquestionably for the future, made this agreement with him and Barnabas, that whensoever they should come to the same City, mixt of Jews and Gentiles, Peter and John should betake themselves to the Jewish, and Paul and Barnabas to the Gentile part of it. For, as it was said, it was not by any particular assignation of Christ's, but by agreement among themselves, that this assignation of Provinces was made. 4.

‖ τοσοῦτον ἀπέχον τοῦ μεμαθηκέναι ὅτι καὶ ἐπῄνεσαν

* ὁ μόνον (so certainly it ought to be read) ἐκ ἐπετίμησαν

And therefore as in point of propriety, when that which is supposed to lie by Nature in common to all, is, to avoid contentions and confusions, and the state of perpetual hostility, so distributed by agreement among the fellow-communers, as that one portion shall be assigned as the propriety and apartment of one, the other of another, then and from thenceforth that which is the proportion of one, is so his, that it belongs to no other, and again, so his, that he hath no right to any other part (which I should express by saying that that part is his exclusively to any other part, for sure his standing to any such division cuts him out, and so excludes him from any farther right) so here after this agreement betwen those Apostles jointly made, concerning the two parts of mankind, Jews and Gentiles, to which they were to preach, and among whom to preside, the Jews are become S. * Peter's peculiar, or portion, or Province, and that so his, as the Gentiles were not his, they being left to S. Paul and Barnabas) who is both there affirmed to have them committed to him, and Rom. 11. 13. to be the Apostle of the Gentiles; And that I expresst by that Phrase, Peter was the Apostle of the Jews (so it is said of him expressly, Gal. 2. 8.) exclusively to the uncircumcision] and truly I knew not (nor yet do) how to express it more significatively, and more to the rendring of the full importance of those plain Texts, and this Gentleman hath not pleased to direct me how to do it better. 5.

* See Baron. An. Christ. 39. n. 14.

And having the Scripture thus clear and irrefragable for my position, if now I should not be able to salve the Antinomies, to answer his objections from Scripture to it, this were certainly but my dulness (another that hath a greater ἀσχνοια might be able to do it) and therefore ought not to be any prejudice to the truth of the affirmation. But unless the difficulties be greater than as yet appear, I shall not much doubt of undertaking the task, of reconciling all the ἐναντιοφανείαι that can be phansied. 6.

For what if Peter by special vision was once commanded to preach to Cornelius a Gentile? Sure this is very competible with my Position; For not to mention that this is acknowledged to have been a peculiar commission, by special vision determined to that particular person and his Family, which, till he had this vision, he thought it utterly unlawful to preach to, Act. 10. 28. (And it is certain that one special Case were no prejudice to the general Position) and again that Cornelius, though a Gentile, was yet a Proselyte of the Jews, such as they called a Proselyte of the Gates, though not of justice, a σεβόμενος or devout man, though not circumcised; To omit these, I say, the Answer is obvious, 1. That this agreement of which I speak, was at the time of Paul's going up to Jerusalem, Act. 15. i. e. some years after this of Peter's preaching to Cornelius, as may appear Gal. 2. 1. which defines it to be about fourteen years after St. Paul's conversion, whereas that of Peter's preaching to Cornelius, Act. 10. placed in the next Chapter to that which described the conversion of Paul, must needs be some considerable space before this time of his going up to the Council of Jerusalem. And so that of Peter's preaching to Cornelius, and his protesting the same in the Council of Jerusalem, hath nothing of opposition to this agreement (made for the future, sure, not for the time past) what should be done in their after-preaching, I suppose I need add no more to that which is thus evident. 7.

Secondly, I have already sufficiently * expresst, how far this agreement extended, and how far exclusive it was; not that it should be unlawful for Peter to preach to a Gentile, or for Paul to preach to a Jew; but that when they met in the same City (as at Antioch certainly they did, and there, saith Baronius, An. Chr. 39. n. 14. Peter preached peculiarly to the Jews, and gathered a Church of them only; and at Rome also, I make no question) then the one should constantly apply himself to the Jews, receive Disciples, form them into a Church, leave them to be governed by a Bishop of his assignation, and the other should do in like manner to the Gentiles. 8.

* Tract of Schism. c. 4. §. 7.

And that this was so in the consequents of the Story, is largely shewed in that Tract. What could have been said more punctually to prevent this exception taken from Peter's preaching to Cornelius, I cannot yet discern. I wish this Gentleman had pleased to take notice of it; As it is, I hope he will now be more sure to do so. 9. C. 4. §. 8. &c.

SECT. IV.

Paul's first preaching to the Jews in every City. To what the Agreement between him and Peter belonged.

ANother Argument he adds much to the same purpose, which will make his third Exception. Again, if he were made the Apostle of the Jews, exclusively to the Gentiles, by the same reason Saint Paul was made Apostle of the Gentiles exclusively to the Jews, for the words are like; and yet the Scripture teacheth us, that whereever he came, he preached first to the Jews: Is not this to make Scripture ridiculous? Numb. 1. 2.

Here is great severity again, a charge of making Scripture ridiculous; But I hope I have been far from any guilt of it. That S. Paul, whensoever he came to a City, where the faith had not been preached, and where there was any Synagogue of the Jews, went into that Synagogue in time of their 3.

publick assembling, I never made any Question, were this before, or were it after the Story of Act. 15. when I suppose this agreement to be made betwixt him and S. Peter, &c.

4. Great reason, and no small obligation there was for that; For 1. Christ had commanded that the preaching should begin at Jerusalem, the Metropolis of the Jews, and as to the Jews first (ὑμῖν πρῶτον) God had raised up his Son Jesus, Act. 3. 26. so the Gospel of the resurrection was to be revealed (Ἰουδαίῳ πρῶτον) to the Jew first, Rom. 1. 16.

5. And although in Paul's commission from Christ, it were peculiarly expresst that he should preach the Gospel to the Gentiles, Act. 9. 15. & 22. 21. yet according to this great fundamental œconomy, he counted it necessary, first to make tender of his service, and of the glad tidings of the Gospel, to the Jews, and so he tells them Act. 13. 46. It was necessary that the Word of God should first have been spoken to you, and till the Jews refuse it and reject it, he doth not betake himself so peculiarly to the Gentiles.

6. Again, this was in some measure necessary to his publishing the Faith; For that was most advantageously to be done in the publick Assemblies, that it might be known to all that were in the City: And the Synagogues of the Jews being such, were in all reason by him, that was a Jew, to be preferred before the Idolatrous Temples of the Heathens: And according to these obligations, and inducements, so generally he did; But then, as this no way prejudiceth his title of Apostle of the Gentiles, to which he was at the first assigned by Christ; so neither is it any way contrary to, or unreconcileable with the agreement which I suppose to be made between him and Peter and John, which concerned only those Cities and Regions, where they met, and came to plant Churches; There, and there only it is, that I affirm this distribution of Provinces to have been made, and consequently, the affirmation is no farther in any justice to be extended, than thus, that when they so met, Paul betook himself to the Gentile part, compacted the Gentile Proselytes or Believers into a Church, put them into the hands of a Bishop of his own assignation, Ignatius at Antioch, Timothy at Ephesus, whereas Euodius was in the former, Bishop of the Jewish part, and in the latter, and in all Asia, John was the Apostle of the circumcision, and constituted Bishops there. And this I suppose, without farther enlarging, may satisfie the importunity of his second Argument.

SECT. V.

Of the Gentiles being Saint Paul's Province peculiarly.

Numb. 1. HIS fourth exception is to my producing the words of Scripture, Gal. 2. 7, 9. to the proof of my Position, Thus.

2. But he goes on telling us, that the Gentiles exclusively to the circumcision were the lot of S. Paul by S. Peter's own confession, his words are, for the uncircumcision or Gentiles they were not S. Peter's Province, but peculiarly S. Paul's, &c. but look on the place and you shall find no word of exclusion as [peculiarly] is, and whereon lieth the whole Question, so that the Doctors evidence is his own word against the main torrent of Scripture on the other side.

3. How truly it is suggested, that the torrent of the Scripture is against me, hath already been made manifest in the foregoing Sections, where the contrary appearances, by this Gentleman produced, as they are far enough from a main torrent, or from the common force of such, (or but even of an ordinary stream) carrying the whole business before them, so they are severally examined and allowed, as far as they have any force in them, and found perfectly reconcileable with our pretensions.

4. And so likewise it hath already been cleared in what sense this Apostle of the Gentiles, so styled by himself, and so, by agreement betwixt the Apostles, acknowledged by S. Peter, was so, peculiarly or exclusively to the Jews.

5. As for his Argument drawn only from hence, that in the Text to the Galatians there is no word of exclusion, that sure is of little force; If there were any agreement, and division, and several assignation of Provinces, it must follow that what was said to be one mans Province, is his, so as it is not the others, and so peculiarly, and so as far as that agreement holds, exclusively his, As in the Estate first held in common, and then after by agreement divided, it hath appeared so evidently, that I need add no more to that matter.

SECT. VI.

Of Saint Peter's withdrawing from the Gentile-communion. Of the Gentile Diet. The prudence of Saint Peter's action.

Numb. 1. HIS fifth exception concerns an incidental passage about S. Peter, and is an actio injuriarum.

2. Again (saith he) see how he wrongs S. Peter and his Jewish Proselytes, where he says he withSect. 8, 9. drew from all communion with the Gentile Christians. Whereas the Text expresseth no more, than that he withdrew from eating with them, that is, keeping the Gentile Diet.

3. What wrong I have done S. Peter and his Jewish Proselytes, I am yet to learn, nor am I sure that I know wherein this Gentleman placeth the supposed injury; But I think it most probable to consist in this, that I say he withdrew from all communion with the Gentile Christians, whereas he conceives that he withdrew only from keeping the Gentile Diet.

4. But 1. let me demand of this Gentleman, what he means by Gentile Diet? I suppose using those sorts of meats, which were by the Jewish Law forbidden; And if that be acknowledged of S. Peter, that he would not thus eat with the Gentiles, lest he should seem to offend against the Jewish Law, then by the same reason he must certainly be supposed to abstain from other communion with them, because it was equally against the Jewish Law, that a Jew should converse with a Gentile, as the Woman of Samaria tells Christ, when he spake to her, but to draw him some water, John 4. 9. How, said she, dost thou being a Jew, ask me to drink (and it was but water, none of the interdicted Gentile Diet) being a Woman of Samaria? and either She or the Evangelist, renders the reason in as comprehensive terms as mine were, ὐ γὰρ συγχρῶνται Ἰουδαῖοι Σαμαρείταις, for the Jews have no dealings with the Samaritans; and accordingly v. 27. the Disciples marvelled that he talked with the woman. And therefore certainly Peter did abstain from all those other ways of converse and communion with the Gentiles, which the Jews thought as unlawful, as eating of the Gentile Diet, or else he failed of the end of his action, which is evident what it was, a fear of scandalizing his Country-men, and from thence a shew of compliance with them, lest he should be thought by those that came from Jerusalem to forsake the Judaical Law.

thou

That the very preaching to a Gentile (which was the loosest degree of communion) was, according to the Jewish Principles, as unlawful as eating any unclean meat, using the Gentile Diet, is plain by Peter's vision, Act. 10. 12. where the one is represented by the other; and had he not received that vision, which made it lawful to him to eat all kind of meats, he acknowledgeth that he durst not have adventured to come to one of another Nation, v. 28. affirming in as plain words as could be, that it was an unlawful thing for a man that was a Jew to keep company or come to one of another Nation, κολλᾶσθαι ἢ προσέρχεσθαι, which certainly includes all communion, and not only that of the Gentile Diet. Thus unhappy is this Gentleman continually in his Objections. 5.

ὁ θεὸς ἔδειξέ μοι κέλευσε παρὰ νόμον εἶναι κολλᾶσθαι. Chryst. in loc.

It were here obvious, and easie to shew the opinion of the Antients, of the * prudence, and no kind of uncharitableness of S. Peter's action, which would farther evidence how far I am from wronging S. Peter or his Proselytes, in affirming what I affirm of them. But the present Objection doth not make that necessary; I refer the Reader for it to the (Ἐμφασις) interpretation, or Comments of * S. Chrysostom, who sets it down exactly † not as a Quarrel, but as an οἰκονομία, an act of prudent managery, a wise ordering, designed by him and S. Paul, as most likely to reduce the Jews from their errors, when he that did thus much to comply with them (not for fear of persecution from them, but for fear of averting them from Christianity) and was herein seemingly opposed by S. Paul (the κατεγνωσμένῳ ὡς v. 11. being not to be rendred, he was to be blamed, in Paul's opinion, but he was blamed by the Gentile Christians) made no manner of reply in defence of that compliance with the Jews, and so yielded that S. Paul was in the right, and not the Judaizers. This interpretation of Chrysostome is followed by the Greek Commentators, and taken up by Jerome, but disliked by Augustine in his Epistles to Jerome, and therefore I lay not weight upon it, nor have my pretensions any need of it. 6.

SECT. VII.

The two Plantations of Gentile and Jewish Christians at Antioch. Euodius and Ignatius. The differences of the Antients about them reconciled. The two Bishops at Rome. Jews in England. Simon Zelotes. Gentium Ecclesia the Church of Jews as well as Gentiles.

HAving gained so little by the several steps of his exceptions, and the Position remaining still firm against all, I have less reason to suspect what is built upon this foundation in the ensuing Sections: Yet against them all together he casts one stone, before he will part, in these words, Numb. 1.

Upon this wisely laid ground, he would perswade us, followed the division of the Bishopricks both in Antioch and Rome, but bringing not one word of Antiquity proving this to have been the cause, yet is he so certain of it, that he will find a Colony of Jews even in England, for fear S. Peter should have touched a Gentile, and yet he cites S. Prosper, that both S. Peter and S. Paul founded the Church of Gentiles in Rome. 2.

What force there is in any part of this suggestion, I shall not here need to set down at large. There be three Branches of it, 1. That I bring not a word of Antiquity to prove (what I say) that this is the cause of the divisions of the Bishopricks both in Antioch and Rome. 2. That I will find a Colony of Jews in England. 3. That I cite Prosper, that both S. Peter and S. Paul founded the Church of Gentiles in Rome. 3.

For the first, I desire the Reader to review what is already said in the Tract of Schism c. 4. from §. 8. to §. 20. and I shall much wonder if he return of this Gentleman's mind, that there is not one word there brought out of Antiquity to confirm what I say. The short is, It is there manifested from Antiquity, that the Church of Antioch was founded by S. Peter and S. Paul, that there were † two Churches there, one of Jewish, the other of Gentile Christians, that in those Churches at the same time sate two distinct Bishops, * Euodius and Ignatius; by which means some appearing difficulties in antient Writers are explained. 4.

See Baron. An. 45. n. 14.

† Seorsim qui ex Judæis erant Ecclesiæ habebantur, nec his qui erant è Gentibus miscebantur. Hieron. in Gal. 1. 22.

To what is there said, I shall, instead of repeating, add thus much more. Of Euodius, Suidas's words will be easily turned to, in Χρονικοῖ, Ἐπὶ Κλαυδίου βασιλέως Ῥωμαίων, Πέτρῳ τῷ Ἀποστόλῳ χειροτονήσαντος Εὐόδιον ἐν Ἀντιοχείᾳ, &c. In the reign of Claudius Cæsar, Peter the Apostle ordained Euodias Bishop at Antioch. Of Ignatius the † Author of the Constitutions is express, Ἰγνάτιος ὑπὸ Παύλου, Ignatius was ordained Bishop there by S. Paul. Now seeing in those Acts of Ignatius which are put together by Simeon Metaphrastes, Ignatius is said to succeed Euodius, as Euodius succeeded Peter (Πέτρου μὲν ὁ μέγας Εὐόδιος διαδέχεται. Εὐόδιον δὲ Ἰγνάτιος) and the anonymous antient Writer of the Acts of Ignatius, which remains unprinted, hath the same, Εὐόδιον γὰρ Ἰγνάτιος διαδέξατο, Ignatius succeeded Euodius; and seeing this Ordination of Ignatius is also said by * Theodoret, and by † Felix III. Bishop of Rome to have been done by the hand of Saint Peter, This seeming difference is removed by * Joannes Malela Antiochenus, who thus sets down the whole matter, ἐν τῷ ἀνιέναι αὐτὸν (Πετρὸν) ἐν τῇ Ῥώμῃ, διεχομένου αὐτῆς δὲ Ἀντιοχείας τῆς Μεγάλης, συμβὰν τελευτῆσαι Εὐόδιον τὸν Ἐπίσκοπον, καὶ Πατριάρχην Ἀντιοχείας, καὶ ἔλαβε τὸ ἀξίωμα τῆς Ἐπισκοπῆς Ἰγνάτιος, τῷ ἁγίῳ Πέτρῳ τῷ Ἀποστόλῳ χειροτονήσαντος αὐτὸν καὶ ἐνθρονίσαντος, When Peter went to Rome, passing by Antioch the Great, Euodius Bishop and Patriarch of Antioch happened to dye, and Ignatius (who was, as was said, first constituted by S. Paul over the Gentiles there) received the Bishoprick (that I suppose must now be, of the Jewish Province also, over which Euodius had been in his life time) S. Peter ordaining and enthroning him. And so that is become most clear which * S. Chrysostome said of this Ignatius, that καὶ σὺ μακαρίων Ἀποστόλων χεῖρες, &c. 5.

the hands of the bleſſed Apoſtles, (in the plural, firſt of Paul, then of Peter) had been laid on Ignatius.

6. The other part which concerned Rome, * was ſo cleared by the words of Epiphanius, who ſaith of Sect. 9. Peter and Paul both, that they were ἐν Ῥώμῃ Ἀπόστολοι καὶ Ἐπίσκοποι, Apoſtles and Biſhops at Rome, and ſo many other evidences produced to the ſame purpoſe, from the inſcription on their Tombs, by Gaius contemporary to Pope Zephyrinus, by Dionyſius Biſhop of Corinth, by Proſper, by the ſeals of the Popes, Sect. 12. and ſo again by the Eccleſiaſtick ſtory, that makes Clement S. Peter's Deacon and ſucceſſor in the Biſhoprick, and Linus S. Paul's; that ſure there can be no need of farther proofs or teſtimonies from Antiquity in this matter.

7. Whilſt in the mean, other Churches are * inſtanced in, particularly the Churches of Aſia, wherein Sect. 14. S. Paul and S. John had all the command, and S. Peter had nothing to do, whether in planting or governing them, which alone is ſufficient to carry the whole matter againſt S. Peter's univerſal Paſtorſhip, and no word is by this Gentleman replied to that ſo conſiderable a part of my probation. Only inſtead of it, a far more compendious way, that of the ſcornful or faſtidious ſcoffing at my wiſely laid ground, as he pleaſeth to call it, and adding that I bring not one word of Antiquity, &c.

8. As to the ſecond branch of his ſuggeſtion, that I will find a Colony of Jews in England, that is no where ſaid by me; only thus, that upon ſuppoſition, if the ſaying of Simeon Metaphraſtes (ſpeaking of S. Peter's preaching and ordaining Biſhops in England, Neronis 12) ſhould be thought to have truth in it, it muſt be extended no farther than the Jews, which might at that time be diſperſed there.

9. Where, as my concluſion from that ſuppoſition is founded in the analogy, that as, where S. Paul and S. Peter met in any Plantation, they divided their Province, &c. ſo in reaſon it ought to be, where S. Peter and Simon Zelotes, or Joſeph of Arimathea, met in like manner; ſo all, that of the Jews in England I there affirm, is only this, that it was poſſible they that were diſperſed in ſo many regions, might be, ſome of them, diſperſed in Britanny, which how improbable ſoever it may appear at that time, is ſure as probable, as that S. Peter preached and ordained Biſhops in Britanny, and in conſequence to that only it was, that I made the ſuppoſition of the poſſibility of it, knowing it the affirmation of our Antiquaries, that Joſeph of Arimathea, or Simon Zelotes ('tis poſſible alſo that Simeon Metaphraſtes might miſtake Simon Peter for him, and then that matter is at an end) planted the faith in this Iſland.

10. As for his laſt ſuggeſtion, that I cite Saint Proſper, that both S. Peter and S. Paul founded the Church of Gentiles in Rome, I deſire the truth of it may be conſidered by the words which I cite from him,
* Dimid. Temp. c. 5. * In ipſa Hieruſalem Jacobus, & Joannes apud Epheſum, Andreas & cæteri per totam Aſiam, Petrus & Paulus Apoſtoli in urbe Roma Gentium Eccleſiam pacatam unamque poſteris tradentes ſanguine, memoriiſque ſuis ex dominicâ pactione ſacrârunt, James at Jeruſalem, John at Epheſus, Andrew and the reſt through all Aſia, Peter and Paul at Rome, by their blood and memories conſecrated the Church of the Nations. What Nations were theſe? ſure, of Jews, as well as Gentiles, elſe Jeruſalem could not be any part of them, no nor John's converts at Epheſus, for they were Jews. And if the Reader will conſult the place, he ſhall find theſe words immediately ſubſequent; Huic generali Eccleſiæ communicans Chriſtianus eſt Catholicus. By which 'tis evident, that Gentium Eccleſia is generalis Eccleſia, the Univerſal Church, which it cannot be, unleſs it contain the Jewiſh as well as the Gentile Chriſtians: and therefore this Gentleman did not do well to ſubſtitute the word Gentiles for Nations; and yet could not, without doing ſo, have made this exception to my words.

11. And ſo much for exceptions to my firſt evidence againſt the Univerſal Paſtorſhip of S. Peter.

SECT. VIII.

No promiſe of Keys to S. Peter, which was not made and performed to all the Apoſtles, Joh. 20. 21. the completion of the promiſe, Matt. 16. 19. Paſce oves. Joh. 21. an exhortation, not commiſſion.

Numb. 1. THE ſecond ſort of Exceptions follows, thoſe againſt my evidence drawn from the power of the Keys, which I ſay, and prove both from Scripture, and expreſs teſtimonies of the Fathers, that it was given equally to all the Apoſtles; And his Exceptions begin thus:

2. A ſecond evidence he bringeth from the donation of the Keys, which he ſaith were given equally to the Apoſtles, Matt. 28. yet confeſſeth the Keys were eſpecially promiſed to S. Peter, Matt. 16. but performed only in common, Matt. 28. which though they may be both true, yet is abſurdly ſaid, for who acknowledgeth a ſpecial promiſe, ſhould have found out a ſpecial performance, which is done, Joh. 21.

3. This Exception being not to the matter of what I ſay, but to the abſurdneſs of the expreſſion (to which cenſure I muſt ſuppoſe every thing liable, which is contrary to his pretenſions, and yet proved ſo manifeſtly that it cannot be denied by him) I ſhall briefly evidence how commodious, and proper the expreſſion was.

4. And 1. whereas he ſets it down as my confeſſion, that the Keys were eſpecially promiſed to S. Peter,
Sect. 20. this is not with truth ſuggeſted; my words are, This power Matt. 16. 19. is promiſed to S. Peter] But the [eſpecially] is an interpolation of this Gentleman's, to prepare my words for his exceptions, for which otherwiſe they were no way qualified.

5. All that can be fetcht from any words of mine towards this ſenſe, is, that in the next Section, I foreſaw, and ſo mentioned an objection from Chriſt's making this promiſe to him peculiarly (and yet even that is not, to him eſpecially, but to him particularly, or ſingly, I will give unto thee, &c.) To this, as to an Objection, I preſently made a reply, that the repetition of that promiſe, Matt. 18. 18. to all the Apoſtles indefinitely, and without any peculiarity of reſtriction (I ſay to you, in the plural, and, Whatſoever ye ſhall bind, &c.) will take away all appearance from this objection.

6. And ſo it will from this Gentleman's exception alſo: For if what was at one time promiſed to S. Peter ſingly, was ſo ſoon after promiſed to all the Apoſtles indefinitely, what abſurdity is there in ſeeking no other performance of this promiſe, than that which was at once afforded to all the Apoſtles together, in the deſcent of the Holy Ghoſt, when the fire, that repreſented that Spirit, divided and ſat upon every one of them, and they were all filled with the Holy Ghoſt, and no ſhew of peculiarity, or mark of eſpecial eminence to S. Peter in all this.

As

As suppose a General should promise a Commission this day to one, and to morrow should make the like promise to eleven more, that one being in their company, and then, upon a set day, some weeks after, should send twelve Commissions sealed to those twelve, one for each of them, I wonder who would doubt of the exact performance of this promise to that first, or seek for any more special performance of it. 7.

But this Gentleman having phansied a special promise (as that is with him somewhat more than a particular promise, for otherwise a common performance might have served the turn, it being certain that an Universal contains every particular under it) must needs have a special performance, and that Joh. 21. I suppose in those words of Christ to S. Peter, Feed my Sheep, and, Feed my Lambs, thrice repeated. 8.

But for this, 1. I cannot acknowledge that it hath any particular reference to the words of the promise, Matth. 16. 19. The promise was, I will give thee the Keys — and, Whatsoever thou shalt bind — And sure the direct completion of this, as far as could be expected from Christ personally, whilst he was here on Earth, is that of Joh. 20. 21. where, as the sending or commissionating is answerable to giving the Keys, the Ensign of the OEconomous, so remitting and retaining of sins is all one with the binding and loosing. 9.

As for that which is after this Chap. 21. it is, 1. by that very Position of it; but 2. more by the occasion, and yet more 3. by the matter of the words, prejudged from being any more than an exhortation to discharge that Duty, for which in the former Chapter he, with the rest of the twelve, had received his commission, and so is still as far from being a special performance, as that of Matth. 16. had been from a special promise. 10.

The Pasce Oves, Feed my Sheep and Lambs, thrice repeated, was certainly a direction to him how he might approve his love to that Master and Saviour, whom he had thrice renounced; testifie it now to be a sincere constant love (such as would cast out all fear of danger, through which formerly he had fallen) by an eminent diligence in discharge of that Pastoral Office, which was intrusted to him; but 'twas not so much as an intimation, that his diligence would be actually greater than all others (for sure S Paul said truth, that he laboured more abundantly than they all, of whom S. Peter was one) but rather, that he, that after such professions had fallen so foully, had the more need now of having this proof of his love inculcated and prest, lest he should fail again (much less is it a sealing any power or authority to him, above that which before had been conferred on him, and with him on those others also. 11.

And nothing being here offered to prove that there was any more of energy, or special Commission in these words, but only the thing crudely affirmed, by naming Joh. 21. there is no need of making any farther Answer, a bare denial is a proportionable return to an unproved affirmation. 12.

Only this I shall add, that 'tis certain that S. Peter thus understood the reiteration of Christ's Question, as a reproach of his three denials; The Text saith, Peter was grieved, because he said unto him the third time, Lovest thou me? Which sure he would not have been, if he had looked on it, as an introduction to so great a preferment, as it must be, if the Supremacy and Universal Pastorship of the Church were by those words conferred on him. 13.

SECT. IX.

Of the peculiarity of the power given to Saint Peter.

TO this Head of Discourse about the power of the Keys follows a second Exception in these words, Again, he would perswade the World that the Catholick Church holdeth, none had the Keys but S. Peter, calling it a peculiarity and inclosure of S. Peter, as if the other Apostles had them not; which is a calumny. Numb. 1. 2. Sect. 2.

How far I have been in this matter from calumniating the whole Catholick Church, or any one Member of it, will appear by this brief review of what is there said; It is this, The power of the Keys is promised S. Peter Matth. 16. but to him that from hence, i. e. from the promising it to him singly in that place, pretends this donative and consequent power as a peculiarity and inclosure of Peter's, two considerations are there offered, and thought sufficient to supersede any such conclusion. 3.

Here certainly a bare supposition will not be the accusing or consequently accusing falsly, i. e. calumniating of any. If no man say this, besides my losing my pains in superseding such a (but possible) conclusion, there is no other harm done. Only I shall demand, Is that promise of the Keys to Saint Peter, Matth. 16. made use of by a Romanist to prove Christ's promise of some special power to S. Peter, which was not promised to the other Apostles? If this Gentleman answer, No; then 1. I must infer that this Gentleman is no Romanist, because in this very page he mentions the first words of this Text, Tu es Petrus, as one of the most considerable Texts of Scripture, fit to be alledged for S. Peter's supremacy. 2. I shall conclude from this his present supposed negation, together with his own words in the last Paragraph, that the words of Christ, Joh. 21. Feed my Sheep, &c.] were not the instating of any power on S. Peter, which was not common also to the rest of the Apostles, for those words Joh. 21. were, saith he, a special performance, answerable to that promise of the Keys to Peter, Matth. 16. as a special promise, and consequently if there were nothing in that promise peculiar to S. Peter, there was nothing in that performance peculiar to him. And so neither he nor any Romanist must henceforth conclude any thing for S. Peter from either of those particular addresses of Christ to him, Matth. 16. or Joh. 21. which they will not equally yield from thence to all the other Apostles; And then, that will more compendiously perform what I by a greater circuit of considerations endeavoured to do, i. e. supersede all the Romanists conclusions from one or both these places; for certainly if they pretend not to infer somewhat for S. Peter, which is not by them equally granted to all the rest of the Apostles, all that those Texts will be able to do, is to confute the Presbytery, not to establish the Papacy, no more being from hence deducible for the Bishop of Rome the Successor of one Apostle, than for the several other Bishops, Successors of the other Apostles. 4.

But

5. But if upon the sight of these consequences, he shall now say, that in this of Matth. 16. 19. there is any thing, be it never so little (so as to be capable of the Phrase, a special promise) ensured upon S. Peter, which was not elsewhere promised also to the other Apostles, I shall then conclude, that it seems I have not calumniated him, or the Church which he defends, in saying that they make this power a peculiarity and inclosure of Saint Peter, for so it must be, if it belong to him and not to others.

6. And 'tis not sufficient to say, that the power of the Keys was common to him with the other Apostles, but yet some other special power was there reserved to S. Peter; For of that specialty, whatsoever it is, my present dilemma proceeds, and desires to be informed, whether any Romanist conclude it from that Text of Matth. 16. and if he do not, then the inconveniences will press him, which I have here mentioned. If he do, then I shall now conclude anew (not that the Catholick Church, but) that this Catholick Gentleman holds that which he will not be able to prove, because there is not the least minute portion of power promised to him in that sixteenth Chapter, which is not elsewhere promised to all the Apostles; Peter is called a stone, on which the Church shall be built, and to Peter the Keys are promised; and the twelve Apostles are in like manner, and all equally twelve foundation-stones of the same building, and the Keys are equally promised to all them. And this being there proved at large, Sect. 21. and the probations extended, not only to the power of the Keys, but (after) to the compellation of Tu es Petrus (and they will be extensible to all the most diminutive imaginary fractions of either of those powers) I shall farther conclude, that whatsoever he shall now return to this Dilemma, will equally secure me from having calumniated either him, or the Church maintained by him.

SECT. X.

Sitting on twelve Thrones, Matth. 19.

Numb. 1. HIS third Exception to this Chapter is to another interpretation of mine, which it seems hath not the luck to approve it self to him, Thus,

2. I cannot pass without noting another odd interpretation of Scripture, in his 20. Sect. out of Matth. 19. speaking of the twelve Thrones at the Day of Judgment, he explicates, to rule or preside in the Church.

3. I do acknowledge to understand the twelve Thrones, Matth. 19. of the Apostles ruling and presiding in the Church, and S. Augustine long before, so understood it; and if Christ's sitting on the Throne of his Glory, may be the interpretation of ἐν παλιγγενεσίᾳ, whether it be rendred in the regeneration, or in the resurrection, meaning thereby Christ's resurrection and ascension to the Throne of his Glory, there will then be no difficulty so to understand it, that when Christ was gone to Heaven, these should succeed him in the Government of his Church on Earth, and so (as the Phylarchæ ruled and judged the several Tribes of Israel) exercise judicature, bind and loose, excommunicate and absolve in the Church, no one having the πρωτεία, any more than of order, among them.

4. But this Gentleman gives no reason for preferring any other interpretation, only calls mine an odd one; And, when I have replied first, that this place comes in ex abundanti, only as it is (being thus interpreted) in concord with that other of Matth. 16. & 18. and therefore secondly, it is not an odd one, and thirdly, the Cause in hand will stand as firm, though this interpretation should be found to have no truth in it: fourthly, that my interpretation is reconcileable with his, and therefore his, if granted, will not be exclusive of mine, they that shall judge the World hereafter may for some time have presided in the Church, and so also judged here; fifthly, that this place, and the grounds of this interpretation are * elsewhere insisted on at large; I shall need add no more to this single dislike of his, in this place.

* Annot. on Matth. 19. d. and Power of Keys, c. 5. §. 13.

SECT. XI.

The equivalence of Πέτρα and Πέτρος. Twelve foundation-stones.

Numb. 1. HE concludes with some shew of dislike of what I had said to the vulgar place of Tu es Petrus, Thus,

2. His quibling about the word, is so light a thing, as it is not worth consideration, the sense being plain, that upon Peter the Church was built especially, though not with exclusion of others.

3. What I said of the equivalence and perfect identity of the words, Πέτρος and Πέτρα for a stone, seemed to me particularly useful to the understanding of the meaning of Christ's speech, when he said, he would build his Church on this πέτρᾳ or πετρᾳ, i. e. this stone. For not to mention what hath by divers of the Antients been said of that Text, applying it not to the person of S. Peter, but to the faith, whereof he then had newly made confession, I was here willing to grant the Romanist the utmost that he could pretend to, viz. that the person of Peter was that Petra or stone, on which Christ promised to build his Church: And why this Gentleman should be so unwilling to be gratified, or why the setting down the bare notation of the Greek word, should deserve his reproach, and be called quibling or levity, I profess I can render no reason but his haste, which permitted him not to consider either the undeniable truth, or his own advantages from what was said.

4. The force of my Answer lay in another Branch of that fourth Section, viz. that this stone, from whence Peter had his name, peculiarly relating to a building, and so being to be considered as a foundation-stone, not only he, but all the rest of the Apostles were herein made equal with Peter, being all partakers of this common appellation, δεκάλιθοι δώδεκα twelve foundations, Apoc. 21. 14. and those by circumstances in that Text, manifested to have an equal proportion of power and Province assigned to each of them. And to this there is nothing here answered by this Gentleman, and his unprovoked quarrel at that, which was said concerning the nature of the word, is an indication that he had nothing more to object to it.

When

When therefore he saith, that on Peter the Church was built especially, I demand what he means by especially? If no more than that he was one special person, on whom the Church was built, then I grant it, and reply, that so was John, and so was Andrew, and so was every other of the twelve, a special foundation-stone of the Church. But if by [especially] he mean in an extraordinary, or more eminent manner, than any of the other Apostles, Then I Answer, 1. That Christ's telling him he was a stone, on which he would build his Church, implies no such matter; the other Apostles each of them are by Christ, in Vision to S. John, affirmed to be foundations of this building, as well as he; 2. That among foundation-stones, there is but one, that hath any eminence above others, and that is the ἀκρογωνιαῖον, the chief or head corner-stone; and that title belongs not to S. Peter (as neither to any other Apostle) but only to Christ himself. Ephes. 2. 20. And so still nothing belongs to Peter in this matter of being a stone or foundation, which doth not equally appear to belong to those others, as well as him. And so much for the vindicating of the Evidences set down in the fourth Chapter. 5.

CHAP. V.

An Answer to the Exceptions made to the fifth Chapter.

SECT. I.

Of slight passing over Pasce oves, and Tu es Petrus.

THE first thing he here excepts against, is my too slight passing over two, which he thinks the most considerable texts, to support the supremacy of S. Peter, in these words, Numb. 1.

In the fifth Chapter he lightly passeth over the two most considerable Texts of Scripture fit to be alledged for S. Peter's supremacy, viz. Feed my sheep, and Thou art Peter: because they have no appearance, and have been often answered: Why no appearance? because he and his fellows say so, and as if being so often repeated, was not as likely to shew the answer was naught, as the answering to impeach the objecter: but who understands the principles of Catholick Faith, knows, that as well for other points of our Faith, as for this of S. Peter's supremacy, we relie not only upon such places of Scripture. 2.

For this of the light passing over those two places of Scripture, I think I can give a very reasonable account, 1. From his own words p. 10. where he tells me that I am mistaken in thinking that the Catholick ought to prove that the Pope hath an Universal Primacy; For if he be not obliged to prove it, if the right pretended depend wholly upon possession, why should not I make haste through those proofs, which some have ex abundanti (as to him it seems) made use of. 3.

Secondly, I did in the simplicity of my heart verily believe (what here is recited from me) that those two texts had so very little appearance of strength in them, and this so often manifested by the variety of answers made to them by our writers, that no Romanist would in earnest have laid such weight on them, as to require of me a more punctual answer to them, than I had before given in the former Chapter. There I had evidenced that the whole world was not S. Peter's Province, but only one portion of one part of the world, the Jewish believers in Antioch and Rome, &c. the Gentile Christians in those very Cities being under S. Paul, and the Jewish of other Countries under other Apostles; those of Asia under John, &c. 4.

This to my understanding made it evident, that in case Christ's Pasce oves, &c. Feed my sheep and my lambs, were granted to be a form of commission, instating of power on him, it must yet be restrained to his particular Province, so as to leave other his fellow Apostles their Provinces also, and not extended to an Universal Pastorship. 5.

But then when this farther consideration was behind, that indeed this of Pasce oves] was not the form of commission to S. Peter, but that in the former Chapter, Joh. 20. 21. As my Father sent me, so send I you, &c. and that to S. Peter in common with the rest of the Apostles, and not the least indication of any branch of power appropriated to him (on which I have already insisted in this Reply, though in that Tract of Schism I did not think it necessary) I hope I may have pardon for not returning to a strict survey of it in that fifth Chapter. 6.

As for that of Tu es Petrus, that was the very text wherein the donation of the Keys was promised to S. Peter, Matt. 16. 18. and that had particularly been examined in both parts of it, both as to the Keys, and the compellation, in the fourth Chap. and the Keys promised him, manifested by other texts to belong equally to all the other Apostles, and so the compellation of stone, or (which is all one, as was there shewed) foundation, or foundation-stone in the building of the Church, bestowed equally upon the rest of the twelve Apostles also. And so considering what I had already done my self, and what others had done much more largely, there remained little appearance of force in those texts, which might suggest to me a more diligent survey of them. And all these together, if not two of them alone, were a competent reason of passing lightly over them in that fifth Chapter, where I was ingaged in a new stage, i.e. of not returning afresh, and loco non suo, to a yet larger consideration of them. 7.

I should now from this notice of his displeasure indeavour to pacifie him by reforming my former omission, and enter upon a yet more solemn survey of these two texts, but that I see him already resolved not to trust his cause to the support which those Texts can afford him, telling me in the close, that he relies not only on such places of Scripture, and if I should dwell longer upon them, I should be thought impertinent, and again reprehended, as forgetting what matter I handle: And therefore till he please to tell me how far he relies on them, and shew me that I have not yet removed them from being a foundation so far to be relied on, I shall spare mine own and the Readers pains, and flatter my self, that I 8.

have said much more to invalidate any conclusion, which he shall infer to his advantage from these two places, than he hath yet said in my hearing, to confirm his pretensions from both or either of them.

SECT. II.

The Bishop of Antioch's Title from succession to Saint Peter equal to the Bishops of Rome. Peter formed a Church there. His dying at Rome no Argument.

Numb. 1. AFter his velitation he now proceeds to the weightier impression, excepting first to an Argument taken from the Primogeniture of Antioch, Thus,

2. Next he urgeth that if the succession to S. Peter were the base of the Popes supremacy, Antioch should
Sect. 3. be the chief See, because S. Peter sat there; wherein to omit his first and second Question, whereof the first is untrue, I answer to the third negatively, that the constituting a Church and Bishop at Antioch, before at Rome, did confer no priviledge extraordinary on that Church, and the reason is clearly deduced out of his second Quære, because it was before Rome, for he could not give any such authority, but by divesting himself, since there cannot be two Heads to one Body, and therefore this authority and priviledge of S. Peter can rest and be no where but where he died.

3. In this matter I must first premise what I had warned the Reader of in that fifth Chapter, Sect. 2. that what I there produced against the power of the Bishop of Rome, under the Notion of Successor to S. Peter, was perfectly ex abundanti, more than needed, the whole matter being sufficiently concluded in the former Chapter, which concerned S. Peter's person, and had shewed that S. Peter himself had no Universal Pastorship belonging to him, or supremacy over any other Apostle, from whence it was evidently consequent, that to his Successor, as such, no such power pertained.

4. This being premised, I did not pretend, that what should then follow, should proceed with that evidence as to demonstrate again what was so sufficiently cleared already; Only to those, whose curiosity was not satisfied, when their reason was, I proposed some considerations, which pretended to no more than this, that beside that Peter had no supremacy, there were also other defects in the Bishop of Rome's tenure, particularly this, that he did no more succeed S. Peter, than the Bishop of Antioch did, nay, that S. Peter having left a Successor Bishop at Antioch, before he did at Rome, the Bishop of Antioch had in a manner the Primogeniture, and by that, as good (if not a better) title to preheminence, as any the Bishop of Rome had, upon that tenure of Succession from S. Peter.

5. Now to this part of Discourse which pretended but to probability, there can lye no exception, unless it appear either to be untrue in any part, or in the whole less probable than what is offered by the Romanist for the other side; And this is now to be examined.

6. And 1. saith he, the first Question is untrue; But he is so reserved as not to express his reason for so saying. I shall therefore give my reasons to the contrary, 1. because a Question cannot be untrue, all truth and falshood being in affirmations and negations (and asking a Question, or proposing a thing to consideration whether it be so or no, is neither of those) in answering, not in asking of Questions.

7. Secondly, Because this Question being resolved into an affirmation, viz. that Peter as truly planted a Church at Antioch, and left a Successor Bishop there, as he is or can be supposed to have done at Rome, it relies on the uncontradicted Testification of antient Writers.

8. By planting a Church, I mean not that he was the first that preach'd the Gospel at Antioch (though Leo the Great seems to affirm it, (in Antiochena Ecclesia primum prædicante beato Apostolo Petro, Christianum nomen exortum est, Ep. 53.) and from thence pleads the right of precedence to belong to that Church (in paternæ constitutionis ordine perseveret) against Anatolius Bishop of Constantinople) for that seems by S. Luke to be attributed to those that were scattered abroad upon the persecution that rose about S. Stephen, Act. 11. 19. but his forming them into a Church or regular Assembly. And that so he did, and left Euodius Bishop there, and after his death, Ignatius the Martyr, is elsewhere manifested at large, and I shall not repeat it, but only add one Testimony (which I suppose will be authentick with him) of Leo the Great, Bishop of Rome, Ep. 62. to Maximus Bishop of Antioch, bidding him be mindful of that Doctrine, Quam præcipuus Apostolorum omnium, beatissimus Petrus, per totum Mundum quidem uniformi prædicatione, sed speciali Magisterio, in Antiochena & Romana Urbe fundavit. Where it is the clear affirmation of that Pope, that S. Peter founded the Doctrine of Christ first in Antioch, then in Rome, by a special authority, or power, or magistery, which he had in those two Cities, more than in the rest of the World. And so I cannot guess what untruth there could be in that affirmation, if it had been such, which was but a consideration, or Question, as he calls it.

9. Next, he saith, that S. Peter's constituting a Church and Bishop at Antioch, before he did the like at Rome, is a proof that he conferred no extraordinary priviledge on Antioch, and renders the reason for it, because he could not do it without divesting himself, and consequently this priviledge must rest no where but where he died, and consequently at Rome only, because he dyed there.

10. That he left any extraordinary priviledge at Antioch, I do not believe, any more than he did so at Rome; and therefore I cannot be required to prove any more than this, that it is as reasonable for me to affirm it of Antioch upon the title of Succession, as for him to assume it of Rome, upon the same Title.

11. From Christ there is nothing that will fix it at Rome, rather than at Antioch; and in the Law of Nations, concerning inheritances, nothing is or can be applied to this purpose. It must needs be then from the free act of S. Peter's will, whatsoever is pretended to. And in respect of that, 'tis sure as reasonable to believe, that he which planted a Church, and placed a Bishop first in one, after in another City, should delegate the διπλὴ τιμὴ, double portion, the greater dignity and priviledges to the former as to the latter. If the Right of Primogeniture be no Right in this matter, yet sure the younger Sister hath neither Law, nor custom, that the inheritance should belong to her.

And

And for his own reason here offered, that it cannot belong to the Elder, that is no reason; For St. Peter might do, as Christ did, make an assignation of power in his life-time, fix it by promise, yet not divest himself of it till his death; And if S. Peter had done so, if at his planting a Bishop at Antioch, on consideration that in that City they were first called Christians, he had decreed that after his own death that Bishop should succeed to all that authority, which he had received from Christ, with power to communicate it to any, I shall ask this Gentleman whether he might not have done it without either divesting himself whilst he lived, or making two Heads to one Body, or whether his bare dying at Rome, would have invalidated any such former act of his in Case he had done so. If it would, there must then be more owing to his death than to his life, to his martyrdome than to his preaching or ordaining of Bishops, that this priviledg belongs to Rome. And then again Jerusalem, where Christ himself died, will by that title of his blood shed there, have a more unquestionable right, than that City where Peter did but faintly transcribe that Copy, which had in a more eminent manner been set him by Christ. 12.

Lastly, If by this Argument of Rome's being the place where Peter died, the supremacy had belonged to that See, precisely or peculiarly, how could it be transferred to Avenion, as we know it was, and there continued for some time? But I shall no longer insist on such fiction of Case, as this, if that had been which never was, what then would certainly have followed, whether if S. Peter had been Universal Pastor, it must eo ipso be concluded that his Successour of Rome, and not at Antioch, was such after him, when it hath been rendred evident in the former Chapter, that S. Peter had no such supremacy. 13.

SECT. III.

The Act of the Council of Chalcedon; of the ground of Rome's precedence. The safety of the Church reconcileable with removing the chief See. Of the Bishop of Constantinople being ashamed of that act. No tumult in the Council. The Story of it.

THE next dislike is to my deriving the original of that precedence which belongs to Rome, as the Council of Chalcedon had derived it, Thus: Numb. 1.

Then he tells you, that the dignity or precedence of the Bishop of Rome is surely much more fitly deduced by the Council of Chalcedon from this, that Rome was then the Imperial City, or ordinary residence of the Emperour: a very wise judgment, that the quality upon which the unity, that is the safety of the Church Universal relies, should be planted upon a bottom fallible and subject to fail; but the resolution was so shameful, that the very Patriarch was ashamed, and imputed it to his ambitious Clergy, who how tumultuary and unruly they were, is to be seen in the Acts of the Council. 2.

Here two Objections are made to the wisdom of that Act or judgment of that Council; and I, that foresaw it would be thus rejected by him, and from thence observed how little Councils are considered by them, when they define not as they would have them, and therefore laid no more weight on that Canon, than the Romanists very rejecting it, allowed me, might now spare the pains of defending the judgment of that Council. Yet it is so easie to return answer in few words to his two Objections, that I shall not decline doing it. 3. Sect. 5.

To the first, that the precedence of Rome, which there I speak of, being a Primacy only of dignity and order, and not of Power, is no such quality, on which the unity and safety of the Church relies. For how can that be concerned what Bishop sits uppermost, gives the first or last suffrage in a Council? This Gentleman thinks of a supremacy or power, when he thus speaks, but that he cannot but know is denied by us to be placed in any one Bishop, and therefore must not imagine me to assign the original of that, to which I deny a Being. And it matters not though he say I am injurious in denying it, for beside that that is petitio principii on his side, to say so, 'tis also certain that the Question now betwixt us in this Paragraph, is not whether I am just in denying that supremacy, but whether it be more than a Primacy of order, which I devolve to this original. 4.

Nay if I had spoken of the supremacy it self, and fixed it on a bottom so far fallible, as that it might be removed by the change of Empires from one City to another, if it were but resolved that the supreme Ecclesiastical Power, and so the fountain of unity should follow the Imperial Seat, I see not why the safety of the Church might not by this means be provided for. 5.

Let it but be judged of in little first, as it is easily supposeable. Suppose the Church of England αὐτοκέφαλος, nay for Argument's sake, suppose there were no other Church but that of England, and suppose there were a supremacy in one Bishop, in him, whosoever were the Bishop of that City, where the Royal Throne were placed, and suppose that that were for the present removed to York, and so that the Bishop of York were the supreme Bishop, and by that means the unity and safety of the Church competently provided for; I shall then demand, in Case the Royal Seat should be removed to Winchester, could there be any Question, but the supreme Episcopal See would be removed so too? and might not all Appeals be made from thenceforth to Winchester, and the safety of the Church be as well provided for by this way, as by its being fixt unmoveably at York? 6.

The Primacy we know hath oft thus been removed, and never more inconvenience come of it, than by S. Peter's See being removed to Avenion. And if any supremacy belonged to any Succession of Bishops over the whole World, and that were never mutable, but by the removal of the Imperial Seat, a certain, illustriously visible thing, it is not easily discernible, how this should more prejudice the safety of the Church, than the change of that power from one Bishop that dies, to his Successour in the same See. But this is still much more than needed to have been said. 7.

As for the Patriarch's (I suppose he must mean of Constantinople) being ashamed of that resolution of that Council, and imputing it to his ambitious Clergy, 1. he gives us not any testimony for this, only saith, that in the Acts of that Council may be seen how tumultuary and unruly they were. And to that affirmation, and that not very pertinent proof of it, I have two things to say, which indeed the Acts of that Council, and the Epistles both of Anatolius Bishop of Constantinople, and Leo Bishop of Rome, may 8.

assure us to have truth in them, 1. That if by being ashamed, be meant retracting or renouncing this resolution of the Council, It then hath no truth in it, that the Patriarch was ashamed.

9. For 1. it is so evident that of all Leo's reprehensions in this matter of the Primacy adjudged him by that Council, Anatolius chose to take no notice, and to return no Answer, that Leo tells the Emperor of it, Ep. 59. maluit prædictus Antistes meam gratulationem tacere, quam suam ambitum publicare, and chargeth it upon Anatolius himself, that he made no reply to what he had said to him; Ad quas cum non rescriberes ipse, te à colloquii nostri consortio separâsti, by not making any return to my admonitory Letters, thou hast thy self separated thy self from the communion of our Discourse, Ep. 71.

10. 'Tis true indeed, when Leo charged it upon him as an act of ambition and pride, that he had procured that Canon to be made (as he doth at large, * Ep. 53. making it an invasion of the Bishop of Alexandria and Antioch his Right setled by the Council of Nice, and so in his † Epistle to Martian the Emperor, and * another to the Empress Pulcheria) Anatolius writing to him upon occasion, tells him that the Clergy of the Church of Constantinople, and ‖ not he, brought this matter before the Council, and therefore Leo needed not to be so angry with him, and complain so sharply against his ambition.

* Colon. Edit. fol. 118.
† Ep. 54. fol. 119.
* Ep. 55. fol. 120.
‖ Culpam quam de augenda potestate, aliena (ut asseris) adhortatione contraxeras, etsi non ad sola Clericorum concilia transtulisses. Leo, Ep. 71.

11. And this I suppose is it which this Gentleman must refer to, if there be the least colour of truth in his suggestion; But sure this disclaiming of pride or ambition in what was done, regularly, according to a long continued custom, and the Canon of the Council of Constantinople, is much more the justifying his innocence, than the acknowledgment of any fault, an act of confidence and assurance, no indication either of guilt or shame, no disowning the dignity confirmed to him by the Council.

12. Many evidences there are in the Story of those times, that the Bishop of Constantinople did no way reject this power and dignity, which that Council had confirmed to him; 'Tis annex'd to the Acts of that Council, how he exercised it in an eminent manner on the Patriarch of Alexandria, Leo the Emperour having put wholly into his hands the judging of a great Affair, and quieting a disturbance in that Church; see the * third part of that Council of Chalcedon. In which matter may be observed that in the Epistle of the Ægyptian Bishops, and Clergy of Alexandria, in a recitation of the Bishops of the whole World, the first place being reserved to Leo the Bishop of Rome, the second is given † Regiæ Constantinopolis Anatolio, to Anatolius of Constantinople the Royal Seat, and then follows Basil of Antioch, and Juvenalis of Jerusalem.

13. And indeed if it be but remembred, 1. That what was done here at Chalcedon, was for the main but the reciting and confirming what was done formerly at the Council of Constantinople (a judgment, saith * Euagrius, that this matter was well ordered already, ἐδικαιώθη ἡ Κωνσταντίνου πόλεως δεῖπνον ἐνθὺς μὲν ἡ Ῥώμης τελέσθαι, and what the Bishop of Constantinople held by Custome before that Council also, † τὸ ἐκ πόλλου κρατῆσαν ἔθος, a custom that had been long in force, and ‖ ἐκ τῆς παλαιᾶς συνηθείας, by a precedaneous custom, &c. Secondly, that this was done by this Council (if their professions may be believed) ὑ τοσοῦτον τῷ θρόνῳ Κωνσταντίνου πόλεως τὶ παρέχοντες, ὅσον ἡ μητροπόλεσι τῶν ἐπαρχίαν πρυτανεύοντες, not so much to add any thing to the See of Constantinople, as to provide for the quiet of other Metropoles in Asia, Pontus and Thracia. Thirdly, That the Council attested all this, and sent a relation of it to the Bishop of Rome, πεπεισμένοι ἂ τῶν ὑμετέρων ἁγιωσύνων διδαχθεῖσαν, ὑποδέχεσθαί τε ταῦτα ἂ βεβαιῶν, being perswaded that he being rightly informed, would receive and confirm it, though his Legates had obstinately opposed it. Fourthly, That all the Objections, which the Pope or his Legates had to it, were proposed and clearly answered in the * Council; that of the contrariety of the Canon to the Decree of the Council of Nice, by reading that Decree, and shewing that it was perfectly reconcileable to it; That of invading the rights of the Metropoles of Asia, Pontus and Thracia, by the several Bishops of those Regions being examined by the Emperours Proxies, whether they consented to it οἰκείᾳ γνώμῃ, ἢ ἀνάγκης τινὸς αὐτοῖς ἐπενεχθείσης, by their own will, or by any necessity imposed on them, and their several cheerful answers, ἀπὸ γνώμης ὑπέγραψα ὡς ἐνώπιον θεοῦ, I subscribed willingly as in the presence of God, and the like, To which if we add the depression of the Bishop of Antioch, which * Leo objects, it is likewise answered by Maximus the Bishop of Antioch his subscription to this Canon. Lastly, That as this was enacted by † Baronius's own confession, by six hundred Bishops, i. e. by the whole Council, not only by a Party of it; So the Bishop of Constantinople Anatolius * subscribed it in the first place, and next after him the Bishop of Antioch; there will be no possibility of finding any truth in this Gentleman's affirmation, that the Patriarch was ashamed of this judgment of the Council.

* ad Maxim. Antioch. Ep. 62. fol. 124.
† Tom. 6. An. 454. N. 13. &c.
* p. 453.

14. It is much more reasonable to affirm on the other side, that the Pope, though not Leo, was ashamed of his opposing it, for within thirty years after, we find Felix III. of his own accord consenting to his Primacy, and acknowledging Acacius Bishop of Constantinople to have power over the Bishops that were under him, Ep. 1. and Innocent III. confirms it with a solemn constitution, cap. Antiqua. de Privileg. that I add not the establishment of it again by the Council of Florence, sess. ult. in lit. Unionis.

15. As for the reason which is here offered to confirm the truth of his affirmation, it hath it self no truth in it, and so cannot be a reason of the affirmation. It is not true; for there was no tumults nor unruliness in the Council, only the Pope's Legates opposed the Canon, and made their complaint to the Judges, and were heard most regularly in all they could pretend, and at length the Canon was defined by the cheerful consent of all but them. See the Story of it in Binius, πεζ. ἐκκαιδεκ.

16. After the passing of the Canon, the Legates, Paschasinus and Lucentius make their address to the Judges, the Ἐνδοξότατοι ἄρχοντες, that supplied the Emperours place, who bad them speak what they would have; They say, that yesterday after the Judges and they were risen, some things were done against the Canons, and desire they may be read. That was appointed to be done; but first Ætius Archdeacon of Constantinople makes a relation, how after matters of faith agreed on, they proceeded according to the manner, to some constitutions, in these they desired the Legates to join with them, they refused saying, they had received commands from Rome to do so, which being remonstrated to the Judges they had bid the Council proceed, and hereupon the Council had unanimously decreed; Appealing to them all whether it were not true, nothing being done ἐν παρέβυσῳ ἢ κλοπῆς τρόπῳ, clancularly or by stealth, but πράξει ἀκολούθῳ ἂ κανονικῇ, of course, regularly and canonically. Then the Canon was read, being a plain recitation

recitation of what was before done in the Council of Conſtantinople, and then all the Subſcriptions follow. Then the Legates deſire it may be enquired, whether none have ſubſcribed by force, ſuggeſting that the Conſtantinopolitan Canon was contrary to the Nicene; Thereupon the Canons were both read, and upon the Judges appointment, they that were moſt concerned, the Biſhops of Aſia, Pontus, and Thracia, who were now brought under the Patriarchate of Conſtantinople, being ſuppoſed formerly to be free, were called out ſeverally, and asked whether they had acted under any force, and they ſeverally profeſs the contrary. Whereupon the Judges ſumm up the buſineſs and conclude, that they had weighed all, and found that none had injury, the priviledges of the Biſhop of Rome were preſerved intire according to the Canons, and that the Biſhop of new Rome, Conſtantinople, was to have equal priviledges with him, &c. And this being their ſenſe, they deſire the whole Council to deliver theirs, and they all cryed out, αὕτη δικαία ψῆφος. ταῦτα πάντες λέγομεν, ταῦτα πᾶσιν ἀρέσκει, αὕτη δικαία κρίσις, τὰ τυπωθέντα κρατείτω. This is a juſt Sentence. This we all ſay, let this be conſigned and confirmed, deſiring they may now be diſmiſs'd every man to his home, and ſo the Judges pronounce, Πάντα ἡ σύνοδος ἐκύρωσε, The Synod hath confirmed all. p. 463.

No diſſent of any but of the Legates, and that, it ſeems, went for nothing when the reſt ſo univerſally conſented; ſo far is this ſuggeſtion from all ſhew of truth, that the Clergy of Conſtantinople were tumultuary and unruly. 17.

If any the leaſt unrulineſs there were, it was on the Legate's part, who would thus ſtand out and complain without the leaſt reaſon to do ſo, not on the Councils, which proceeded according to the precedent cuſtom and Canon, and ſuch grounds to which neither the Pope nor his Legate did then ſo much as object any thing, viz. the ſame title by which Rome it ſelf aſcended to her greatneſs, * by being the Imperial City. 18.

* διὰ τὸ βασιλεύειν τὴν πόλιν ἐκείνην.

SECT. IV.

The Popes judging in his own Cauſe. His Legates ſuffrages in Councils, of what neceſſity. Antioch's equality to Rome. Conſtantinople preferred to no more but a Patriarchy. The dignity of the Biſhop of Rome meerely from Rome's being the Imperial City.

IN this matter of that Council of Chalcedon two Exceptions more he offers (which are not ſo weighty, but they may be put together) in theſe words, Numb. 1.

Secondly, He cavilleth at the priviledge of Supreme Magiſtracy, calling it a method of ſecurity beyond all amulets: then he tells us of Antioch's being equal to Rome, and that Conſtantinople deſired but the ſame priviledges, againſt the very nature of the Story; for Conſtantinople being then a Patriarchy, if that made it equal to Rome, as this Doctor feigneth, what did it pretend ἴσα πρεσβεῖα for? ſeeing the Doctor aſſumes before, that all Patriarchs were equal, neither Rome it ſelf, and leſs Antioch had cauſe to complain. 2.

For the former of theſe, which he calls my cavilling at the priviledge of Supreme Magiſtracy, that ſure is but gratis dictum, and a begging of that, which in the whole Controverſie he knows to be moſt denied him. 3.

That he, that aſſumes a ſupreme Magiſtracy to himſelf, ſhould by no means be concluded to be an Aſſumer, till he make his own confeſſion of it, and give his ſuffrage to his condemnation, I mentioned, and cannot but look upon ſtill, as a method of perfect ſecurity, beyond all amulets and defenſatives; For how can it be imagined, that he, that conteſts a Right, ſhould at the ſame time acknowledge it not to belong to him, when he knows that nothing but this confeſſion is ſufficient to deprive him of it? As for any ſuch priviledge belonging to ſupreme Magiſtracy in general, or any way applicable to the Biſhop of Rome, in relation to a General Council, it may be worth conſidering a while. 4.

And firſt for ſupreme Magiſtracy in general, This priviledge doth not extend to all matters. In a conteſt of particular Right between a ſupreme Magiſtrate and a Subject, brought before any legal judicature, 'tis certain the ſupreme Magiſtrate may be concluded without his own ſuffrage or conſent, and agreeable to that it was, when the Queſtion was brought in this Council before the Judges by the complaint of the Pope's Legates, whether the Canon were the Day before, after the Legate's departure, duely paſſed or no, For if it were not ſo, what needed this complaint to the Judges, the bare abſence, and ſo not conſenting of the Legates had been ſufficient to caſſate and annul the Acts: Whatſoever Magiſtracy therefore was then pretended to by the Biſhop of Rome, this priviledge doth not then ſeem to have belonged to it, that his, or his Legate's ſuffrages ſhould be neceſſary to the paſſing every Canon. 5.

That they might have liberty to come to the Council, that nothing were done clancularly or by ſtealth, at a time when they knew not of it, that no force were uſed on thoſe that were preſent, nor the like to hinder the preſence of any, this was neceſſary to the freedome, and ſo to the very being of a Council, and conſequently to the validity of every Act thereof; and accordingly, on theſe Heads it was, that the Legates in their complaint to the Judges inſiſted (and ſo doth * Baronius, ſtyling that laſt Action of that Council, ſpuriam & clandeſtinam, & ab Anatolio furtim adjectam, a ſpurious clandeſtine action, ſtollen in by Anatolius) as alſo, on the authority of the Nicene Canons, which they pretended to be infringed by that latter of Conſtantinople, on which this of Chalcedon was founded; and this they thought ſufficient to caſſate this Act; but for this of the Pope's or his Legate's ſuffrage, that it ſhould invalidate that Decree, it is not ſo much as pretended by the Legates, in the relations of the paſſages of that Council. 6.

* Tom. 6. Ann. 451. Num. 143.

And therefore according to that Saying of S. Hierome, put into their Canon Law, ſi authoritas quæritur, Orbis major eſt Urbe, if authority be looked for, the whole World is more than the one City of Rome; it is the reſolution of * Almain, merito Concilium Chalcedonenſe Leoni reſiſtenti prævaluiſſe, that the Council of Chalcedon did well in ſtanding out againſt Pope Leo, and did juſtly prevail againſt him. 7.

Decret. par. 1. diſt. 193. c. Legimus.

* de Author. Eccl. 7.

This

8. This amulet it seems had not virtue to stand him in so much stead, as * Baronius is pleased to phansie, setting out the power and greatness of Pope Leo by this, that he did alone cassate what this Council had decreed by the suffrages of six hundred Bishops. Which how well it consists with his former affirmation, that this Canon was spurious and clandestine, and stoln in by Anatolius, I shall not here examine. 'Tis sure, if the Popes authority were so soveraign, the act needed not have been made spurious first, to qualifie it for the cassation. But this of the power or superiority of a Pope over an Oecumenical Council, is a question not so necessary here to be debated, unless what this Gentleman was pleased to mention of the priviledge of supreme Magistracy, had been indeavoured some way to be proved by him.

* Anno 454. Num. 13, &c.

9. Next he quarrels my saying that Antioch was equal to Rome, and that Constantinople desired but the same privileges; and this he saith is against the very nature of the story.

10. That Antioch had the ἴσα πρεσβεῖα, equal privileges with Rome, so far as to the dignity of a Patriarchate, &c. (allowing to Rome the Primacy of order and dignity) I thought was competently concluded from the Pope's pretensions against that Canon of Chalcedon, making it an invasion of the rights of Antioch, and as derogatory to that as to Rome; and so still it seems to me; For if Antioch had not ἴσα πρεσβεῖα, equal privileges with Rome, how could Constantinople's aspiring to equal privileges with Rome, be as derogatory to Antioch as to Rome? But I need not this help from Pope Leo's Argument, the thing asserted by me, is not denied, that I know of, by any Romanist, viz. that Antioch had the dignity of a Patriarchate, for that is all that I express my self to mean by Antioch's having ἴσα πρεσβεῖα, equal privileges with Rome, and I that maintain (as this Gentleman truely saith I do) that all Patriarchs are equal (in respect of Power, differing only in order or precedence) cannot be imagined to mean any thing else by it.

11. So again, that Constantinople desired no more but the privileges of a Patriarch and that that is the meaning of the ἴσα πρεσβεῖα, equal privileges, is by me said in opposition to acquiring any ordinary jurisdiction over other Churches; and this, instead of being contrary to the nature of the story, is directly agreeable to the whole course of it, and to the express words of the Canon, which defines, that as the City of Constantinople was honoured with the Empire and Senate, and enjoyed equal privileges with old Imperial Rome, so the Church of Constantinople (ὡς ἐκείνῳ μεγαλωσύνης) should be exalted to the same height with that, δεύτερον μετ' ἐκείνην ὑπαρχουσαν, having the next place after it; adding that the Metropolitans (and none else) of Asia, Pontus and Thracia, &c. should be ordained by the Bishop of Constantinople, the Bishops of each of those Provinces being left to be ordained by their respective Metropolitans; This is so plain that there can be no need of farther proof of it.

12. And for this Gentleman's Objection, by way of Question, that Constantinople being then a Patriarchy, if that made it equal with Rome, for what did it pretend ἴσα πρεσβεῖα? I Answer, 1. That Constantinople being by custom, and by Act of the Council held in that City, a Patriarchate already, it sought not to acquire any new advantage or increase by this Canon of Chalcedon, but only to continue what already it had.

13. This again appears by the story, where that Canon of Constantinople was produced and read, as the foundation on which this new Canon was built, and so by the express words in the beginning of the Canon, Παραχῶ τοῖς ὑπ' ἁγίων πατέρων ὅρους ἑπόμενοι, &c. following constantly the definitions of the Holy Fathers, and knowing the Canon newly read of the hundred and fifty Bishops assembled in the Reign of the Emperour Theodosius at the Imperial City Constantinople or new Rome. And agreeably Euagrius sets down the story, that in this Council of Chalcedon ἐδικαιώθη it was thought just or determined that the Constantinopolitan See εὐθὺς μετὰ τῆς Ῥώμης τετάχθαι, was rightly and duly placed next after Rome.

14. And when this Gentleman assumes, that if this were so, then neither Rome it self, and less Antioch had cause to complain, I shall most willingly joyn with him in it, being no way obliged by my pretensions to justifie the Pope or his Legates dislike to that Canon. And for Antioch I am sure enough that the Bishop thereof, Maximus, though he had received an Epistle from the Pope to exasperate and perswade him to stand upon his right, did very readily subscribe it, setting his name and consent next after the Bishop of Constantinople, as hath formerly been set down out of the story.

15. And if Antioch did so, who was the loser by it, if precedence signifie any thing? I confess I can render no cause (unless it be the Pompejúsve parem, impatience of any equal) why the Bishop of Rome, who lost not so much as precedence by this advancement or confirmation of dignity to the Bishop of Constantinople, should be so obstinately and implacably offended at it.

16. Thus have I Answered every attempt and tittle of exception offered by this Gentleman in this matter, and have now leisure to complain, that the one thing that I desired to be taken notice of from this Canon, is not so much as considered, or at all replied to by him, viz. that the Dignity that old Rome had by antient Canons injoyed, was given it upon this account, διὰ τὸ βασιλεύειν τὴν πόλιν ἐκείνην, because Rome was the Imperial seat; which as it is the proof of my whole pretension, that the Pope was not Universal Pastor, upon title of his succession from S. Peter, (for if whatsoever he had, the Councils gave it him, οἱ πατέρες ἀπέδοσαν, saith the Canon, and gave it him as Bishop of the Imperial See, then sure 'twas no inheritance from S. Peter) so it was truely observed out of the story of the Council of Chalcedon, and may be seen both in the Legate's complaint to the Judges, and in the Epistles of Leo to the Emperour Martianus, the Empress Pulcheria, Anatolius Bishop of Constantinople, and Maximus of Antioch, and his instructions to his Legates, that he never made any exception to that branch of the Canon that thus derived the original of his greatness from the Imperial dignity of the City, never thought himself injured by this way of setting down his title.

SECT.

SECT. V.

Of the Canon of Epheſus. The power of Metropolitans, of Primates. The caſe of the Archbiſhop of Cyprus no peculiar caſe. The deduction thence againſt the Popes Univerſal Paſtorſhip. Of the Popes tenure by the inſtitution of Chriſt.

THE next Exception concerns the Canon of the Council of Epheſus, thus, Numb. 1.

As for the Canon of Epheſus touching the Archbiſhop of Cyprus, it plainly ſheweth that the Metropolitans were ſubordinate to the Patriarchs, ſeeing this caſe of Cyprus was a peculiar excepted caſe, 2. Sect. 6 the reaſon given doth ſhew that the ſuperiority of Patriarchs was by cuſtom received from their Anceſtors, contrary to that which the Doctor before affirmed; however it is ſtill nothing to the purpoſe, becauſe the authority, which we ſay belongs to the Pope, is neither Patriarchal, nor derived from any inſtitution or cuſtom of the Church, but from the inſtitution of Chriſt.

This Canon of Epheſus, ſaith he, plainly ſhews that Metropolitans were ſubordinate to Patriarchs, 3. ſeeing this of Cyprus was a peculiar excepted caſe. To this I ſee not how any pretenſions of ours oblige me to make any return; yet becauſe it may be ſubject to ſome miſtake for want of excepting, I ſhall clear that whole matter by theſe three Propoſitions.

Firſt, That the Controverſie, which occaſioned that Canon, was this, Whether the Biſhop of Conſtance, Metropolitan of the Province of Cyprus, was to be ordained by the Patriarch of Antioch, or (without ſeeking abroad) by his own Synod, the Biſhops of Cyprus. Thus is the ſtate of the Queſtion ſet down 4. in the Councils, Tom. 2. p. 670. at the beginning of the 7 Action. Diſcuſſa eſt controverſia inter Rheginum Epiſcopum Conſtantiæ Cypri, & Johannem Antiochenum, qui ſibi Cyprias Eccleſias ſubdere moliebatur. The Controverſie was diſcuſſed between Rheginus Biſhop of Conſtance of Cyprus, and John of Antioch, who endeavoured to bring the Cypriots Churches into ſubjection to himſelf.

Secondly, That the antient cuſtom had been favourable to Rheginus his pretenſion, and ſo the claim 5. of Antioch is defined πρᾶγμα παρὰ τοὺς ἐκκλησιαστικοὺς θεσμοὺς — καινοτομούμενον, a thing innovated againſt the Eccleſiaſtical Laws, and ſo τῆς πάντων ἐλευθερίας ἀπτόμενον, that which, by the example, or precedent, would concern the liberty of all Churches. Cod. Can. Eccl. Un. 90.

Thirdly, That the Council defined on the Cypriots ſide, that according to the Canons, and antient 6. cuſtom, the Biſhops of Cyprus ſhould retain their privilege inviolable, δι' ἑαυτῶν τὰς χειροτονίας τῶν ἐυλαβεστάτων ἐπισκόπων ποιούμενοι, ordaining their Biſhops within, and by themſelves; and conſequently, that it was an act of aſſuming, and invaſion in the Biſhop of Antioch, to claim τὰς ἐν Κύπρῳ ποιήσας χειροτονίας, to make any Ordinations within Cyprus. And what was thus adjudged in the caſe of the Cypriots, was by that Council in the ſame Canon, thought fit to be extended in like manner to all other Provinces (τὸ δ' αὐτὸ καὶ ἐπὶ ἄλλων διοικήσεων, καὶ ἐπὶ ἁπασταχοῦ ἐπαρχιῶν παραφυλαχθήσεται, the ſame ſhall be obſerved alſo through all Dioceſes and Provinces every where) ὥστε μηδένα, &c. that no Biſhop ſhall meddle with another Province, which hath not from the beginning been under him, i. e. under his predeceſſors power. And ſo there is no truth in what is here ſuggeſted, that this of Cyprus was a peculiar excepted caſe; It certainly, by the expreſs words of the Canon, belonged to all other Metropolitans and their Provinces over all the world, that neither Biſhop of Antioch nor of Rome was to meddle with any ordinations except in their own particular Provinces, but the Synod of the Biſhops of each Province, δι' ἑαυτῶν τὰς χειροτονίας ἐπισκόπων ποιούμενοι, to make the Ordinations of their Biſhops by themſelves.

What he adds of the ſuperiority of Patriarchs by cuſtom received from their Anceſtors, Firſt, that 7. the reaſon given in that Epheſine Canon doth ſhew it; Secondly, that it is contrary to that which the Doctor before affirmed; Thirdly, that it is ſtill nothing to the purpoſe in hand, of the authority of the Pope; hath not, that I can diſcern, any truth in any part of it. For as to the firſt, whatſoever ſuperiority Patriarchs be acknowleded to have, there is no word of mention concerning it in that Canon, neither was there any occaſion to define any thing of it: It was the Synod, and Biſhops of Cyprus their right, that was invaded and of that only that Canon ſpeaks, devolving it to original cuſtom, and Canons, and ſo for all other Metropolitans. But that is not the ſuperiority of Patriarchs. Secondly, for my affirmation, certainly it was never ſuch as could be deemed contrary either to that Epheſine Canon about ordination of their Metropolitans, or that due ſuperiority, which by Canons or cuſtoms doth belong to Primates or Patriarchs; what this is, I have often ſet down, and need not again repeat it.

Laſtly, For the application of this Canon to the preſent affair of the Univerſal Paſtorſhip of the 8. Biſhop of Rome, thus much is evident, Firſt, that all Provinces every where, αἱ ἁπασταχοῦ ἐπαρχίαι were concluded by this Canon, that they ſhould ordain their Biſhops within themſelves; and then I pray, how can the χειροτονία power of ordaining all, belong to the Biſhop of Rome; and ordination and juriſdiction going together, how can he have the Univerſal Juriſdiction, or which is all one, the Univerſal Paſtorſhip?

Secondly, If the Pope his authority be not Patriarchal, as this Gentleman here ſaith, then till he hath 9. proved that it is more than Patriarchal, and anſwered all that is ſaid to the contrary in that Tract of Schiſm, that which is by the Epheſine Canon judged in order to the Patriarch of Antioch, will alſo conclude him.

And Thirdly, That which is held by the inſtitution of Chriſt, being certainly derived ἀπ' ἀρχῆς, from 10. the beginning, muſt needs be included in the words of this Canon, which requires that all ſhould remain, as by cuſtom (immemorial) from the beginning it had been; to which therefore we appeal, and inquire, whether Cyprus was not as Independent from Rome at that time, as from Antioch; if not, how any ſuch dependance at that time appears, or how is it imaginable there ſhould be any ſuch, when all Provinces every where were to be ruled and ordered δι' ἑαυτῶν by their own Synod and Biſhops.

As for the tenure, by which the Pope is now, in the cloſe of this Paragraph, clearly ſaid to ſtand, 11. not from any inſtitution or cuſtom of the Church, but from the inſtitution of Chriſt. Firſt, This is more than ever this Gentleman would acknowledge before, telling us p. 14. that who underſtands the Principles of the Catholick Faith, knows they relie not only upon ſuch places of Scripture, as, Thou art Peter, and Feed my Sheep, From whence I thought my self obliged to conclude they relied not only on Christ's institution, for that I suppose must be set down in some, and if in any, sure in those Scriptures,

and

p. 10. And in another place, that I forget my self when I think a Catholick ought to prove that the Pope hath an Universal Primacy referring all to his Possession) whereas in case he pretend to hold by the institution of Christ (as here he saith) certainly he is obliged to produce that institution, and that is to prove his pretension.

12. But then secondly, that there is indeed any such thing, that the Pope holds by Institution of Christ, is still the thing denied by us, and the contrary, I think, demonstrated in the former Chapter, and all the places producible for it, answered, and so it must not be here begged or assumed, without any word added for the proof of it.

SECT. VI.

The Exemption of Justiniana Prima; The several Exceptions against this Instance answered.

Numb. 1. HIS next Paragraph pretends to be answer to the evidence brought from the example of Justiniana Prima, which was by the Emperour made independent from any other Ecclesiastical Power. His Answer is this,

2. Then he goes on with two Examples, in which he would perswade us that Justiniana Prima, and Carthage were made exempt Cities by the Emperour, and seeth not that his own instance giveth the Answer, for as in the temporal donation, he doth not exempt them from his own subjection, so neither from the Popes in spiritual, nor as much as giveth them the Style of Patriarchs; though the Bishop of Constantinople in his own City ordinarily had it.

3. That Justiniana Prima was by Justinian exempted from all others (and so from the Bishop of Rome his) Jurisdiction (and so Carthage also, being invested with the same privileges) I thought sufficiently proved by the plain words of the Constitution, that for any differences that should befal in that Province, the Archbishop of that new erection from time to time, should decide them finally, nec ad alium quendam eatur, and they should go to no other for decision, or by way of appeal; and so in the Novel, ἔχῃ ὑπὸ τὴν ἰδίαν δικαιοδοσίαν τὰς ὁπισκόπους, &c. he shall have under his own jurisdiction the Bishops of Dacia, &c which what is it, but a perfect exemption and independency?

4. The same appears also by the other part of the constitution, that concerning ordination of that Archbishop, it was, as was said, to be done by his own Synod of Metropolitans. To which agrees that of the Novel 131. Αὐτόνομος ὑπὸ τῆς οἰκείας συνόδου χειροτονείσθω, He must be ordained by his own Synod.

5. To this Answer given here, and given, saith he, by my own instance, is no more than this, that as in the temporal donation he doth not exempt them from his own subjection, so neither from the Popes in spiritual. But sure there is no force in this comparison; For the not exempting him in temporal things from his own power, doth no way conclude a non-exemption from the Pope; When Henry VIII. removed the Papal power out of this Nation, no man thinks he divested himself of the Regal; the Archbishop of Canterbury was made Independent, and exempt from the Bishop of Rome, but remained still subordinate to the King: So in like manner Justinian might do, make Justiniana a Primacy, and yet leave the Bishop and his whole Province in the same subjection to the Emperour, that before it had been; And as this is very possible, so if it were not the plain truth of the fact, that must be made appear by the Story, or by the investiture.

6. In that, there is no sound of any word for the exempting that Bishop from the Imperial subjection, and so we cannot imagine, without any ground, that there was any such thing; but for Ecclesiastical judicature and ordination, they are both distinctly specified, that he and his Metropolitans should have them within themselves, without fetching them abroad from any other; and so by that, the Bishop of Rome is explicitely excluded from having any thing to do there.

7. This farther appears, not only by the matter of fact, for after the first Archbishop was ordained by Pope Vigilius, his Successours were constantly ordained by their own Metropolitans, and not by the Bishop
* Νεαρ. ρλα. of Rome; but also by farther expres words in the * Novel, ἐν δὲ αὐταῖς κατακυρώσεις αὐτῷ ἐπαρχίας ἢ τοπὸν ἐπέχειν αὐτὸν τῆς Ἀποστολικῆς Ῥώμης θρόνου, In the Provinces subject to him, he shall hold the place of the Apostolical Seat of Rome, i. e. do all within those Provinces that the Bishop of Rome was wont to do, before this Primacy was erected; and this, it seems, by direct consent of Vigilius then Pope, as there it follows, καὶ τὰ ὁρισθέντα ὑπὸ τοῦ ἁγίου Πάπα Βιγιλίου, according to what was defined by the Holy Father Vigilius.

8. Which words if they be conceived to denote no more than a deputation from the Pope, by which this power was held, and so be made use of as an argument to infer his continued dependence on the See of Rome, that will be found to be a mistake, the whole investiture giving the Archbishop there αὐτοκεφαλία a perfect freedom, and absoluteness, to be Head within his Province, independent from all others. And should it by any other way appear that Vigilius, who ordained the first Bishop there (as 'tis sure he must be ordained by some body, and none fitter for it than the Bishop of old Rome) did farther give him a deputation, as I see it affirmed (but not by this Gentleman) both of Vigilius, and after him of Gregory; yet certainly this was but a formality, without any farther effect or influence on the investiture; the privileges of that See, came to it meerly by the Act of the Emperour (and that Act was entred a part of the Imperial Law) to which the supposed addition of the Pope's deputation can be no prejudice; And secondly, the Bishop of Carthage, which by that Constitution is invested with the very same privileges by the Emperour, is not pretended to have received any such deputation from the Pope, and yet by virtue of the Emperour's act was freed from all former dependence, and enjoyed the πρεσβεῖον and δίκαιον μητροπολιτικὸν the privilege of a Metropolitan, in the same manner, as Justiniana did.

9. What this Gentleman adds, that the Emperour gave not so much as the style of Patriarch to the Bishop of Justiniana, though the Bishop of Constantinople in his own City ordinarily had it, will soon appear to to ſignifie nothing; For firſt, the power, not the title, is that we ſpeak of, and that may be had in plenitude, without the name; the Archbiſhop of Cyprus was by the Council of Epheſus adjudged to have all power within himſelf, ſo as to go neither to Antioch nor to Rome for it, and yet was not raiſed to any higher title, than that of Archbiſhop.

Secondly, I ſuppoſe Primate and Patriarch to be perfectly all one, as to matter of power and dignity; 10.
that the Archbiſhops of Conſtantinople and Hieruſalem, ſo ſtyled in the antient Canons, were yet ordinarily called Patriarchs, was no injury to the Patriarch of Antioch, ſaith Theod. Balſamon, himſelf Patriarch of Antioch, in his μελέτη περὶ Παλειαρχ. πεφυμ. διὰ τὴν ταυτότητα τῆς τιμῆς, becauſe of the identity of the honour. And acccordingly in the Councils, the Archbiſhop of Conſtantinople, under that title, is placed before the Patriarch of Antioch, yea and of Alexandria, who yet by the θεῖαι καὶ ἁγίαι γεγραφαὶ, divine and holy Writings (i. e. the Canons) by the πάτριαι παραδόσεις, traditions of the Fathers, was ſtyled Pope, ſaith Balſamon. And therefore for Juſtiniana alſo this was ſufficient; It was made a Primacy, and then it matters not, though it were not ſtyled a Patriarchy; The exemption from Rome and all other foreign power, is all I pretend this City had, and of that there can be no Queſtion, whatſoever title belonged to it.

Thirdly, This Gentleman's ſaying that the Biſhop of Conſtantinople had the title of Patriarch in his 11.
own City, would make one believe that he had it not elſewhere, which yet it is notorious that he had, Παλειάρχας ἀνακηρύτλειν, he and the Archbiſhop of Jeruſalem were publickly called Patriarchs, ſaith Balſamon; and he renders the reaſon, διὰ τὸ ἐπέχειν τὰς πέντε παλειάρχας τοπὸν τῆς μιᾶς κεφαλῆς τῷ σώματος, πλαδὴ τῆς ἁγίων ἐκκλησιῶν τοῦ θεοῦ, becauſe the five Patriarchs (of which number they were two) held the place of the Head of the Body, to wit, of the holy Churches of God. But whatſoever the title were, it is ſtill ſure enough, it had the power and dignity of a Patriarchate, firſt by cuſtom, then by Canons of two General Councils, Conſtantinople and Chalcedon (for I ſuppoſe the ſetting is next and equal to Rome, and before Antioch and Alexandria, will amount to this) alſo by that very Novel of Juſtinian, where Νεαρ. 131.
the privileges are conferred on Juſtiniana, τὸν μακαριώτατον Ἀρχιεπίσκοπον Κωνσταντινουπόλεως τῆς νέας Ῥώμης δευτέραν τάξιν ἐπέχειν μετὰ τὸν ἅγιον ἀποστολικὸν θρόνον τῆς πρεσβυτέρας Ῥώμης, ὥστε ἄλλων πάντων πρωτιμᾶσθαι, the Archbiſhop of new Rome, Conſtantinople, hath the next place after the Apoſtolical See of old Rome, and the precedence of honour before all others. And ſo much for the Exceptions to the fifth Chapter.

CHAP. VI.

An Anſwer to the Exceptions made to the ſixth Chapter.

SECT. I.

The Plea for the Popes power from the converſion of England. Of acquiring of Right by two Titles.

THE Plea from plantation, which was conſidered in the ſixth Chapter, he now proceeds to, in Numb. 1.
theſe words,

In his ſixth Chapter he examineth another title peculiar to England, viz. that our Nation was con- 2.
verted by miſſion from Rome; and this is totally beſide the Queſtion, for no man is ſo ſtupid as to pretend Sect. 1.
S. Peter or the Church of Rome to have power over the Univerſal Church, becauſe his Succeſſours converted England: But ſome pretend a ſpecial title of gratitude, the violation of which, aggravateth the ſin of ſchiſmatizing from the Church of Rome in our Nation, yet no man, as far as I can underſtand, thinks this latter obligation of ſo high a nature, as that for no occaſion or never ſo great cauſe, it may not be diſpenſed with, but only preſs it then when the benefit is ſlighted, or by colourable Arguments to the contrary unworthily avoided: And yet this Doctor quite miſtaking the Queſtion, frameth an Argument, as full of words as empty of Sect. 2.
matter, affirming there cannot be two ſucceſſive titles to poſſeſſion of the ſame thing, telling us, that he who claimeth a reward as of his own labour and travel, muſt diſclaim a donation, &c. if any paſſed before, and that if a King have right by deſcent, he cannot claim any thing by Conqueſt, by which you may ſee his underſtanding the Law, is not much more than his underſtanding of our Principles.

What this Gentleman here premiſeth, that this Plea from the Converſion of this Nation by miſſion 3.
from Rome is not uſed by the Romaniſt to prove us Schiſmaticks, I have no reaſon to confute, but ſhall from thence ſuppoſe that that ſixth Chapter might have been ſpared out of that little Treatiſe, and our Church competently juſtified by the precedent Chapters; And then all that I ſhall need add, is, Firſt, that I hope what was by me added ſuperfluouſly, above the neceſſities of our cauſe, will not deſtroy what was before ſaid pertinently; and then, as I ſhall only have loſt my pains, and there is no farther hurt done, ſo it muſt needs be very unneceſſary for this Gentleman to adapt any farther Anſwers to that ſixth Chapter, when he hath once adjudged all that is there ſaid, to be totally beſide the Queſtion.

Secondly, That if others had been as prudent, as this Gentleman, I had certainly ſpared that Chapter, 4.
It being no intereſt of mine to invent Pleas for the Romaniſt; and although, as this Gentleman hath pleaſed to ſet it, it be a competent ſtupidity, and that which I never thought any Romaniſt guilty of, to make the converſion of England a Plea to power over the Univerſal Church; yet England, and not the Univerſal Church, being the Subject of our Queſtion, there is not quite ſo much ſtupidity in it, to plead the Popes power over England from the ſuppoſed converſion of England. And certainly I did not dream that ſome Romaniſts have thus pleaded, but, as I ſaid before, if this Gentleman will not inſiſt on it, neither ſhall I farther importune him about it.

For that of gratitude which he now mentions only as an aggravation of the ſin of ſchiſmatizing, 5.

which that we are guilty of, he acknowledges muſt be proved by ſome other means, I yield to the force of it, that it might juſtly add a weight to the obligation, which formerly lay upon us, ſuppoſing any ſuch there were, but cannot lay an obligation to obedience where before it was not due, much leſs were it due unto another. All the benefits that can be heaped on me by any man that gives me not my Being, cannot oblige or engage my ſubjection to him, without the intervenience of my own conſent, if I am perfectly free to chuſe my Sovereign, and without the conſent of my former Sovereign, if I have any.

6. So that the whole Queſtion muſt be, whether by any original right, the Biſhop of Rome had power over this Kingdom, and ſo whether by that, our obedience was due to him; for if it were, then this gratitude was not the tenure, but that other; and if it were not, then neither of the titles are in force againſt us; not the firſt, which hath no being; nor the ſecond, which whatſoever it be, obligeth not to obedience.

7. This I thought was apparent by the inſtance of the ſeveral claims to a Kingdom, by deſcent, and by conqueſt, the one of which, if it ſtood, as the title, ſuperſedeth the other, he that holds by inheritance, cannot be properly ſaid to hold by conqueſt, even when it is true that he hath conquered alſo. For in that Caſe, when the right Heir being forced to make uſe of his Sword to give him poſſeſſion, is ſucceſsful and victorious in it, all that his Sword doth, is to give him poſſeſſion, not to give him right, for that he had before by inheritance.

8. That the ſame right cannot be held by two tenures, appears by this; becauſe if it might, it being evidently poſſible that thoſe two tenures might be ſeparated and placed in ſeveral Subjects, the inheritance in one, the conqueſt in another, it muſt follow from thence, that each of thoſe perſons ſhall have the right; which as it is unimaginable, ſpeaking of the whole right or propriety in integrum to the whole power, for if one have it all, the other can have no part of it, ſo if it be applied to a partial right (which more than one may have, either ſeverally, or ſocially, and jointly, to the ſame thing) then that is the changing of the Queſtion, which ſpake of the whole right, and not only of ſome one or more parts or branches of it.

9. And therefore as this Gentleman agrees with me in the concluſion, that Rome hath no title to our obedience, from that of converting us, or if it had, it could not plead the ſame from S. Peter's univerſal Paſtorſhip; ſo I cannot diſcern, why my way of inferring it, was diſliked, or my ignorance in the Laws cenſured, for ſaying that the title of deſcent is excluſive to that of conqueſt, meaning it not of ſeveral parts, of which one comes by deſcent, the other by conqueſt, but of the ſame whole thing, of which he that hath the right by deſcent, may by the ſword and conqueſt vindicate his right, and acquire quiet poſſeſſion, but cannot be ſaid to acquire his right by thoſe means, being ſuppoſed to have had it, before he made uſe of them

SECT. II.

The Britiſh Church not converted from Rome.

Numb. 1. HAving granted me my concluſion, that our obedience to Rome is not due from the Nation's converſion by miſſion from thence, he is yet reſolved to examine my Arguments, by which I prove what he grants. And there be three things, that here he takes notice of. The firſt in theſe words,

2. But to come to ſome matter; His firſt Argument is, that this Iſland was converted before S. Auguſtine's time; ſurely he means by the name of Iſland, the Land and Mountains and Trees, for if he ſpeak of the men, what hath the converſion of the former Iſlanders to do with the ſubjection and duty which the Saxons owe?

3. I anſwer, by this Iſland, I mean not the Mountains, nor Trees on one ſide, any more than the preſent individual perſons on the other ſide, but the inhabitants of it indefinitely, who have ſucceeded one another, whether Britiſh or Saxon by extraction. For, firſt, of the Britiſh it is certain that they were not converted by miſſion from Rome, but were Chriſtians long before S. Auguſtine's coming hither; And Secondly, of the Saxons it may be remembred, that Auguſtine did not abſolutely introduce Chriſtianity among them here, but Luidhardus, that came out of France with Bertha, Ethelbert's Wife, and was a Biſhop here, had prepared the way for Auguſtine. See Bede Hiſt. Eccl. lib. 1. c. 25, 26. And Thirdly, if Auguſtine were the firſt Converter of the Saxons, and ſo that be, without farther Queſtion, granted of him, yet that cannot belong to the whole Iſland, the Dominion of Wales being neither of Saxon extraction, nor converted from Rome to Chriſtianity And this is the deſign of that Argument of mine, In Caſe there were a Duty owing to that See, from whence the Converter came, and in Caſe that were acknowledged to pertain to the Saxons, yet ſtill the Britiſh part would not be concluded by either of theſe, it being certain that their Anceſtors were not comprehended in this number.

4. But becauſe this Gentleman waves this title from converſion, neither ſhall I farther inſiſt to diſprove it; But rather ask, why no Anſwer was made to thoſe teſtimonies, which in that Caſe were occaſionally vouched to ſhew that at the time of Auguſtine's coming into this Iſland, the Chriſtian Church here acknowledged no ſubjection to Rome, or to any other Church, to be due from them; which certainly is ſome prejudice to the claim drawn from the Univerſal Paſtorſhip of S. Peter and his Succeſſor at Rome.

5. To that which is there ſaid for the evidencing this out of the Annals of Giſbourn, It will not be amiſs here to add what our Stories tell us, that when the Pelagian Hereſie, which firſt ſprang from Morgan a Britain, was by Agricola brought into this Iſland, the Britains * unwilling to receive their infuſions, and yet unable to reſiſt them without aſſiſtance from ſome other Church in this time of need, applied not themſelves to Rome, as in their † ſecular diſtreſſes they had accuſtomed, but to their Neighbours of France, who calling a Council ſent Germanus Altiſiodorenſis and Lupus to their aid, by which means the Catholick Faith was much revived and increaſed and propagated among them.

* Neq; ſuſcipere dogma perverſum vellent, neq; verſutiam nefariæ perſuaſionis refutare verbis certando ſufficerent. Bed. l. 1. c. 17. † Bed. l. 1. c. 12, 13.

SECT.

SECT. III.

S. Paul's plantations an argument against the Universal Pastorship of S. Peter. S. Paul's being Bishop of Rome, no answer to it.

THE Argument which he next speaks to, is that wherein from Paul's having planted some Churches, which yet are not subjected to the Chair, where S. Paul sate (whether Antioch or Rome) I conclude against this claim of power from the title of conversion: To this he thus speaks, Numb. 1.

His next Argument demandeth, whether all that S. Paul converted, were obliged to be under him; truly if it were to purpose, I believe there might be proof that S. Paul expected it; but he doth not remember that he told us, S. Paul was Bishop of Rome, and so it cometh to the same question; but indeed he quite misseth the matter, for no body stateth this for the Popes title, but aggravation of the Schism. 2. Sect. 8.

To what purpose it is to say, there might be proof, and yet to produce none, I know not: This only I desire to note, that if any such proof were produced, and, without that, by the bare pretending that it might be proved, S. Peter's Universal Pastorship must be disclaimed, and consequently all right which derives its original from thence. 3.

For S. Paul's labours being more abundant than all the Apostles, 'tis certain great numbers were converted by him, and if all they were to be under S. Paul, how can S. Peter be Pastor and Ruler of all, it being certain, that S. Paul was not subordinate to S. Peter? 4.

And it is of little force what I am reminded of (though sure I never forgot it) that S. Paul was Bishop of Rome, and so it cometh to the same question: For 1. S. Paul being Bishop of the Gentile part of the Roman Christians, as S. Peter of the Jewish, and those then disparate congregations, S. Paul cannot be thought in his converting the Gentiles of other nations, to bring in subjects to S. Peter; And 2. it is evident that S. Paul was not Bishop of Rome when he placed Timothy over Asia, and Titus over Crete, and consequently the conversion and establishment of those Churches was not in any reason to acquire any Dominion to Rome, which S. Paul had never seen at that time, and which was it self converted after those, and that was it which I was proving. 5.

But he bethinketh himself at last, and confesseth that this of conversion is not the Pope's title to England; And having done so before, why might he not have permitted me to bring undeniable evidences for the proof of it? 6.

SECT. IV.

The concernments of Rome in the Princes power to remove Patriarchates. The examples of it. Justiniana, the Canon of Chalcedon, and the the sixth Council. Valentinian making Ravenna a Patriarchate. Ἄνωθεν δοθεῖσα.

TO put this whole matter out of controversie, viz. that the Church of England is not bound to be subject to that Church, from which it first received the Faith, one head of Argument Ipitcht on, the power of Kings to remove or erect Primacies and Patriarchates, which if it hath truth in it, evidently proves, that in case we were once under the See of Rome, as our Patriarchate or Prime See (supposing that of Universal Pastorship disproved before, and not reconcileable with this title to England by having converted) yet it was in the power of our Kings to remove that from Rome to Canterbury. For the proof of this, evidences were brought both from the Council (and that Oecumenical) of Chalcedon, and from the practice of Princes, particularly Justinian in an eminent instance, and Valentinian and others before the Council of Chalcedon, and many the like examples in the Records of this Kingdom, and of others, as is shewed at large, and the ground of all insisted on, the supreme power of Kings in Ecclesiastical affairs, and this is done in sixteen Sections, from the ninth to the end of that Chapter. Against all which (that we may see how true the title of this Gentleman's Book is, An Answer to the most material parts, &c.) that which is confronted, is contained in these words, Numb. 1.

Thirdly, He saith it was in the Emperors power to constitute Patriarchs whether that be so or not, it will not be much to our purpose to dispute here; only this I say, that he seems neither to understand the question, nor proves what he would; he understands not the question, which hath no dependency on the nature of Patriarchs, or terms of gratitude, but on the donation of Christ: he proves not what he would, for he produceth only the act of an Emperour accounted Tyrannical towards the Church, without proof and discussion whether it was well or ill done, which was requisite, to make good his proof; neither doth he say, whether the thing were done or no by the consent of Bishops, especially since the Pope was an Actor in the business; he addeth an Apocryphal decree of Valentinian the third, for giving of privileges purely Ecclesiastical to the Bishop of Ravenna, which out of his liberality he makes a Patriarch, but on the whole matter this is to be observed, that generally the Bishops consents were predemanded or preordered, as in the Council of Chalcedon, Can. 17. it is ordered that the Church should translate their Bishopricks according to the Emperors changing of his City, and when the Emperors did it, it is said they did it according to the power given them, to wit, by the Church; so that a few examples to the contrary, produced in the Reigns of head-strong and tyrannical Princes, as the most of those are noted to be, under whom they are urged, prove nothing; and if they did, yet cannot they be taken as testimonies, when these matters of fact are only so attributed to Princes, as no way to exclude the Church; but whatsoever it was, it doth not at all appertain to the question, since the Popes authority, in the sense he calls him Pope, is not properly Patriarchal, nor hath any dependency upon or from change of places made by the command of Princes. 2.

The first thing here answered is, that it is not much to the Romanists purpose to dispute, whether or no the Emperor hath power to constitute Patriarchs. (He ought to have added, or to translate 3.

them from one City to another; for that is in that Tract alſo expreſly proved; but this I ſuppoſe not without reaſon omitted, becauſe the power to erect or conſtitute, ſuppoſes and implies the power to tranſlate them.) And if this be not this Gentleman's intereſt to diſpute, I ſhall then by his good leave, ſuppoſe it yielded me, and obſerve what the conſequences will be.

4. And 1. In caſe the power of the Pope be a Patriarchal power, and no more, and that appear to be all that the antient Councils ever allowed it to be, then it immediately follows, that it is in the power of the Emperor to tranſlate and remove it from that to any other See; and in that caſe, what befel Conſtantinople by way of advancement, from the title of an ordinary Suffragan Biſhops See, it aſcended to equal dignity and privileges with Rome it ſelf, will in the reverſe be the condition of Rome; from the firſt Patriarchal See in the whole world, nothing hinders but that it may become the See of the moſt ordinary Biſhop. And ſure 'twill be the Romaniſts concernment to diſpute that principle, from which this may poſſibly be the undeniable concluſion.

5. But if, as here it ſeems to be interpoſed, the power of Rome be that of Univerſal Paſtorſhip, no way dependant on the nature of Patriarchs, or on any other tenure, but the donation of Chriſt to S. Peter, then 1. it muſt be remembred that after the refuting of any ſuch right from Chriſts donation in the former Chapters, the removal alſo of this, was in all reaſon to prove of ſome intereſt to the Romaniſt, and ſo it muſt, till the proofs of thoſe Chapters be perfectly anſwered, which yet hath not been done in any degree, as this reply to the few anſwers applyed to thoſe Chapters hath ſhewed.

6. Secondly, This adhering thus wholly to this donation of Chriſt, and the Univerſal Paſtorſhip deduced from thence, is the direct diſclaiming of all the Canonical Privileges belonging to Rome, on the ſcore of Patriarchy, and ſo in caſe that firſt tenure ſhall fail, it is the degrading of Rome from that dignity, which by antient Canon belong'd to it, that of the Prime Patriarchy, and ſo cuts the Romaniſt off from all the advantage he can reap either from the affirmation of Fathers or Councils, any farther than they are founded in, and refer to Chriſts donation of Univerſal Paſtorſhip to Saint Peter; which whether it will prove to be the intereſt of this Gentleman, I muſt leave him to judge for himſelf, and only add in the laſt place, that againſt him that aſſerts the Biſhop of Romes Univerſal Paſtorſhip upon what title ſoever, this will neceſſarily be a ſhrewd prejudice, if it be not diſputed but yielded, that it is in the power of Princes to erect or tranſlate Patriarchies, by Patriarchies underſtanding (as it is evident I do in that diſcourſe) chief Independent authorities over other Churches, ſuch as was by Juſtinian conferred on Juſtiniana Prima and Carthage, by Valentinian on Ravenna without any ſubordination to, or dependence on any other, particularly on the See of Rome.

7. Can any thing be more prejudicial to the Univerſal Paſtorſhip of Rome than this? Can Rome be Paſtor of thoſe who have no dependance on her; or can that be Univerſal, from which ſome particulars are exempt?

8. This made it but neceſſary for this Gentleman to undertake two things in the following words, that I neither underſtand the queſtion, nor prove what I would; for if I ſhall yet appear to judge aright of the queſtion, even as it is by this Gentleman brought back to that which had been debated in the former Chapters, whether the Biſhop of Rome be Univerſal Paſtor by Chriſts donation to S. Peter, and if I have really proved that it is in the power of Emperors and Princes to conſtitute and remove Patriarchies, It will certainly follow, that I have done all that I undertook to do, evinced the matter of the queſtion, and ſhewed that it is in the power of Princes to exempt ſome Churches from the Popes dominion, and ſo ſuperſeded the Univerſality of his Paſtorſhip.

9. As for the validity of my proofs, that muſt be judged by the view of the Anſwers applyed to them, 1. that I produce only the act of an Emperor accounted Tyrannical towards the Church. To this I anſwer, Firſt, That the word [only] excluding all others, the propoſition can have no truth in it, it being evident that I produce many other acts of the ſame Imperial power, as the Reader may find by caſting his eye on the place, the latter part of that ſixth Chap. and this Gentleman himſelf ſhall be my witneſs, (who ſaith of me [he addeth an Apocryphal decree of Valentinian] which though it be not a recitation of all that are by me added, yet is ſufficient to teſtifie the contrary, to what the [only] had affirmed.)

10. Secondly, The character that is given that Emperor, whoſe act I firſt produced, that he is accounted Tyrannical towards the Church, will, I ſuppoſe, ſignifie but this, that he that did any thing derogatory to the Univerſal Paſtorſhip of the Biſhop of Rome, is by this prejudged from yielding us any competent teſtimony in this diſpute; which is in effect, that this Gentleman is in the right, and all that is, or ſhall, or can be brought againſt him, muſt ſignifie nothing; which ſure is not the way of anſwering arguments, but adhering to concluſions, without weighing what is or can be brought againſt them.

11. Thirdly, For that particular act, and the Emperor which is thus cenſured: It is Juſtinian, that great and famous Emperor, his making the Biſhop of Juſtiniana Prima the head of all Dacia, &c. of which this Gentleman had paſt a very different judgment, when it came under his view in the former Chapter.

12. There his anſwer was, the Emperor exempted it not from the Popes ſubjection, pag. 15. and yet now when the very ſame paſſage comes in his way again, he hath forgotten himſelf; and the Emperor, that juſt now had as great care of the Popes ſpiritual power, as of his own civil, is in a moment become Tyrannical towards the Church. I deſire one of theſe anſwers, being thus engaged, may make good the conteſt againſt the other.

13. But then Fourthly, whatſoever can be ſaid of that Emperor in other reſpects, 'tis certain that this erecting of Juſtiniana, was no act of tyranny againſt the Church; but the very thing that is authoriſed by the ſeventeenth Canon of the General Council of Chalcedon (which is one of thoſe that the Pope at his conſecration ſolemnly vows to obſerve, and all the Ordinances made in them) for that reſolves, that if any City be built or reſtored by the Kings power, the Eccleſiaſtical order muſt follow the Political, τύποι i. e. the βασιλικὰ πραγμάτα, ſaith the Scholiaſt, the Imperial decrees concerning that City * ἔχειν ἀξίωμα ἢ μητροπόλεως, to have the dignity of an Epiſcopal or Metropolitical See. And the ſame again in the ſame words was decreed by the ſixth Council in Trullo, Can. 38. from whence certainly Balſamon's Concluſion is irrefragable, † ὅτι ἔξεστι τῷ βασιλεῖ πρυτάνια ἐκκλησιαστικὰ ἀφαιρεῖσθαι, that it

* Balſam. in Concil. in Trull. Can. 38.
† 1 Concil. Chal. 17.

it is lawful (and ſo ſure not Tyrannical) for a Prince to take away (or remove) the privileges of the Church of any City, and * ἀναλυτὴν τὰ βασιλέα αὐτῷ χάειν τῶν ἐπισκοπικῶν δικαίων, to determine, as he ſhall pleaſe, * Ib. pag. 342. concerning the Privileges of Biſhops.

His ſecond Anſwer is, that I do not ſay whether the thing were done or no by the conſent of Biſhops, 14. eſpecially ſince the Pope was an Actor in the buſineſs. To which I anſwer, that when I have made it appear to be the Act of the Emperour, and that by the Canons of Councils it was acknowledged fully lawful for the Emperor, and ſo for other Princes, to do ſo; I need neither enquire whether the conſent of Biſhops, or of the Pope himſelf were added to it; ſuch formalities of conſent may be had or omitted, without any diſturbance to, or influence on the matter.

His third Anſwer is applied to that Act of Valentinian, which made Ravenna a Patriarchate, and 15. firſt he calls the Decree of that Emperor an Apocryphal Decree; 2. He ſaith that it was giving to the Biſhop privileges purely Eccleſiaſtical, reproving me for making him a Patriarch. For the firſt, I anſwer, that as I never thought it any piece of the Canon of Scripture, by which Valentinian did this, or any more than a Reſcript of an Emperor, which, if ſuch, is certainly ſufficient to expreſs it an Imperial Act, ſo the authorities for this, may reſcue it from farther Queſtion; for though it were not Baronius's intereſt to believe it, and ſo it is by him ſuſpected of forgery, An. 432. n. 93. yet even he acknowledgeth it to be very antient, and owned by ſeveral Writers, n. 92. and afterwards, when the ſame authorities which are produced for this, Hier. Rubeus, and the Records of Ravenna, ſeem to favour his grand deſign, i. e. make for Rome, he can then very fairly make uſe of them, though it be but a narration of a viſion, An. 433. n. 24. But I need not lay more weight on this, than the Apocryphal (as he calls it) Decree will be able to ſupport; this is no ſingular Precedent, many examples there are of the like, which are there mentioned in the Tract of Schiſm.

For the ſecond, Patriarchal power Ravenna had, without any dependence on the Biſhop of Rome, 16. and I pretend no more for the Biſhop of Canterbury, and therein alſo ſhall bate him the title of Patriarch. What he adds (by way of obſervation on the whole matter) Firſt, that generally the Biſhops conſents were predemanded or preordered, as in the Council of Chalcedon, Can. 17. Secondly, that what the Emperors did, they did by the power given them by the Church, will ſoon appear to bring him little advantage, For

1. The Biſhop's (I ſuppoſe he means the Biſhop of Rome's) conſent was not asked; One part of the 17. Story is, that when the Biſhop of Ravenna, being fain to flye to the Biſhop of Rome for ſupport againſt the Longobards, ſubmitted himſelf to him, the people of Ravenna thought themſelves injured thereby; And 2. it is not truly ſaid, that it was preordered; and the Canon of the Council of Chalcedon cannot be brought to that purpoſe, this Act of Valentinian's dated Anno 432. being nineteen years before the Council of Chalcedon, which was aſſembled Anno 451. and ſo ſure not preordained by that which was ſubſequent; And indeed the Canon of that Council mentioning Cities and Churches in the plural, which had been * before the Seſſions made Metropoles by ſeveral Kings, is a clear evidence that there were other ſuch, beſide that of Ravenna, and † Balſamon expreſſeth them by the name of Madyta and Abydus, &c.

* ὅσαι ἢ ἤδη πόλεις διὰ γεγραμμάτων βασιλικῶν τῆς μητροπόλεως ἐτιμήσαν, Can. 12. † διαφόροι βασιλεῖς ἐπισκοπὰς εἰς μητροπόλεις ἐτίμησαν, Balſam. in Can. 12.

Thirdly, If this be acknowledged an Act of Council confirming the lawfulneſs of what the Emperor 18. had thus done, and decreeing (as clearly the Council of Chalcedon and that other in Trullo did) that generally it ſhould be thus, that as the Prince made an ordinary City a Metropolis, the Church of that City ſhould be a Metropolitical Church, then ſtill this is the fuller evidence, that it was lawful for Princes thus to do, and that as oft as they did, ſuch changes in the Churches followed; for ſure a King was not obliged to ask the Churches leave to repair or build a City.

Laſtly, What out of Balſamon was cited by me, that what the Emperors did in this matter, they 19. did according to the power that was given them] was, it ſeems, either an occaſion of ſtumbling to this Gentleman, or an excuſe of it; For from hence he concludes, that this power was given them by the Church; This if it be true, is the thing that I would demand, and ſo, far from anſwering mine inſtance: for if the Church have given Princes this power, then they may freely and lawfully make uſe of it; and Juſtinian's doing ſo, could be no tyrannical act againſt the Church. But let us view * Balſamon's * in Chalced. words, They are theſe, τὰς τοιάυτας γινεσθαι θεσμὰς παρὰ μὲν βασιλέων καὶ τὴν δοθεῖσαν αὐτοῖς ἄνωθεν ἐξουσίαν, Can. 12. ſuch definitions are made by Kings according to the power given them from above. The word ἄνωθεν from above, ſometimes ſignifies in reſpect of time, ſometimes alſo in reſpect of place; In the firſt reſpect it ſignifies from of old, and is oft joined with ἀπ' ἀρχῆς, from the beginning; and if it be ſo taken here, as Gentianus Hervetus interprets it olim, it muſt then ſignifie, that this power was yielded to Kings either by the Apoſtles, or by the Primitive Canons of the Church; and if it were thus given them by the Church, then ſure they might juſtly challenge and exerciſe it freely. But in the ſecond ſenſe, it is as certain that ἄνωθεν ſignifies from above, i. e. from Heaven, ſo Joh. 19. 11. Chriſt tells Pilate, thou couldſt have no power over me, εἰ μὴ ἦν σοι δεδομένον ἄνωθεν, unleſs it were given thee from above, i. e. ſure from Heaven, from God, by whom Kings reign and have their power, and ſo it very frequently ſignifies in the * Scripture; And if that be the meaning, then this Gentleman ſees how well he hath inferred his concluſion from this paſſage. * Jam. 1. 17. 3. 15, 17, &c.

By all this it already appears what truth there is in this ſuggeſtion, that the examples produced are 20. but few, and thoſe of tyrannical Princes, and no way excluding the Church] juſt as much, and no more, as was in the premiſſes, which induced it, and thoſe being diſcovered already, it is ſuperfluous to make repetitions ſo ſoon in this place.

In the cloſe he thinks fit to retire again to his old fortreſs, that the Popes power is not Patriarchal, 21. and ſo that he is ſtill ſafe from all that hath been ſaid on that Head; But it hath now appeared, that if any other be made a Patriarch or Primate, or (whatever the ſtyle be) a Biſhop without any dependence on the Pope, this is a prejudice ſufficient to his Univerſal Paſtorſhip, and other diſadvantages he is rather in reaſon to expect by diſclaiming the Patriarchal authority, which the Canons have allowed him, than hope to gain any thing by contemning his inheritance.

An Anſwer to the Exceptions made to the ſeventh Chapter.

SECT. I.

King Henry's deſire of Reconciliation to Rome. The Sacriledge, &c. no Argument againſt Regal Power to remove Patriarchies. Poſſeſſion in the belief of the Popes ſupremacy. Preſcribing for errour. Napier's teſtimony. Poſſeſſion, if granted from Auguſtine's coming into England, no Argument of truth. Confeſſions of Popes. Auguſtine required it not. Pope Gregory's teſtimony. Many evidences that this belief was not received after Auguſtine's time.

Numb. 1. WHAT in the next place is replied to that part of the ſeventh Chapter, which concerned Henry VIII. his act of ejecting the Power of the Pope, will be full matter for a firſt Section of this Chapter. He begins thus,

2. Begun in Henry the VIII.

In his ſeventh Chapter he intends a juſtification of the breach, whereof as he doth not teach the infamous occaſion, and how to his dying day the ſame King deſired to be reconciled, as alſo that it was but the coming two days ſhort of a Poſt to Rome, which hindred that the reconcilement was not actually made, as may be ſeen in my Lord of Cherbery's Book fol. 368. and that the moderate Proteſtants curſe the day wherein it was made; ſo the very naming of Henry VIII. is enough to confute all his Diſcourſe, one of the Darlings of his Daughter having given him ſuch a Character, as hath ſtamped him for England's Nero to future Poſterity, and as it was ſaid of Nero in reſpect of Chriſtian Religion, ſo might it be of him reſpecting the unity of the Church, viz. it muſt be a great good that he began to perſecute and aboliſh: and as for the Acts paſſed in the Univerſities, Convocation or Parliament, let the blood ſhed by that Tyrant bear witneſs what voluntary and free Acts they were, eſpecially thoſe two upon his Seneca and Burrhus, Biſhop Fiſher, and the Chancellor More, that he might want nothing of being throughly parallel'd to Nero.

Sir Walter Raleigh in Pref. to Hiſtor. of the World.

But methinks the Doctor differs not much in this, ſeeming tacitely to grant the Biſhops were forced, awed by that noted Sword in a ſlender Thred, the Præmunire which did hang over their Heads, though in the concluſion of that Section he ſays we ought to judge charitably, viz. that they did not judge for fear nor temporal Intereſts, yet after waves the advantage of that charitable judgment, and ſaith, That if what was determined were falſly determined by the King and Biſhops, then the voluntary and free doing it, will not juſtifie; and if it were not, then was there truth in it, antecedent to, and abſtracted from the determination, and it was their Duty ſo to determine, and crime that they were unwilling: laying the whole weight of the Argument upon this, that the pretenſions for the Popes ſupremacy in England, muſt be founded either as Succeſſor to S. Peter in the univerſal Paſtorſhip of the Church, ſo including England as a Member thereof; or upon paternal Right reſpecting S. Auguſtine's converſion, or upon conceſſion from ſome of our Kings, &c. To which I anſwer, that we rely on the firſt as the foundation and corner-ſtone of the whole building; On the ſecond as an action worthy the Succeſſor of S. Peter, which requires a grateful conſideration from us; And on the third not as a conceſſion, but as a juſt acknowledgement of what was neceſſary for the good of Chriſtian Religion, taught our Kings by thoſe who taught them Chriſtian Religion; of which belief, I mean that the Pope as Succeſſor to S. Peter is Head and Governour of the Univerſal Church, we have been in poſſeſſion ever ſince the converſion of our Engliſh Anceſtors, then Saxons, to the Chriſtian Religion, made by Auſtin the Monk ſent hither by Pope Gregory for that purpoſe; until that good King Henry VIII. out of ſcrupuloſity of conſcience (no doubt) was pleaſed to cut the Gordian knot of thoſe Bonds, within which all his Anceſtors limited themſelves; neither ſhall all that the Doctor and his Fellows have ſaid, or can ſay, juſtifie themſelves ſo, but that ſuch a poſſeſſion, as I here ſpeak of, will convince them of Schiſm, though all thoſe Replies, which by ours have been forty times made to every one of thoſe Arguments the Doctor uſes, ſhould bear but equal weight in the Scale, which we think hoiſes it up into the Air, for the Arguments muſt be demonſtrative and clear to men of common ſenſe, that muſt overthrow ſuch a poſſeſſion; and therefore it is, that the Puritans, who are much leſs friends to the Church of Rome than to the Church of England, wave all diſputing out of Antiquity, and confeſs that the Church of Rome hath born a ſway without any debatable contradiction over the Chriſtian World twelve hundred and ſixty years, a time that no King in the World can pretend to by ſucceſſion from his Anceſtors for poſſeſſion of his Crown, and yet I believe the Doctor would conclude thoſe Subjects guilty of Rebellion, which ſhould go about to deprive ſuch a King of his Crown, though he could not ſhew Writings evidently concluding for him twelve, fourteen, fifteen or ſixteen hundred years ago, how much more if he could ſhew them demonſtrating his Right, in the interpretation of as wiſe and learned men as the World hath, and twenty times the Numbers of their Adverſaries.

Napier on the Revelation.

3. The firſt thing here objected to my Diſcourſe, is, as Orators are wont to do for the raiſing of paſſions, a mention of ſome circumſtances, which though extrinſecal to the matter, may yet hope to have ſome influence on an unwary Reader, and infuſe no ſmall prejudices into him; ſuch are the infamous occaſion of the breach begun by that King, and ſuch is the odious character faſtned on him of England's Nero, &c.

4. But it cannot be neceſſary for me to offer an Apology on either of theſe two Heads; If that which he did in this particular of ejecting the Papal power, be in it ſelf juſtifiable, both in reſpect of the matter of the action, and the competency of the power that did it; it matters not what moved him to do it, or how inclinable he was to have reſcinded it. The farther he were from a truly pious man, the more likely it is, he might be brought by ſecular intereſts (and the leſs likely that it was by any religious) to undo all that upon the weightieſt grounds of reaſon, had been eſtabliſhed by him. Without examining therefore the truth of that ſuggeſtion, that to his dying day he deſired to be reconciled, and without demanding what is meant by that Phraſe, deſired to be reconciled, whether any overture to receive the Pope on his own terms, into full poſſeſſion again, or only a deſire to approve himſelf to the

Pope,

Pope, that he ſtill maintained the Catholick, nay Roman Faith (as we know he put men to death for denying ſome Doctrines profeſt at Rome) that what he had done was no whit injurious to him, prejudicial, or derogatory to any right, which could juſtly be challenged by the Pope in this Kingdom; without either of theſe inquiries, I ſay, If I ſhall take for granted the utmoſt that can be pretended, that for a long time together he deſired to have reſcinded what he had done, I ſee not what diſadvantage this can be to our pretenſions.

For 1. I ſhall demand, was he all this while, that he thus deſired to be reconciled, a truly changed and Pious Prince, was that principle of wicked life ſo ſoon eradicated, which even now denominated him a Nero, and made it fit to eſteem that a great good, which he began to aboliſh, and did he thus continue a new, reformed penitent to his dying day? If ſo, then truly Sir W. R. was very unkind and unchriſtian, in recording his crimes, and omitting his repentance; and it is no excellent part of this Gentlemans character, that he thought fit to imitate and quote him in this; the ſame injuſtice in an Hiſtorian or Obſervator, that it had been in Euſebius to take ſo much of the life of Conſtantine out of Zoſimus or Julian Cæſar's, as ſhould render him juſtly odious, and to omit the whole latter part of his life, which was ſo eminently vertuous and Chriſtian. 5.

But if this Prince ſtill continued to be like that image, which here is pourtrayed of him, then ſure I ſhall with the ſame evidence of proof, be allowed to object thoſe vices, and thoſe no excellent Chriſtian motives that incited it, to his deſire of being reconciled, or his willingneſs to re-admit the Papal power into this Kingdom, and conclude, that the ejection of it muſt be a great good, which he was ſo inclinable to aboliſh, and ſo, the faith of the reformed, which he ſo more than began to perſecute; and all this as regularly as his perſonal vices, and the infamous occaſion, be it never ſo truly ſo, can be objected to that act of State, which paſt in that Kings reign, for the diſclaiming the Papal powers among us. 6.

Nay, if that paſſage in his ſtory had acquired a yet farther degree of Truth, if the Poſt had come two days ſooner to Rome, and ſo had actually compoſed the difference between that King and that Pope, ſo as had been moſt for the intereſt of Rome, yet it is evident, that my diſcourſe had no way been concerned in this; This evidently had been no more, than what afterwards came to paſs in Queen Mary's days, and it would ſtill be in the power of King Henry's immediate ſucceſſor, to remove the power from Rome to Canterbury, as it had been in the power of Henry either to do it, or undo it again. 7.

And therefore the whole matter ſtill devolves (as it did in the Tract of Schiſm) to that one queſtion, whether the Biſhop of Rome had at that time any real authority here, which the King might not lawfully remove from him to the Archbiſhop of Canterbury, and muſt be decided as there it is, by the view of Evidences, whether that pretended from Peters Univerſal Paſtorſhip, or that from Auguſtine's planting Chriſtianity here, or that from the voluntary conceſſion of ſome Kings; and each of them is ſo diſproved there, that till ſome competent anſwer be rendered to thoſe particulars, (which certainly is not yet done by this Gentleman, who only here tells us the manner how he relies on each of theſe, and the poſſeſſion they had of the belief that the Pope was head of the Univerſal Church) 'tis perfectly unneceſſary farther to conſider what is here added, only to inflame paſſions, but not to ſatisfie Conſcience, to exaſperate, not to argue. 8.

For what if moderate Proteſtants ſhould truly curſe the day, &c. or, in a more Chriſtian dialect, expreſs their diſlike to the great Sacriledge, and ſome other enormities, which were committed in that Princes reign, what prejudice will this be to any lawful exerciſe of that regal power? 'Tis certain that all the Acts of a bad Prince are not invalid or null; and much more evident ſtill, that he that hath not offended in aſſuming the power which really belongs to him, may by being denyed that, be inraged, and laid open, to importune Temptations, and if he be not a through Chriſtian, conſtant and maſterly, fall, and that foully, under thoſe temptations. And if Henry VIII. did ſo, ſtill this is very extrinſecal to the preſent inquiry, whether he as King had power to remove a Patriarchy, and by that, to remove all foreign juriſdiction or authority out of this Church. 9.

All that remains in this Section, farther to be ſpoken to, is the poſſeſſion that is here pleaded, not in the power it ſelf, (if it were, that hath formerly been ſpoken to) but in the belief, that the Pope as ſucceſſor to S. Peter, is head and Governour of the Univerſal Church; This belief, ſaith he, they have been in poſſeſſion of, ever ſince the Converſion of our Engliſh Anceſtors, till King Henry; and for this, beſide his own bare affirmation, he brings no other proof, than one teſtimony of Napier on the Revelation, confeſſing that the Church of Rome hath born a ſway over the Chriſtian world above twelve hundred years. 10.

And Firſt, for this kind of Poſſeſſion, poſſeſſion in the belief of any thing, any farther than that which is believed is true, and that appear ſome other way, than by our having ſo long believed it, certainly this is no matter of any deep conſideration to us, If it ſtill appear to be true upon grounds of reaſon, thoſe grounds are the conſiderable, and not the belief. And if the grounds be diſcovered to be fallacious and the contrary to be more reaſonable to be believed, then ſure this hath but the advantage of an Antient errour, and the older it is, the fitter not to be longer continued in, it muſt be immediately depoſited. And againſt this, or inſtead of doing thus, to talk of poſſeſſion, is unnatural and irrational, the ſame plea that may ſerve for any ſin that hath had the luck to get the firſt hold in us, the ſame that would certainly have held for all the Idolatry of the Heathens, when Chriſt came into the world; And he that hath long lived in obſcurity and miſery (he, and his Anceſtors) for many years together, and were now offered an advancement out of that ſad condition, would he ever be ſo unkind to himſelf as to refuſe that offer, upon this one account, becauſe it is the turning him out of a poſſeſſion? This preſcribing for Errour, and preſcribing for Sin, and preſcribing for Miſery, are in effect the ſame, equally unnatural and irrational, ſuppoſing it to be truly Errour, and Sin, and Miſery, which we treat of. 11.

But then Secondly, waving this, and applying our ſelves to the particular before us, how doth it appear that the Romaniſt hath been in poſſeſſion in this belief, ſo long as he pretends? He here brings but one Teſtimony to confirm it, that of Napier; But for this teſtimony the anſwer is eaſie, that the affirmations or confeſſions of ſuch as Napier was (and is by this Gentleman acknowledged to be) in their 12.

arguing arguing againſt the credit of Antiquity, or to make good other Hypotheſes of theirs, are of as little authority with us, as I ſuppoſe they will be with them, when they are contrary to their pretenſions or intereſts; Secondly, that the Popes bearing a ſway over the Chriſtian world, is not interpretable to ſignifie his Univerſal Paſtorſhip; The Biſhop of the Prime imperial See, may juſtly be very conſiderable, and ſo bear a ſway, but it follows not thence, that his ordinary juriſdiction hath been thus extended to the whole Chriſtian world.

13. Nay Thirdly, the contrary to this hath been ſufficiently evidenced Chap. 4. and 5. both as concerns S. Peter himſelf, and the Biſhop of Rome as ſucceſſor to S. Peter; and till thoſe evidences are refuted, the affirmation of Napier being ſo imperfect and infirm, both in reſpect of the teſtifier and the matter of the teſtimony, will be very unfit to bear ſway with any rational man.

14. And ſo the whole weight of this argument preſt with ſo much confidence, is reſolved into the bare authority of the Speaker, this Gentleman, who ſaith it, that ever ſince the converſion of the Engliſh Nation, the Romaniſts have had poſſeſſion of this belief, that the Pope, as ſucceſſor to S. Peter, is Governour of the Univerſal Church.

15. And that I may apply ſome anſwer yet more particularly to this, I ſhall premiſe one thing, that if indeed this were granted, which is ſuggeſted, it would not be of any great force toward the inducing of this concluſion, that the Pope really was and is Univerſal Paſtor. For ſuppoſing the Pope to have aſſumed that authority, at the time of Auguſtine the Monk his coming into England and making his plantation, and ſuppoſing him to have preacht this to King Ethelbert, and the reſt of his Proſelytes, with the ſame gravity and confidence, that he uſed in imparting all the Doctrines of Chriſtian Faith (in the ſame manner as Xaverius the Apoſtle of the Indies, imparted to them two Goſpels, the one of Chriſt, the other of S. Peter) I ſhall not doubt but upon theſe grounds it would be very conſequent, that all, that willingly imbraced the preaching of Auguſtine, and had no other Doctrine to compare it with, or examine it by, ſhould probably receive this branch of belief, and ſo all others from and after them, that inſiſted firmly and punctually on Auguſtine's way; and thus 'tis poſſible the poſſeſſion of that belief might be continued till the days of Henry VIII.

16. But then this is no proof, that what in this particular Auguſtine affirmed, was true, or that the belief of it had poſſeſſion in the whole Church before; Nay, the contrary will be moſt evident, that at that very time the Britiſh Biſhops acknowledged not any ſuch power over them in the Pope or any other, as is cited from the Abbot of Bangor, Cap. 16. Sect. 5. and much more to the ſame purpoſe.

17. And 'tis no news to remind him out of their own Canon Law, that ſome of their Popes have diſclaimed (and that not without great averſation and deteſtation of the arrogance of it) the title of Univerſal Biſhop or Paſtor, and acknowledged it as a very ominous Symptom in any that ſhall aſſume it; and conſidering the prejudices that lye againſt it, from the firſt œcumenical Councils, all the Ordinances whereof, the Popes at their creations vow to maintain inviolably, and againſt which to conſtitute or innovate any thing, ne hujus quidem ſedis poteſt authoritas, it is not in the power of this See, ſaith Pope Zoſimus, 25. qu. 1. c. Contra. I may juſtly conclude that all are obliged to do the like.

18. But then ſecondly, what truth there is in it in theſi, that from S. Auguſtine's plantation to this time of Henry VIII. the Romaniſts have been in poſſeſſion of this belief of the Popes Univerſal Paſtorſhip, muſt be conteſted by evidences. And 1. for Auguſtine himſelf, it appears not by the ſtory in Bede, that he did at all preach this doctrine to the nation; nay, as upon Auguſtine's demand concerning ceremonies, Pope Gregory binds him not to conform all to the Canons or practice of Rome, but bids him * freely chooſe that which may moſt pleaſe God, whereſoever he finds it, ſive in Galliarum, ſive in qualibet Eccleſiâ, whether in France, or in any other Church, & hæc quaſi in Faſciculum collecta apud Anglorum mentes in conſuetudinem deponere, make up a Book of ſuch Canons to be obſerved in England (which clearly ſhews that the Romiſh Canons were not to be in power in England) ſo when the difference betwixt him and the Britiſh Biſhops (of whom it hath been ſhewed that they acknowledged not the Pope to have any power over them) came to be compoſed, he required compliance and obedience from them but in three things, the † obſervation of Eaſter according to the order of the Church of Rome (and the Nicene Canon) the Miniſtration of Baptiſm, and joyning with him to preach to the Engliſh; Which is ſome prejudice to the founding of this belief in Auguſtine's preaching.

* Eccl. Hiſt. l. 1. c. 27.

† Ib. l. 2. c. 2.

19. Nay when Bede comes to ſpeak of Gregory then Pope, by way of Encomium at his death, the utmoſt he ſaith of him is, that cùm primum in toto orbe gereret Pontificatum, & converſis jamdudum Eccleſiis prælatus eſſet, &c. being Biſhop of the Prime Church in the whole world, and ſet over thoſe Churches which had been long ſince converted, and having now taken care to propagate that faith to England, he might juſtly be called our Apoſtle, and ſaith as S. Paul did, that if to others he were not an Apoſtle, yet he was to us.

20. As for that of Univerſal Paſtorſhip, certainly we may take Gregory's own word, that no ſuch thing was then thought to belong to him, in his Epiſtle to Eulogius Biſhop of Alexandria, viſible among his works, and inſerted in the * body of their Canon Law. Nam dixi, &c, I told you that you were not to write to me or any other in that ſtyle, and behold in the Preface of that Epiſtle directed to me who thus prohibited, you have ſet this proud appellation, calling me univerſal Pope or Father, which I deſire you will do no more, for it is a derogating from you, to beſtow on another more than reaſon requires; I count it not my honour, wherein I know my brethren loſe their honour; My honour is the honour of the univerſal Church, My honour is, that my brethren ſhould enjoy what fully belongs to them (ſo I render fratrum meorum ſolidus vigor) then am I truly honoured, when the honour, which is due to all, is denied to none. For if you call me univerſal Pope, you deny that to your ſelf which you attribute all to me; And farther tells him, with expreſſions of averſation, Abſit and recedant— that this honour had by a Council been offered to his Predeceſſors, in the Council of Chalcedon (that gave it equally to him and the Biſhop of Conſtantinople, which is in effect to give to neither the power or ſenſe, but only the title of it) but no one of them would ever uſe this title. This ſure is evidence enough, that if at that time any ſuch belief of the Univerſal Paſtorſhip of the Pope entred this Nation, it muſt needs be the belief of a known acknowledged falſity, and ſo far from a bonæ fidei poſſeſſio.

* B. Greg. Ep. ex regiſt. l. 7. Indict. 1. c. 30. * Par. 1 diſt. 99. Eccl.

After

After this, what poſſeſſion this belief had among us, may be judged by ſome of thoſe many * inſtances put together by the Biſhops in Henry VIII. his days, as the premiſes whereon that King built his concluſion of ejecting that Power which was then uſurped by the Pope. 21.

* l. de diff. Reg. & Eccl. Poteſt.

Firſt, a ſtatute, that for Eccleſiaſtical Appeals, they ſhall in the laſt reſort lye from the Archbiſhop to the King, ſo as not to proceed any farther without the King's aſſent. 22.

Secondly, That Turſtan Archbiſhop elect of York, asking leave of the King to go to a Council deſigned by Calixtus, had it granted with this reſerve, that he ſhould not receive Epiſcopal benediction from the Pope. 23.

Thirdly, That the Kings of England from time to time, had and exerciſed authority of making Laws in Eccleſiaſtical matters; Eight ſuch Laws are there recited of Canutus's making, the like of King Ethelred, Edgar, Edmund, Æthelſtane, Ina King of the Weſt Saxons, and King Alfred. 24.

Fourthly, That William the Conquerour inſtituting and endowing the Abby of Battel, gave the Abbot exemption from all juriſdiction of any Biſhops, aut quarumlibet perſonarum denominatione, from all dominion or rule of any perſons whatſoever, ſicut Eccleſiæ Chriſti Cantuarienſis, in like manner as the Church of Canterbury; Which imports two things, 1. that the Church of Canterbury had no ſuch Ruler over him (but the King) and 2. that the Abbot of Battel was by regal power inveſted with the ſame privileges. 25.

But I ſuppoſe all theſe, and many the like inſtances, which might be brought, derogatory enough to the poſſeſſion in this belief here pretended, will but add one more to the number of ſuch Arguments, of which this Gentleman ſaith, that they have forty times had replies made to them; And truly this is a good eaſie compendious way, which as it ſecures him againſt all that can be produced, ſo it doth not encourage me to ſpend time in collecting and producing more, and therefore this ſhall ſuffice to have added now concerning this matter, being apt to flatter my ſelf, that theſe Arguments are demonſtrative and clear enough to men of common ſenſe, to diſprove, and ſo to overthrow this Poſſeſſion. 26.

SECT. II.

Queen Mary's retaining the Supremacy. Power of refuſing Legates, unreconcileable with the Popes Supremacy.

THE next Paragraph is an account of a Paſſage cited by me from the Story of Queen Mary, Thus, Numb. 1.

Queen Mary's titular retaining of the Supremacy, until She could diſpoſe the diſordered hearts of her Subjects to get it peaceably revoked, is no authority for the Doctor; She never pretending it to be lawfully done, but that She could not do otherwiſe; no more is her refuſing of a Legate, which in all Catholick times and Countries hath been practiſed and thought lawful. 2.

What civil or ſecular motives they were, which kept that Queen ſo long from rejecting the title of ſupreme in her own Kingdom, I ſhall not need to enquire; If it were no unpardonable ſin in her to continue the title, and exerciſe of that power, which was incompetible with the Pope's univerſal Paſtorſhip, then why ſhould it be ſo heinous in her Father to aſſume it? Her never pretending that it was lawfully done, ſignifies very little, as long as She pretends not the contrary, that it was unlawful; The truth may well lye in the middle, that She thought it lawful to retain it, yet lawful alſo to beſtow it on the Biſhop of Rome, and upon the ſtrength of the former perſwaſion, my charity obligeth me to think, that She did the former, and in force of the latter it is poſſible alſo, that She did the latter, though poſſible too, that She did it upon reaſon of State, the validity of her Mother's Marriage, and conſequently her legitimation depending upon the acknowledgment of the Pope's abſolute power in this Nation. 3.

But the truth is, her opinion or practice is of no more force one way, than the other, and therefore was taken in as a ſupernumerary Obſervation, and not ſuch as on that alone to found any grand Argument. 4.

As for the power of refuſing a Legate from the Pope, I cannot diſcern how that is reconcileable with the Popes pretenſions to ſupreme power in this Kingdom; Can it be lawful for any Province to refuſe a Procurator, or Prætor, or Proconſul, ſent ſolemnly commiſſionated by the lawful Prince? Was it lawful for the Tenants or Dreſſers of the Vineyard, to deny entrance to the King's Son, or but Servant? Is not this a derogation to ſupreme power and domination? If this be practiſed and counted lawful in all Catholick times and Countries, this is to me an indication, that in no time or Country there hath been poſſeſſion of this belief, that the Pope is the ſupreme Paſtor of all; for ſure if he were, his Legate which is his Image, might in power of the Original, require admiſſion, and he that is πεμπόμενος ἀπ' αὐτῆς thus ſent and commiſſionated by him, muſt by S. Peter's Precept, be allowed obedience from all his Subjects, and ſo from that Queen, if ſuch She were, and ſuch She muſt be, ſo far as he had the Supremacy. 5.

So again, when Cardinal Petou was ſent to be Biſhop of Sariſbury, the denying him that Biſhoprick, was a check to the Pope's abſolute ſupremacy; but of that, this Gentleman was in prudence to take no notice. 6.

SECT. III.

King Edward's Reformation. The Duke of Somerſet. The Duke of Northumberland, his Treaſon no prejudice to the Reformation under that King.

HIS next Exception is to the Paſſages concerning King Edward VI. King Henry's immediate Succeſſor, Thus, Numb. 1.

King Edward a Child of nine years old fell into the hands of wicked and ambitious Traytors, who knowing 2.

the Kingdom affected for Religion-ſake to Queen Mary, to cut off her Succeſſion, and introduce their own, thought fit to ſtrengthen their faction, which beſide what they might hope from abroad, conſiſted of many Lutherans and Calviniſts at home: thoſe two Sects having by opportunity of that rupture in Henry VIII. his time, ſpread and neſtled themſelves in many parts of England.

3. What is here ſaid hath little of truth in it, and as little of Argument, if it were truth. That the youth of the Prince can be no foundation of Argument againſt the legality of what was done by the Duke of Somerſet his Uncle, the Protector, in his nonage, was ſufficiently ſhewed before, and might be exemplified through all times and places. That this Protector ſhould at this time, when the young King legally fell into his hands, be ſtyled a wicked ambitious Traytor, hath not any degree of truth in it, the crime for which he afterward loſt his life, being far from any diſloyalty to his Sovereign.

4. As for the Duke of Northumberland, who obtained the King's conſent to ſettle the inheritance on Jane Grey, and accordingly, after the King's death, proclaimed her Queen, and ſuffered as a Traytor for ſo doing, all that I ſhall need to ſay is this, 1. That this act of his, how trayterous ſoever, cannot juſtifie what is here ſaid, that the King at nine years old fell into the hands of Traytors, for that one Duke cannot truly be called Traytors in the plural, and the King at that age did not fall into his hands, but into the hands of Edward Seymour Duke of Somerſet, under whom the ſix Articles, and other Acts of ſeverity againſt the Proteſtants, were called in, and the Acts againſt the Papal authority confirmed, the Romiſh Maſs abrogated, the Bible tranſlated, and publiſhed in the Engliſh tongue, the Liturgy reformed, and the publick Offices performed in Engliſh, the Sacrament of the Lord's Supper adminiſtred in both kinds, &c. And ſo whatſoever was afterward done (were it never ſo trayterouſly) by the Duke of Northumberland, could have no influence on this change, and is therefore very impertinently here inſerted, after the manner of the Orator, not the Hiſtorian, to raiſe paſſions, inflame diſlikes and averſions in the Reader, and not to give him any exact view of the truth of the Story.

5. Secondly, That the deſign of the Duke of Northumberland not ſucceeding, but coſting him ſo dear, the loſs of his own life, and hers, whom he ſet up to be Queen, and the Succeſſion regularly deſcending on Queen Mary, there can be no reaſonable account given, why this treaſon of that Duke ſhould here be propoſed as the one conſiderable, it being evident in the Story, that all things were compoſed to the full ſatisfaction of Queen Mary, and juſt as they ſhould have been, in Caſe that trayterous attempt had never been made by that Duke.

6. To which I might add, that this treaſon of his, was founded on that very act, which in the next Paragraph this Gentleman thinks fit to vouch as authentick, and if it were ſo, that could be no treaſon in that Duke, viz. the act whereby Mary as well as Elizabeth were adjudged illegitimate, and ſo uncapable of the Succeſſion. But theſe are conſiderations very extrinſecal and remote from the matter, as it lies here in the conteſt between us.

7. I ſhall only, for concluſion, obſerve, that if, as he ſaith, the Kingdom were for Religion's ſake affected to Queen Mary, it could not certainly be skilful, or popular, or any way Politick in them that thus deſired to ſtrengthen themſelves, to introduce this change in Religion. For whatſoever aid they might hope for, either from Lutherans or Calviniſts at home or abroad, ſure they might have hoped for more by the other way, if it be true what he affirms of the Kingdom indefinitely, that it was affected to Queen Mary's Religion. For that other Kingdoms of Europe generally were ſo at that time, there is ſmall Queſtion.

SECT. III.

Queen Elizabeth's illegitimacy anſwered. The unpolitickneß of her Counſels of Reforming.

Numb. 1. NOW follows his Exceptions to that part of the ſtory which concern Queen Elizabeth; The firſt by the bye, Thus,

2. Queen Elizabeth being by Act of Parliament recorded a Baſtard, and ſo pronounced by two Popes, and therefore miſtruſting all her Catholick Subjects, who She feared did adhere to the Queen of Scots title, in which She was then likely to be ſupported by the King of France Her Huſband, was by the advice of men partly infected with Calvaniſm or Lutheraniſm, partly ambitious of making their fortunes, caſt upon that deſperate counſel of changing Religion; deſperate I ſay, for ſee amongſt what a number of Rocks She was, in conſequence of that Counſel forced to ſail, witneß her adhering to the Rebels of all her Neighbour Kings, ſo provoking them thereby, as if the French King had not been taken out of this World, and wind and weather fought againſt the Spaniſh Armado, in all likelihood She had been ruined, eſpecially her Catholick Subjects being ſo provoked as they were, by moſt cruel and bloody Laws: but this by the bye: though from hence the Reader may judge of reaſon of changing Religion in her time, and what a ſolid foundation the Church of England hath.

3. That Queen Elizabeth was by Act of Parliament recorded a Baſtard, hath no farther truth in it, than is of force againſt Queen Mary alſo, The ſame Act of Parliament affirming the Marriages with Queen Katharine, and Ann of Bullen void, and their Children Mary and Elizabeth illegitimate, and ſo involving them equally under the ſame cenſure.

4. Nay, if there were any force in this (as this Gentleman by mentioning it, is obliged to think there is) it muſt be much more to Queen Maries diſadvantage; for 'tis certain that upon the birth of Queen Elizabeth, 'twas enacted by Parliament, that the marriage with Katharine was null, becauſe inceſtuous, and ſo this with Ann lawful (which certainly it was, if the former was inceſtuous; and the reſolution of the Univerſities and moſt learned men, not only in England, but at Paris, and elſewhere was, that it was of ſuch a nature, as it could not by the Pope's power be diſpenſed with, being ſo contrary to the Law of God) and by the ſame Act, Elizabeth is declared Heir of the Kingdom, in Caſe the King ſhould have no Heir male, and Oath of Allegiance taken to the King and to his Heirs by Ann the Mother of Elizabeth. And to conclude, the ſubſequent Act, that decreed the Succeſſion, and eſtabliſh'd it firſt in Edward, then in Mary, then in Elizabeth, by which it was that Mary did actually aſcend to the throne, was equally favourable to both of them.

And ſo ſtill if any thing were to be concluded from this Gentleman's proœmial conſideration, it ſtill 6. lies more againſt Queen Mary, than againſt Queen Elizabeth, if not in reſpect of the merit of the cauſe (on which this Gentleman will give me leave to ſuppoſe it was, that our ſtories tell us, that the Pope had given Cardinal Campegius his Legate a private Bull, much in favour of the King's pretenſions, but kept it under ſome reſtraint till he ſaw how the Emperor's affairs in Italy would ſucceed) yet in reſpect of the ſeveral declarations againſt the one, and but one only againſt the other, and that how well founded, is eaſie to diſcern, if this were a place for ſuch diſputes.

But it is not ſo, much leſs for the other Politick conſiderations that here follow, whether the coun- 7. ſel of re-excluding the Papacy, and proceeding to a farther Reformation in her Kingdoms, were a deſperate Counſel or no; For if to this Gentleman's Arguments I ſhall grant it were ſo, the concluſion will be only this, that her action was unskilful in ſecular conſiderations, from which it is no way conſequent, that it was more than, as Princes ſhe had power to do, or impious in the ſight of God, or that that, which being built on ſo feeble a foundation, proved yet competently ſucceſsful, is by this means concluſible to have been unlawful and null, for in that alone can be founded the truth of the ſuggeſtion here, that we that adhere to her Reformation, muſt be adjudged Schiſmaticks.

SECT. IV.

The Ordination of Biſhops in Queen Elizabeth*'s time. Mr.* Maſon*'s Record. Introducing of Turciſm.*

WHAT remains on this Head of Queen Elizabeth, as the Narration after this long Proœm, the Numb. 1. ἔργον, after an acknowledged (yet larger) πάρεργον, will be ſoon diſpatch'd; It is thus,

How far Maſter Maſon can juſtifie the Ordination of Queen Elizabeth*'s Biſhops, I will not now exa-* 2. mine; but certain it is, that the Record (if there be ſuch a one) hath a great prejudice of being forged, ſince it lay ſome fifty years unknown amongſt the Clamors againſt the flagrant Act, and no permiſſion given to Catholicks to examine the ingenuity of it; but howſoever, it is nothing to our purpoſe, for whatſoever material miſſion they had by an external conſecration, thoſe Biſhops, who are ſaid to have conſecrated them, are not ſo much as pretended to have given them order to preach the Doctrine, or exerciſe the Religion they after did, which is the true meaning and effect of miſſion. I cannot end without noting in his 24. Parag. the foundation upon what he himſelf ſays his whole deſign relies; which is, that becauſe the receſſion from the Roman Church was done by thoſe, by whom, and to whom only the power of right belonged legally, viz. the King and Biſhops of this Nation, therefore it is no Schiſm, that is, whatſoever the reaſon of dividing hath been, even to turn Turks, or for violating never ſo fundamental points of Religion, yet it had not been Schiſm.

What Mr. Maſons Records are, and of how good and unqueſtionable authority, I leave to the view 3. of his Book, which ſets down all ſo particularly, and irrefragably, that nothing can be more contrary to the Gentlemans intereſts, than the moſt ſtrict examination of that whole matter, in order to the vindicating and juſtifying this truth, that the ſucceſſion of Biſhops, and order Eccleſiaſtical hath been regularly preſerved in our Church, at that time, when alone the Romaniſt accuſeth us for the interruption of it, i. e. in Queen Elizabeth's Reformation. (To which head of diſcourſe it is not amiſs to add the reſolution of Cudſemius the Jeſuit, de deſper. Calvini causâ, Cap. 11. that the Engliſh Nation are not Hereticks, becauſe they remain in a perpetual ſucceſſion of Biſhops.)

Which being the only thing that in that Sect. 16. I purpoſed to conclude from Mr. Maſons work, 4. and the Records by him produced, it lyes not on me to prove that they which ordained thoſe Queen-Elizabeth-Biſhops, gave them order to preach the Doctrine they after did, or to examine the truth of his ſuggeſtion, that this is the true meaning and effect of Miſſion. It may ſuffice that they which conſecrated them, gave them the ſame power which themſelves derived by ſucceſſion from the Apoſtles, and that was ſufficient to authorize them to preach all Apoſtolical doctrine; and if they preacht any other, let it appear, and I ſhall never juſtifie their preaching. But that is not attempted here, and therefore I have herein no farther matter, that exacts reply from me.

For as to his parting blow, which he cannot omit, in reply to Sect. 20. certainly it hath little impreſ- 5. ſion on my diſcourſe in that place, which doth not inquire what is unlawful or criminous Univerſally, for then ſure I ſhould have acknowledged that the bringing in Turciſm, or violating fundamental points of Religion had been ſuch, but peculiarly and preciſely this, what is Schiſm, in that one notion of Schiſm, as that is a voluntary ſeparation from our Eccleſiaſtical Superiors; of which that we are not, or cannot be guilty, when we act in perfect concord, compliance and ſubordination to all thoſe to whom the right of ſuperiority legally belong'd, is I ſuppoſe, ſo manifeſt, that it can need no farther proof.

As for any ſuch act of lawful Superiors in bringing in Turciſm, or violating fundamental points, I 6. ſhould not be apt to ſtyle that Schiſm (any more than I would call perjury, lying, or inceſt, ſimple fornication) it being in the firſt part of the inſtance, Apoſtaſie and total defection from Chriſt, which I hope is a little more than denying the Popes Univerſal Paſtorſhip, or Infallibility of the Church (in which conſiſts his grand ſpecies of Schiſm) and in the ſecond, Hereſie, and the groſſeſt ſort of Schiſm together, that of departing from the unity of the Faith, which being by me Chap. 8. diſtinctly handled, as a ſecond ſpecies of Schiſm, all that I need here ſay to this Gentleman's exception, is, that I indeavoured to ſpeak as diſtinctly, and not as confuſedly as I could, and therefore did not mix things that were diſtant, and therefore did not ſpeak of that ſecond kind of Schiſm at the ſame time when I propoſed to ſpeak of the firſt only, and upon this account only ſaid nothing to it in that Chapter. And I hope this was but my duty to do, agreeably to all rules of method, and ſo that he might very well have ſpared that animadverſion which he ſaith he could not end without noting.

CHAP. VIII.

An Answer to the Exceptions made to the eighth Chapter.

SECT. I.

The Division of Schism. An Answer to many Questions about Schism. A retortion.

Numb. 1. IN proceeding to the view of the eighth Chapter, this Gentleman, without any cause, is pleased to change the division of the second sort of Schism there handled, into another, which it seems was more suitable to his understanding, and then to make two light skirmishes against the discourse of that Chapter. He begins thus,

2. In this eighth Chapter, as far as I understand, he divideth Schism into formal, that is, breach of unity; and material, that is, breach of Doctrine or Customs, in which the Church was united; the former he
Sect. 4. brancheth into subordination to the Pope, of which enough hath been said; and breach of the way provided by Christ for maintaining the unity of faith, the which he puts in many subordinations without any ef-
Sect. 5. fect; For let us ask, if inferior Clergy-men dissent from their own Bishops, but not from their Metropolitan, in matter of faith, is it Schism? he will answer, No: If a Metropolitan dissent from his Primate, but agree with the rest of the Patriarchs, is it Schism? I think he must say, No: If a Patriarch dissent from the first, but agree with the rest, is it Schism? No: If a Nation or a Bishop dissent from the rest of the General Council, is it Schism? still I believe he will answer, No: Where then is Schism provided against? or where truly is there any subordination in Faith? if none of these are subject, and bound to their Superiors or Universals in matters of Faith?

3. What my division there is, will be obvious enough to any man's understanding. In the third Chapter the foundation had been laid in the opposition betwixt Schism and Ecclesiastical Unity, and as the unity was the conserving of all due relations, whether of subordination, or equality, wherein each member of Christ's Church is concerned one toward another, so there were two prime branches of Schism, the one against the subordination which Christ setled in his Church, the second against the mutual charity, which he left as his Legacy among Christians. And the former of these being discussed at large in order to the present debate, in the eighth Chapter, the method led me to the latter of them, to consider Schism, as it is an offence against the mutual unity, Peace, and Charity, which Christ left, and prescribed among Christians; And that I might be sure not to straiten the bounds of this sort of Schism, or omit any thing, that can, by any rule of discourse, be placed in the borders or confines of it, by this means either to lay charge on us, or render our Vindication the clearer, I distributed it into as many parts, as in my opinion the matter could by any be thought to bear, i. e. into three species,

1. A breach in the Doctrines or Traditions (together with the institutions of Christ, his Apostles, and the Primitive Church, whether in government, or observances.)
2. An offence against external peace or Communion Ecclesiastical.
3. The want of that Charity which is due from every Christian to every Christian.

The first of these again subdivided and considered, 1. in the gross, as it is a departing from the rules appointed by Christ for the founding and upholding unity of Doctrine, &c. 2. in particular, the asserting of any particular doctrine, contrary to Christ's and the Apostolical pure Churches establishment.

4. The Scheme being thus laid as regular, and as comprehensive, as I could devise. 1. here is not one word said to express any cause of dislike or exception to it; and yet 2. it is quite laid aside, and another of formal and material Schism, &c. substituted instead of it, upon what temptation or design, save only a willingness to gain somewhat by the shuffle and confusion, more than the distinctness of discourse could yield him, I cannot divine.

5. As it is, I yet discern not the particular advantages he had in his intuition, but suppose them latent and reserved; For to his special discovery that he means to make by asking (and supposing answers to) many questions proportionable to the several links in the subordination, the account will be easie enough, that as long as any particular Bishop remains in the due subordination to his Canonical Superiors, so long the departure of any Clergy-man that is under his jurisdiction, from that obedience which Canonically he ows him, is in him that is thus guilty of it, an act of Schism.

6. But then first, when instead of departure he puts dissent (which may belong to light matters, wherein liberty of dissent from Superiors, is yielded to all men; or to greater matters, without departing from obedience or Commmunion) this is not fairly done, this difference having a visible influence on the matter.

7. Secondly, When of the inferior Clergy-man's dissent from his own Bishop, he makes me answer that it is not Schism, if it be not from his Metropolitan, I never gave him my Letter of Proxy to do so: But on the other side, if the dissent be supposed to be improved into a departure (which alone makes Schism) I shall not doubt to pronounce it Schism, unless he have first made his appeal from his Bishop to his Metropolitan, and by him and his Council of Bishops be adjudged to be in the right; and then, if his Bishop by that judgment be reduced to order, he may not, he cannot again without Schism depart from him.

8. Thirdly, When from Primates he ascends to Patriarchs, as if that latter had a power superior to the former, and again from the Patriarchs to the first Patriarch, i. e. the Bishop of Rome, this he knows hath no place with us, who acknowledge no power of any Patriarch above a Primate, no supremacy over all in the Bishop of Rome, but yet allow them and him (proportionably to the Πρῶτος Σίμων, if that will content him) that Primacy of order, which by the Antient Canons is allowed them.

Fourthly,

Fourthly, Whatsoever concerning these several steps from the lowest Clergy-man to the first of Patriarchs, he phansies to be answered by us, and from thence concludes, that then Schism is no way provided against, is visibly much more true of any Romanist; For certainly if he dissent not from the Bishop of Rome, it must be no Schism in him, though he dissent from his own Bishop, his own Archbishop, Primate, and Patriarch; and if he do dissent from him, 'tis not his consenting with all his inferior Governours, that will stand him in stead for his vindication. 9.

And therefore if what he hath formed against me, by his making Answer himself to his own Questions, be found really to conclude (as he saith it doth) against all subordination, 'tis now evident, who is most blameable for it, he doubtless, that hath divolved all into the Monarchick supremacy of the Pope, and permits us not to consider what any other our immediate Superiors require of us. 10.

Lastly, What he puts into my mouth by way of Answer, concerning subordination to a General Council, that if a Nation or Bishop dissent from the rest of a General Council, still it is not schism; unless, as I said, there be deceit in substituting the word Dissent, for Departure or Recession, I shall no way acknowledge the Answer which he believes I will make: For certainly I acknowledge, as much as he, or any man, the authority of a General Council against the dissents of a Nation, much more of a particular Bishop. And these were misadventures enough to be noted in one Paragraph. 11.

SECT. II.

The sufficiency of the few Heads resolved on by the Apostles. The Notion of Fundamentals. The Canon of Ephesus concerning it. The definition of the Council of Florence. Many Churches have not betrayed this trust. Christian practice to be superadded. The few things preserved by Tradition.

NEXT he proceeds to another part of the Discourse of that Chapter, concerning the Heads resolved on by the Apostles, in order to planting Christian life; and to that he thus offers his Exceptions, Numb. 1.

But, saith the Doctor, the Apostles resolved upon some few Heads of special force and efficacy to the planting of Christian life through the World, and preaching and depositing them in every Church of their plantation. Truly I do not know what a Catholick professeth more, so that by the word few, he meaneth enough to form a Religion, and Christian life, and will shew us a Church which hath not betrayed the trust deposited; for if there be none, what availeth this depositing? if there be any, clear it is that it preserveth it by Tradition; if there be a Question whether it hath or no, again I demand to what purpose was the depositing? so that if the Doctor would speak aloud, I doubt he would be subject to as much jealousie, as he saith Grotius was. 2.

That what I affirm, as he confesseth, conformably to the Catholicks profession, may be as full and explicite as he can desire, I doubt not to express my meaning to be, that the few Heads, that the Apostles resolved on, were sufficient both for number and efficacy, or in * Athanasius's language, ὡταρκης πρὸς ἀναίρεσιν πάσης ἀσεβείας, σύστασιν δ' εὐσεβείας ἐν Χριστῷ, sufficient for the averting all impiety, and establishment of all piety in Christ; And for his satisfaction therein, I refer him to the Treatise of Fundamentals, printed since that of Schism, of which the only design was to insist on this, as the grand Notion of Fundamentals, such as were by the Apostles and Christ himself, deemed most proper and effectual to plant Christian life in a World of Jews, and Gentiles, and briefly to set down and enumerate all those that the Apostles thought thus necessary. 3. * Epist. ad Epict.

To which I shall now add one observation, that this sufficiency of the foundation by them laid, and somewhat explained (on occasion of Heretical Opposers) by the Council of Nice, &c. was such, that the Ephesine Council following that of Nice, a hundred and six years, made a Decree, ἑτέραν πίστιν μηδενὶ ἐξεῖναι προφέρειν ἤγουν συγγράφειν, ἢ συντιθέναι παρὰ τὴν ὁρισθεῖσαν, &c. that it should not be lawful for any man to produce, write, or compose any belief beside that which was established by the Fathers at Nice, and that they which should dare to compose or offer any such to any that would from Gentilism, Judaism, or whatever Heresie, convert to the acknowledgment of the truth, if they were Bishops, should be deposed from their Bishopricks, if Laymen, anathematised, &c. Can. 7. 4.

And this authority being prest by the Greeks to the Latines, in the Council of * Florence, and that with this smart expression, οὐδεὶς ἐγκαλέσει ἀτέλειαν πίστεως, εἰ μή τις εἴη μαινόμενος, No man will accuse the Faith (that which those Fathers had profest) or charge it of imperfection, unless he be mad, Concil. l. 7. p. 642. A. The Latines Answer is but this, that that Canon did not forbid, ἑτέραν ἔκθεσιν σύμφωνον τῇ ἀληθείᾳ ἐν τῇ πίστει, another explication agreeable to the truth contained in that Creed, acknowledging that it did forbid διαφορὰν καὶ ἐναντίωσιν, difference as well as contrariety (pag. 644. b) and even for such a bare explication they counted not that lawful for any but the Fathers convened in O Ecumenical Synods, citing it from Aquinas, 2a. 2æ. qu. 1. ar. 10. and adding that he spake, περὶ ὁτινοσοῦν συμβόλου, ὅπερ ἦν κοινὸν τῆς ἐκκλησίας, of any Creed whatsoever which was common to the whole Church. 5. * Sess. 10. Ib. p. 641. D. 6.

And accordingly there follows out of the Epistle of Celestine to Nestorius, ἡ πίστις ἡ παραδοθεῖσα παρὰ τῶν Ἀποστόλων, ὅτε προσθήκῃ ὅτε μείωσιν ἀπαιτεῖ, The belief delivered by the Apostles requires neither addition nor diminution. So in the seventh Council, which hath full authority with the Romanist, that second at Nice, Act. vi. Concil. t. 5. p. 734. A. speaking of the six Councils foregoing, we have these words; Πάντα τὰ παραδοθέντα ἐν τῇ καθολικῇ ἐκκλησίᾳ καὶ ἐγγράφως καὶ ἀγράφως ἐκ τῆς ἀρχῆθεν χρόνων αὐτοῖς καὶ ἐβεβαίωσαν καὶ ἐστήριξαν, they have confirmed and established all that from the first times have been delivered to the Catholick Church written or unwritten. Ib. p. 644. D.

In all which, how they are concerned, who impose so many new Articles of belief upon their own Churches, and upon all that desire Communion with them, I leave to each Romanist to consider, and shall only add the words of the Catechism taken out of the works of Costerus, Petrus de Soto, and others, and set out by the command of the Archbishop of Triers, resp. ad 2. qu. Neque ulla unquam extitit hæresis, quæ non hoc symbolo damnari potuerit, There was never any Heresie which might not be condemned by the Apostles Creed. It were well we might be allowed the benefit of this tryal. 7.

And

8. And now having given this pledge of my readineſs to anſwer his Queſtions, though I diſcern not any obligation, ariſing from my former Diſcourſe, to lye upon me, yet I ſhall not be ſo nice or ſparing of my pains, as to deny him a clear account alſo of his ſubſequent demands, but ſhall ſpeak as loud as he would wiſh, and tell him firſt to the firſt demand, that as to thoſe few Heads I ſpoke of, I can, bleſſed be God, ſhew him Churches enough, which have not betrayed the truſt depoſited; The Church of England, even now, under the ſaddeſt perſecution, hath not been tempted to betray that truſt; the Church of Rome, through all the Proſperity and Splendor, and Grandeur, which it hath long enjoyed, and which, the Hiſtorian tells us, acrioribus ſtimulis animum explorant, hath as yet held out thus far; I mean hath retained thoſe few Heads, and in that reſpect is not accuſed by us to have betrayed that truſt (I wiſh it were as blameleſs in all things elſe, particularly in that wherein our preſent Debate is moſt concerned, in impoſing new Articles of Faith on all Chriſtians, and her own infallibility for the firſt of them.)

9. The ſame I can as freely affirm of all other National Churches, that I know of, confining my Diſcourſe ſtill to the ſmall (yet in the Apoſtles opinions ſufficient) number of Heads of ſpecial force to the planting of Chriſtian life through the World.

10. And ſo as this Gentleman is much diſappointed in his expectation, that I ſhould not be able to name any Church that hath not betrayed the truſt depoſited, ſo I muſt profeſs to him, I think it as reaſonable, that they that agree in believing and conſerving thoſe few precious Heads of truth, deſigned to ſo glorious an end, as is the peopling a World with a peculiar Colony of Inhabitants, all uniformly zealous of good works, ſhould all join hands and hearts, to add that ſuperſtructure to the foundation, pure, immaculate, Elevated, Heroical, i. e. Chriſtian practice, to the untainted belief of theſe few things.

11. And then how much blame (by force of that Canon of Epheſus) moſt juſtly belongs unto them that make it their great intereſt to quarrel, divide from, and anathematize, all others, who cannot believe all other things which they chance to believe, though they know they agree with them in all that the Apoſtles thus thought neceſſary to be agreed in; and indeed how contrary this is, and deſtructive to this ſuperſtructure, of which Charity is one principal ingredient, and ſo to the deſign of laying the foundation, though not to the foundation it ſelf, I ſhall leave this Gentleman and every ſober Chriſtian to conſider; and if he judge not as I do, yet I ſhall not ξενίζεσθαι number it among the prodigies of the Age, or indeed think ſtranger of it, than I have long done of the great diſtance betwixt Reaſon and Paſſion in the ſame ſort of Creatures, Man, and (God knows too oft) in the ſame individual Creature, the ſame Man and Chriſtian.

12. Having gone thus far in ready obedience to this Gentlemans lighteſt intimation of his pleaſure, in ſatisfaction to his firſt demand, I ſhall in the ſame humour proceed without all reſerve to the next, doubting as little as he, but that theſe few things (all juſtice muſt allow our Diſcourſe to be coherent, and ſo to adhere to the ſame Subject with which we began) have been preſerved in each Church by Tradition; and then to the third, that there is no place of doubt concerning the fact, and ſo of Queſtion, whether they have or no; and if by thus ſpeaking aloud to every of his demands, I render my ſelf ſubject to as much jealouſie as I ſay Grotius was, I ſhall not accuſe him as my Tempter, but only ſupport and comfort my ſelf, that I have retained as much innocence as I always thought Grotius had done, and by declaring my meaning thus clearly, and profeſſing that I mean no whit more than I ſay, I ſee no place for jealouſie remaining to any.

13. If to believe the Apoſtles Creed to be conveyed down to us by tradition in every National Church from the Apoſtles time to this, be any Hereſie, I am viſibly guilty of it, and need not have my words put upon the rack (as Grotius's have been) to extort a more explicite confeſſion from them.

SECT. III.

Submiſſion without opinion of infallibility. The Appeal to the Fathers of the firſt three hundred years, and the four General Councils, to what it belongs. The ſilence of the firſt times no advantage to the Romaniſt. Two Queſtions of Additaments to Faith; The way of debating each of them.

Numb. 1. HIS laſt Exception to this Chapter is to our profeſſion of humility and temper, which it ſeems thoſe of our Religion muſt not be permitted to aſſume to themſelves (and which I was no farther ſo inſolent to aſſume, than as it is obſervable in the peculiarity of the frame of the Church of England's Reformation) Thus,

2. I cannot but admire indeed the great temper he profeſſeth men of his Religion have, in chuſing of Doctrines, to wit, their ſubmiſſion to the three firſt Ages, and the four firſt Councils; but I confeſs it is a humility I underſtand not, firſt to profeſs they know not whether their Teachers ſay true or no (that is, that they are fallible) and then to hold under pain of damnation what they ſay. Another piece of their humility is in ſubmitting to Ages, where very few Witneſſes can be found; in regard of the rarity of the Authors, and the little occaſion they had to ſpeak of preſent Controverſies. A third note of humility is, that whereas the fourth Council was held about the midſt of the fifth Age, theſe Lovers of truth will ſtand to it, but not to the fourth Age precedent, or that very Age in which it was held; ſo humble they are to ſubmit to any authority, that toucheth not the Queſtions in preſent Controverſie; but where do they find Chriſt's Church ſhall be judge in three Ages, and fail in the fourth, or that the Councils in the fifth Age ſhall be ſound, but not the Fathers.

3. It is very hard, it ſeems, to pleaſe this Gentleman. Our humility is one while by him cenſured as really too great, another while the want of it is our crime, and we equally to be ſcoffed at on both accounts.

4. It is a criminous exceſs of humility forſooth, to ſubmit to thoſe of whom we firſt profeſs not to know that they are infallible. But as long as we do verily believe they do actually affirm truth, why may we not ſubmit to them, though we know not that they are infallible? For certainly I may ſubmit to my natural

natural, or civil parent in this manner, obey him in all his commands, (supposing, as now I do, that none of his commands are by me apprehended to be unlawful, as none of these Councils definitions, are by us believed to be contrary to the Word and Will of God) though yet I neither account him inerrable nor impeccable. But of this I have spoken already, Chap. I. Sect. 3.

What he adds of holding under pain of damnation what they say, is in this place an insertion of this 5.
Gentleman's, no word being said of it in that Section, to which his words are confronted, and having elsewhere spoken to that, I abstain from adding more at this time.

In the next place it seems our humility is too scanty; for when I have submitted to be judged by 6.
the Scriptures, the consent of the first three hundred years, or the four General Councils, whether we have departed from the Apostolical doctrine or traditions, this, saith he, is submitting to Ages where very few witnesses can be found, &c. But I desire it may be remembred, what there I speak of, (for perhaps this Gentleman's haste hath not permitted him to advert to it) the contesting our innocence in this, that we of the Church of England have not departed from the Apostolick doctrine and traditions; And for this, whither could the appeal more properly be directed, than to the Scriptures, the Conservatory of the Apostles written doctrine and the three first Centuries, the conservatory of their traditions? It being unimaginable that any thing should be so per saltum conveyed to us from the Apostles, as to leap over those three Centuries next to them, without leaving any footstep discernable among them.

For let the witnesses of those times, the authors that remain to us, be never so few, yet unless by 7.
some of their hands we be directed what the Apostles delivered to them, how can we know what was delivered? It being all one in this respect not to be, as not to appear; Tradition, even Apostolical, being no more than an empty name, unless we suppose our selves able to avouch some competent testifiers of the Tradition.

And if to these two, I have added the four General Councils, because they were held against the 8.
great disturbers of the unity of the Faith, and they maintained the true faith by these two special weapons, the Scriptures and Tradition, testified by the first Writers, and our Church hath taken in their Creeds into our Liturgies, and their definitions into our Articles of Religion, and so I have by that appeal so far testified our non-departure from the Faith, I hope there is no offence in this, no degree of defect in our humility.

As for the little occasion these first had to speak of the present Controversies, that sure cannot be ob- 9.
jected against our procedure (any more than the paucity of the Authors could) for if the Romanist do but grant this one thing, it will be found a real prejudice to his pretensions, if (which was the point in hand) the question be, whether the Church of England have departed from the unity of the Apostolick Faith, denied any Apostolick Doctrine or Tradition.

For in this Controversie how shall it be proved, that we have departed, unless that Doctrine or Tra- 10.
dition being specified what it is, it be evidenced also, that it was delivered by the Apostles? and how can that be evidenced, but by those which within some competent distance of their time, affirm that from them? and how can they be pretended to affirm that, if it be granted of them that they had no occasion to speak of it; and so are utterly silent in it?

To his last note of humility, i. e. the next expression of his sceptical humor, there can be no need 11.
of applying any answer, it being no where intimated in that Treatise that we are not ready to stand to the fourth Age, or that wherein the fourth Council was held; All that was said, was, that the three first Ages, and the four General Councils were competent witnesses of the Apostolical doctrines and traditions; and I desire any man to name any other, that were more competent to this purpose i. e. to testifie what the Apostles taught; It being certain that whosoever doth (not by inspiration) tell us any thing of that kind, must assume to tell it from them, and as evident, that all those things (that even now were spoken of) which the Apostles resolved on, as heads of special force to form Religion and Christian life, were by this means conveyed to us.

Mean while other matters there are, which we look on as additaments to the doctrines of Faith, and 12.
so are the subject of a double question, 1. whether they be parts of that faith which was once, or at once delivered to the Saints; 2. whether not appearing to be so, there be any other just reason to believe, though but by an humane Faith, that they have any truth in them.

Now of these two questions, as the resolution of the former depends upon those Ages, which alone 13.
can convey Tradition to the succeeding, and so still for that, we refer our selves to the former Umpirage; so of the second, I did not then, because I had not occasion to speak in that place.

And if my answer be required now, I shall readily give it, that in matters of this nature the Opini- 14.
ons of the Fathers of the Church in the most flourishing Ages of it, wherein their writings are most voluminous, and their Learning in Theology most venerable, are with us of great weight and consideration; we do (and shall upon all occasions demonstrate our selves to) allow them as full an authority, pay as great and true a reverence to their judgments, indeavour as uniformly to conform our selves to the declarations of their sense, as any sober Romanists are by us discerned to do, or as it can be their interest to do, in respect of the controversies that lie between us. And so still I discern not, wherein our humility can be judged to fail, by those, with whom I now dispute, being content that it should by others be judged excessive.

CHAP. IX.

An Answer to the Exceptions made to the ninth Chapter.

SECT. I.

The hinderances of Communion imputable to the Romanist, not to us. Siquis Ecclesiam non audierit, one of our grounds. What is meant by Ecclesia.

Numb. 1. THE Exceptions to this Chapter are not very great, whether we respect their weight or number; yet upon the same account that the former have been our exercise, these may for a while detain us also.

2. In his ninth Chapter, saith he, he pretended the Roman Catholick Church is cause of this division, because they desire Communion, and cannot be admitted, but under the belief and practice of things contrary to their consciences; of which two propositions, if the second be not proved, the first is vain, and is as if a subject should plead he is unjustly outlawed, because he doth not desire it: Now to prove the latter, he assumeth that the Protestant is ready to contest his Negatives, by grounds that all good Christians ought to be concluded by; what he means by that, I know not, for that they will convince their Negatives by any ground, a good Christian ought to be concluded by, I see nothing less.

What then will they contest it by? all grounds a good orthodox Christian ought to be concluded by? If they answer in the affirmative, we shall ask them whether siquis Ecclesiam non audierit be one of their grounds, and if they say no, we shall clearly disprove their Major; but then their defence is, if any ground, or rule of it self firm and good, speaketh nothing clearly of a point in question, they will contest that point by those grounds; and is not this a goodly excuse?

3. The design of Chap. IX. of the Treatise of Schism, is to vindicate us from all guilt of Schism, as that signifies offence against external peace and communion Ecclesiastical; and it being certain, that we exclude none from our Communion, that acknowledge the foundation, and that we desire to be admitted to the like freedom of external communion, with all members of all other Christian Churches, the result is visible, that the hinderances, that obstruct this freedom, are wholly imputable to the Romanist, such are their excommunicating us, and imposing conditions on their communion, such as we cannot admit of without sin, or scandal, acting contrary to Conscience, or making an unsound confession.

4. To this, all that is answered is, that unless this second be proved, viz. that such conditions are by them imposed on their communion, the first, that of our desire of Communion, is vain; And to this I make no doubt to yield; for if we may with a good Conscience be admitted to their Communion, and yet wilfully withdraw our selves from it, then I confess there is no place for this plea of ours; But for the contesting of this there was not then, neither will there now be any place, without descending to the severals in difference between us, (which was beyond the design either of those, or these Papers) and therefore for that, all that can be said is, that we are ready to maintain our Negatives, by grounds that all good Christians ought to be concluded by; And because it is here askt, whether siquis Ecclesiam non audierit be one of those grounds, I answer without question it is, and so is every other affirmation of Christ, or the Apostles, however made known to us to be such. And I cannot sufficiently admire, why, when it is known to all Romanists, that we are ready to be judged by Scripture, and when it is certain that siquis Ecclesiam non audierit] are the words of Scripture, he should suppose (as here he doth) that we will say, No: i. e. that we will refuse to be tried or concluded by that.

5. Here I must suppose that by Ecclesiam he understands the Roman (which he calls Catholick) Church; but then this interpretation or understanding of his, is one thing, and those words of Christ are another; for they belonging to the Church indefinitely, under which any man, that hath offended, is regularly placed; do to a member of the particular Roman Church, signifie that, as to an Englishman, the Church wherein he lives, and that, is not the Roman, or the Universal Church of God, and that is more than the Roman.

6. And so by acknowledging that ground of Scripture, we are no way obliged to believe all that that particular Church of Rome, to which we owe no obedience (and are as ready to contest that by the same means also) exacts of us.

7. As for our contesting any point by that ground or rule which speaketh nothing clearly of it, I gave him no occasion to make any such objection against us, and withal have said what was sufficient to it Chapter VIII. Sect. 3. n. 7. and so need not here farther attend to it.

CHAP. X.

An Answer to the Exceptions made to the tenth Chapter.

SECT. I.

The Romanists want of charity, wherein it consists.

IN his view of Chap. X. he takes notice of two Charges by us brought in against them, 1. judging, 2. despising their Brethren, but contents himself with a very brief Reply, and that only to one of them, Thus, Numb. 1.

In his tenth Chapter, he saith, we judge them and despise them: as to the first, I have often wondred, and do now, that men, pretending to learning and reason, should therein charge us with want of charity, for if our judgment be false, it is errour, not malice, and whether true or false, we press it upon them out of love and kindness, to keep them from the harm, that according to our belief, may come upon them; but since they deny they are Schismaticks, and offer to prove it, we must not say it: yet I think we ought, until we have cause to believe them, since our highest Tribunal, the Churches voice, from which we have no appeal, hath passed judgment against them. 2.

The want of charity, with which we charge the Romanist in this matter, is not their warning us of our danger, which may reasonably be interpreted love, and kindness, and care to keep us from harm, and if they erre in admonishing, when there is no need of it, there is nothing still but charity in this; but it is their casting us out of their Communion on this score, that we consent not to all their Dictates, that we withdraw our obedience from those, who without right usurped it over us, their anathematizing and damning us, and being no way perswadable to withdraw these sanguinary censures, unless we will change or dissemble our beliefs; and as there cannot be charity in this, any thing that can tend to the mending of any; for how can it be deemed any act of reformation in any, to forsake his present perswasions, whilst he is not convinced of any errour in them? and surely the bare damning of us is not any such matter of conviction; so there is a double uncharitableness, 1. of being angry without cause, and expressing that anger in very ill language, of which that of Heretick and Schismatick is the mildest, and each of those causless too, if they be affix'd to any particular man, much more to a whole Church, before either of them be sufficiently proved against us; For certainly as the Romanist's judgment concerning us, if it be false, may yet be but error not malice (by which this Gentleman here justifies himself from want of charity) so our opinions and perswasions of the erroneousness of their Doctrines and sinfulness of their practices, if possibly they be not true also, are still as justly and equitably capable of the same excuse, that they are involuntary errors, and then by their own Rule, cannot justly fall under such their rigid censures, which belong to none but voluntary Offenders. 3.

Secondly, The endeavouring to insnare and pervert fearful or feeble minds, using these terrors, as the Lion doth his roaring, to intimidate the Prey, and make it not rationally but astonish'dly, fall down before them. And as the offering due grounds of conviction to him that is in errour, may justly be deemed charity, so this tender of nothing but frights, without offer of such grounds of conviction, is but leading men into temptation to sin against conscience, to dissimulation, &c. and so the hating the Brother in the heart, Lev. 19. the more than suffering sin upon him. 4.

To these might be, not unseasonably, added a farther consideration, which hath carried weight with the Fathers of the Church in all times, that seeing the censures of the Church were left there, πρὸς οἰκοδομὴν & πρὸς καθαίρεσιν, for edification not for destruction, and are only designed to charitative ends (must never be used to any other purpose) therefore when obedience is utterly cast off, the band, be it of subordination or co-ordination so broken, that the issuing out of censures cannot expect to compose, but only to widen the breach, not to mollifie but exasperate, there Christian prudence is to endeavour by milder ways, what severity is not likely to effect, and so the Thunderbolts to be laid up, till there may be some probability of doing good by them. 5.

But this is not the Case, as it really lyes betwixt Rome and us, save only as à majori it may be accommodated to us; we have cast off neither obedience to any, to whom it was due, nor charity to those, who have least to us, nor truth, to the utmost of our understandings, and yet we must be cast out and anathematized, and after all that, condemned as wilful Schismaticks, i. e. αὐτοκαλύκελοι, Dividers and Condemners of our selves, because we quietly submit to that fate, which will cost us too dear, the wounding and disquiet of our conscience, to qualifie our selves for a capacity of getting out of it. 6.

What he adds of their highest Tribunal, the Churches voice, which hath passed this judgment against us, belongs I suppose to those Bishops of Rome, which have sent out their Bulls against us, and therefore I must in reason add, that those are principally guilty of this Schism, and so their Successors principally obliged to retract and reform the sin of it, and after them, all others in the order and measure, that they have partaked in this guilt with them. 7.

And there can be no greater charity, than to beseech all in the bowels of Christ, to return to the practice of that charity, which hath too long been exiled from among Christian Professors. 8.

CHAP. XI.

An Answer to the Exceptions made to the last Chapter.

SECT. I.

Of the present state of the Church of England. The Catholicks promise for eternity to his Church. Roma æterna. Particular Churches perishable. Mr. Hooker's Prediction of this Church. The power of the secular Magistrate to remove Bishops Sees, not to make Bishops. The Council of Florence concerning the Popes supremacy, &c. Marcus's opinion of it. Joseph. Methonens. his Answer briefly examined.

Numb. 1. THE last part of this Gentleman's endeavours to perswade men that the Church of England is not only persecuted but destroyed, and of that he means to make his advantage to fetch in Proselytes, being out of his great charity very sensible of their estate, unwilling they should sit any longer in the vault or charnel-house to communicate with shades, when they are invited to a fairer sunshine, in a vital and very flourishing Society. Thus then he begins his Reply to the eleventh Chapter.

2. In the last Chapter he complaineth of the Catholicks for reproaching them with the loss of their Church, and arguing with their Disciples in this sort: Communion in some Church, even externally, is necessary, but you cannot now communicate with your late Church, for that hath no subsistence, therefore you ought to return to the Church from whence you went out; truly in this Case I think they ought to pardon the Catholick, who hath, or undoubtedly is perswaded he hath a promise for eternity to his Church, and experience in the execution of that promise for sixteen Ages, in which none other can compare with him, and sees another Church judged Hooker's Eccl. Polit. by one of the learnedst and most prudent persons confessedly that ever was among them, to be a Building likely to last but fourscore years, and to be now torn up by the roots, and this done by the same means by which it was setled; I say, if this Catholick believe his eyes, he is at least to be excused; and though I know the Doctor will reply, his Church is still in Being, preserved in Bishops and Presbyters rightly ordained, yet let him remember how inconsequent this is, to what he hath said before, for ask him how it doth remain in Being, if there be no such Bishops or Presbyters among them, for his defence against the Church of Rome is, that the secular Authority hath power to make and change Bishops and Presbyters: from whence it will follow, that as they were set up by a secular Authority, so are they pulled down, and unbishoped by another secular Authority; if it be said the Parliament that pulled them down, had not the three Bodies requisite to make a Parliament, no more had that which set them up, for the Lords Spiritual were wanting both in Parliament and Convocation, so that there was as much authority to pull them down as to set them up: but it will be replied, that though they are pulled down, yet are they still Bishops, viz. the character remains upon them.

Alas, what is their Character, if their mission of Preaching and Teaching be extinguished, which follows their jurisdiction, which jurisdiction the Doctor makes subject to the secular authority, so that whatsoever Characters their Bishops and Presbyters pretend to have, they have according to his Principles, no power over the Laity, and so no character can be made of any Bishop as Head and Pastor, and of the People as body and flock, and consequently their Church is gone.

But we account our selves Bishops and Priests, not from an authority dependent upon Princes, or inherited from Augustus or Nero, but from Peter and Paul, and so shall stand and continue, whatsoever Princes or secular Powers decree; when they according to their Doctrines and Arguments, are not to wonder if they be thrown down by the same authority that set them up; and as the Synagogue was a Church to have an end, so is this, with this difference, that the Synagogue was a true Church in reference to a better, but this is a counterfeit and tyrannical one to punish a better. As concerning the Doctors Prayer for peace and communion, all good people will join with him, if he produce Fructus dignos pœnitentiæ, especially if he acknowledge the infallibility of the Church, and the Supremacy of the Pope; the former is explicated sufficiently in divers Books, the latter is expressed in the Council of Florence in these words, viz. we define that the Holy Apostolical See, and the Bishop of Rome have the primacy over all the World, and that the Bishop of Rome is Successor to S. Peter, the Prince of the Apostles, and truly Christ's Vicar, and Head of the whole Church, and the Father and Teacher of all Christians, and that there was given him in Saint Peter from Christ a full power to feed, direct and govern the Catholick Church: So far the Council. Without obeying this, the Doctor is a Schismatick; and without confessing the other, an Heretick; but let him join with us in these, all the rest will follow.

3. I shall not here repeat my complaint (if it were indeed such, and not rather a bare proposing of a last foreseen objection against us) knowing how little compassion any sufferings of ours may expect to receive from this Gentleman, I shall only join issue with his tenders of proof, that our Church hath now no subsistence; but yet before I do so, take notice of one part of his arguing, viz. that the Catholick hath, or is undoubtedly perswaded he hath a promise for eternity to his Church. Where certainly the fallacy is very visible, and sufficient to supersede (if he shall advert to it) his undoubted perswasion. For what promise of eternity can this Gentleman here reflect on? undoubtedly that of the Church of Christ indefinitely, that the Gates of Hell shall not prevail against it, Matth. 16. 18.

4. What is the full importance of that Phrase, is * elsewhere largely shewed, and need not be here any farther repeated, than that the promise infallibly belongs not to any particular Church, of any one denomination, but to the whole Body, Christ will preserve to himself a Church in this World, as long as this World lasteth, in despight of all the malice, cunning, or force of men, and Devils.

* Annot. on the p. last.

5. Now that this is no security, or promise of eternity to any particular Church, whether of Rome or England, any more than of Thyatira or Laodicea (which contrary to any such promise, is threatned to be spued out, Rev. 3. 16.) is in it self most evident, because the destroying any one particular Church is reconcileable with Christ's preserving some other, as the Species of Mankind is preserved, though the Gentleman and I should be supposed to perish, and because the Ἐκκλησία μου, my Church, which is there there the ſubject of the diſcourſe, is not the Romaniſt (or in that ſenſe the Catholick) his Church, as is here ſuggeſted, but the Church of Chriſt built upon the foundation of the Apoſtles, of which Simon is there ſaid to be one Πέτρος, i. e. ſtone or foundation-ſtone, ſo as he was of other Churches, beſide that of Rome, and ſo as others were of other Churches, which he never came near, and even of this of Rome, Saint Paul as well as he.

From hence therefore, by force of this promiſe (which as truly belongs to every Church as it doth to Rome, but indeed belongs to no particular, but to the Chriſtian Church, to conclude that the Church of Rome is eternal, is a firſt ungrounded perſwaſion in this Gentleman, the very ſame, as to conclude a particular is an univerſal, or that the deſtruction of one part is the utter diſſolution of the whole; and the proof from experience of ſixteen ages, which is here added, is a ſtrange way of argumentation, ſuch as that Methuſalem might have uſed the very day before his death, to prove that he ſhould never dye, and the very ſame that Heathen Rome did uſe, at the time of their approaching deſtruction, calling her ſelf * Urbem æternam, the eternal City, and † ἀϊδιόπολιν Ῥωμὴν, Rome the Heaven-City, and * Ῥωμὴν θεὰν, Rome a Goddeſs, which accordingly had by Adrian a Temple erected to it, and the Emperors thereof, and the very name of the place worſhipt as a deity (More Dea, nomenque loci ſeu numen adorant) and all this upon this one ſcore, that it had ſtood and proſpered ſo long. 6.

* Hieron. qu. 115 ad Algas.
† Athenæus, l. 12.
* Golizius in Theſau. Dio in Adriano. Prudentius.

The like may be affirmed of the Church of the Jews, built upon a promiſe, which had more of peculiarity to the ſeed of Abraham, than this of Matt. 16. can be imagined to have to the Church of Rome, and yet that Church was deſtroyed, and nothing more contributed to the provocation, and merit of that deſtruction, than their own confidence of being unperiſhable. The beſt admonition in this reſpect, is that of the Apoſtle, Be ye not high minded, but fear, and, If God ſpared not the Natural branches, take heed alſo leſt he ſpare not you; and this Gentleman cannot be ignorant what * Church it was, that was then capaple of this exhortation. And the very making this matter of argument, and in this reſpect (not of purity, but of duration) exalting the Romaniſt's Church, above all other Churches in theſe words [none other can compare with him,] as it is one character which determines the ſpeech to the particular Church of Rome, (for elſe how can he ſpeak of others, and affirm that they cannot compare) ſo it is no very humble, or conſequently Chriſtian expreſſion in this Gentleman. 7.

* Rom. 11. 2.

What he adds out of Maſter Hooker, and applies as the judgment of that learned man concerning the Church of England, yields us theſe farther obſervations, 1. That in all reaſon this Gentleman muſt in his former words ſpeak of his Church of Rome, as that is a particular Church, for elſe how can he after his Church, name another Church, meaning this of England, of which ſaith he, Mr. Hooker ſpeaks? and that will conclude the evident falſity of his aſſumption, that by Chriſt's promiſe, eternity belonged to it, for that it cannot do to any particular Church, becauſe the Univerſal may be preſerved, when that is deſtroyed, and the promiſe being made indefinitely to the Church, may be performed in any part of it. 8.

Secondly, That a very ſmall matter will ſerve turn with this Gentleman, to ſupport a concluſion, which he hath a mind to infer; otherwiſe Maſter Hookers Teſtimony had never been produced to this matter. The words of that (truly) moſt learned and prudent perſon, are to be found in his fifth Book, Num. 79. in the Concluſion. The ſubject of that whole Paragraph, beginning pag. 424. is of Oblations, Foundations, Endowments, Tithes, all intended for the perpetuity of Religion, which was in his opinion ſure to be fruſtrated, by alienation of Church Livings; and this being largely handled by him throughout that Paragraph, at length he obſerves, 1. what waſte Covetouſneſs had made in the Church by ſuch commutations, as were proportionable to Glaucus's change, giving the Church, Flanel for Gold: and 2. how Religion it ſelf was made a Sollicitor and perſwader of Sacrilege, ſignifying, that to give to God, is errour, and to take it away again, Reformation of errour, concluding in theſe words, By theſe or the like ſuggeſtions received with all joy, and with like ſedulity practiſed in certain parts of the Chriſtian world, they have brought to paſs, that as David doth ſay of Man, ſo it is in danger to be verified concerning the whole Religion and ſervice of God, the time thereof may peradventure fall out to be threeſcore and ten years, or if ſtrength do ſerve unto fourſcore, what followeth, is likely to be ſmall joy for them, whoſoever they be that behold it. Thus have the beſt things been overthrown, not ſo much by puiſſance and might of adverſaries, as through defect of Counſel in them that ſhould have upheld and defended the ſame. 9.

This is the full importance of that place, which the Gentleman hath ſo diſguiſed in his abbreviation. Mr. Hooker foretells what a deſtructive influence, Sacrilege may have on the whole Religion and Service of God, obſerves in certain parts of the Chriſtian world (without naming any) that ſacrilegious ſuggeſtions are received with all joy, and putting theſe two together, preſaged ſad events to the whole Religion, and Service of God, within threeſcore and ten, or fourſcore years, and from hence this Gentleman concludes it Maſter Hooker's judgment, that the Church of England was a building likely to laſt but fourſcore years. 10.

In what mode and figure this concluſion is thus made from the premiſſes, he leaves us to divine, who have not ſagacity enough to diſcern it; The concluſion to all mens underſtanding will moſt regularly follow thus, that the Church of England was ſo conſtituted, that all the enemies thereof on either ſide were never likely to deſtroy it by arguments, and conſequently, that the moſt probable way remaining to Satan to accompliſh his deſign was, by ſacrilegious violations to impoveriſh and ſubdue the maintainers of it, which as he foreſaw very likely to come to paſs within the age of a man, ſo it would be no joyful ſight when it ſhould come, he was not ſo unkind to any part of the Church of God, as to be willing to live to ſee it. 11.

And if this Gentleman's inclinations have qualified him for the receiving pleaſure or joy in ſuch a ſpectacle, I ſhall as little envy him the proſperity which hath thus petrified his bowels, as he ſhall think fit to envy me the honour of being a member of the pureſt (being withal the moſt perſecuted) Church. 12.

Thirdly, That theſe words of Mr. Hooker thus pitifully diſtorted, are the only proof he hath for his aſſertion, that this Church of ours hath now no ſubſiſtence, and that it is now torn up by the roots; A way of arguing very conformable to his characters of a true Church, of which external glory and proſperity muſt never miſs to be one, but very unlike the image of Chriſt the head, to which his Church the body may be allowed to hold ſome proportion of conformity, for of him we can give no livelier portraiture, 13.

traicture, than as we find him crucified between two thieves, whilst the souldiers divide his garments, though they were not over sumptuous, and cast lots who shall have his vesture.

14. What next follows is an answer to a supposed objection of ours (and that is a farther evidence of what I said, that Mr. Hooker's distorted speech is the only proof of his proposition) The objection is, that our Church is still in being preserved in Bishops and Presbyters rightly ordained; and to this objection he will make some answer from our own principles, of which he supposeth this to be one, that the secular authority hath power to make and change Bishops and Presbyters, and saith without any regrets, that this is my defence against the Bishop of Rome.

15. Many replies might be made to take off all appearance of force from this answer. As 1. that this, to which the answer is accommodated, is not my objection. The truth is, I took not on me the objectors part in that place, but evidenced it by clear demonstration, that if twenty years ago the Church of England was a Church, it must needs be so now, being the very same that then it was, except these bands, as the Apostle once said, who I hope did not cease to be an Apostle by being imprisoned. And when I mentioned the Church of Englands being preserved in Bishops and Presbyters rightly ordained, together with multitudes rightly baptized (which sure are all the necessary ingredients in constituting a visible Church) I added, none of which have fallen off from their profession, and then foreseeing the only possible objection to infer the Church guilty of Schism, I answered that by remembring the Primitive persecutions and night-meetings, and the very manner of the Romanists serving God in this Kingdom for these many years.

16. And all this is pulled off from the clue, and fumbled together into an objection of mine, supposed to be made against that which the Romanist, without either tender of proof, or reason, had crudely affirmed. But truly I may be believed, that I meant not that affirmation so much respect, as to offer objection against it: And then that is one speedy way of concluding this matter.

17. But then, secondly, for that saying of mine, on which he will form his answer to this imaginary objection, 'tis certain I never said any such thing, as is here suggested: That the supreme Magistrate hath power to erect and translate Patriarchates, and the like, I had affirmed indeed, i. e. to make that a Patriarchal See, which had not formerly been such, so to ennoble a Town or City, that according to the Canons of the Church it should become an Episcopal, or Archiepiscopal, or Chief, or Patriarchal See, and my meaning is evident, and not possible to be mistaken by any that understands the Language, and adverts to what he reads.

18. But sure I never said, that the secular authority hath power to make Bishops and Presbyters, and there is no question but this Gentleman knows, if he hath read what he answers, that in the Tract of Schism I never said it.

19. So again, it is of daily practice in this Church, as in all others, for the supreme power to change, as that signifies to remove Bishops from one See to another, and so for every Lay-Patron in the same sense to change Presbyters: But what is that to the making of Bishops or Presbyters? did ever King or Lay-Patron pretend to that? This is too visible to need insisting on.

20. Thirdly, When he saith, there was as much authority to pull down Bishops and Presbyters in this nation, as to set them up, I might demand, 1. Whether he hath any reason to pretend that Presbyters are now pulled down in this nation, for this is by him supposed, who inquires by what authority they are pull'd down: 2. Whether he can, either upon mine or his own principles, assume with any colour of truth, that none had any hand in setting up the Bishops in this Kingdom, but those whom here he affirms to have consented to the pulling them down, and consequently affirm, that there was as much authority to pull them down, as to set them up? 3. Whether it have any truth in it, (whether he speak of what was done in Parliament in King Henry's, or King Edward's, or Queen Elizabeth's daies) that the Lords Spiritual were wanting both in Parliament and Convocation? 4. What he hath said to make it in the least degree probable, that the Bishops and Presbyters mission of preaching and teaching is extinguished among us, any more than it was in the Primitive Church, when the Emperor was not favourable to the profession, and when the Jews called it Heresie: And lastly, Whether, if no one of these can with any degree of verity be answered in the affirmative, this be not very immoderate liberty, which this Gentleman hath given himself in affirming or supposing all these, and then adding, that our portion is to be lookt for with the Jewish Synagogue, as one, so the other, to have an end; not considering that he hath as little skill in revealing secrets, as even now in interpreting Mr. Hooker's Prophecy, that he cannot yet tell, what God hath within his veil decreed concerning our Church, and which may yet make the greatest speed to follow the Synagogue's fate, they which are cast down, but not destroyed, or they which (to say no worse) stand by, and rejoyce at it.

21. The Treatise of Schism concludes with a Prayer for Peace and Communion, and for the matter of it, we have his seeming confession that all good people will joyn in it. But even in such a Prayer, wherein all good people will joyn, this Gentleman will not joyn with me, but upon such terms, which I shall not undertake, to qualifie me for his favour; I mean not the fructus dignos pœnitentiæ, such as John Baptist would prescribe, but the penances of this severer confessor, to acknowledge the Infallibility of the Church in his notion of the Church, Supremacy of the Pope, &c.

22. And all that I shall need to reply is, to beseech him that he will then, without joyning with me, pray in secret, what I began to him, and endeavour to qualifie himself with charity and other graces, which may wing his prayers unto that holy place, where all humble Christians supplications daily meet, and then I shall again pray God, that I may be found in the number of those, that so I may be secured to meet and joyn with him, at that common throne of grace.

23. He is pleased to shut up all with an expression of the Council of Florence, to the business of the Popes Supremacy. To this I might reply that this definition is there visibly subscribed, as the act of the Bishop of Rome, Eugenius IV. (who was a liberal carver and definer for himself) as may be seen in that very * page, where the words cited will be found, both by the Seal of his Pontificate there impress, Saint Peter on the left hand, Saint Paul on the right, and Eugenius Pp. IV. under it; and by the last part of the date in these words, τῆς ἀχειροτονίας ἡμῶν ἔτει ἐνάτῳ, in the ninth year of our Pontificate; which though I shall suppose to be the mode, the Pope to pronounce the definition of the Council, cil, yet this was much varied from the old form, and the Council being dated at Florence, in the year of our Lord 1439. so near Rome, and so far from the first times, where more simplicity and just distribution of Rights might be expected, this might be a competent Answer to this testimony, and a vindicating my self from all Schism or Heresie, that my want of the obedience or confession, which he requires, might fix on me.

* Concil. t. 7. p. 858. Edit. Paris.

24. But I shall for this once, chuse somewhat the longer way, and transcribe part of Marcus the Metropolitan of Ephesus his Answer, wherein he expresseth his opinion, and others, of that definition of the Council, as it lies in the * Apology of Joseph Methonensis for that Council, Καὶ ἡμεῖς δὲ Πάππαν ὡς ἕνα τῶν Πατριαρχῶν λογιζόμεθα, ἤτοι δὲ βικάριον τοῦ Χριστοῦ καὶ πατέρα καὶ διδάσκαλον πάντων Χριστιανῶν ἀπάντων μάλα σεμνῶς ἀποφαίνονται, We also account the Pope as one of the Patriarchs, But these do with great gravity pronounce him Vicar of Christ, and Father and Teacher of all Christians: and this both to them and us is matter of some wonder, how (μάλα σεμνῶς) with so much gravity, they could thus pronounce, what had so little of truth in it. * Joseph. Methon. pro Concil. Florent. p. 1023.

25. And it is worth recounting here, what for the justifying of that definition, Joseph Methonensis was able to reply there to that Bishop (and that Reply thought worthy to be inserted into the Acts of the Council) 1. That he doth not say that the Pope is two or three, but only one of the Patriarchs, ὃν δὴ ὁμολογήσει τὶς πρωτεύειν, having preheminence among those of the same Order with him.

26. For this he hath, 1. Chrysostom's authority in his seventeenth Homily on the Acts, where, he saith, that among the seven there was one, περιεστῶ καὶ τὰ πρωτεῖα ἔχων, one above the rest (and the seven there, were the seven Deacons, and the same preheminence that Stephen then had over them, and all the rest of the World, we shall not deny the Bishop of Rome; especially if, as it follows there, he have the πλείονα χάριν more grace than all the other Bishops, and will acknowledge, as it is there also, the χειροτονίαν κοινὴν, the same ordination of him and all other Bishops.)

27. Secondly, The Saying of Christ, that, He that heareth you, heareth me, and the common Maxime πάντα ἀρχιερέα διάδοχον Χριστοῦ εἶναι, that every Bishop is the Successor of Christ (But then how came the Bishop of Rome to impropriate that title, to be the only one that all are obliged to hear, when, as he confesses there, καὶ ταῦτα μὲν κοινῶς πρὸς πάντας, This was said in common to them all.)

28. Thirdly, The words of Theodorus Studita (one, by the way, that had been imprisoned for opposing the Bishop of Constantinople, and who did not communicate with that Church, see Zonaras tom. 3. p. 9. & 102.) to the Emperor Michael, that if he doubted of, or disbelieved any thing that had been there resolved, he should command a διασάφησις declaration or explication to be sent him from old Rome, ὡς ἄνωθεν καὶ ἐξ ἀρχῆς παραδόθη, how from of old, and from the beginning it had been delivered by tradition of Fathers, adding, that that was κορυφαιοτάτη τῶν ἐκκλησιῶν the uppermost of the Churches of God, of which Peter was πρωτόθρονος, the first that sate Bishop there, unto whom Christ said, Thou art Peter, &c. (But all this still amounts to no more, but that Rome was the prime Apostolick See, that might very probably explicate a difficulty to the Emperor, by telling what had been from time to time delivered, and believed in that Church.)

29. Fourthly, The words of the same Theodorus Studita again, in his Epistle to Naucratius, which speaks of some that had broken off themselves from the Body of Christ, from the chief See, in which Christ placed the Keys of that Faith, against which the Gates of Hell, the mouths of *Heretick*s, had not, should not prevail, (But then still, supposing his testimony were authentick, this is no more, but that, they which divided from the true Doctrin, which he supposed to be at Rome, did in his opinion break off themselves from the Body of Christ, that Rome again was the prime See, that it had the Keys of knowledg and faith entrusted to it by Christ at the Apostles founding a Church there, but this not exclusively to other Churches, which doubtless had those Keys, as well as She, and that the faith of Christ should never be utterly destroyed by *Heretick*s.)

30. Fifthly, The words of Arcadius a Bishop in the third Council, that of Ephesus, proposing that the words of Cœlestine the Pope, who was to be named with all reverence, Bishop of the Apostolical See, should be read, that they might see what care he had of all Churches (and why might not the like be said of any other truly Christian Bishop?) And so the like speech again of Cyril of Alexandria, that the Letter of Cœlestine, the most holy Bishop of the holy Apostolick Church (a title which belonged, and was ordinarily given to other Sees, besides that of Rome) μετὰ τῆς πρεσφόρου τιμῆς ἀναγινωσκέσθω, might be read with due honour or respect (but sure that doth not prove his supreme power over all the Churches of God.)

31. Lastly, The words of the Emperor's Letter (called θεῖον γράμμα divine Letter) in the Council of Chalcedon, that the most blessed Bishop of the City of Rome, to whom antiquity hath given ἱερωσύνῃ καὶ πάντων, Priesthood over all, χωρὶς δὲ ὑποσείας ἔχη τὸ πίστεως καὶ ἱερέων ἀνακείνειν, may have a place and power to judge of faith and of Priests, from whence he roundly concludes, Ἐπεὶ δὲ τὸ πίστεως, &c. Seeing then he hath power to judge of Faith and Priests, he is justly defined by the Council of Florence διδάσκαλον πάντων Χριστιανῶν ἀπάντων, the Teacher of all Christians.

32. This being the last and most probable, and indeed only Testimony, to justifie with any colour of reason the definition of that Council, it is not amiss to consider it a little, and with that to conclude also the debate with this Gentleman, as Joseph Methonensis there did with the Bishop of Ephesus. And if we turn to the Acts of the Council of Chalcedon, we shall soon discern the full weight of it.

33. There in the * first part, numb. 25. we shall find this Letter styled θεῖον γράμμα, sent by Valentinian the Emperour to Theodosius, ὡς ἐκελεῦσας ἐν τοῖς μέρεσι τῆς Ἰταλίας συνοδον ἐπιτελεσθῆναι, that he would command a Synod to be called in the Parts of Italy. This then was the Subject of the Letter, and this the occasion; A second Synod had lately been held at Ephesus, in which the Heresie of Eutyches had received some assistance; Upon this, Pope Leo, and his Synod of Bishops met at Rome, † writes earnestly to the Emperour Valentinian, that he will κελεύειν command γενικὴν συνοδον a General Council to be called in the parts of Italy, that may remove and mollifie all offences. The same he * again proposes to the Emperour Theodosius there, desiring ἰδικὴν συνοδον a Special Council to be convened in the parts of Italy. Hereupon soon follows a Letter of Valentinian to Theodosius to the same purpose, in condescension to Leo's Request, and in it those very words (recited by Joseph Methonensis in defence of the Council of Florence) * concil. tom. 3. p. 25. † Ibid. n. 19. p. 19. * Ibid. n. 20. p. 20.

Florence) to no other sense but this, that such a Council might be convened in Italy, to review and reform what had been done amiss in that second Council of Ephesus.

34. This therefore is the meaning of the ἵνα χωρὸν καὶ συντοκίαν ἔχῃ, that he may have a place and power] that some place may be assigned him and the Bishops, to meet in Council, that he may have power, or faculty, or commission to sit (not he by himself, but he and the Bishops in Council) and when they sit, πίστεως καὶ ἱερέων κρίνῃ, to judge of Faith and Priests, as in all Councils it is done, to define what is the true faith, opposed by *Heretick*s, and what persons, Bishops or others, are fit to be censured for any thing done or taught by them.

35. This is the plain and only importance of the place, to which all the rest of the Epistle accords, that an Universal Council should be called in Italy, wherein the Pope was doubtless to preside, and he συναχθέντων ἐκ πάσης οἰκουμένης καὶ τῶν λοιπῶν ἱερέων, all other Bishops also being convened from the whole World, should consider and define, what the true faith required. And so this is a fair testimony to prove that the Pope is the Vicar of Christ, the Father and Teacher of all Christians.

The CONCLUSION.

Numb. 1. I AM now come to the close of this Gentleman's Answer in these words, Thus, Sir, you have my sense of Doctor Hammond's Book in all the Particulars, which, I think, to the purpose; my time, nor the brevity fit for a Letter, not permitting I should be more methodical, and do rest

Bruxels, March 30, 1654.

Your Friend, and

Humble Servant,

B. P.

2. Here he is pleased largely enough to assume the Office of an Aristarchus, and to involve under no light censure, of impertinency at the least, the far greatest part of that Treatise of Schism; for certainly that which he hath not offered any Answer to, is such; and yet he here undertakes to have given his sense in all the Particulars, which he thinks to the purpose, which must conclude it his opinion, that all other Particulars are not to the purpose. This indeed is a performance somewhat above the promise of the Title-page, which obliged him to an Answer of the most material parts of that Treatise; And it were very easie to shew that there is no degree of truth in either of these; that on the contrary, he hath not offered any word of Reply to the most material, which I hope are not the least pertinent parts of that Treatise. But instead of this larger reflection it may suffice, that whatsoever he hath thought fit to take notice of, and thereby hath expressed his judgment of it, that it is most material in comparison of the rest, hath here been very particularly considered, and his Answers manifested to have no force in them. And so I very friendly take my leave of him.

The God of all Grace and Peace bind up the wounds of his bleeding Church.

APPENDIX

TO HIS

Manual of Controverſies,

CONCERNING

The Abbot of Bangor's Anſwer to Auguſtine.

HAVING concluded the foregoing Reply to the Catholick Gentleman, I received news of a Manual of Controverſies in the Preſs, wherein I was ſaid to be particularly concerned; and having ſoon gotten a ſight of it, I found that the matter was of no greater bulk or weight, than might receive an account in few words, and thoſe moſt proper to be here annext, by way of Appendix. Numb. 1.

At the folding up of that Manual, the Author of it is pleaſed to take notice of (no more than) one teſtimony, which I had cited out of Sir Henry Spelman's Anglicane Councils, containing an Anſwer of the Abbot of Bangor to Auguſtine the Monk, when he demanded of the Britains an acknowledgment of ſubmiſſion to the Biſhop of Rome. 2.

The paſſage is to be ſeen at large, in Welſh, Engliſh, and Latine, in that tome of the Councils, p. 108. and is recited in the Treatiſe of Schiſm, p. 111. and the ſum of it is, that he and the reſt of the Britiſh Church were under the government of the Archbiſhop of Caerleon upon Uske, and owed no obedience (or reſpect, ſave that of fraternal charity) to the Pope of Rome. 3.

This Anſwer of that Abbot, the Author hath thought good to cenſure (by way of Appendix to the Article concerning the Pope's Supremacy) 1. As unapt to conclude againſt the Romaniſt's pretenſions concerning the Papal power over the whole Church. 2. As unworthily alledged by perſons of any ordinary judgment or erudition. 3. As that which may eaſily be convicted to be a ſimple impoſture, and the ways of demonſtrating it clearly, promiſed in that inſuing diſcourſe. 4.

What thoſe ways are, and how far ſhort of the force or evidence of demonſtration, I ſhall, with the Reader's good leave, examine anon, after I have premiſed this one conſideration, That the only thing, which is by us conteſted, and concluded againſt the Romaniſt from this teſtimony, is a matter of fact of known truth, and ſuch as the Romaniſts themſelves (yea and this Author H. T. who hath thought fit to arraign this teſtimony) acknowledge to be ſuch; and therefore, as in caſe this one teſtimony ſhould be demonſtrated to be a ſimple impoſture, we can very unconcernedly and eaſily part with it, ſtanding in no manner of need of this auxiliary; ſo it is a little ſtrange, that this Author ſhould think it worth his ſolemn pains, to wreſt it out of our hands, and dedicate this whole Appendix to that one work, when if he were ſucceſsful to his wiſh, his acquiſitions hereby, and proportionably our loſſes, muſt be ſo unconſiderable. 5.

That which we conclude from hence againſt the Romaniſt, is no more but this, that the Britains, particularly thoſe of Bangor, denied to yield obedience to the Pope, upon Auguſtine's demand of it. And for this, we have the notoriouſneſs of the fact, as it is ſet down by the Authors which are of credit, and are vouched in this matter by the Romaniſt, particularly by Bede, in the ſecond Book of his Eccleſiaſtical Hiſtory, c. 2. where the whole ſtory may be read at large, and out of which I ſhall collect, and, in paſſing, clear theſe few things. 6.

Firſt, That Auguſtine and the Britiſh Biſhops met in Council at Auguſtine's Oake in Worceſterſhire; This paſſage lyes very corruptly in the Latine Bede, in loco ubi uſque hodie linguâ Anglorum Augiſtineʒat, id eſt, robur Auguſtini in confinio Vectiorum & Occidentalium Saxonum appellatur. Three corruptions I ſuppoſe there will ſoon appear to be in theſe words, which I ſhall briefly remove for the clearing of our entrance, and diſabuſing the Author of this Manual in one of them. 7.

The firſt, and chief of them is, that Auguſtineʒat is a σφάλμα γεαφικὸν, miſtaken for Auguſtines-ac, i. e. Auguſtines Oak, whether that were the name of a Tree, or a Village, moſt probably the former, after the manner of that Council, which was held againſt S. Chryſoſtome, called ordinarily the Synod ad quercum, at, or under the Oak. 8.

Secondly, that [ubi] ſhould be read [qui] which is an eaſie miſtake, and ſo the conſtruction will be facile, which now is rough, in loco qui uſque hodie Auguſtines-ac appellatur, in the place which even to this day is called Auguſtine's-ac, and accordingly the Saxon reads, on þære ſtope þe mon nemneð Aguſtinuſ ac, in the place ſtill named Auguſtine's Oak. 9.

Thirdly, that Vectiorum (which the Author of this Appendix renders Vectians, and interprets to be the Iſle of Wight, quite againſt all probable conjecture, for how can it be believ'd that the Britains ſhould give him a meeting ſo far from the place of their own preſent habitation?) ſhould be Wicciorum (ſo * Huntington reads it, and the Saxon Bede Hpicna) meaning Worceſterſhire by that ſtyle, and accordingly this Synod is by Authors oft called Wigornienſis Synodus, the Worceſterſhire Synod; and among the Britiſh Biſhops, who are recorded to be preſent at the ſecond Seſſion, Wiccenſis, the Biſhop 10.

of Worceſter is one. In what part of that County it was that that Synod convened, I ſee it is uncertain among our later Writers, and ſo there may be place for conjecture; Sir Henry Spelman from the Map propoſeth Auſtric, as a probable contraction from Auſtinſric, Auguſtini ditio, as that which may give ſome light in a doubtful matter; but upon inquiry I hear that that village is called Aufric or Alfric, not Auſtric; and therefore I ſhall take confidence to mention, what ſeems to me far more probable, that it was in the pariſh of Merton, which hath the agnomen of Uſſentree, or Oſſentree, in old Rolls, Merton juxta Oſſentree, Merton cloſe by Oſſentree, an eaſie variation from, and contraction of Auſtin-tree, and is three miles from Worceſter, near the rode to Droitwich, where the Hill-Church is Auguſtine's Church.

11. Secondly, That the buſineſs of this convention, deſigned to draw the Britiſh to obedience to Auguſtine and the See of Rome, began with a propoſition only of conformity in the obſervation of Eaſter, in the Ceremonies of Baptiſm, &c. But this in vain; for, ſaith Bede, after a long diſputation they would give no aſſent to the intreaties, and exhortations and chidings of Auguſtine, but preferred their own tradition before all the Churches through the world, which accorded with Rome in the particular of Eaſter, &c.

12. Thirdly, That for the convincing of them, Auguſtine challenged them to do miracles, and by prayer to God, cured a blind man, and was much cried up for ſo doing; the Britiſh ſtill adhering to their way, and anſwering him, that abſque conſenſu & licentiâ ſuorum, without conſent and licence of their whether Rulers of Church, or whatſoever other ſuperiors alſo (their Metropolitan, I ſuppoſe, which cannot be thought to have been with them at this, being certainly none of the ſeven Biſhops, which are affirmed to have been preſent at the later convention) they could not forſake their antient cuſtoms.

13. Fourthly, That upon propoſal, it was agreed that they ſhould have a ſecond meeting, at which were preſent ſeven Britiſh Biſhops (which other Writers expreſs to have been the Biſhop of Hereford, Landaff, Bangor, S. Aſaph, Worceſter, Paternenſis, Morganenſis) and many other learned men, eſpecially de nobiliſſimo eorum Monaſterio, quod vocatur lingua Anglorum Bancornaburg, cui tempore illo Dinooth Abbas præfuiſſe narratur, of the famous Monaſtery of Bangor, of which Dinooth was Abbot at that time.

14. Fifthly, That before they went to this Meeting, they were adviſed by a religious perſon, whoſe directions they asked, to obſerve diligently the behaviour of Auguſtine, when they came, whether he were meek and lowly in heart, a mark by which they might know whether he had taken Chriſt's yoke upon him, and conſequently whether it were the yoke of Chriſt, which he now deſired to impoſe upon them, and upon Auguſtine's ſitting ſtill upon his ſtool or ſeat, and never riſing up with any civility or humility, at their approach, they were ſo diſpleaſed, ſaith Bede, that they contradicted all the propoſals that he made to them.

15. Sixthly, That upon his making three Propoſitions to them, concerning Eaſter, Baptiſm, and preaching to the Engliſh, and promiſing to bear with them in all other differences, (of which ſort, ſaid he, there were many wherein their practice was contrary conſuetudini noſtræ, imò Univerſalis Eccleſiæ, to the cuſtom of the Roman, yea the Univerſal Church) they anſwered, nihil horum ſe facturos, nec illum pro Archiepiſcopo habituros, that they would not comply with him in any of them, nor acknowledge him for their Archbiſhop; Upon which follows that rough ſanguinary anſwer of Auguſtine's, quod ſi pacem cum fratribus accipere nollent, bellum ab hoſtibus forent accepturi, that if they would not accept of peace with brethren they ſhould have war from enemies; and, as it follows in very plain language, per Anglorum manus ultionem mortis eſſent paſſuri, the hands of the Engliſh ſhould act a bloody revenge upon them.

16. Which, it ſeems, ſoon after followed, and fell in an eminent manner on the Monks of Bangor, of which order there were at that time above two thouſand, who lived all by the labour of their own hands. For, ſaith he, King Edilfred of Northumberland, coming with a great Army to Caerleon, made his firſt onſet on their Prieſts, who were aſſembled by themſelves to faſt and pray for their brethren, (as Moſes holding up his hands in prayer, whileſt Joſhua held up his in fighting) and upon no other provocation (taken notice of by the Hiſtorian) but this, that they fought againſt him with their prayers (contra nos pugnant qui adverſus nos in precationibus proſequuntur) he firſt ſet upon them, killed twelve hundred of them, and then deſtroyed the whole Army. Sicque completum eſt præſagium ſancti Pontificis Auguſtini, and ſo the preſage of the holy Biſhop St. Auguſtine was fulfilled upon them.

17. Theſe particulars of the ſtory I have thus punctually ſet down in obedience to the rebuke of this Author, who p. 412. chargeth it upon Sir Henry Spelman, and thoſe others that borrow out of him, as a want of willingneſs to ſee the truth, and of fidelity to communicate it to others, that they have choſen to reflect on that teſtimony (which he is pleaſed to call upſtart, and) which appeared not till within theſe fifteen years, and not upon that true antiquity, which having indured the ſhock of almoſt a thouſand years, Sir Henry had a little before tranſcribed out of Bede, wherein, ſaith he every one may read, firſt that miracle in giving ſight to the blind man, then that divine vengeance prophetically foretold by Auguſtine, which (in his opinion) more than ſufficiently prove, that S. Auguſtine, ſent by the Pope, came in the name of God, from a lawful authority, and that his demands of conformity to the Church of Rome in the points ſpecified, were good, and to be yielded to by the Britains.

p. 413.

18. In this matter I might now fitly inlarge, and examine the force of this two-fold Argument, that of the miraculous cure, and that of the predicted vengeance, and offer many things to conſideration concerning each head.

19. For the former, Firſt, the no great credit that hath been given to the relations of Bede on this head of miracles (of which his Story is ſo richly furniſhed) together with the great deceit that ſuch pretenſions have been experimented to ſubject men to: Secondly, the confeſſion of Bede, that the Britains were * unwilling to yield to this tryal of their cauſe; and accordingly when he ſaith that the † blind man being offered to the Prieſts of the Britains, he received no cure or benefit by them, he doth not ſo much as pretend that the Britains attempted to do the miracle, and failed in it, but leaves us to reſolve that they wholly waved this tryal: Thirdly, that if the miracle were granted to be a true miracle, and a teſtimony of Gods aſſerting the doctrines then conteſted between them, yet this would not be any concludent teſtimony for the Pope's Supremacy, but only for thoſe things which were then the

the matter of the Queſtion, the time of the obſervation of Eaſter, the Rites of Baptiſm, accuſtomed in the Roman Church, and at the moſt ſome ſuch like traditions, wherein the Britiſh cuſtom varied from that of Rome, for this was the form of the propoſed tryal, quæ ſequenda traditio, quibus ſit viis ad ingreſſum Regni illius properandum, what tradition was to be followed (in the celebration of Eaſter; that which the Britains had received and retained from their firſt converſion, imputed to an Apoſtle or Apoſtolical perſon, Simon Zelotes or Joſeph of Arimathea, or that which the Romans deduced from S. Peter) by what ways they were to haſten to entrance into that Kingdom (referring, I ſuppoſe, to the Rites of Baptiſm, the ſecond Head of Debate between them) And in both theſe, (as alſo in refuſing to join with Auguſtine in the common work of preaching to the Gentiles) it may eaſily be granted by us, that the truth was on the Romaniſts ſide, and not on the Britains, without yielding a ſupremacy of the Church of Rome over the Britiſh Churches. Fourthly, That the Britains by Bede's confeſſion, acknowledged themſelves convinced by that miracle, that the way of righteouſneſs which Auguſtine preached, was the true way, yet added, that they could not renounce their antient cuſtoms without the conſent and licence of their own Superiors) which evidently confines and determines the miracle and all the ſuppoſed Vertue thereof to the confirming the Traditions which Auguſtine delivered, without farther extending it to the aſſerting the Papal power (to which the Abbot of Bangor's Anſwer was particularly confronted) for had they once acknowledged themſelves convinced of that, there had been no place left for the licentia ſuorum, no need of the conſent or licence of any other Superiors, which yet they reſolutely adhere to. Laſtly, That at their ſecond meeting the Britains deemed Auguſtine's pride a more valid convincing Argument, that the yoke which he deſigned to impoſe on them, was not the yoke of Chriſt, than the ſuppoſed miracle, that it was.

And for the latter, that of the ſlaughter, firſt * threatned and then fulfilled upon them. 1. If that were indeed a miracle, it was not of the complexion, which is generally obſerved in Chriſt's miracles, uſed for the working of Faith, but proportionable to the Spirit of the Boanerges, which would have the fire from Heaven called down upon the Samaritans, and were anſwered by Chriſt, that this was not agreeable to the Spirit of the Goſpel; And if the example of S. Peter on Ananias and Saphira, or of S. Paul on Elymas, be made uſe of as a precedent for this ſeverity, yet ſure the Anſwer of Pope Gregory to Auguſtine at that time, ſuppoſing different Churches to enjoy different cuſtoms, and not impoſing the Roman upon all, might have directed him to greater moderation. See Bed. l. 1. c. 27. in his Anſwer to the third Interrogation. Secondly, It is no very great miracle, that a grand Army falling firſt upon unarmed Monks, ſhould obtain the Victory againſt them, and afterward againſt all other their Oppoſers; nor conſequently is it any whit ſtrange that Auguſtine, that was ſo provoked, and meant to uſe this bloody revengeful courſe, ſhould thus threaten what he then deſigned to ſee performed, for that is the full meaning of his foretelling it. 20.

* Fertur minitans prædixiſſe. Bede. Terruit eos vaticinio futuræ ſuper eos calamitatis. Sigebert.

It is true indeed that either Bede, or ſome Interpolator, that copied out the original Latine of that Hiſtory, hath thought good to inſert ſome words in the end of that Story, l. 2. c. 2. in fine, (quamvis ipſo jam multo ante tempore ad cœleſtia Regna ſublato) which might delude men into a perſwaſion, that this bloody act was a long time after Auguſtine's death; But for this, Firſt, it is obſervable that King Alfred's Saxon Tranſlation or Paraphraſe of Bede, wholly omits that Parentheſis, and reads it only thus, ⁊ ſpa pær ȝefylled ſe pitedom ſær Dalȝan B. Aȝuſtinuſ ƿ Dſceolsan, &c. and ſo was fulfilled the prediction of S. Auguſtine, that they ſhould feel the revenge of temporal deſtruction. Secondly, That the ſeries of the Story in Bede gives juſt prejudice to that Parentheſis, for this of the ſlaughter of the Britains being ſet down in the end of the ſecond Chapter, the third begins with Auguſtine's ordaining two Biſhops, Mellitus and Juſtus, which ſure was not after his death; and, as the Saxon paraphraſe of King Alfred begins that Chapter with this form of reference to the former paſſage Dæ pær æfter ƿiſſum — It was after this — which plainly defines Auguſtine to have ſurvived that bloudy fact; ſo the Latine Bede, which ſets down the time of Auguſtine's ordaining thoſe two Biſhops, Anno Dominicæ incarnationis ſexcenteſimo quarto, In the year 604. doth yet more incline us to ſuſpect that Parentheſis, for though Bede, who ſets down the month and day of Auguſtine's death, ſets not down the year of it, but leaves it in a latitude to be between the year 596. in which he came to England, and the year 613. (or, as the Saxon reads 616.) in which King Ethelbert died, yet others commonly affirm that he continued Biſhop fifteen or ſixteen years, and ſo died about 612 or 613. whereas Chronologers affirm the ſlaughter of the Monks of Bangor, &c. to have been in the year 603, and ſo the year immediately precedent to Auguſtine's ordaining thoſe two Biſhops. Thirdly, When in the relation of this ſlaughter, the Latine Bede begins, Siquidem poſthæc ipſe, de quo diximus, Rex Anglorum — For after this, i. e. after Auguſtine's threatining deſtruction to the Britiſh, the forenamed King of the Angles gathered an Army — the Saxon Paraphraſe reads and ſona Dnaƿe æfter ðiſſum, and ſoon rath, i. e. very ſoon after this, which again perſwades that it was before Auguſtine's death, at leaſt that the jam multo ante in the Parentheſis (that Auguſtine died long before) could have no truth in it. Laſtly, as ſome Writers of theſe dark times have made a ſhift to affirm with the Latine Bede, that Auguſtine was firſt dead, ſo it is known alſo that others charge it on him, that he was not only the Inciter to it, but that he met the Kings when they were ready for the fight, and was preſent with them; And Trivet in his French Chronicle, that ſaith it was done after Auguſtine's death, yet adds that Ethelbert King of Kent, who ſtirred up Ethelfred King of Northumberland and his Saxons againſt the Britains, and by name againſt Dinoth Abbot of Bangor formentioned, was highly diſpleaſed and inflamed, that he had deſpiſed Auguſtine. All which being conſidered, it is certain, that this was no very Chriſtian action, whether in Auguſtine or in Ethelbert, and the threats of the one, and performances of the other, as they bear an exact proportion, ſo are they equally argumentative, not for, but againſt that Cauſe which was willing thus unchriſtianly to ſupport it ſelf. 21.

Thirdly, if the ſlaughter of theſe poor Monks ſhall yet be thought a ſolid probation, as an act of Divine vengeance upon them (juſt ſuch as the falling of the Tower of Siloe was, from which none but a Jew, or Turk, or the Barbarians, Act 28. or thoſe that make proſperity the ſpecial mark of a true Church, will think fit to conclude any thing) there is one part of the Story yet behind, which will refute and retort that Argument; for when Edilfrid had uſed them ſo bloodily, and in the heat of his rage 22.

and victory proceeded to deſtroy the remainder of thoſe Monks, and their Monaſtery together, the Avengers of blood met him, three Britiſh Commanders, with their Forces, routed his Army, killed ten thouſand and ſixty of them, wounded the King, and put him and the remainder of his Army to flight; which certainly is an Argument of as much validity to infer that God maintained the Cauſe of thoſe innocent Monks againſt the Saxons and Auguſtine, as the former was argumentative on their ſide againſt the Britiſh.

23. But it is not needful, that I inſiſt on either of theſe; the one thing that from this view of the Story in Bede, was to be concluded, is only this, that upon the Relations, as in him they lye, and are by this Author H. T. vouched againſt us, there can be no doubt of our Concluſion, that the Abbot and Monks of Bangor oppoſed Auguſtine, yielded him no obedience, referred themſelves only to their own Governours, without any acknowledgment of obedience to the Pope; And this is generally the reſult of other Authors Narrations of this matter.

24. So * Balæus, ſpeaking of that Convention, Dinotus omnium primus graviter & doctè de non approbandâ apud eos Romanorum authoritate diſputabat, Dinoth in the firſt place gravely and learnedly diſputed againſt the Authority of the Biſhops of Rome among them; adding, Fortiter præterea tuebatur Menevenſis Archiepiſcopi in Eccleſiarum ſuarum rebus ratam juriſdictionem, that he moreover ſtrongly and couragiouſly defended the validity of the juriſdiction of the Archbiſhop of S. David's (the ſame that in the Abbot's Anſwer is called the Biſhop of Caerleon) in the affairs of his own Churches.

* In Dinoth.

25. So Geffrey of Monmouth, Edelbertus Rex Kantiorum, ut vidit Britones dedignantes ſubjectionem Auguſtino facere, Northumbrorum & cæteros Saxonum regulos inſtimulavit ut collecto grandi exercitu in Civitatem Bangor, Abbatem Dinoth & cæteros Clericos, qui eos ſpreverunt, perditum irent. King Ethelbert ſeeing the Britains diſdain to yield their ſubjection to Auguſtine, ſtirred up the King of Northumberland and other Saxon Kings to gather a great Army againſt the City Bangor, to deſtroy Dinoth the Abbot and the other Clerks of that Monaſtery, who had ſcorned Auguſtine and the Saxons.

26. So Sigebert in Anno 602. Auguſtinus —— habita Synodo cum Britonum & Scotorum Epiſcopis, qua Sacerdotes & Monachos invenit Adverſarios æquitatis —— Auguſtine had a meeting with the Britiſh and Scotiſh Biſhops, and there found an oppoſition from the Prieſts and Monks, and terrified them by prediction of a calamity that ſhould fall on them. Other evidences to the ſame purpoſe are ſet down in the Collection of the Anglicane Councils, and Mr Whelock's Notes on his Edition of the Saxon Bede, p. 115. if there could now remain any Queſtion of it.

27. And that this was diſcerned by the Author of this Appendix, if it had been for his Intereſt to have taken notice of it, is evident by his mention of the miracle and Divine vengeance, as of proofs that Auguſtine was in the right againſt theſe Refuſers, who yet continued, ſaith he, ſtill refractory to his Propoſals. And this was all I concluded from the Abbot's Anſwer, and this ſtands firm in this Romaniſt's own confeſſion, though the words of the Abbot's Anſwer had not been preſerved to us.

28. And therefore being now wholly unconcerned in the validity of this teſtimony, and ſo ſecured from all danger of being bribed by intereſts to judge more favourably of it than the matter requires, I ſhall now proceed calmly to conſider, whether there be that clearneſs and evidence in this Author's Arguments for the invalidating this teſtimony, which he aſſures us we ſhall find in them.

29. His firſt Argument is negative from the [not leaſt ſcrap of Antiquity ſo much as pretended to prove that
p. 405. the Cambrian (i. e. Welch) lines cited, were the Abbot of Bangor's Anſwer to Auguſtine upon the occaſion ſpecified, nor that the renowned Dinoth was that Abbot, nor that the old Manuſcript whence Sir Henry Spelman extracts the teſtimony, was copied out of any more ancient.

30. What other proof from antiquity ſhould be expected from Sir Henry Spelman, to give authority to theſe lines, than what readily offers it ſelf in this matter, I do not underſtand; That the Britiſh, particularly thoſe of Bangor, and yet more peculiarly Dinoth the famous Abbot of that Monaſtery, diſputed againſt Auguſtin's pretenſions for the authority of the Biſhop of Rome, and aſſerted their own ſubjection to their Metropolitan, hath already appeared to be the affirmation of thoſe, who are moſt competent Witneſſes of it; and the Manuſcript paſſage in Welch and Engliſh, which Sir Henry Spelman had tranſcribed from Mr. Moſton's Copy (and directs the Reader to Sir Robert Cotton's Library to ſatisfie himſelf in that matter) is directly agreeable to this, for the matter of it, and ſo gave that very judicious Knight juſt reaſon both to ſet ſome value on it himſelf, and to communicate it to others, as that which might gratifie their curioſity, and approve it ſelf by its own light to any judicious Reader, to be, if not the very words of that Abbot's Anſwer, yet the ſenſe and ſubſtance of it, and whether of theſe it ſhould be judged to be, it matters not.

31. Had the Contents of this Teſtimony been any way contrary to other undoubted Records of thoſe times, or indeed any diſparate new relation, that had not formerly been taken notice of, and was now to owe the whole credit and ſupport to this Teſtimony, ſome reaſon there might have been for an Ariſtarchus to proceed with more caution than here was uſed, and to yield nothing to bare groundleſs conjectures (and the Romaniſt hath as much reaſon as any man to lay this to heart, to act with this caution in other Teſtimonies (but when the matter is agreed on among the Antients, and an old Record offers it ſelf to our view, in perfect concord with that which we had formerly all reaſon to believe, and only affirms that more legibly and diſtinctly, which was in ſubſtance before, but not ſo punctually delivered to us, I cannot think the ſevereſt Critick, ſuppoſing him unconcerned and impartial, without any Hypotheſis of his own to be defended or tended by him, would have any averſion or diſlike to a teſtimony thus produced, though for ſome circumſtances of it, ſuch as are here mentioned, the Producer have nothing of authority to back his own conjectures.

32. This one thing I am ſure is moſt unjuſt, not to give credit to a Manuſcript, that it is what it pretends to be, unleſs I have ſome expreſs affirmation of Antiquity concerning that particular Manuſcript; ſhould ſuch Rules of ſeverity be now impoſed on the Preſs, the Vatican muſt never bring forth more rarities, the wealth of all the Archives in the World muſt lye dead, like a Miſer's treaſure, no one Volume being able to teſtifie for the veracity of its Neighbour, or if it were, it ſelf muſt alſo bring its Voucher along with it, and ſo on in infinitum, or elſe it would not be ἰση μαρτυρια, a competent teſtification in this matter; and when it is remembred, that all, which is now made publick by the help of Printing, lay

once in ſingle Manuſcripts, and thoſe multipliable only by tranſcribing, and neither the Originals nor Copies any other way teſtified to be what they pretended to be, than as theſe Cambrian Lines are delivered to us by Sir Henry, I hope this will be deemed a competent proof, that this firſt Argument is not ſo clearly demonſtrative as was promiſed.

Another Branch there is of this firſt Argument, in theſe words, And certainly if his Manuſcript be no 33.
elder than the interlined Engliſh, he hath groſsly wronged himſelf and his Reader, by honouring it with the p. 405.
Style of Antient: For as every one ſees, the Engliſh is purely modern, and cannot be ſo old by many years as Henry VIII's caſhiering the Pope's Authority, and arrogating the ſupremacy in Eccleſiaſtical matters to himſelf, for maintenance whereof it is alledged, and was certainly forged.

To this I anſwer briefly, that it is not pretended by Sir Henry, that the Engliſh is as antient as the 34.
times of Dinoth, no nor the Welſh neither, but that thoſe two Languages were made uſe of by ſome, whoſe Ages he pretends not to know, to conveigh to us intelligibly the Anſwer of that Abbot, in what language ſoever it were delivered by him; And if it ſhall now be granted to this Author, that the Engliſh idiom evidenceth it to be written within theſe laſt hundred years, this can be no prejudice or ground of ſuſpicion, much leſs a proof of forgery againſt this Manuſcript, as long as the Welch is allowed to be more antient, to which the Engliſh may upon a latter tranſcribing have been annext, as fitly as old Greek MSS. are daily printed with the Latine tranſlations of a later date, in the ſame or ſeveral pages.

His ſecond Argument is deduced from the Cambrian Lines, in which he pretends to diſcover many 35.
un-Cambrian mixtures of Engliſh words, helpio and gleimio, for help and claim, want of Orthography, p. 406, 7, 8.
and the like; To which being utterly unskilful in the Welch language, I acknowledge my ſelf incompetent to give any very particular reply, yet ſhall give my reaſon, why I cannot think that this ſecond argument of his is any more demonſtrative againſt the validity of the teſtimony than the former; For, firſt, ſuppoſing this Copy of Mr. Moſton's to be a tranſcript, not the original (as it is evident Sir Henry Spelman ſuppoſeth) what difficulty is there to imagine, that that Copy was tranſcribed by one unskilful in the Orthography of that language, eſpecially when it is known, how ordinary this is to be found, not only among the vulgar, but among learned Church-men of that nation, who are fain by ſtudy to acquire skill of reading before they can officiate in that language. Secondly, I ſhall readily grant, or, if he pleaſe, yield to the force of his arguments, that the Welch Lines are not the words, or language wherein Dinoth delivered his anſwer, but (as this Gentleman after contends) that Dinoth, a writer of Latine Books, being to ſpeak to Auguſtine, that underſtood not the Britiſh language, gave his anſwer in Latine; What hinders now, but that this Latine anſwer being conſerved among the Britains, might in later times (before Henry the VIII.) in any age to which the idiom of the Welch lines ſhall direct a Critick in that language to affix them, be tranſlated into imperfect (I mean more modern) yet intelligible Welch, either by a native of that Country, or by any other, who had acquired ſo much of that language, as was ſufficient for no weightier an enterpriſe? I diſcern not what diſadvantage I can receive by this conceſſion; and ſure there will be ſmall difficulty in vindicating Sir Henry's integrity, if this ſhall be ſuppoſed; For he no where pretends, that the Cambrian Lines, in the form here preſented, were the language, or words of the anſwer of Dinoth, but that the matter of his anſwer, in what language ſoever delivered by him, is communicated to us by that MS. And that it was not, here is no word of ſo much as probable argument, much leſs of clear demonſtration tendred by the Author of this Appendix.

Laſtly, for the two words which occaſioned his charge of the Engliſh mixtures, I am, by thoſe which 36.
have skill in the language, enabled to return him ſome anſwer, that the word help, from whence is the infinitive helpio or helpu, is found uſed by Tudor Aled, who wrote An. 1490. and by Lluellyn, who is thought to be more antient, and that gleimio, or cleimio is by the Latine and Welch Dictionary ſet down in the word vendico, in the firſt place, (and after that holi) as the moſt proper Welch word for it, not borrowed from the Engliſh; From whence as I ſhall not conclude, that theſe Welch lines, were the original of Dinoth's anſwer, (that were to retract my former conceſſion) ſo I may ſafely aſſume, that theſe two words (his only inſtances of Engliſh mixtures) do no way demonſtrate this Welch tranſlation to be later than Henry the VIII. his caſhiering the Pope's authority (as of the Engliſh it was granted) nor conſequently leave it under ſuſpicion of being forged by any Proteſtant.

His third Argument is of more ſeeming force, taken from the mention of this Abbot's ſubjection to 37.
the Biſhop of Caerleon upon Uske, in which he finds two abſurdities, 1. ſaith he, Bangor is very near, p. 409.
if not in the Dioceſe of Lhan Elwy, now commonly called S. Aſaph: 2. all Hiſtories teſtifie that the Archiepiſcopal Seat was removed from Caerleon to S. David's in King Arthur's time, who died about the year 544. i. e. fifty years before Auguſtine's firſt entrance into Britain.

To theſe two branches of probation, certainly the anſwer is very obvious to the firſt, that acknow- 38.
ledging and ſuppoſing that the Monaſtery of Banchor, ſituate in Flintſhire, though within the confines of Cheſtſhire, was under the Dioceſan Biſhop either of S. Aſaph, or of Cheſter, (the Epiſcopal See of Bangor lying in the County of Caernarvan) yet this can be of no manner of force againſt this teſtimony; for he that was under the Biſhop of S. Aſaph, as his immediate ſuperior, or Dioceſan, may yet be under the Biſhop of Caerleon, as his Metropolitan, as he that is under the Biſhop of Rocheſter in one reſpect, is under the Biſhop of Canterbury in another. And ſo that is a full anſwer to his firſt difficulty.

For the ſecond, it is acknowledged that before this time of Dinoth's anſwer to Auguſtine, the 39.
Archiepiſcopal See had been by authority of Synod removed firſt from Caerleon to Landaff by Dubritius, Anno 512. and ſo it is affirmed by Sir Henry Spelman in his Apparat. p. 25. (where by the way, lin. 5. the Printer hath miſtaken ad Meneviam for ad Landaviam) and in like manner by his ſucceſſor S. David, Anno 516. by licence from King Arthur, from Landaff to Menevia, which from that eminent Biſhop, under whom that change was made, was after called S. Davids. But this removal of the Metropolitical See from one City to another was not of ſuch weight, or conſideration, but that the Metropolitical dignity, having been ſo long fixt at Caerleon, might ſtill retain that title after the tranſlation.

Beſides, the Abbot of Bangor making anſwer to Auguſtine's claim, which was founded in ſome 40.
old

old right, which he pretended the Pope to have over all Churches, it was moſt proper to conteſt this by former practice, not only how it ſtood at that preſent, but eſpecially how it had been ἄνωθεν ἢ ἐξ ἀρχῆς, of old, or from the beginning, by cuſtom immemorial, and herein not to conſider ſuch immaterial changes, as were the removing of the Primate's See from one City to another, but to look on it, as it had always lain, in oppoſition to all foreign juriſdiction: And it being certain that Caerleon was antiently this Prime See, nothing was more agreeable to this conteſt, as it is ſuppoſed to be managed by that Abbot, than thus to refer to the ἀρχαῖα ἔθη (as the Councils of Nice, and Antioch, and Chalcedon, and Epheſus had done, in the like controverſies) to tell Auguſtine that the Britiſh Chriſtians had always, from their firſt plantation, been under a Britiſh Primate, and to call the Britiſh Primate by that title, which had moſt antiently belonged to him, i. e. Biſhop of Caerleon, and not by the later of Landaff, or the yet later of S. Davids.

41. What this Author here objects againſt the former of theſe anſwers, ſaying, 1. That this is not proved: And 2. That it implies a contradiction, to ſay, the See was tranſlated, and the former title ſtill retained, Tranſlation importing the taking a new, and deſertion of the old title,] is no way applicable to this ſecond anſwer (which conſequently remains in full force) and therefore I need not farther attend to it; And in relation to the former anſwer, It is far from the promiſed clearneſs of demonſtration.

42. For as to the firſt part of it, the thing may be true, though it be not proved; the contrary muſt be proved by him that promiſeth clear or demonſtrative confutations: And for the ſecond, it muſt be founded in ſome new notion of Contradiction, which my Logick hath not acquainted me with; for ſure he that ſaith the See was tranſlated, and the former title retained, doth neither ſay that the See was tranſlated and not tranſlated (which is the only form of a Logical contradiction) nor that the former title was retained and not retained; Nor conſequently can I diſcern the leaſt inconvenience, much leſs contradiction, either direct, or by way of implication, that the Metropolitical See being tranſlated from Caerleon to another City, the Metropolitan ſhould ſtill retain his original title, that of Biſhop of Caerleon.

43. Other Exceptions he proceeds to add, but thoſe ſo far again from being, according to promiſe, demonſtrative evidences againſt this teſtimony, that they are no way worthy to be attended to.
p. 410.

44. Firſt, That Dinoth would probably have anſwered in Latine; and to that I have already replied, that I may well grant he did ſo, and conſequently that both the Welch and Engliſh in Mr. Moſton's MS. were tranſlations of that Latine.

45. Secondly, That the words in Welch rendred [whom you name to be Pope--] are not rightly tranſlated; In this again I cannot contend, having no knowledge in that language, but as before I followed Sir Henry's tranſlation, and finding it not very clear, did endeavour to expreſs his meaning by a juſt Paraphraſe, and thereby happily rendred the true ſenſe of the place, ſo if I ſhould now believe my teacher again, this Author, that undertakes to correct Sir Henry's tranſlation, it would not be impoſſible ſo to render the words, as ſhould bear a very commodious ſenſe, and perfectly agreeable to the notion I formerly had of them.

46. But being not ſecure that my leader H. T. (whom now I diſcern to be no Welch-man) hath really the skill in that language, which his animadverſions pretend to, I thought it more reaſonable to conſult ſome other more knowing guide, and am now from a judicious hand aſſured, that there is an errour in the diſtinction between Daad: and yw gleimio, which being taken away, the true rendring of the whole is this, Et aliam obedientiam, quam iſtam, non agnoſco ego cujuſquam eſſe, quem vos nominatis Papam, vel patrem patrum, vendicare & poſtulare, And any other obedience than that, I acknowledge not to be any mans (or to belong to any man) whom ye name Pope, or Father of Fathers, to challenge and require. This is plain ſenſe, and ſtill perfectly agreeable to the underſtanding I formerly had of the words, and I doubt not but upon the moſt Critical examination, it will be found to be the moſt literal rendring of them

47. The third, of the no good ſenſe of the Engliſh. is already anſwered alſo, by adhering to that better tranſlation, which is as perfectly fit for our turns, as the other was imagined to be, and much more intelligible and clear, as appeared in the laſt number.

48. The fourth is, that the words uſed of the Biſhop of Caerleon [who is to overſee under God over us] makes againſt the aim of the Prelatick reformers, and particularly againſt me, who labour to ſupport the King's Supremacy againſt the Pope, whereas theſe words exclude the King as well as the Pope.] But certainly there is no force in this, for Auguſtine's demand, or queſtion being only of that obedience and ſubordination which belonged to the ſupreme Biſhop, whether that were the Biſhop of Rome, or the Biſhop of Caerleon, and not at all inquiring into the nature or extent of the regal or imperial power (there being no occaſion to ſuggeſt any ſuch inquiry) the Abbot's anſwer can in no probability be extended any farther than the queſtion extended, i. e. to the aſſerting the Prime Epiſcopal power to belong to the Metropolitan of Caerleon or S. Davids, without any ſubordination to the Pope of Rome.

49. As for that which in the fifth place he adds of the miracle and divine vengeance, in Bede, and ſo
* n. 19, 20 concludes his Appendix, to that I have ſpoken * already, in that which I thought meet to premiſe to this debate, and ſo I have no more to add by way of anſwer to his exceptions, but that I cannot ſufficiently wonder, that this Author (ſo recommended to the Reader by his learned Friend in the front of his Book) ſhould make it his ſolemn buſineſs to invalidate this one ſupernumerary teſtimony, being withal no better provided with arguments to promiſe him ſucceſs in it.

THE

THE Disarmers Dexterities EXAMINED, In a Second DEFENCE Of the TREATISE of SCHISM.

CHAP. I.

An Introduction and Answer to S. W. his Epistle to the Reader.

SECT. I.

Of the Disarmers stile and contumelies. The Scriptures judgments and sentence on Λοιδορίας. Other parts of the Character belonging thereto.

SOME months have now past, since I made my joynt Reply both to the Catholick Gentleman his Answer to the Tract of Schism, and to Mr. H. T. his Appendix to his Manual of Controversies; and thereon I had grounded some just hope, that either I should receive a fair Christian Rejoynder to that Reply, or else being permitted to retire from these agonies, be allowed some respite for thoughts and offerings of peace: But before some other importunities had permitted me to enter on the least injoyment of this calm, this φυσικωτάτη κατάστασις (to me I am sure) most natural, as * Epicurus call'd his γαλήνη, I find my self again ingaged (by one who hath chosen to be so reserved, as to give me but two Letters, S. W. to know him by, and so little to take notice of these lower transactions, as not to own the having heard of that Reply) and there under the title of Disarmed Schism, I meet with as copious a Collection of scoffs, and contumelies, as I ever remember to have seen contrived within so narrow a compass. To these the Romish Factor hath, in the name of the Stationer, pleased to give the stile of Drollery, and Piquant sauce; but the Author himself, who was fittest to have the naming of his own births, hath in his Epistle to the Reader, allowed them the plainer titles of Rude blows, and twitchings by the beard: now because the one business of that Epistle is not to excuse, but to justifie this dealing, to avow and defend the Authors just title to the scorners chair, and professly to plead to it, producing such evidences, as he is confident may secure his possession; and agreeably, the Publishers care and wit hath so particularly conformed, that to the syllabus of the Chapters, he hath solemnly annext a list of the contumelies, three and thirty pickt out by specialty out of the far greater number, (as if Goliah's cursing of David, had been the disarming and discomfiting him; as if the language that the King of Moab would have bribed Balaam to use, had been a certain inchantment against Israel; as if every reproach wherewith Rabshakeh adorned his challenge to Hezekiah, were indeed a several victory over him) It is therefore reasonable that I should thus far comply with my disarmers method, as to begin with an examination of that spirit which hath suggested, of those reasons, which are thought competent to defend this manner of managing controversies in Religion.

* Nonnus συναγ. ἰσρεα. p. 137.

And herein the matter under examination being already as notorious, and confest, as the flagrant fact, and the Authors justifying thereof can render it, the sentence is long ago pronounced by the Apostle, 1 Cor. 5. 11. and 6. 10. I shall need only to recite it; In the former place, ἐάν τις ἀδελφὸς ὀνομαζόμενος ἢ λοίδορος, If any that is called a brother, by name or profession a Christian, be a railer or reviler, τῷ τοιούτῳ μηδὲ συνεσθίειν, with such an one no not to eat; the Christians of Corinth must have no society with him, ὄνομα μόνον ἀδελφῷ ἔχει, οὐκ ἔστι δὲ τῇ ἀληθείᾳ, saith the Scholiast, He hath only the name, not the reality of a Christian, and βδέλυγμά ἐστι διὰ τὴν κακίαν, he is for this fault a detestable person, and as such, falls under the censures of the Church, v. 12. and he that is thus ipso jure excommunicate, is no very competent Juror or witness in a question of Schism, such as that which we have now before us. In the latter, the λοίδοροι, railers, revilers, contumelious persons again, are reckoned as a special sort of ἄδικοι, unrighteous, which continuing such unreformed, shall not inherit the kingdom of heaven, and do but flatter, and deceive themselves, if they hope they may; and such sure are not qualified to condemn others, and exclude them from heaven, being none of those Saints, who, clave non errante, shall judge the world.

3. Beside these, which alone might have discouraged any sober Christian from this adventure, many other unhappy characters are ready to fall upon it. 1. That it is by our Saviour noted to be the very Dialect, which the obstinate Jews used toward the true Prophets of God, ἐνειδισμοὶ, and πᾶν πονηρὸν ῥῆμα, reproachings, and every evil word, Mat. 5. 11. and such withal as will to the sufferer be matter of triumph (χαρὰ and ἀγαλλίασις v. 12. amounts to that) in case it shall finally prove, that causelesly or falsely, and for defence of the truth, it hath fallen upon him.

4. 2. That in case it should not in fine prove thus, yet it is that, which an Angel, the most highly dignified, and most importunely provoked (so was Michael, Jude 9.) would not make use of against the Devil himself, when ingaged in the most malicious dispute against the true Church of God (for such I suppose I have elsewhere shewed was meant, in that place, by the body of Moses) And that it should now adays against all laws of Religion, be admitted to an office (such I think should be a dispute) of Religion, what is it but the imitation of Hercules's sacrifices at Lyndus, which were celebrated by execrations and maledictions, any εὐφημία or word of civility, though unwarily let fall, being deemed the violation of the festival.

Μάλιστα δὲ τὸν μαχόμενον δυμεῖν ὁ χρὴ. Chrys. t. 4. p. 709. l. 33.

5. 3. That as nothing hath a more direct and particular opposition, and unreconcileableness to that spirit of meekness wherein we are commanded by Saint Paul, to * instruct, to ‖ chastise, to * reduce opposers, to that supernal wisdom in S. James, which being first pure, is next peaceable, then gentle and εὐπειθὴς; so it cannot proceed from that divine Spirit, whose fruits among others are reckoned to be love, peace, long-suffering, gentleness, meekness, in opposition to hatred, variance, emulations, wrath, strife, envyings, and such like, Gal. 5. and the biting one another, v. 16. all characters of the Gnostick heresie at that time.

* 2 Tim. 2. 25.
‖ 1 Cor. 4. 21.
* Gal. 6. 1.

6. Lastly, that as this is a most unskilful deviation from all rules of art, aswell as civility, and S. Hierom notes it as a great error in Helvidius, that he took railing for eloquence, so it is not imaginable how so much learning and abilities, as this Disarmer is believed to have, should admit so great a mixture of rudeness and scurrility, had it not appeared necessary to assist in the counterpoise, to supply some other defects, and been useful, as Hierocles saith of oaths, πρὸς ἀναπλήρωσιν λόγου, to fill up the chasms or vacuities in the discourse, that fame prudent Philosopher having given us this Aphorism, that confidence of skill conduces much to the infusing meekness into our debates: And Plutarch πε. ἀοργησ. much to the same purpose, ἀνδρεία χολῆς οὐ δεῖται, fortitude needs no anger, βέβαπται γὰρ τῷ λόγῳ· and Cicero, Tusc. Qu. l. 4. non desiderat fortitudo advocatam iracundiam; satis est instructa, armata, parata per se. Annon vir fortis nisi stomachari cœperit, non potest esse fortis? Gladiatorum id quidem est. And Seneca de Ira, l. 1. c. 16. Nil aliis instrumentis opus est. Satis nos instruxit ratione natura. Hac dedit telum firmum, perpetuum, obsequens, nec anceps, nec quod in dominum remitti possit. Thus * Pliny and ‖ Aetius tell us of the Grecian Serpents, that have no killing faculty of their own, born with them, they are fain to feed on noxious herbs (δανάλωφορυς ῥίζας ἐσθίουσι) or else they are able to hurt no body. And thus is S. W. put to it, to heighten his confuting powers; he submits to a sad diet, and then * βεβρωκὼς κακὰ φάρμακα, having armed himself with these strengthning plants, he becomes, ‖ ὀρίτερος ἀνδρὶ μάχησι, very triumphant at least, if not victorious over his adversary.

* Nat. Hist. l. 29. c. 4.
‖ Tetrab. 4. sec. 1. c. 34.
* Ælian. l. 6. c. 4.
‖ Hom. Iliad. χ. v. 93.

This therefore is no excellent indication of S. W. his perswasions of his own performances in this combat, that he deemed it necessary * ---- geminare venenis vulnera, thus to anoint his shafts, as the Ethiopians do their ‖ little arrows, which having thus imbibed high vertues, ὑπὸ δραμόντων περφαγμένα, ὀξὺν τινὰ καὶ ἀπότομον θάνατον ἐπιφέρουσι, make very quick work, are very killing, or in my Disarmers phrase, beyond all possible confute; For (besides this conscience of his own wants) what rational account can be assigned, that such a last reserve should be drawn out so soon? that τὸ πλῆξαι which the Orator makes the effect of the disputants being nonpluss, and cannot be more commodiously rendred than in the Authors stile, of rude blows, should be the refuge so early, and so constantly? that this ultimus conatus, last plunge of a gasping cause (as when art is at an end, Hypocrates puts off his desperate patient to the φύσεις ἴντεαι) should so long forestal the κρίσις, and dishearten his friends and servants (in which number, if but upon that one score of having received injuries from him, I am by Christs Law obliged to include my self) and shut out all hope of receiving benefit from any future applications? The Divine being allowed to have that skill in symptomes, which Irenæus, as well as Galen hath taught us, that the profusest laughter is the worst indication in the affections of the spleen, ᾧ πλέον γελῶσι, ταύτῃ μᾶλλον κακῶς ἔχουσι.

SECT. II.

An Answer to his two Questions concerning contumelies. The Christian method of answering such.

HAving from that Obligation of Charity, which is most particularly required of me by Christ to the despightfullest enemy, Mat. 5. 44. said thus much to my unknown Disarmer, It is a second necessary method of the same Charity, to endeavour his conviction, by examining that one account, which he gives, of the rudeness of his blows, by exacting an answer from his Reader to this question, How he

he would take it, if one should spit in his face, and justifie the affront, because his breath is sweet; or what he would say to him that ruines his estate by perjury, and defends himself, that he held up his eyes to heaven, and swore demurely] adding, that whatsoever answer he gives, it will perfectly clear S. W. his behaviour towards the Doctor.]

Herein all the Reply that can be expected from me, is to answer his double Question, and to do it according to the certain rules of Christs Divine Precepts, and not the uncertain, mutable practices, or humours of the passionate world. To the first, which mentions spitting in the face, be the breath that accompanies it either sweet, or otherwise, my answer is, That this I should look on as a contumely of the nature of that which Christ mentions, Mat. 5. 39. ὅστις σε ῥαπίσει, Whosoever shall strike thee on the right cheek, which, supposing no wound, or permanent pain to the body, was a fit instance to express reproaches, and contumelies, and such like supportable injuries of all sorts, parallel to which are all the scoffings and revilings, which were thought necessary by S. W. for the Disarming of Schism; And if the Tract to which he replies had any such in it, either toward the Church of Rome, or any particular member of it (as I know there is not one in the whole Book, and the very confession of the sweet breath, the courteous stile, the civil adversary, makes it needless to contest it) the duty, in respect of the sufferer, is evident in Christs Sermon, στρέψον αὐτῷ καὶ τὴν ἄλλην, turn to him the other also, rather adventure more of the like injuries, than ever think of acting revenge on that. There is but one farther care beyond this, which can be seasonable, προσεύχεσθαι ὑπὲρ τῶν ἐπηρεαζόντων, To pray for them that thus despightfully use you; and that it may not be ἀνενέργητος ἐυχὴ, a sluggish, unactive, and so uneffectual sacrifice, (that πυρὸς τροφὴ καὶ ἱεροσύλοις χορηγία, in Himerius) the assistant endeavour, and diligence of fraternal admonition, and reproof, is to go along with our Prayer, Mat. 18. 15. and this is all the revenge that is allowed to any private Christian in this case. And so that must serve for answer to his first question; Let him now consider what arts will avail to make up the parallel betwixt this duty, and his practice, when he that gave the Law, shall come to exact account of the performance of it. 2.

The other Question, founded in the more unsupportable injury of ruining the estate by perjury, must have another answer, that in that case, it is very lawful to use all lawful means to discover the perjury, and to defend the estate: What those lawful means are, I shall not need to enumerate, but only assure him, that rude blows, which avail nothing to either of these ends, twitchings by the beard, declamation and satyr, (before any attempt of proof) are none of these justifiable lawful means, but are on the contrary, that most unjust, unskilful, as well as unchristian revenge, the ἐξομοίωσις in the Stoick, the doing the most we can to be like him, whom we most dislike. Mean while, to bring this home to the case before us, 'tis certain and visible, that as the defending the Church of England from Schism, bears no proportion to the ruining S. W. his estate (if he hath no other tenure in his earthly, or heavenly possessions, but the worlds believing, that we are Schismaticks, he hath been very negligent of his deeds, and a little charity were his much better way to mend his assurances;) so surely, neither is there any oath incumbent on us, which can be pretended to be violated by casting off the Romish yoke, neither hath there been any the least perjurious tampering discoverable in any part of my defence; (he might as truly have said, that I offered sacrifice to Idols, that I consulted with Necromancers, to rob him of his Christian patience) and if he mark, his stile, which was robust in the mention of perjury, is grown much fainter, when he comes to the ἀνταπόδοσις, pretends to no more than perverse meaning and abusive treating matters of religion; But I trust it shall appear that this was but the language of interest, or passion also, and that there is not one single falsity in that whole Tract of Schism; If there be, I shall, when it appears, be content to deliver it up to the force of his proofs, but not till then, to the charm of his scoffs. If I must be humbled for my misfortune, as he stileth it, in handling controversies so meanly, 'tis not yet, I suppose, the season for it, till I have lost my own, or felt the keenness of his weapons, in whom it is (in the interim) a transgression of the rules of Art, as well as Justice, no other than the meanest begging the question, to suppose that guilt, which he was to prove, to assume so early, in the Epistle to the Reader, what he must (but hath not yet so much as attempted to) demonstrate. 3.

I have done with S. W. his Epistle to the Reader, his very uneffectual defence of a very great, ond evidently the principal part of his Book, that which comprehends all the scoffs and revilings in it, and having said so much in this place, shall not add one word more on that subject, how oft soever it solicite me, in the future debates.

SECT. III.

The affinity betwixt Schism Disarmed and the Catholick Gentlemans Letter. The design of this Answer.

AND when I shall have subjoyned two considerations more, I shall have rid my self, and the Reader of a great part of the task, which seems incumbent on both of us, and so shorten our work, by inlarging our procinctus or entrance to it.

First then it is manifest, that Schism Disarmed is in a great part of it, nothing else but the inlarging on those briefer animadversions, which had been given by the Letter from Bruxels, or the Catholick Gentlemans answer to the most material parts of the Book of Schism; For which purpose I refer the Reader to p. 24. of Schism Disarmed: where after some preludory lighter skirmishes, he thus begins. These grounds laid, it were not amiss to insert here what the Author of that Epistle which was written from Bruxels in Answer to Dr. Ha. saith upon this place] adding his judgment of that Letter, that had it not been strangled in the birth, and miscarried in the Printers hand, it might have saved the labour of this larger confute, and being exactly short, might justly be stiled Dr. Ha. his Iliads in a Nutshel, since the force of it was so united, the reason in it so firmly connected, as might pag. 25. 2.

have cost the Dr. a full ten years siege, ere he could make a breach into it by his brown Paper bullets.] This passage of kindness and reference to that Epistle, with many other characters of affinity betwixt that, and Schism disarm'd, especially the first of the three parts of it, perswade me that the Author of that Epistle was the Penman of at least the first part of Schism Disarmed: And agreeably the answers there drawn in little, have here a larger pourtraicture, but remain in substance, the same, with the advantage only of some growth of limbs, and such like accidental improvements. Now whereas it is certain, that I have punctually made reply to that whole letter, and every period in it, setting it down and attending it κατὰ πόδα, and having first, to the utmost of my skill, rescued it from all the Printers miscarriages, (which is all the strangling in the birth he speaks of) and then improved every Answer in it, as far as I could foresee it improveable, never taking the least advantage either of the conciseness of its natural frame, or the misadventures it had casually met with; It were now not only superfluous for me, but unjust, equally impertinent, and unconscionable, to make the Reader pay twice for the same Answers, and therefore no other than duty thus far to comply with his ease, and thrift, as to refer him to that Reply for all that is there competently vindicated, without any further repetition, which I therefore here mind him of, once for all, and accordingly design this view of Schism Disarm'd, to be an Appendix only to that Reply to the Catholick Gentleman, to glean after the rake, to consider only those Answers in it, which had not been insisted on, in the haste of that briefer letter, but are now taken in by these δεύτεραι φροντίδες. Had my Disarmer taken notice of my Reply, (as he had time to have done, and I cannot apprehend his retirement, or imployment so strict, that he should not hear of it) he might possibly have given me a sight of some infirmities in it; But as it is, I discern no need of giving it any farther assistance, as far as respects those answers, which it undertook to consider: And so I have no more incumbent on me at this time, but to survey, and muster all the fresh forces, which now first appear in the field, and not to increase the roll with the new names and dresses, that the old stagers appear in, the second time.

3. Secondly, There are some parts of the Tract of Schism, which my Disarmer excepts against, as superfluous to the debate betwixt us, as that intire branch entred on, Ch. 6. of the Romanists plea from the Bishop of Romes having planted Christianity among us. Which being disclaim'd to be any plea of theirs, It is perfectly needless that I should vindicate the arguments, that are framed to refute that plea, any farther, than as he which grants my conclusion, will yet make some specious objections against my way of inferring it.

4. Some other things there are of this kind, to all which I shall not need to give any attention, especially when I have done it once in the Reply; And then that which remains, my present necessary charge or province, being thus refined, and separated from these three parts of it, the declamation, the repetition, and what hangs loose, and may by consent be spared from the controversie before us; it will not retain so formidable a bulk, as it first appeared to have, and may by Gods blessing be dispatcht without much labour, and presented to the Readers use with some degree of that compendium, which Philo speaks of, τῶν Κολοσσιαίων μεγέθων τὰς ἐμφάσεις ἐν ἠ βραχυλάτῃ σφραγὶς τυπωθεῖσα δέχεται, the largest proportions may be carved in little, and contrived into a signet, and so might, if the hand were fine enough, the pourtraicture of my Disarmer.

CHAP. II.

A Reply to his Introduction.

SECT. I.

The writers that have ingaged against the main body, and authority of the Church of Rome. The reasonableness of insisting on that rather than particular controversies, especially at this time.

IN his Introduction these few things seem to expect some Reply. 1 His pretended admiration, Why the Protestant party, who heretofore seem'd still more willing to skirmish in particular controversies, than bid battel to the main body of the Church, or any thing which concern'd her authority, should now print Books by pairs, in defence of this disunion from her, and subducing themselves from her Government] annexing afterward his conjecture of the reason, to allay this admiration. Now of this, as far as concerns one of the pair, I am able to give him the one just account, and need not attend to his conjectures, who was not of my Counsel in the designment.

And 1. S. W. must be a very great stranger to his own country, or willingly dissemble his knowledge, if it were any news to him, that the Fathers or Sons of the Church of England, write Books against the main body and authority of the Church of Rome: 'Tis pity I should be set to prove this: He cannot but have heard of the Tract de vera differentia Regiæ & Ecclesiasticæ potestatis, set out by the Prelates in Henry VIII. his days (and may if he please now view it, under the title of Opus eximium in Goldastus's Monarchia) as also The Institution of a Christian Man, 1537. and, The necessary Doctrine and Erudition, 1543. under the head of the Sacrament of Orders, I. These certainly were as early, and as punctual, as he could wish, to the main body of their Pretensions; and to omit innumerable others, What was Dr. Reynolds's conference with Mr. Hart in Queen Elizabeth's reign? and of later times, Bishop Bilson's discourse of the true difference betwixt Christian subjection, and unchristian Rebellion, Bishop Davenant de judice & norma Fidei, The Volumes of Antonius de Dominis, when he was a member of our Church, and yet later, Dr. White, Mr. Chillingworth, and my Lord of Canterbury, and many others, which are fresh in every mans memory; And it is much juster matter of wonder to me, that S. W. would chuse to set out so unauspicionsly, as to begin with an observation founded in a viſible contrariety to a plain matter of fact, that every man that thinks of, muſt diſcern to be ſo.

2. If his obſervation had all truth in it, viz. That formerly we were more willing to skirmiſh in particular controverſies, yet 'twere obvious to every man, what might now ſuggeſt the change of that courſe, and ſo could be no real matter of admiration to S. W. For when the particular controverſies have been competently debated, why ſhould more pains and time be ſpent on them? And when the more general fundamental queſtions of Romes infallibility, and univerſal paſtorſhip (on which the caſe of Schiſm depends) comprehend all leſſer debates, what more compendious way can be invented, to the ending of diſputes, which are not ſuch excellent imployments, that they ſhould be perpetuated, as this, to ſet the axe to the root of the tree, which when it is ſtockt up, the branches by neceſſity of conſequence, without any new execution, will ſoon wither away, but till this be done effectually, the root will ſtill propagate its life and juice, and controverſies will within few years ſprout out, and flouriſh afreſh, and ſo the circle be endleſs betwixt growth and lopping, and new growth again, when the axe and mattock, brought out together, might ſoon make a gainful concluſion, transform and improve the barren weald and bosk into a fruitful Campania. But beſide prudent conſideration, there was ſome kind of neceſſity which inſtead of directing, challenged and exacted this method at this time. It was viſible to all, what induſtry was uſed by the Romiſh Miſſaries, by pretence of our being in ſchiſm, to defame (and ſo fright us out of) a perſecuted profeſſion. And if we may believe their own boaſts, it hath ſucceeded with them very proſperouſly; and how could we, without the greateſt uncharitableneſs, permit the temptations of our preſent preſſures to be thus inhaunced to any weak ſeducible Chriſtian, when a little pains would lay it viſible before him, that the Biſhop of Rome never had from Chriſt or Saint Peter, or from any other title juſtly pleadable, any ſupreme authority, or juriſdiction over this Iſland. And ſo, unleſs an act of due and ſeaſonable Charity be the great unheard of news, or prodigie; I diſcern not what could ſuggeſt to S. W. the leaſt admiration in this matter. 2.

SECT. II.

No reaſonableneß of Schiſm pleaded. The Cenſures of the Church not always ſeaſonable againſt Schiſmaticks.

THE ſecond thing that exacts Reply, is his advertiſement, that it were more ſeaſonable for the Church of England, to denounce to thoſe many minute ſects gone out from their communion, the unreaſonableneß of their ſchiſm, than plead the reaſonableneß of their own, and to threaten them with the ſpiritual rod of excommunication, unleß they return, than cry ſo loud not guilty--] 1.

To this I anſwer, 1. That S. W. cannot be imagined to have read the firſt Chapter of the ſhort tract, to which he aſſumes to give anſwer, if he can believe himſelf, when he ſaith, that we plead the reaſonableneß of our own ſchiſm: 'Tis there moſt evident, that I grant all ſchiſm in any that are found guilty of it, to be uncapable of all excuſe, or plea of reaſonableneß, and that I maintain our innocence by denying the fact, and not by defending the juſtice of it. This then is another δεξις what truſt is due to S. W. in his affirmations.

2. It muſt be a miſunderſtanding of the nature, and aim of the cenſures of the Church, if he could in earneſt think this a fit ſeaſon, to inflict or menace them, on thoſe ſons of this Church, which have at this time divided from us. 'Tis certain that a prevailing evil, a ſchiſm arm'd with might, is not either in prudence or charity to be contended with. They that have caſt out the Governors of the Church, and trod down their power, are not, till the paroxyſm aſſwage, or ſome good criſis appear, qualified for this kind of application. Our prayers are the ſpecial means, from which we hope ſucceß, and thoſe we ceaſe not to pour out for them, and for all that have erred, and are deceived. All other fraternal means both for cure and for prevention, we take in alſo in their ſeaſons: and I had thought the ſo large and punctual repreſentation of the danger and ſin of Schiſm, ch. 1. the definition and ſpecification of the ſorts of it, in the following Chapters of the Tract of Schiſm, had been in ſome part the denouncing againſt all that are guilty of it, the more than unreaſonableneß of their ſchiſm: And I need not mind him of many other treatiſes, very particularly addreſt, and largely deſigned to the ſame end. 3.

As for any more ſolemn judicial proceſs of νουθεσία & ἐπιτιμία, admonition, exhortation, diſcipline, they are not at all times, and ſo not at this, the proper choſen weapons of our warfare, which being deſigned to none but charitative ends, for edification, not for deſtruction, to reduce ſuch as are within reach of that hope, not to riot in the ruine, to ſeal up, or increaſe the damnation of any; and being, as the Apoſtle ſaith, σ' Σαρκικὰ, not carnal, they muſt conſequently be far removed from that one (as from all other kinds of) carnality, the expreſſing impotent paſſion or revenge, or heaping any other coles of fire on the Oppoſers heads, but thoſe that are apt and probable to melt them. And had the Romaniſts uſed this method, inſtead of their other more ſanguinary, with meekneß inſtructing, and not with rage fulminating againſt thoſe, that oppoſe themſelves, the Chriſtian world had not now probably been ingaged in ſuch irreparable ruptures, as with rivers of tears of blood will not be proportionably lamented. 4.

SECT. III.

The Romaniſts urging falſe fundamentals. Our acknowledging them a true Church. No proof that we think their Errors tolerable. The gravity of the matter makes not errors fitter to be preſt than rituals. Tediouſneß in things acknowledged, unjuſtly charged.

A Third thing there yet remains, ſet down in theſe words [that we preſt them to believe falſe Fundamentals, Dr. Ham. and his Friends will not ſay, ſince they acknowledge ours a true Church, which is inconſiſtent with ſuch a lapſe, they were therefore in their opinion things tolerable, which were upon them; 1.

and

and if not in the same rank, yet more deserving the Church should command their observance, than copes or surplices, or the Book of Common-prayer, the allowance whereof they prest upon their Quondam brethren.

2. In these words there are so many variations from the rules of sober discourse, so many indications of S. W. his temper, that it will not be easie to enumerate them; I shall make tender of some few, πρὸς δεῖξιν.

3. And 1. when he undertakes for me and my friends, that we will not say, that the Romanists have prest us to believe false Fundamentals, either his words are not intelligible sense, or else they have visibly no degree of truth in them. That any Fundamentals should be false, is a contradiction in adjecto, and is not sense, or intelligible: The meaning therefore, I suppose, is, that some things may be said to be fundamental, which are not truly such, and that they that press others to believe such doctrines, and to believe them fundamental, press them to believe false Fundamentals, and then S. W. his affirmation must be, that I and my friends will not say that the Romanists do thus. But herein certainly he knows the contrary, viz. that we affirm them to press many things on us for fundamentals of belief, which are not Fundamentals (by name that of the infallibility of their Church) and that this is of all others the greatest objection, which we have to their dealing with us, as that which renders our reunion most impossible. That we hold nothing de fide, as fundamental, which they do not also hold, we oft affirm, and it is most manifest; but that they have not made more things necessary to be believed, and so de fide, and fundamental, than we do, or can acknowledge to be such, is affirmed without the least ground, or shew of truth; and that was no very fair play in my Disarmer.

4. 2. For his proof of this his affirmation, viz. because we acknowledge theirs to be a true Church; either it is assisted by a gross, and discernable equivocation in the word [true]; and then again it hath no truth in it; or else it is far from all probability of concluding, what he infers from it. If by [true] he means to exclude erroneous, even in this degree, as to press for fundamental, that which is not such, nay nor truth neither; then he knows we yield not the present Church of Rome a true Church, but charge it guilty of many errors in belief and practice, and particularly of this, that they define many things de fide, and press them to be so received by us, which we acknowledge not to be such; and so he hath gained little by this our confession. But if by true, he means veritatem entis, which alone we acknowledge of it, that it hath the true nature of a Church, but that overcharged with many errors, 'tis impossible he should ever infer from thence, that we say they press us not to believe any thing for fundamental, which is not such. This sure they may do, and be foully culpable for doing it, and yet not unchurch themselves by so doing. They that hold the true foundation laid by Christ, but offend by enlarging it beyond the due limits, who add more than Christ or his Apostles deposited in the Church, do not by this superaddition either renounce, or forfeit all that before they had, the dross doth corrupt the gold, but not annihilate it.

5. 3. His affirmation, that they were, in our opinion, things tolerable which were urged upon us, is of the same quality with the former. 'Tis certain we have oft expreſt our opinion, that they are such as without hypocrisie, or gross sin against conscience, we cannot admit, and no weight is more unsupportable than that. Another visible lapse you see in relating a matter of fact (for such it is to affirm us to opine, what we opine not) but then that which follows in the fourth place, is still more transcendent. The things which they press upon us (and we cannot submit to) are, saith he, more deserving the Church should command their observance, than copes.--- I grant that articles de Fide are, or should be of far greater importance, than ornaments, or rituals: But what if articles are imposed de Fide, which have no truth in them, will the gravity of the matter in that case plead for the imposing them? or can it thence follow, that all that the Church of Rome hath defined to be de fide, do better deserve to be commanded, than Copes? Copes are by us, and the Romanist joyntly acknowledged to be things indifferent, and so lawful to be prudently prescribed by a competent authority; and the lighter they are in the nature of them, the greater obstinacy it is, to resist such commands, and causlesly to depart from the Church, rather than do what is thus indifferent. But the weightier the importance of the other is, the more intolerable is the pressure, and the greater the tyranny of imposing them. So beyond all measure improbable are all S. W. his present offers of probation. 'Tis pity thus unnecessarily to insist on it.

6. What he adds of my tediousness in things acknowledged by both parties, is with no shew of justice suggested (the whole treatise being very short, and in my opinion every branch of it necessary to vindicate our innocence, or to prejudge theirs) especially when the less he hath to oppose, the sooner he might, if he pleased, be at an end of his journey, were it not that he finds as fair colours of answers to reply, and as fair a field to expatiate, when the matter is most grosly true, and granted by him, as he doth, when it is most his interest to oppugn it. I shall propose to my self, not to transcribe this copy from him, but permit him peaceably to speak as much truth, as he will, be it direct, or never so much out of the way, and never disturb him in his course, unless I shall discern some part of my arguing concerned, which the former Reply to the Catholick Gentleman had not opportunity to vindicate. And so much for his Introduction.

CHAP.

CHAP. III.

A View of the first part of Schism disarmed.

SECT. I.

No cause can justifie Schism. The reasons of my setting down the sin of Schism so largely. The state of the question, which the Schismaticks, the Romanists, or we. The case of the Romish Recusant. Of the Pope excommunicating us, against Canons Ephesine, and Apostolick, &c. A difference between the Court of Rome with their abettors, and the charitable subjects of the Papacy. The fundamental question, the right of the Popes power. My modifying the Fathers words.

IN the first Section of his first part, two things S. W. is much to seek in, and to those it will be act of charity to afford some satisfaction. First, why I took pains to set so ill a character upon schism (as is done in the 6, 7, and 8. Sect. of Chap. 1.) to gather, as he saith, such a bundle of severe rods out of the Sacred Scriptures and best Fathers, to whip Schismaticks:] 2. Why I think the cause or occasion of any mans schism not worth the producing or heeding in this Controversie. 1.

Of the latter of these I have already spoken in the Reply, Chap. 1. Sect. 1. and shall now only add another very ancient testimony from Dionysius Alexandrinus, in his Epistle to Novatus, ἔδει πᾶν ὁτιοῦν παθεῖν ὑπὲρ τοῦ μὴ διακόψαι τὴν ἐκκλησίαν τοῦ θεοῦ. A Christian ought to endure any thing in that (humble Charitative) cause of not dividing the Church of Christ, rather than really to divide upon what ever cause. And because it is now suggested that this is but a fetch, the prettiest that ever S. W. met with, to wave the whole question, or what soever is material in it, I shall in answering of his first wonderment, give a clear account of this second misunderstanding also. 2. Ap. Euseb. Hist. Eccl. lib. 6. cap. 44.

The evident reason of my premising so largely, and so early that bloody pourtraicture of the danger, and sin of schism, as far as it respects the Romanist and us (for it had a more comprehensive influence than so, as hath been already said) was no other but the intire desire to speak the full truth of God, and to lay all guilt, where I was fully perswaded the All-just searcher of hearts, and Judge of actions had laid it, i. e. on those, whosoever they were, that were truly guilty of it, who had either divided from the Catholick Church of Christ, truly so called, or in special from any particular National Church, such as the Church of Rome is on one side, and the Church of England on the other. And this was so pertinent in both these respects, to the Romanists present case (as many especially, as have forsaken that Communion of ours, in which they sometimes lived obediently) that if ever I had been really willing to alleviate the Fathers censures of the crime of schism, (as twice, or thrice my Disarmer pretends me inclinable to do, he shall see anon with how little reason) I might most justly say, that it had been from a tenderness to our enemies (and not from any jealousie of our selves) an effect of which it really was, that I chose not to proceed to fasten this crime on any, to assume the office either of an accuser, or a Judge, but contain my self within the meekest bounds, that humility and charity could advise, of vindicating our own integrity, without recriminating or retorting the charge on our adversaries. Of this I shall now speak a little more expresly, upon this occasion. 3. Tr. of Schism, p. 11.

That it is in this debate, concerning Schism, a matter of question betwixt the Romanists and us, whether the Bishop of Rome had before, and at the time of the Reformation, any supreme legal power, and authority over the Church of England, I willingly acknowledge (and by the way, it is strange that S. W. can think fit to affirm, that * none doubts it) and till that question be decided on one side, it cannot with any reason be defined, on which side the schism doth truly lye. And therefore I deemed it absolutely necessary to examine all the Romanists pleas imaginable, their weightier, or lightest colours of pretensions to that authority. And I think no man can, or doth say that I have omitted any head of them; but on the other side, that I was over careful to prevent some which they now choose not to plead. From hence it is inevitably consequent, that as on the tryal of this question of the papal supremacy, the Crisis of this other of Schism so depends, that when the one is determined, the other must follow it, it being evident, that actually there is a schism or partition betwixt us, and by both of us granted, that no cause can excuse them, who shall be found guilty of it: So whilst the former, that of the papal authority, is under contest; the question is not barely this, Whether the Church of England be schismatical, or no, (for a Romanist may cheaply debate that, and keep himself safe, whatsoever becomes of the umpirage) but indifferently, and equally, whether we, or the Romanist be thus guilty, or which is the Schismatick, that lies under all those severe censures of the Scriptures and Fathers. Those of the English Reformation on the one side, or the English Revolters on the other side, not excluding (but involving also under the same condemnation, in case they have no due authority over us, which now is the question, and must not be begg'd on either side) the Governours in the Romish See, that have against all Christian methods of charity, and duty of Communion, cast us out of their societies, as without authority (in case they are not our lawful Superiors) so without all cause, and continue their severity without all remorse or relenting for the space of many years, and this not only toward us, but toward many other Churches, East and West, North and South, in all parts of the habitable world. 4. * That our Church had authority to do it (to cast you out and deny you Communion) if you be found to deserve it, being then her subjects and children, none doubts, p. 4

For if the Church of England be really ἀυτοκέφαλος, duly subject to no foreign jurisdiction, which I must yet suppose to be made good in that tract of schism, then the lay Papist, baptized a member, and son of this National Church under the authority of our Ecclesiastical Superiors, as he was born a subject under the civil Governors of this Realm, hath revolted, and separated from his immediate Superiors, and for his sake, among others, it was, that the Discourse was so punctual, and so large, c. 3. concerning the unity of subjection of all inferiours to all their lawful Superiors, and the schism that arose from the breach of that unity, the casting off that Obedience; It were to be wished, the English Revolters, that are so neerly concern'd, and the unsetled doubters, that are in most danger to be seduced by the confi- 5.

dence of a supposed safety, which is promised them in their departure from us, and affirmed to be granted on all hands, would timely be admonished to take notice of it.

6. So again, if the Bishop of Rome had really no more power and authority over this Church, than the Bishop of Antioch in the time of the Ephesine Council, was found to have over Cyprus, then his pretending this supereminent authority, and proceeding with us, as with his legal subjects, sending out his Bulls of Excommunication against us, what is it but a schism formally on his part, which makes the rupture between the sister Churches, and a most express violation of the ancient Canons, which so distinctly, and precisely command the contrary. I shall best give you their sense in the very words of the great Council of Ephesus, Can. ult. μηδένα τῶν θεοφιλεστάτων ἐπισκόπων ἐπαρχίαν ἑτέραν ἐκ ἔσαν ὥρωθεν καὶ ἐξαρχῆς ὑπὸ τὴν αὐτὸν, ἦγεν τῶν πρὸ αὐτῶ, χεῖρα, καταλαμβάνειν, ἀλλὰ εἰ καί τις κατέλαβεν, καὶ ὑφ' ἑαυτῷ πεποίηται βιασάμενος, τοῦτον ἀποδιδόναι, ἵνα μὴ τῶν πατέρων οἱ κανόνες παραβαίνωνται. μηδὲ ἐν ἱερωσύνης προσχήματι ἐξουσίας κοσμικῆς τύφος παρεισδύνηται, μηδὲ λάθωμεν ἢ ἐλευθερίαν κατὰ μικρὸν ἀπολέσαντες, ἣν ἡμῖν ἐδωρήσατο τῷ ἰδίῳ αἵματι ὁ Κύριος ἡμῶν Ἰησοῦς Χριστὸς, ὁ πάντων ἀνθρώπων ἐλευθερώτης, that no Bishop (be he never so dignified) shall invade another Province, which hath not been from the beginning under his, i. e. his Predecessors hand or power. But in case any have thus invaded, and by violence brought it under him, he shall then make restitution, that the Canons of the Fathers be not transgressed, and under pretence of sacred office, the pride of secular power secretly steal in, and so we by degrees lose indiscernibly the liberty which our Lord Jesus Christ the Redeemer of all Men hath given us by his own blood. This is yet more distinctly set down in the genuine Apostolick Canons, where, as the due observance of the Primate in every Nation is prescribed, Can. 34. and his power thus limited in the exercise of it, that he shall do nothing in the Inferior Bishops Dioceses, ἄνευ τῆς πάντων γνώμης, without the good liking of them all (and if he do otherwise, he abuses his dignity, saith the Scholiast, and * converts it into δυναστεία and ἀυθεντία, which is no better than tyranny) so Can. 35. they proceed to define ἐπίσκοπον μὴ τολμᾶν ἔξω τῶν ἀυτῦ ὅρων χειροτονίας ποιεῖσθαι, εἰς τὰς μὴ ὑποκειμένας ἀυτῷ πόλεις καὶ χώρας------ that no Bishop shall dare to ordain any without his own bounds, in Cities or Regions not subject to him; or if he be convinced to have done so, without the good liking of those that have the rule of those Cities or Regions, he is to be deposed for that default.

* ἀλλὰ τῷ πρώτῳ τῷ ἐπισκόπῳ παρεχωρεῖ τῇ ἰδίᾳ καταχρώμενον, εἰς δυναστείαν αὐτὸν ἀμείβειν, καὶ ἐναυθεντεῖν, καὶ χωρὶς κοινῆς γνώμης τῶν ὁικείων συλλειτουργῶν ποιεῖν τὰ τῶν εἰρημένων, ἢ τῶν ὁμοίων αὐτοῖς. Zon. p. 17. D.

7. And what they thus define about Ordination, the Council of Constantinople extend to all other Ecclesiastical affairs, Can. 6. ἀκλήτους ἐπισκόπους ὑπὲρ διοίκησιν μὴ ἐπιβαίνειν (as before τὰις ὑπερορίοις ἐκκλησίαις μὴ ἐπιέναι) ἐπὶ χειροτονίᾳ, ἢ τισιν ἄλλαις οἰκονομίαις ἐκκλησιαστικαῖς, that no Bishops must, unless they be called or intreated, meddle beyond their Dioces, or with Churches without their bounds, either for ordination, or any other Ecclesiastical œconomies; and the Scholiast tells us, that the word ἐπιβαίνειν signifies it to be ληστρικὴν καὶ ἄτακτον ἔφοδον, a robbery, and a tumultuous disorderly invasion in them that are guilty of it. The same doth the 13*th. Canon* of Antioch define of any Bishop, in reference both to * ordination and to constituting of what ever Ecclesiastical affairs that belong not to him, decreeing a plain nullity of all that he shall thus constitute, and so again, Can. 12. of that Council.

Zon. p. 70. A.

* ἐπὶ χειροθεσίᾳ τινῶν καὶ καταστάσει τῶν ἐκκλησιαστικῶν πραγμάτων μὴ προσηκόντων αὐτῷ, ἄκυρα εἶναι τὰ ὑπ' αὐτῦ πεπραγμένα συγχώρειν,

And this being the Bishop of Rome his condition in respect of us, in case he have no legal authority over us, and be not intreated by the Governours of our Church to exercise any; or in case he were our Primate, yet still if he act without the Council, and against the consent of our Bishops, as he must be supposed to do, when he excommunicates them, and their Flocks together; 'tis all this while, as was shewed, usurpation and invasion, and by force of these Canons, ἄτακτον and ἄκυρον, irregular, invalid, and null, and in the consequence of it, most evidently destructive of that ὁμόνοια that concord and unity, as of brethren, which is to be preserved between several Churches, and so a most culpable act of schism in the Bishop of Rome, and in all them that are guilty of it in so high a way, as to anathematize and disclaim all Communion with others: and this is all this while visibly antecedent to, and abstracted from the cause of his doing it, which alone S. W. will allow to be considered, accusing me for waving the question, when he swallows it down at one haust, pretending that none doubt of their Churches authority to do it, which I profess to be the one fundamental question of all, to which this other, who they are that are guilty of the schism, or whether the charge of schism be sufficiently proved against us of the Church of England, is but appendent, and consequent, the usurping of an undue power over those that are not his Ecclesiastical subjects, being no Judicial act, but a most visible Tyranny in him that exercises it so bloodily, on whatsoever pretended misbehaviours, and that which alone, without any other branch of plea, justifies us from the guilt of schism, in vindicating our just liberties, by casting him out of that power, who was so unduly possest of it, and so devolves (unless he can clear his title to the power) the whole guilt of the crime on the accuser.

9. How highly the Court of Rome, and all that abet her grandeur and contempt of their brethren, are to be judg'd criminous herein, this is no place to define: I willingly acknowledge a wide difference between them, and the humble charitable members of the Roman Communion, who living quietly under their Superiors, endeavour and pray for the peace of the Catholick Church, and contribute not actively or willingly to the ruptures of it: Of which number because our charity bids us hope there are great multitudes, we are still free from any necessity of prejudging the Church of Rome from being a true Church, and so still retain that favourable opinion of salvation being attainable amongst them, which we always allow'd, yet cannot absolve from the guilt of the most culpable schism those that have set up, and maintained that more than γεῖσον or ὄριγγον or μεσότοιχον τῆς φραγμοῦ, that impregnable fortress, rather than wall of partition betwixt us, nor yet those that against all rules of subjection and subordination, have renounced their lot in the Church of England, wherein they were planted, and given themselves up to a foreign obedience.

10. My Disarmer will, I suppose, by this discern the satisfaction which he is likely to receive to his two scruples; I have that confidence of his capacity, as to leave him to pick it out of the premisses, and apply it to his best advantage, as I do also this open acknowledgment, that if by the process of this debate it shall appear, that the Bishop of Rome is, or was by the Institution of Christ, from whom he pretends, our legal Superior, possessor bonæ fidei of the supreme power over us, we are then unquestionably the Schismaticks; and if not, then are they such, which have revolted from us. And this, as it will shorten the method, and make it still reasonable to wave the consideration of the occasion and causes of the schism (of which they that are guilty, are not excusable by any motive or cause of their action) so it is most distant from declining the very point of the difficulty, as S. W. without all colour of truth, or argument, pretends, the right of the power being the one great requisite to the validity of any exercise of it.

Wherein as we have no reason to dread the Romanists, or to misdoubt our plea, so I assure S. W. 11. no fear, or jealous apprehension of any possible danger, inclined me to modifie any sharp expression of the Fathers against schism, as he twice or thrice without any justice suggests me to do. The clearing whereof is all that I have any obligation to add to this Section.

His first whisper of suggestion is, that in rendring S. Augustines words, Non esse quicquam gravius 12. schismate, I say there is scarce any crime so great as schism. [There saith he, I mince it with scarce, when the place cited is absolute, that there is not any] But certainly S. W. sees amiss, The place in that Father is not absolute, that there is not any so great, but only that there is not any gravius heavier or greater; now there may possibly be many crimes as great, though no one were supposed greater, and so my rendring it [there is scarce any so great] i.e. scarce any equal to schism, is fully as much, as the original contained: and if it differ at all from it, 'tis that 'tis more comprehensive, than that which 'twas set to interpret. And yet also the other expressions of the Fathers, produced in that place, gave me authority to set it in that amplitude, not idolatry, not sacriledge, not parricide (say they) is so great, and therefore I conclude, scarce any crime can come in competition with it, not knowing any that was qualified for it by being greater than these, and yet not assuming to affirm more than my authorities did induce, that there was none greater. Herein 'tis visible my Disarmers haste was too great, and that I could not have rendred either the words more fully, or the sense of the testimonies more punctually, than I did render them: 'Twere, I doubt, his dearest interest, that some softer expression did truly belong to that sin, than that which I was forced to allot to it.

The other rendring which he blames, is on occasion of these words of Irenaus, Nulla ab eis tanta 13. fieri potest correptio, quanta est schismatis pernicies, whence, not as translating to a word, but as deducing a conclusion, I infer, that it is in the opinion of the Fathers very hard, if not impossible to receive such an injury or provocation from the Governors of the Church, as may make a separation excusable [here, saith he, the Doctor mitigates the dangerous expression with, very hard, if not impossible.] But why did he not say, I did not exactly render schismatis pernicies? For it is evident, I varied that more, than the nulla fieri potest correptio. The short is, I set down the latine punctually, and so left it not possible for me to impose on any that understood that: Thence I inferred what I supposed the testimonies would be sure to bear, and was careful not to go beyond those limits; and knowing that both in Scripture oft, and not seldom in other Authors, ἀδύνατον, which is literally impossible, was in sense to be rendred hard or difficult, I took that cautious expression to be best, that in their opinion 'twas very hard, if not impossible.

A third whisper there is still behind in this §. that in stead of the words of S. Augustine, separate from 14. the Catholick Church, the Dr. full of jealousies and fears, puts the Church truly Catholick, as if, saith he, there were much danger lest any perhaps should imagine Christs Church (of which he conceives S. Austin meant it) to be untruly Catholick] But this will be soon dispatcht. S Austines words are, Communionem separent à communione Orbis terrarum, I expres't this [and by separating from the universal or truly Catholick Church of Christ] the reason is visible, because the Church of Rome is by her Advocates stiled the Catholick Church, being certainly not such in the notion, wherein S. Austin speaks, that of the Communion of the whole world, or as Catholick, if truly so, must signifie Universal.

These are the acts of charineß, whereof I am accused as of dexterities, that I found necessary, lest 15. I might too directly prejudice my future work; with what truth suggested, the Reader will now judg, yea and S. W. also (if 'twere possible he should believe himself in this part of his accusation) whom I have now made my Confessor of my secretest and deepest reservations; I wish he would not oft put me to such necessities, till he be better qualified for that office.

SECT. II.

The notation of the word σχίσμα, from the passive reciprocal. The Hebrew conjugations. Σώζεσθαι. Ἀφορίζεσθαι. Ἀποσχίζεσθαι. Self-division. Begging the principal questions. The cause considerable in Excommunication, though not in Schism.

IN the second Section what he premises concerning heresie, and forms into a kind of exception 1. against my proceeding, had been intimated by the Catholick Gentleman, and is in the Reply, c. 2. §. 1. evidenced to be his misunderstanding.

What follows at large in a triumphant manner, on occasion of the critical notation of the word 2. σχίσμα, from σχίζομαι, in the notation of the Hebrew Hithpael, is perfectly new, and an excellent taste of S. W. his Grammatical skill, but shall no longer detain me, than whilest I clear the truth, and give reply to his objections.

The truth is evidently this, the word Schism comes from the passive σχίζομαι, which regularly sig- 3. nifies being cut, or divided, but yet the sin of Schism being an action upon himself, not a passion from any other, it was, I conceived, of the nature of those passives, which note reciprocal action, or passion, which S. Jude fully expresses by ἀποδιορίζοντες ἑαυτούς, the title which he gives the grand Gnostick Schismaticks, that they cut off, or divide themselves from the Church; and Justinian in his Novels, διαταξ. ρϑ. εἰ ἑαυτὰς χωρίζουσι τῶν τῆς θεᾶς δωρεῶν, if they divide themselves from the gifts of God. This being evident, and yet not regularly the notation of Greek passives, I said it was of the nature of the Hebrew Hithpael, which denoting reciprocal action, is by some reckoned the fourth, by others the seventh conjugation, constantly known among all by that name of conjugation, and I was content to speak as other men constantly speak, and therefore said, that for want of conjugations (such as the Hebrew Grammars call thus) the passive was designed to supply the place of the Hebrew Hithpael, and so noted the reciprocal, where the passion is from, and on himself, and is fully expres't by the latine Neutral, a separating, or receding of any member from the unity of the Church. This is as plain sense, and as strictly according to the rules of Grammar, & ordinary use of words, as I could possibly speak; & withal, very useful, in my conceit, to set down the true notion of Schism, as it differs from all other things that border on it (and though they are not, may yet be mistaken for the same) particularly from excommunication, which is the cutting off others from the Church, whereas S. Paul speaking of the heretical Gnosticks which were Schismaticks too, saith that they were αὐτοκατάκριτοι, such as condemned and excommunicated themselves, which is as perfect an evidence of the reciprocal action or passion, as could be.

4. This renders him answer to his first scruple [How I know it must necessarily be taken in that notion here, since, saith he, coming from a verb active, it must in the first place have a signification perfectly passive.] The account is given already, because the Schismaticks in S. Jude are defined by him not such as are divided, in a passive sense, but ἀποδιορίζοντες ἑαυτὲς, those that separate or divide themselves, and the same men are by S. Paul said to be αὐτοκατάκριτοι, such as inflict the censure of condemnation or excommunication, αὐτοὶ καθ' ἑαυτὲς, in the African Council, themselves upon themselves. This evidences the Schismatick to be a reciprocal agent and patient, and that, the Greek passive denotes not, but as it supplies the place of the Hebrew Hithpael, therefore thus it must be taken in this word.

Cod. Afr. can. 22.

5. 2. This renders him answer, with what propriety I say, this is for want of conjugations, viz. for want of such flexions and variations both of the signification, and of the first syllables, as the Hebricians call conjugations, whose language it was fit I should use, when I spake of the Hebrew idiom, communicated to the Greek.

6. That voices and conjugations are, as he saith, jumbled in this language, is neither granted by all Grammarians, nor at all tends to S. W. his advantage, if it were granted to him. Those Grammarians that make but four conjugations, do certainly not mix, or jumble them, for of those four, each of the three former are divided into their Actives and Passives, such as the Latines and Greeks call voices, and the fourth is not capable of that division, but is reciprocal. And though others style these, eight conjugations, as David Kimchi in his מכלל, Moses Kimchi in his Grammar, and Elias Levita, yet they have taken care to sever them, into the parents, as they call the Actives, and the off-spring, the passives that have issued from them, and the reciprocal, which is parent and daughter too; and so still the distinction is preserved clear, and not the least impropriety imaginable in my speech, that the Greek which had neither voice nor conjugation of the reciprocal form, used the passive voice in stead of it, for want of conjugations, i. e. for want of something answerable to that, which the Hebrews, both they which make but four, and they that make eight, do uniformly style conjugation.

7. In this place it is not conceivable how S. W. should come to call them eight votes, and to affirm that the Grammarians so style them. That any one Grammarian hath styled them eight Votes, is more than by any enquiry I can discover: and if any have, I am too dull, I acknowledge, to understand him, unless because Votes signifie voices, when they are used for suffrages, he means to give law to language, and appoint votes to signifie Grammatical voices also. And yet if that were his mistake, or if the Printer substituted votes in stead of voices, there must be in it another mistake also, for no Grammarian, I suppose, could ever think there were eight such voices, and therefore still I am to be informed by some Diviner, what S. W. his eight votes signified.

8. So again, when having disliked my multiplied conjugations in Hebrew, he yet adds, that there are more in the Greek than in the Hebrew, 'twill not be easie to discern upon what account Grammatical, or rational, he could do so; For it being certain, that the different conjugations in Greek, are not varied in the flexion, as the Latines are, but only in the Characteristick, (and so the best Grammarians have resolved, that though such Κλίσεις are called * conjugations, yet they are improperly so called) it is evident also, that the same strict laws, that are of force against the multiplying the conjugations in Hebrew, are of equal, if not greater force against the bestowing that title of conjugation upon all the variations of the verbs in Greek. The variations in all those, which the Hebrew call conjugations, being discernible both in the signification, and in the first syllable, which may well outweigh the variation of the characteristick in the Greek; And besides, it is most evident, that one and the same verb goes through all the conjugations in Hebrew, but doth not so in Greek, and accordingly there is no such thing in the Greek language, as the variation of frequentative, transitive, and reciprocal, which are in the Hebrew Piel, Hiphil, and Hithpael, the only ground of my affirming, that the Greek wanted conjugations, which were found among the Hebrews. Such misadventures as these, his descending to such niceties hath cost him, and truly some more; witness his neutropassive taken by him for a passive in the reciprocal or neutral sense, when every school-boy knows, that all neutropassives are of the active voice; so again his instancing in sto, as a word partaking of a passive sense, because it may be rendred, I am standing, and others the like, through every stage of this his voyage, if it were not too great levity, and somewhat unreconcileable with common compassion to enumerate them.

* ἃς καὶ συζυγίας καλοῦμεν, Theodor. γραμματ. εἰσαγ. βιβ β. p. 39.

9. In stead of so doing, I shall only add an answer to his one principal scruple, when having mentioned the notion of Hithpael, to signifie an express action upon it self, he demands, where the Doctor among all his critical observations, can shew him one word in all the Latine and Greek language to parallel it, or that is (as the Doctor expresseth it) of the nature of Hithpael. I answer σώζεσθαι is such a Greek word of the nature of Hithpael, signifying sometimes saving and delivering himself, and in rendring expressed by the neutral, escaping, Gen. 19. 19. and 22. 1 Sam. 19. 12. Joel 2. 32. and so 'tis used by S. Luke in the same sense, Acts 2. 40. σώζεσθε ἀπὸ τῆς γενεᾶς σκολιᾶς ταύτης, be ye saved, literally, but in sense, rescue, or as the English renders it, save your selves, or escape, or get out of this wicked generation. So yet neerer to the word we have in hand, ἀφορίζεσθαι, literally, to be separated, is sometimes to separate themselves, without any action of, or passion received from any other, as 2 Cor. 6. 17. where by way of exhortation the Apostle bespeaks them, ἐξέλθετε καὶ ἀφορίσθητε, Come out and be ye separate, i. e. separate your selves, not, be ye separated, or cast out by others. The foregoing neutral sense of coming out, expresseth this to be the importance of it. And for the very word which hath occasioned this debate, see Num. 16. 20. where when the Hebrew hath הבדלו in Hithpael, separate your selves, the Greek reads ἀποσχίσθητε, be ye cut off, or divided from them, the very same that is varied, v. 24. into העלו ἀναχωρήσατε get you up from them; and v. 26. סורו depart, again rendred by the Gr. ἀποσχίσθητε, be ye separated. These are sufficient to answer his question: And for variety of other the like examples (I never affirmed it of all, as he is pleased to infer, p. 9. but only of this and some others) if he have, either skill, or conversation in the original languages of the Scripture, he will be soon able upon this memento, with a little observation, to furnish himself.

As for his ways of disproving it, p. 10. [that if it signifie a reciprocal action or passion, it must signifie an act of dividing exercised on himself, who therefore is the thing divided: and since division is a progress or motion from unity to plurality, its proper and formal effect is to make that, which it works on, more of one; but that which it works upon, saith the Doctor, is himself the Schismatick, therefore it cuts the Schismatick in two] this is indeed a deep subtilty, which will soon be avoided by remembring him, what self-division it is, of which he knows we speak, not that of hewing, or mutilating his body, but cutting himself off from the body of the Church, with which he was united (the Church being a body as well as S. W.) and sure such a division is motus ab unitate ad pluralitatem, a progress from unity to plurality, when he cuts himself off from the Church, as well as when he cuts himself in pieces. If these be the rigorous, by which he saith he means solid, pregnant, convincing discourses, to which S. W. so pretends, I have no reason to be ill pleased, that he likes not my way of arguing: I should be sorry to have approved my self to him. 10.

But it seems all this debate might have been spared, for after all this sollicitude (which hath brought in but slender advantages to S. W.) he willingly grants all that this Criticism demanded, viz. that the sin of schism, must be the voluntary recession, as that differs from the passive, excommunication, which therefore he acknowledges not to be schism. Which as plain a truth as it is, I desire to take witness of it, that it is granted me by him, and then I shall be the more perfectly secure from the guilt of schism, till by some other argument than the Popes having excommunicated us (viz. by our voluntary recession from them, or from some members at least of the true Church of God) he shall prove that we are truly Schismaticks. 11.

What he adds farther in this Sect. p. 12. of the no immunity from error in the Governed, fit to counterpoise the liableness to error in the Governors, which I had mentioned; and p. 13. of the voluntary continuance in a just excommunication, which makes the thus excommunicated Schismaticks] hath in both parts perfect truth in it, but is no ways applicable to the business * there in hand, nor can pretend to be so, without a begging of the principal questions, or matters in controversie betwixt the Romanist and us: First, that the Bishop of Rome was the Governor, and we the governed, at the time when he first excommunicated this Nation; whereas at the time of those Censures coming, in Q. Elizabeths days, he neither de facto was then owned as such, nor de jure had title to it: And at the time when this Nation first did that, for which he first excommunicated them, i. e. in King Henries days, de jure he had no title to it, and by Papists, continuing such in all other points, the Government, which he held de facto, was first cast off, and that by those, to whom the supreme power, under Christ, did belong, viz. by the King concurring with the Bishops, and by the Bishops with the King. 2. That the excommunication sent out against us, was founded in a just cause; which it could not be, if we did nothing toward the Bishop and Church of Rome (viz. in that one act of casting out his usurped power, and reforming our selves) which was not perfectly lawful for us to do. For though, as I said, in a voluntary recession, which alone is schism, it is not worth heeding what the cause or occasion is, because none, how weighty soever, can be sufficient to justifie that; yet in excommunication, which is not schism, it is not so; the justice or injustice of that, whether in respect of the power (the legality thereof) or of the cause, is that which gives it validity, or renders it invalid, and null to all effects: and this being in part granted by S. W. viz. that unjust excommunication hurts no man; and the other part being as evident, that an unjust power is no power, and the acts null; we are perfectly safe from all the suggestions of the 2*d. Sect.* till he make it appear, what here he attempts not to do, that their excommunicating of us, had neither of these injustices and nullities in it. 12.

* Tr. of Schism. c. 2. Sect. 3, 4.

SECT. III.

The pretence of weak consciences against lawful authority in just commands, misrepresented. Fallibility of all but God, and Saints and Angels. S. W. his arguments for infallibility answered. The infallibility of the Apostles stated. Of the Church to the end of the World. Of the means to know the Books of Scripture. Of matters of fact of our certain knowledge.

THE third Section is by my Disarmer strangely misspent, Declamation poured out on the air, like Xerxes his stripes on the Sea, a perfect Romance-combate with a Windmill of his own erecting, toward which I never contributed the least stone or timber; 'Tis upon a fancy, or fiction, that I favour the pretence of such a weak conscience, as makes a man think he ought not to communicate with the Church, and this even though the truth be on the Churches side.] How much I favour such a weak conscience, which apprehends that unlawful, which is duty, and so thinks to be excused from performing it, is visible to any that shall but view the place, to which this Section is confronted, where first I affirm of him, that he is in several respects criminous, and particularly in this, that he communicates not with those, the condition of whose communion contains nothing really erroneous or sinful. 2. I add, that such an one is in the worst and most unhappy kind of straight, remains in error and schism on the one side (is this in favour of such weak consciences, or an affirming (as S. W. suggests) that he may do it lawfully? or is it interpretable to have any kindness to a bare pretence of it, which comes short even of that?) and if to avoid that, he communicate, in this case he advances to lying and hypocrisie; and in plain terms, that which way soever he turn, till he really convert from his erroneous conscience, and weak mis-perswasion, he is sure to sin. What could be more plain, or free from my Disarmers calumny? from pleading for seditious offenders ears (of which the wit of the Romish factor hath made a special service in his Bill of fare) or what Apologie can S. W. ever make to God or his own conscience, for so manifest a perversion, and slander of the most innocent expressions. Of Schism, c. 2. Sect. 8.

Having given the Reader a few such Scenes of this Disputer, I shall get, as soon as I may, out of this close converse with him.

3. In the latter part of this Sect. I am chid for not apprehending any but Saints and Angels in heaven, and God himself to be infallible and impeccable: and as this last word is stiled a disgraceful addition of a forged calumny on the Romanists, and noted as a custom of ours, whensoever we speak of their tenets; so for the former part, he pretends to shew the great absurdity of it, 1. by mentioning the Apostles as those that were infallibly assisted, and so 2. the succeeding Church, and 3. that there is some means to be infallibly certain that such and such books were Gods word and genuine Scripture: and lastly, that the Dr. himself will acknowledge it impossible that all the Protestants in England should be fallible, or mistake in witnessing whether twenty years ago there were Protestant Bishops or no.

4. To these objections I answer briefly, 1. by recounting the occasion of those words of mine, to which his animadversion belongs. It is a saying of Mr. Knots, that we may forsake the Churches communion, in case she be fallible, or subject to error, which seemed to me very strange, because then 'tis not only lawful to forsake the Communion of every erroneous Church, but of all that are fallible, though they be not in error, and such I conceived all humane societies to be, and consequently that there would be no possibility for any on earth to be guilty of the sin of Schism: Now as this is plain in it self, so it is very far from ingaging me in the question concerning the Infallibility of the Church (on that subject I had spoken at large elsewhere) any farther, than to take notice how strange an argument this was to conclude it by.

5. 2. By assuring him, that I was far from calumniating, or affixing any disgraceful word on the Romanist in that place. I conceived humane nature to be in it self equally liable to sin and error, and so no more infallible than impeccable; and again, that no society of men on earth hath now the priviledge of immunity from either, and if any had the former of impossibility to be deceived, yet unless it also had the latter, and so could not teach contrary to their belief, it were still the same to all effects: He that knows the truth himself, and yet may be so wicked as to teach contrary to his knowledge (and he that can act contrary to his knowledge, and so sin, may do so) may lead others into the most ruinous errors, without erring himself: and therefore I said, that none but Saints and Angels, and God in heaven, had the priviledge of impeccable and infallible, never conceiving that any man would hence conclude me to think, that the Romanists pretended to both of them, whose actions so openly, and acknowledgedly disclaim the one, and I think the other also Mean while it may not be amiss to remember, what Hildebrand, the advancer of the Papacy to its present greatness, hath resolved and defined concerning the sanctified as well as infallible state of those that Canonically ascend that Throne, in sententia 22. Romanus Pontifex, si Canonicè fuerit ordinatus, meritis Beati Petri indubitanter efficitur sanctus. And if by S. Peter's merits he be made such, I hope it will not be doubted, but by the same tenure the grace of Perseverance, and not falling into any unsanctified estate, and consequently, into any sin which is apt to waste the Soul, and cast it into such a state, is secured to him also; and then that will amount to the full of that ἀναμαρτησία, impeccability, which I spake of. But I need not these succours, to defend my discourse. The utmost was, that I thought it as possible that the Pope might erre, as sin, having no more promise from Christ of his security from one, than the other, and so might any other single man in the world, and in proportion any multitude, or assembly might (the major and so prevalent part of them) consent in an error, as well as in a vice; and as this was far from calumniating any, so is it to my apprehension, as evident a truth, in reference to any society of men now in the world, as could have been mentioned by me, but this is no place to inlarge on it, farther than the remaining objections exact from me.

6. To them therefore I proceed; and to the mention of the Apostles, I reply, 1. That sure they are comprehended in the number of Saints in heaven, for there undoubtedly they are; 2. That supposing S. W. to speak of them, when they were here on earth, as his following words interpret him; I answer, that it is most true, that they were assisted by Christ, so as they did not, and could not erre in the discharge of their office, in penning the sacred writ, and preaching the Gospel. In this work they were, according to Christs promise, led by the Spirit into all truth; But that this promise had an unlimited extent, or consequently, that they were in all sorts of things made infallible, appeareth not; nay the differences that were between them, in lesser things, prejudge that.

7. I shall lay down this a little more distinctly. Of the Apostles 'tis evident, that as they were men here on earth, they were fallible, and oft deceived, even after they were employed by Christ; Of ignorances, and slowness, and hardness of heart, and littleness of faith, they are by their Master frequently affirmed to be guilty. And so all the infallibility that ever they had above other men, proceeded from Christs special promise of assistance, made unto them; some degree of this assistance was promised them, in order to some particulars, at their going out to preach, Mat. 10. 19. and after more largely, at his departure from them, Mat. 28. 20. Now that promise, Mat. 10. 19. was evidently confined within such limits, as left them subject to the many great errors, which after they proved guilty of, so far as (to omit many other of an inferior degree) to doubt whether he were the Redeemer, or no, Luke 24. 21. one to apostatize finally and betray him, another not to believe him risen for some time, and all, as to be scandalized and forsake him at his apprehension, so to disbelieve the relation of his resurrection, Luke 24. 11. and to take the appearance of him, ver. 37. for a phasm.

8. From such grand fallibilities, and failings as these, I suppose them perfectly secured by that second promise, and the descent of the Holy Ghost, and to be from thence-forth infallibly assisted to their whole office, but yet to be liable still to some frailties and ignorances in other things, whereunto the promised assistance extended not in that degree, as should make them thus wholly infallible; which appears, as I said, by the lesser differences, which are recorded between the Apostles themselves, in their Ministry.

9. Now to bring this home to the particular in hand; It is not only a speaking truth, a not being actually in error, which will infer such an infallibility, as there I speak of, and conceive not to be met with on earth (for my words are expresly, to forsake all that are fallible, though they be not actually in error) but it must be a security founded in some promise of God, that they shall not be liable to any error, and though naturally they are so, that yet they shall undoubtedly be preserved from falling into

to it, and that not only from this, or that sort of errors, but indefinitely from all (for so Mr. Knots words are [infallible and not subject to error.] And neither of these being proved to be comprehended in the promise made to the Apostles, it is evident, that this first instance or example of the Apostles could not pertinently be opposed to my affirmation.

2. For the ensuing, or succeeding Church till the end of the world] 'tis certain that that degree of assistance which was afforded the Apostles, was not either promised, or afforded to that. By the succeeding Church, the Governors must necessarily be meant, speaking as he doth, of that promise of remaining with them always to the end of the world. For the ὑμεῖς you] there, being primarily the Apostles themselves, and secondarily the successors of the Apostles, 'tis evident and acknowledged generally by the Fathers, that the Bishops in every Church, were those, the Apostles successors: And therefore this promise in the secondary sence belonging unto them. 1. It belongs no otherwise to the Church, than as that signifies the Governors of the Church. 2. It belongs to the Governors of the Church of Ephesus, Laodicea, &c. and to all other Bishops, as well as the Bishop of Rome. And belonging to all these indifferently, it is yet evident, and confest on all hands, that all these Governors have not been infallible. Many of them have notoriously fallen into error, and even in the time of Scripture, witness the Epistle to the Churches, Rev. 2. 3. and so sure the same priviledge, that the Apostles personally had, was not thus communicated to the succeeding Church, i. e. to their Successors, the Governors of that; 10.

Nor indeed was it needful it should; All things which were deemed needful for the ensuing Plantations, were agreed on by the Apostles, and deposited in each Church, as their Rule of Faith; and if they would adhere to that, there was no need of any superadded infallibility to other things, because these, already provided, were sufficient; but if they would not adhere to that, this were an evidence of their fallibility: As for the promise here mentioned, that Christ would remain with the succeeding Church; that, and the prediction that the gates of hell should not prevail against it, are assurances, that he will so support the Church by his presential providence, that it shall never totally be destroyed, or demolished: But not that any particular branch of this Church, be it never so favour'd by him, shall be thus secured from the utmost either error, or ruine, in case it shall not walk worthy of the mercies bestowed on them (the seven Churches in the Revelation are competent instances of that) nor that even the universal Church over all the world, in what capacity soever, diffused, or collective, shall never fall into the least error, Christs personal presence among his Apostles on earth having not thus secured them. 11.

3. For the infallible means of knowing this or that book of Scripture] it is sufficient, that I answer, that if this were yielded, yet would it not prove any society of men on earth to be infallible. He that is in many things fallible, and more than so, actually erroneous, may yet infallibly know or believe some one, or more other things, either by his own senses, or by the testimony of others, founded in their several sensations, which being faithfully conveyed to us by undeniable Tradition, supply the place of an αὐτοψία, are as unquestionably certain, as what we have seen our selves. I know infallibly I now write, and that the book which I now answer, was written before me, and S. W. cannot question the truth of these affirmations, yet sure 'tis his interest to be so just, as to think me very fallible, and actually to erre in many other things, else he would have no excuse for having written a volume against me. And the same I affirm of all other matters of fact, testified by my own senses, or by universal unquestionable Tradition, for that is founded in the repeated sensations of so many other men, which being communicated and sufficiently testified to me, I have no more reason to doubt of, than of my own sensations. And of this sort is the Tradition of the universal Primitive Church concerning the Apostles delivering some doctrines, and writing some books, the testifications of those which saw the miracles, which the Apostles wrought (and whereby God set his seal to the truth of their preachings and writings) that this or that book was written by them, and so by those which were inspired by God. In this testimony the Church is not considered as a society of believers indowed with any inerrable priviledge, there being nothing in this question contested from the authority of their judgment, be it errable or inerrable, but as a number of witnesses (Heathen and Jewish first, and then converted by this doctrine thus miraculously confirmed) joyntly testifying of a thing done and seen by them, and wherein it cannot be imagined, that they should agree to deceive and betray, and so destroy their posterity, by confirming a falsehood to them. And so this being the means whereby I am assured that such or such books are genuine Scripture, it follows not from hence, that either I that thus assuredly believe this, on these testifications, or even they that have truly testified this one thing, are in all other things, wherein they do not thus affirm upon their own or others certain knowledge, of an infallible authority. 12.

To the last I say, that it is a strange shortness of discourse, that puts together an impossibility of actual mistaking in witnessing a matter of fact of mens certain knowledge, and an impossibility of being fallible; for, as 'tis one thing not to be mistaken, another to be infallible, so 'tis not one act of infallible judging, that makes that person infallible, but a foundation of security for all the acts of ones life; and so this is a most impertinent instance to prove general infallibility. For though I no way doubt of the truth of that which all Protestants in England affirm in a matter of fact twenty years ago, wherein many of them lived, and saw what they affirm, yet I have no assurance that both in that, and in every other affirmation of theirs (of which there is no other evidence) 'tis impossible for them to be fallible. That they do, or probably can mistake actually in a thing of that nature visible before their eyes, I believe not; Yet is that no proof that they are any way infallible, either in observing, and coming to the knowledge of all matters of fact, without all possible mixture of error, (humane weakness or inadvertence may here interpose sometimes) or in conveighing and testifying to others exactly, what they did observe; humane frailties and passions also may at other times intermix, and even when neither hath really interposed, either might have interposed, and so still they are not infallible, for that contains more than speaking exactly true, an impossibility to do otherwise, which was the priviledge that I still believe to belong to no barely humane society. 13.

Thus have I, ex abundanti, given him answer to all his offers of reason for Infallibility. And if the rest of those evidences tendred by the excellent Apologist, be of this kind of frame (as methinks S. W. 14.

should

should not be so unskilful or unkind, as to chuse out the weaker) I shall not be in danger of that amazement that S. W. tells me of. Some creatures are pictured on the flag that hangs out, far more terrible, than they appear, when you have been at the cost of the nearer view of them. And that is all I have to say to his third Section.

SECT. IV.

Ἴδιος τόπος, Act. 1. Theophylacts, and Oecumenius's Scholion, &c. The division of Provinces betwixt S. Paul and S. Peter. Ambroses, and Jeroms testimonies, and Theophylacts. This by their own agreement, not only by Gods designation. Exclusive of no other of the Apostles. Peters singular supremacy at Jerusalem, why denied. Clements testimony. The principal place belonged to James in his own See, and so in the Council. Ἐγὼ κρίνω, Acts 15. 22. Peters speaking first. S. Pauls no dependence on S. Peter. A place from S. Cyprian, answered. The testimony out of Anacletus's Epistle.

1. THE fourth Section is but the spreading a little thinner the Catholick Gentlemans letter, and hath been fully answered in the Reply, c. 2. §. 3. So also the Fifth Section is answered in Reply, c. 3. 1. and the Sixth Sect. c. 3. Sect. 2. & 4. So again his Seventh Sect. (all but the calumnies, and ridiculous colours, that without the least cause or ground in the Tract, he affixes to my way of proceeding, as will appear to any one that reads the Tract it self) is prevented, Ch. 4. Sect. 1.

2. After this he hath another Seventh Sect. p. 42. but that, nothing but a detortion of my words about κλῆρος ἀποστολῆς, Acts 1. making that my evidence, which was never by me thought on, as such (nor had I need of such, the thing being evident by its own light, that the Apostles went not all to one, but disposed themselves over all the world to several Provinces) yet borrowed from the short notes of the Catholick Gentleman, and answered, Reply c. 4. Sect. 2.

3. Of the Eighth Sect. three or four pages are spent on the phrase πορευθῆναι εἰς τὸν τόπον τὸν ἴδιον, going to his own place, Acts 1. and is of the same nature exactly with the former, and as largely prevented, Reply c. 4. Sect. 2. n. 20. &c. and yet upon this he pitches anew, with the greatest career of declamation, that he ever let loose to, in the whole book, and spends it all in a passionate paraenesis to his dear country-men; the effect of which is, that the rendring that phrase of any thing but Judas's going to hell, is to relinquish the sence of the whole Catholick world. My reasons for the other interpretation of Matthias his going to that Province, which should otherwise have been assigned Judas, I have largely rendred in the Reply, and shall now annex a testimony perfectly to my sence from Theophylact, on Acts 1. ἴδιον τόπον, &c. he calls that his own place, which Matthias, so as it was just and fit, should obtain; for as Judas was a stranger to it, even before he had fallen from it, ever since he began to be sick of covetousness and treason, so it properly belonged to Matthias, even before he obtained it, ever since he shewed himself worthy of so great an office. The like again we have from * Oecumenius on the place, who setting down, as his use is, the most approved interpretations, hath these words, τόπον δὲ ἴδιον ἤτοι τὴν ἀσχύνην καλεῖ, ἢ ὅτι τῷ Ἰούδᾳ ἐξαπωσμένῳ, ἄτοπος ἴδιον σχοίη, ἢ ἐκείνῳ λαμβάνων ἐπισκοπὴν, His own place] he calls his suffocation, &c. or else that Judas being gone, he, i. e. Matthias, may have the place to himself, receiving his Episcopacy. So Didymus, the word τόπος place signifies many things, among the rest an Order, as when we say the place of a Bishop, or of an Elder. So the Ordinary gloss, ut abiret in locum suum, i. e. Sortem Apostolicam, that he might go to his own place, i. e. the Apostolical lot. Would ever any man have thought that all these should have been thus adventurous to mention such a blasphemous interpretation as this (just the same with the Doctors) or that Lorinus and Salmeron should take notice of them, without any expression of detestation, when S. W. had undertaken on his word to his kind Readers and dear country-men, that it was the utmost absurdity, that it inferred the finding of Judas a Diocess in hell, and Matthias succeeding him?

* Edit. Veron. 1532.

4. What follows there of the agreement made between S. Peter and S. Paul, concerning the division of their Provinces, the one to the Jews, the other to the Gentiles, and is matter to S. W. of such challenge and triumph, is cleared in the same Chap. of the Reply, Sect. 3. and 4. to be a mistake in him, and all that I pretend, manifested from Scripture. To which I now add the plain words of S. Ambrose on Gal. 2. 8. wherein he asserts all that was either my purpose, or my interest to affirm, in these words, * Paul saith he, nameth Peter alone, and compareth him to himself, because he had received the primacy to build the Church, and he likewise is chosen to have the primacy of building the Churches of the Gentiles (and so Chrysost. that S. Paul demonstrates himself to be ὁμότιμον, equal to them, καὶ τῷ κορυφαίῳ συγκρίνει ἑαυτὸν, and compares himself with Peter the chief of them; and Theophylact, δείκνυσιν ἑαυτὸν ἰσότιμον τῷ Πέτρῳ, he shews himself equal to Peter) ita tamen ut & Petrus prædicaret Gentibus, si causa fuisset, & Paulus Judæis, nam uterque invenitur utrumque fecisse; sed tamen plena authoritas Petro in Judaismi prædicatione data agnoscitur, & Pauli perfecta authoritas in prædicatione gentium invenitur; Yet so that Peter preached to the Gentiles also, if there were cause, and Paul to the Jews, and so both of them did both: but yet the full authority is acknowledged to be given to Peter in the preaching to the Jews, and Pauls perfect authority is found in preaching to the Gentiles, from whence also he calls himself the Doctor of the Gentiles; adding that this portion was assigned him, in respect of his abilities, it being harder to attract to the faith, those that were far from God, than those that were near. And so S. Hierom having affirmed, on Gal. 1. 22. that the Churches which were of the Jews, seorsim habebantur, nec his qui erant è Gentibus miscebantur, were severed, and mixed not with the Gentiles, he adds on this verse of c. 2. That the * agreement was made, that Paul should preach to the Gentiles, and Peter, and James, and John to which though he qualifie after, to salve his hypothesis concerning Peter's principality, n. 26, 27, 28. yet n. 29. he makes Peter's Apostleship to the Jews, to be proportionable to Christs being the Minister of the Circumcision, which we know was so far true, as not to preach, by himself or Disciples in his life-time, to any other. See Clemens in Euseb. l. 6. cap. 14. speaking of S Paul's Epistle to the Hebrews, and the reasons why he prefixt not his name, Paul an Apostle, &c. as in other his Epistles; this for one is rendred from one of the Ancients, ἐπεὶ ὁ Κύριος Ἀπόστολος ὢν τῶν Παντοκράτορος ἀπεστάλη πρὸς Ἑβραίους, διὰ μετριότητα ὁ Παῦλος ὡς ἂν εἰς τὰ ἔθνη ἀπεσταλμένος, οὐκ ἐγγράφει ἑαυτὸν Ἑβραίων ἀπόστολον, διά τε τὴν πρὸς τὸν Κύριον τιμὴν, διά τε τὸ ἐκ περισσείας καὶ τοῖς Ἑβραίοις ἐπιστέλλειν ἔθνων κήρυκα ὄντα καὶ Ἀπόστολον. Where Paul's writing to the Hebrews was ἐκ περισσείας, not pertaining to, or over and above his office, præter officium, saith Christophorson. the

* Petrum solum nominat, & sibi comparat, quia Primatum ipse acceperat ad fundandam Ecclesiam, se quoq; pari modo electum, ut Primatum habeat in fundandis Gentium Ecclesiis.

* And that, by decree of the Council, Acts 15. See Baron. Ann. 51. n. 16.

the Jews; which ſure was a ſevering of their Provinces. So S. Chryſoſtom in his Hom. on Gal. 2. 11. τὲς μὲν Ἰουδαίους ἐπέτρεψε τῷ Πέτρῳ, τοῖς δὲ Ἕλλησι τὸν Παῦλον ἐπέστησεν ὁ Χριστὸς, t. 5. p. 403. l. 18. and one of theſe πρὸς ἀντιδιαστολὴν, by way of contradiſtinction to the other, l. 23. and after the manner of a wiſe King, ſaith he, l. 26. which commits the Horſemen to one, and the command of the Foot, στρατιὰν πεζῶν, to another; ſo, ſaith he, Chriſt divided his Army into two parts, and committed the Jews to Peter, and the Gentiles to Paul: and the reaſon of this Oeconomy he at large renders, p. 404. &c. So again, t. 3. p. 729. l. 24. ſpeaking of them, ἐν τῷ κηρύγματι διειλόμεθα τὴν οἰκουμένην, καὶ γὰ μὲν τὲς ἐξ ἐθνων, ἐκεινὸς δὲ τὲς Ἰουδαίους ἔλαχον κατὰ τῷ θεῷ δοκῶν. So Eucherius Lugdun. in Hom. in Nat. Pet. & Pauli, Electi duo præcipui ad duorum populorum ſalutem, Petrus ad Judæorum, Paulus ad Gentium. And ſo Theophylact on Gal. 1. 21. ἐπισὰς τὴν Ἰουδαίαν, πάλιν μεθίσαται ταύτης, διά τε τὸ ἔθνεσιν ἀπέσαλθαι κήρυξ, καὶ τὸ μὴ ἐπ' ἀλλότριον θεμέλιον ἀνέχεσθαι οἰκοδομῶν, being come to Judea, he departed thence, both becauſe he was ſent a preacher to the Gentiles, and becauſe he would not build on anothers foundation.

Yet one little deceit there is in S. W. his diſcourſe, which the Catholick Gentleman had not attained to; for on occaſion of the [for] Gal. 2. 8. his concluſion is, that theſe two Apoſtles were more properly particularized to theſe two parts of the world, by no other deſignation, than the more eſpecial co-operation of Gods efficacious aſſiſtance. Here the mention of Gods ſpecial co-operation hath truth in it, and is fully proved from verſ. 8. but the [no other deſignation] (wherein all the force of his anſwer lyes) is moſt expreſly contrary to plain Scripture, the Text affirming, that beſides that, this deſignation of mutual agreement intervened, James, Cephas, and John, ſaith Paul, gave me and Barnabas the right hands of fellowſhip, that we ſhould go to the Gentiles, and they to the circumciſion. What can be more evident for this farther deſignation, founded in that former? 5.

His Ninth Section hath ſomewhat new in it (but perfectly agreeable to the miſtakes and detortions gleaned from the Catholick Gentleman) as 1. that he will conclude from my words, that I will have all the Apoſtles to have ſeveral Provinces limiting their juriſdictions, and excluſive of one anothers right, and from thence making the circumciſion, or Jewiſh Chriſtians peculiarly S. Peters Province, and the Gentile Chriſtians peculiarly S. Pauls, I have gotten all the reſt of the Apoſtles leave to play.] And then there is another prime diſh for Mr. Stationer to add to his Bill of fare. 'Tis true, I ſaid the Apoſtles by their own act diſtributed their univerſal great Province (the whole world, to which they were to go and preach) into ſeveral diſtributions, or lots, or leſſer Provinces, one or more to go one way, and the other another, to proclaim the faith of Chriſt, and that the circumciſion was peculiarly S. Peters Province, or diviſion aſſigned to him (and thence I concluded it unimaginable, how he ſhould be the univerſal or ſupream Paſtor or Biſhop of the whole world:) But what word ſaid I, of concluding all the Jewiſh Chriſtians under S. Peters aſſignation, or all the Gentiles under Pauls? from which alone, his concluſion of the play-day for the reſt of the Apoſtles is inferred? Nay, when he had ſet it down for my affirmation, that I will have all the Apoſtles have their ſeveral Provinces, is it poſſible he ſhould, in the ſame breath, conclude me to deprive eleven of theſe all of their ſeveral Provinces? When I ſay Peter was the Apoſtle of the circumciſion, excluſively to the uncircumciſion (as when Euſeb. hiſt. l. 3. c. 1. ſaith, that he preacht in divers nations, τοῖς ἐκ διασπορᾶς Ἰουδαίοις, to the Jews that were of the diſperſion) the meaning is evident, that he was ſo the Apoſtle of the one, as he was not of the other, or as Paul was, and is in Scripture ſaid to be, of the other. But can it thence follow, that either no other Apoſtle was aſſigned to the Jews, but Peter, or no other to the Gentiles, but Paul? Nay is it not expreſly ſhewed §. 6. that the Jews in Judea were by Peter, James, and John put under James the brother of the Lord and Biſhop of Jeruſalem? And §. 3 that the other Apoſtles had their ſeveral κλήρους aſſigned them, and their travels, labours, and plantations proportionable thereto, and that S. John was aſſigned the Jews for his Province, as well as S. Peter, and ſo had the converting and governing of the Lydian Aſia, and placing Biſhops there? This in both parts he takes notice of, p. 57. but never relents at the foregoing calumny, only laughs it out, and deſpiſes the remainder of the diſperſion of the Jews, as a few pitiful Pariſhes, unworthy S. Peter; but never offers to conſider the allegations, by which it was evident, and can never be avoided by him or any man, that the Jews in the Lydian Aſia were governed by S. John (and from thence it was, that they had and retained ſeveral cuſtoms, different from thoſe which were introduced in the Weſt by S. Peter) And muſt this be ſtiled the freeing all the reſt of that task which their Maſter had enjoyned them? If this be to conclude, or diſpute, what contradictories may not this wonder-working faculty reconcile? 6.

Secondly, he excepts againſt my uſe of the word [ſingular] when I ſay Peter had no ſingular ſupremacy at Jeruſalem. To take away his wonderment, I anſwer, that by ſingular, I mean ſuch an one, as was not common to the other two eminent Apoſtles, James and John, who together with Peter committed the Biſhoprick of Jeruſalem, the Metropolis then of all Judea at leaſt, to the Lords brother; What he ſaith in this matter, p. 58. that Peters great authority is not invalidated by his taking the other two with him, any more than is the Archbiſhops, when in conſecrating a Biſhop, he takes two other Biſhops with him] is true, in caſe it any other way appeared, that Peter was an Archbiſhop in reſpect of theſe two other Suffragan Biſhops, James and John: But this neither doth, nor ever will be made to appear by him; and though I did not then undertake to prove their equality by this argument, being about another matter, the extent of S. Peters Province, yet the words of Clemens Ὑποτυπώσ. l. 5. might to him, who had this concluſion in his eye, have deſerved to be conſidered, when he ſaith of Peter, and James, and John, ὡς ἂν ὑπὸ τῷ κυρίῳ προσελιμμένοι, as being by our Lord prefer'd or honoured before the reſt, yet they did not ἐπιδικάζεσθαι δόξης, contend for dignity, but choſe James the firſt Biſhop of Jeruſalem; where the προτιμία or precedence that Peter had from Chriſt, is common to James and John alſo, and ſo no ſingular ſupremacy, and as ſuch, they choſe and ordain'd the brother of the Lord; which ſure is not after the manner of an Archbiſhop and his Suffragan Biſhops. And ſo alſo in that place to the Galatians, c. 2. 9. James, and Cephas, and John are equally dignified by S. Paul, and have all three the ſtile of δοκοῦντες στύλοι εἶναι, ſeeming to be pillars; and as the Fathers even now concluded, that Paul was ὁμότιμος to them, and particularly to Peter, ſo they did alſo, that they were all ἰσότιμοι, equally dignified. 7.

Thirdly,

8. Thirdly, When I had said of James the Lords brother, not that he was simply superior to Peter, but that being fixt Bishop of Jerusalem, all the Bishops of Judea were subject to him, and that thereupon in this his See, he is named before Peter and John, Gal. 2. 9. and hath the principal place in the Council (where S. Peter is present) and gives the sentence, Acts 15. 19. on which the Rescript is founded, verse 22. and from all this, conclude no more, but that the jurisdiction in that Metropolis belonged to James the Just, and not to S. Peter; All this he is willing to misunderstand, as a proof of mine, to infer S. James's priority of dignity, or greater authority, and to frame some answer to the several branches of it. But he may know, that as I do not believe S. Peter had any greater authority than the rest of the Apostles, so I do not pretend that any of the other Apostles had greater authority than he, much less this James the Bishop of Jerusalem, who, I suppose, was none of the 12. Apostles. Only I was to prove, that in this his See, James was considered as Bishop, and so even in Peters presence, had the principal place (and indeed if he was not there in that capacity, how came he there at all, for upon reasons elsewhere given, I suppose it competently established, that this James was none of the twelve) and against this what he pretends, is not of any weight: For

9. 1. When he saith, that the naming him before Peter, Gal. 2. 9. is, if it were allowed any weight, the losing my cause, because in most other places of Scripture, Peter is constantly named first of all the Apostles. This I am sure hath no force in it, because this place belonging peculiarly to the Council of Jerusalem, the giving James, which was none of the twelve, the first place here, must in all reason signifie thus much, that he was Bishop there, and that is all, in effect, that I deduce from it; and not from that alone, but from it in conjuncture with other circumstances.

10. 2. When he saith, I have not the least pretence of a testimony, that James had the principal place,] it is evident that S. Pauls naming him first before Peter, is a pretence at least of a testimony, as far as belongs to Jerusalem. And if there be not the least force in that, this will be somewhat to the prejudice of the Romanists argument, that is wont to be taken from the πρῶτος Σίμων, concluding his Primacy from his being first named, which if it would convincingly prove, then must James here have it, who yet pretends not to it, any farther than in his own City. But then sure the mention of James's giving the sentence, v. 19. was another pretence of a testimony, and this I still believe the phrase [διὸ ἐγὼ κρίνω, wherefore I judge, or, my sentence is] will be found to signifie, and not only, as he saith, his opinion or judgment in the matter. For 1. 'tis * S. Chrysostoms observation, that his speaking last, was founded in his being Bishop of Jerusalem, ἐπίσκοπος ἦν τῆς ἐν Ἱεροσολύμοις ἐκκλησίας ἔτος, διὸ καὶ ὕστερον λέγει, he was Bishop of the Church of Jerusalem, whereupon he speaks last (according to the customs in Assemblies, he that sits first, speaks last) adding upon 19, 20, 21. of that chapter, εἰκότως ταῦτα ἐπιτάττει ---- he rightly decrees, ordains these things, making his sentence ἐπίταγμα, a decree, and yet more expressly, setting down * the εὐταξία, good order observed in their speaking. After Peter, saith he, Paul speaks, and Ἰάκωβος ἀνέχεται, καὶ οὐκ ἐπιπηδᾷ, ἐκεῖνος δὲ ἦν ἡ ἀρχὴν ἐγχειρισμένος, James forbears, and interposes not, for he was intrusted with the principality: and * again observing that Peter spake more earnestly, but James more mildly, saith, οὕτω δὲ δεῖ καὶ ἐν μεγάλῃ δυνασείᾳ, τὰ μὲν φορτικὰ ἑτέροις παραχωρεῖν, αὐτὸν δὲ ἀπὸ ἡμερωτέρων διαλέγεσθαι, for thus it behoves him that is in great power, or authority, to leave the sharper things to others, and himself to draw his arguments from the gentler, and milder Topicks, making James here in this Council clearly superior to Peter.

*Tom. 4. p. 795. A.

11. As for the argument which I had drawn from κρίνω I judge] I see not yet any infirmity in it. For thus sure the word signifies in the matter of censures, 1 Cor. 5. 12. τί γάρ μοι καὶ τοὺς ἔξω κρίνειν; τοὺς δὲ ἔσω κρίνετε, judging or sentencing to excommunication, ver. 13. and so v. 3. ἤδη κέκρικα, I have judged *P. 797. l. 15. already, i.e. given sentence: and so saith * S. Chrysostom here of James, κρίνω ἐγὼ, ἀντὶ τοῦ, μετ' ἐξουσίας λέγω, I judge, instead of, I say with power, or, as other copies read, φησὶ καλῶς μετ' ἐξουσίας, τὸ κρίνω ἐγὼ, he saith with power, I judge. But this I never meant any otherwise, than as a sentence pronounced by him, and agreed to by the rest, and founded, as any conciliary sentence ought to be, in the ἔδοξε τῷ πνεύματι καὶ ἡμῖν, which supposes the good liking of those others, that sate with him together in Council, not as depending only on his vote. And this is enough to confirm to him the principal place in that Council.

12. What he adds to prejudge the Rescripts being founded, v. 22. upon S. James's sentence in particular, that 'tis but only, Then (i. e. after S. Peter, S. Paul, Barnabas, and S. James had spoken) it seemed good to the Apostles and Elders ---] is 1. founded in a misunderstanding of my assertion, and 2. is it self a farther mistake. For when I said James gave the sentence, I never imagined that the sentence was so his, as not to be the Councils also, but that all their opinions uniformly inclining the same way, James pronounced the decree, or δόγμα. But then 2. the thing which there follows in those words, Then seemed it good to the Apostles and Elders, and the whole Church] was a subsequent determination of sending chosen men to Antioch with Paul and Barnabas, and to write by them, as follows expressly in that 22. verse. And so on which side the want either of wisdom or honesty hath appeared to lye, S. W. may now be better qualified to consider.

13. What he would now conclude in favour of S. Peters authority, from his speaking first, or breaking the ice in such a solemn pronounced oration] will soon be answered by remembring, that S. Peter had been accused of preaching to Cornelius a Gentile, c. 11. 2. as Paul and Barnabas had of more than so, and for that reason they begin, and give account of their actions, the one justifying himself by the holy Ghosts descent on those Gentiles, before he baptized them, and the other by the miracles which God had enabled them to do among the Gentiles.

14. In this Sect. treating the business of S. Paul set down in Gal. 1. 12. 17. he distinguishes of dependence on S. Peter, and allowing Paul to have had no dependence on him as to the manner of conferring on him the power of Apostle, he will yet have this power (given him) to depend on S. Peter, or to be subject to him as the chief of the Apostles.] But to this I answer, 1. That he ought in any reason to have offered some proof for this, which he knows is most denied by us; and 2. That unless the same Christ that gave him this power immediately, subjected it to S. Peter, and appear to do that, as clearly as he gave him the power (which 'tis certain appears not) this cannot be said with any sobriety. 3. That the place, Gal. 1. 17. belongs expressly to the power, after it was given, and yet then he depended not on him.

For

For this I appeal to S. Chrysostom, affirming of Paul distinctly, * μηδὲν Πέτρου δεόμενον, μηδὲ τῆς ἐκείνου φωνῆς, ἀλλ' ἰσότιμον ὢν αὐτῷ, he had no want of Peter, nor of his voice (as I suppose he must have, if in respect of his power he depended on, and were subject to him) but was of equal dignity with him; adding in a parenthesis πλέον δὲ οὐδὲν ἐρῶ τέως, for I will say no more, which what it is an intimation of, I leave S. W. to conjecture. 15. * Tom. 3. p. 723. l. 23.

The last thing that expects answer in this Sect. is the place out of Cyprian, Ep. 17. where concerning S. Pauls withstanding S. Peter, Gal. 2. 11. he saith of Peter, that though the Lord chose him first, and built his Church on him, yet he did not insolently challenge any thing to himself, or assume arrogantly so as to say he had the primacy, and so that he should rather be obeyed by newer and later Apostles, nor despised he Paul, because he had been a persecuter, but admitted the counsel of truth.] To which as being the only testimony from antiquity, I have yet observed to be produced by S. W. it is needful to give answer, that I never doubted of S. Peters primacy, in this sence, as this holy Father speaks of it (any more than of Christs building his Church on him;) I gave him even now a testimony from S. Ambrose, which expresly avouched it; I only deny, that this Primacy gave him any power, either over S. Paul, or any other Apostle (or that his being a foundation on which the Church was built, gave him jurisdiction over the rest of the Apostles, who were foundations also.) And that I have reason to deny this, he will remember, both by the ὁμοτιμία, and ἰσοτιμία, so lately produced from Chrysostom and Theophylact, the equality betwixt Paul and him, and so of all other the Apostles; and also by the words of S. Ambrose, that S. Paul had a primacy among the Gentiles, as Peter among the Jews. And then, if he will review these very words of Cyprian, he will find them accord very well, which though they affirm him chosen primùm first by Christ, yet add, that non vindicavit sibi aliquid insolenter, aut arroganter assumpsit ut diceret se primatum tenere, & obtemperari sibi à posteris & novellis oportere ---- leaving us to resolve, that if he had claimed any obedience from Paul by this primacy, he could not have justified it from arrogance of assuming that which did not belong to him. And to this agree those words set down in the * Canon law as from Anacletus's 2 Epist. ad Episc. Ital. where, as on one side we find, post Christum à Petro sacerdotalis cœpit ordo, quia ipsi primo Pontificatus in Ecclesiâ Christi datus est, & potestatem ligandi primus accepit, primusque ad fidem populum adduxit; after Christ the sacerdotal order began from Peter, because the Pontificate in the Church was first given to him, and he first received the power of binding and loosing, and he first brought the people to the faith by vertue of his preaching; adding after, that the Apostles ipsum principem eorum esse voluerunt, would have him to be their Prince; (where he read this, I know not) so on the other side the words are as clear, Cæteri verò Apostoli cum eodem pari consortio honorem & potestatem acceperunt; but the rest of the Apostles received honour and power in equal fellowship with him: Which being entred into their body of law, will, I hope, be of some force with S. W. whatever opinion others conceive of it. See Cassub. contra Baron. p. 535. 16. * Decret. par. 1. Dist. 21. c. 2.

SECT. V.

S. W. his ill memory. The distinction of the Gentile and Jewish cœtus, Acts 15. 23. The Bishops at Rome a proof of it.

THE Tenth Section begins with the view of two testimonies out of Ignatius. The very mention whereof, accuses the close of his former Section of a fault, which even before all others is predominant in this Author, and railing it self is but his blind, to keep this from being descried. For he had there said, that there was no testimony at all to confirm my own [we know] and now being gotten into another Section his memory is frail, and he hopes others will be so too, and then he blushes not to set down two testimonies of that, of which he had so lately denied any. But then next, he hath objection to these; The testimonies do affirm no more but the founding of the Church of Antioch by Peter and Paul, and that might be by their promiscuous endeavours without distinction, much less exclusion of authority and jurisdiction.] I answer, 'tis true, this was possible; and if it had been true, had manifestly prejudged Peters singular jurisdiction, and clearly joyn'd Paul socially with him. Vid. Baron. Ann. 45. n. 14.

But there was another testimony behind (and that, if taken notice of, had removed this, might be) from Acts 15. 23. where the distinction of the Gentile Cœtus at Antioch from the Jewish, is discernible, by the inscription of the Rescript of the Council, τοῖς κατὰ τὴν Ἀντιόχειαν καὶ Συρίαν καὶ Κιλικίαν ἀδελφοῖς, τοῖς ἐξ ἐθνῶν, to the brethren (i. e. the Christian Church) which are at Antioch and Syria and Cilicia (of which Antioch was the Metropolis) those of the Gentiles, and that separately, and in contradistinction to the Jews, as appears, v. 28, 29. where the things required of the Church in that decree, are all proper to the Gentiles: And beside more evidence, which there follows to the same matter, the words of * S. Hierom even now produced are most clear, Seorsim qui ex Judæis erant Ecclesia habebantur, nec his qui erant è Gentibus miscebantur; the Churches which were of the Jews were held apart or in several, nor were they mixed with those which were of the Gentiles. * In Gal. 1. 12. See Baron. Ann. 45. n. 14.

The next Paragraph concerning Peters withdrawing from all communion with the Gentiles, and not only the Gentile diet, is prevented in the Reply, c. 4. §. 6. and the whole matter of Evodius and Ignatius being Bishops of Antioch at once farther cleared, and his elaborate misunderstandings forestal'd, Sect. 7. And so likewise the other part, wherein Rome was concerned, is reviewed, n. 6. (and to omit others, 'tis not possible all his scoffs can divert the force of the testimony of Epiphanius, who makes both those Apostles Bishops, as well as Apostles of Rome, which they could not be at once, without this distinction of the cœtus, the Jewish to be under one, and the Gentile under the other) and the testimony of Prosper concerning the Ecclesia Gentium, the Church of the nations, as that is cleared to comprehend the Jews and Gentiles both, n. 10. And that concludes the calumnies and scoffs of the tenth Section.

SECT. VI.

The Popes seals for what produced. S. W. his misunderstandings. S. Peters jurisdiction in Rome proved to belong to the Jews only. The Jews solemn departure from Paul, Acts 28. yet some of them possibly of his cœtus. The differences in story about the first Bishops of Rome. Christs favour to John. Dignity of his place. Leaning on Christs breast. Abrahams bosom. No birth-right. Ὁλόκληρον ἔθνος. No pretence for S. Peters power in Asia, 1 Tim. 3. 14, 15. Timothy and Titus were not under S. Peter.

1. HIS Eleventh Section contains new matter, but all in the former dress; I need not say of what kind that is. And first the seals of the Popes, which I brought for a testimony of the Church of Romes being founded by S. Paul as well as S. Peter, and is so far an irrefragable testimony, he must cry out on, as a most irrational proof of S. Peters being Apostle of the Jews only, not of the Gentiles.

2. The short is this; I have proved out of Scripture that Peter was by agreement to betake himself to the Jews (where S. Paul and he met) and S. Paul to the Gentiles, and it was sufficiently manifested, that these were distinct assemblies; and in agreement with this (not as proofs of it) I found express mention of both of these, in the planting the Church of Rome, and I affirmed the Popes seals to be an irrefragable instance of this last. And then all this must be first shuffled together, and some appearance of incoherence gained; and then the victory is gotten, and pursued most triumphantly. I again therefore ask, Is not the Popes seal an evidence that Paul as well as Peter had the planting the Church of Rome? and is not that agreeable to Peters preaching to the Jews, and Pauls to the Gentiles, when they met in a City, where there were multitudes of both? and was not that the importance of the agreement, Gal. 2. 9? And is not that an argument that Peter was not the Universal Pastor, but that the Gentiles were S. Pauls Province, as the Jews S. Peters? If it were, then is all my arguing regular, and concluding, for 'tis clear as the day, that this was it. And 'tis not the dazling of his eyes from the distance of the object, but the resolvedness not to see ought to the prejudice of his cause, which made S. W. so short-sighted.

3. Agreeable is his next attempt against the word [only] when I said that the story of Scripture, according to the brevity of the relations there made, only sets down S. Peter to be the Apostle of the circumcision. Where the [only] is set clearly in opposition to the Scriptures making more particular relations of S. Peters preaching to the Jewish cœtus, at Rome, &c. as is evident by the consequents; that it saith of Paul, that he preacht at Rome, &c. And S. W. can by no means see that true importance of the word [only] but 1. it must note that Peter is only set down as Apostle of the circumcision exclusively to James and John, which he knows I could not mean, without contradicting one branch of my former discourse, and that most impertinently to my own disadvantage: And 2. that he was Apostle of the circumcision only, and great wagers are offered against the truth of my words in this sence, which though they belong quite to another matter, as hath been said, yet because his offers are so liberal, in case I shall shew the least syllable either in Scripture or any other testimonies expresly restraining S. Peters jurisdiction (at Rome he had said, and must mean) to the Jews only, and exclusively to the Gentiles, he will yield the laurel, and quit the controversie; I shall, not for the laurels sake (that may belong to him upon other scores) but upon so tempting an hope, that I may be at an end of controversie, offer to his review the testimony from S. Paul, and from Epiphanius, the one affirming the agreement made between those Apostles, that one should execute their Apostleship (for after that or the like manner must the Ellipsis be made up, ἵνα ἡμεῖς εἰς τὰ ἔθνη ----) among the Gentiles, the other among the Jews; and the other expresly affirming that in Rome Peter and Paul were the same persons, both Apostles and Bishops. From hence, and by force of S. Hieroms affirmation, that the Churches which consisted of the Jews, seorsim habebantur, were held by themselves apart, and were not mingled with those which were of the Gentiles, I shall adventure to infer the conclusion, that in Rome S. Peters jurisdiction was restrained to the Jews only, and exclusively to the Gentiles. For how could there be two Bishops in one City (a thing quite contrary to all rule, and practice, assoon as the division betwixt the Jews and the Gentiles was taken away) unless there were two such distinct cœtus? If there were two such cœtus, then they that were of one cœtus under one Bishop, were not of the other cœtus under the other Bishop; 1. Because the cœtus were kept apart, and impermixti. And 2. because no Bishop was to meddle in another mans Province; and withal this was part of the foresaid agreement, ἵνα ἡμεῖς εἰς τὰ ἔθνη, αὐτοὶ δὲ εἰς περιτομήν. And if it be pretended, that is true in co-ordinate Episcopacies, but holds not betwixt a Bishop and his Primate, and S. Peter be pretended as such, then the former arguments return again, that shewed from Scripture and antiquity, that S. Paul was independent from S. Peter, and that S. Paul had the Primatum, primacy among the Gentiles, as S. Peter among the Jews. And if against all this, it be again urged that Peter preacht to Cornelius a Gentile, I answer, that that was not at Rome, but long before this agreement between the Apostles: and though it may be, he did convert some other such, yet this is not argumentative for S. W. being nothing to the matter of jurisdiction, and withal but a whimpering [may be] in his language; and till I can foresee some farther Reply from S. W. this is all I shall offer to him at this season.

4. So when I said the Jews solemnly departed from S. Paul, Acts 28. 29. Whence I conceived it fit to apply his two years preaching there, to the Gentiles of that City, he is much offended at the word [solemnly] as not finding it in the Text, nor any expressions of absolutely relinquishing him; nor pertinacy nor contempt; but rather the contrary, much discourse or debate, a sign of hoveringness, &c. and finding a more solemn departure of his from them, Acts 13. 51. Shaking off the dust of his feet against them, after which yet he oft preached to the Jews, demanding farther what became of the Jews, which v. 28. were now converted by him?

But

But I answer, that as I cited not the word [solemnly] from that verse, as any part of the sacred Text, so I had authority enough to make use of the word, in that narration; For sure there were words, that signified a solemn departure, when before the dissolution of the meeting, Paul said this one one word, Well said the Holy Ghost to our Fathers by the Prophet Isaiah, saying, Go unto this people, and say, Hearing ye shall hear, and shall not understand ---- v. 26. For the heart of this people is waxen gross, and their ears are dull of hearing, and their eyes have they closed, lest they should hear, and see, and understand, and be converted, Verse 27. Be it known therefore unto you, that the salvation of God is sent to the Gentiles, and that they will hear it, v. 28. Upon which words it is, that the mention of their departure follows, v. 29. This I thought was a competent ground, on which to found the solemnity of their departure, for this signified pertinacity, contempt and obduration of heart, and withal, the Apostles resolution to deal with them as such, to betake himself to the Gentiles; so saith S. Chrysostom, Ἀσύμφωνοι ὄντες διελύοντο, πάντες μὴ πιστεύοντες ἀνεχώρουν, when they agreed not among themselves they departed, v. 25. that is, they not believing, forsook him; that is his notion of their dispute, and the conclusion thereof, and πρὸς ἐκείνους ταῦτα εἴρηται ἀπιστήσαντας, those words of Scripture he applied to them upon their unbelief: and again, that you may not wonder that they remained unbelievers, he cites that prophecy. All clear to mine, and contrary to S. W. his sence. And on Pauls part, πρώτους Ἰουδαίους καλεῖ, ἔπειτα δείξας αὐτοῖς τὰ πράγματα, τότε ἐπὶ τὰ ἔθνη ἔρχεται, he calls the chief Jews, then having declared the matter to them, he goes to the Gentiles. What could be more express? 5.

And what if he did not shake off the dust of his shoes against them? That was the ceremony of his departing from them, and that, when he meant to leave their City, c. 13. 51. but I there spake of the solemnity of their departing from him; and beside, he was brought prisoner to Rome, and could not depart at pleasure; and withal, meant to stay there and preach to the Gentiles; and therefore this ceremony was not now seasonable, and the others were sufficient to render it on both sides a solemn departure. 6.

Lastly, for the Jews that believed, v. 24. I answer, that if they continued in that Faith, which now they received, and were not scandalized and averted, if they did not fall off, upon the mention of his resolution to turn to the Gentiles (for many Jews which received the faith, would no longer associate with S. Paul, when he did so) yet I say, upon any evidence produced for this, I shall make no doubt to acknowledge, that they, though Jews, became a part of S. Pauls cœtus; and so also can I as willingly yield to the force of any authentick testimony, that there were some Gentiles in S. Peters cœtus, such I suppose was Clemens a Roman: and if we believe * Eucherius Lugdun. vetustâ prosapiâ senatorum atque etiam ex stirpe Cæsarum, and yet S. Peters Disciple, and Deacon, and Successor in the See. But this is no prejudice still to the distinct cœtus of Jews and Gentiles, in this, as in other Cities, the one under one Apostle and Governor, the other under another, any more than the admission of some Gentile proselytes among the Jews can be an argument against the impaling of the Church of the Jews, or their not associating with the Gentiles before Christs time. 7.

* De contemptu mundi.

Next he makes a pompous mention of a testimony from Ignatius ad Tral. (which I used only to prove that Linus was Deacon to S. Paul, and Clemens to Peter) and because it doth say nothing to the proof of S. Peters being only over the Jews, and Paul over the Gentiles, he hath great rejoycings over it: But I say again, that conclusion was proved by Scripture, which affirms him by agreement to go to the Jews, as the other to the Gentiles; and this from Ignatius, is only a branch of accordance with it, that Linus, who (saith Ignatius) was Deacon to one, and Clemens to the other, succeeded them in the Government of their several cœtus, that, as Epiphanius had said, Peter and Paul were both Bishops of Rome, so their two Deacons were Bishops after them. Whether this was any unseasonable advertisement, I desire * others to pass their judgment, and shall not much consider, what S. W. thinks of it. Only he that likes not the fancy, should have directed his reader to some other solid way to reconcile those repugnancies of story, some making Linus, others Clemens first Bishop of Rome, after the Apostles, and others making Clemens but the third, which must in truth have some way of reconciliation, and for which the course is pointed out in the Tract of Schism, and needed not have been so fastidiously rejected. 8.

* See Baron. Ann. 45. n. 14.

And this being the only crime committed against S. W. at this time, he is so reserved as not to offer any other means, but what himself justly calls evasions, to salve the difficulty. There was little kindness in this to his (even now) dear Country-men. 9.

The remainder of the Section concerns S. John, of whom I had said 1. That in Christs life he had the favour of Christ, and dignity of place before S. Peter himself. 2. That being by agreement assigned the Jews for his Province, as well as Peter had been, he had the converting and governing of all the converted Jews of the Lydian Asia, and the placing Bishops over them; and this proved from Clemens Alex. Eusebius, Prosper, and the author of the martyrdom of Timothy. 3. That S. Paul had planted the Faith in the Gentile part of this Asia, and placed Timothy Bishop there: Now to all this he hath sundry exceptions; 1. That I bring nothing to prove this] But that is manifestly evinced by the testimonies there annexed, §. 14. Only because they are not put in the same Section, in which the observation was proposed, he thinks that a very competent advantage; upon which to reply to §. 13. that I say 'tis manifest, and yet bring nothing to prove it. But this is the manner of this artificer, and therefore being now grown into some acquaintance with him, it must not be taken amiss from him. 10.

2. He dislikes my proof for the dignity of S. Johns place, from the stile of beloved Disciple, and leaning on his breast, as if, saith he, because Jacob loved Joseph more than all his other brethren, and therefore out of favour he might lean on his breast at supper, it must needs mean plainly, that young Joseph was the highest of his brethren in dignity, had due to him the birth-right and inheritance, &c.] I answer, 1. That having mentioned two things of John, 1. Christs favour to him, 2. The dignity of place he had above others; it was only the former of these, which I assumed from his title of the beloved Disciple, and that infallibly infer'd it. 2. That for the dignity of place, as the πρωτοκλισία, or first room imports that, so that was as irrefragably concluded from his lying in his bosom, or leaning on his breast at supper, in the discubitus; for supposing Christ first, he that was in his bosom, must needs have, next Christ, the uppermost place; & accordingly it unavoidably follows, that Lazarus being represented parabolically 11.

in Abrahams bosom, is there described to be in the next place to the father of the faithful, and it being certain, that upon supposition of degrees of glory in Heaven, some one or more Saints are next to Abraham, I presume we may believe Christ, that such an one as is in that parable decyphered by Lazarus, is capable of that place; and all S. W. his scruples, which he adds further on this score, have not the least validity in them. So Baronius, Ann. Chr. 34. n. 41. Ratione accubitus Johannis, qui in ea cœna primum locum post Christum obtinuit, suborta esse videtur in eadem cœna, illa inter Apostolos contentionis occasio, quis eorum videretur esse major, dum viderent cæteri in cœna illius accubitu omnibus prælatum esse Johannem. Adding n. 42. a special observation, that the Apostles never contended thus, or took it ill, Petrum præpositum cæteris esse; but could not well bear, Johannem vel Jacobum apud Christum primos haberi, ut Mar. * 10. & Lu. 9. cum iidem unà cum Petro selecti à cæteris ducti essent à domino in montem Tabor; intravit, inquit Lucas, cogitatio in eos, quis eorum major esset. And for all this, he had laid the foundation, n. 40. out of Fulvius Ursinus's observations of the Romans accubitus, not only liberos suos, aut quos caros habebant in conviviis infra se, i. e. in sinu collocasse, but also Regem sacrorum, qui apud Romanos maximæ dignationis erat inter Pontifices, summum locum in pontificalibus cœnis occupare solitum, neminemque supra eum accubare: And applying that to Christ, and expressly adding, that as there [were] five lying in each of the other Tables, so there were but three in that where Christ was, he and John and Peter; which sure gave that dignity to John. But as for the birth-right and inheritance, &c. which I suppose must import some real priviledge, such as Reubens birth-right was, Gen. 49. 3. the excellency of dignity, and the excellency of power, that is an addition of S. W. his own fertile fancy, and was never dreamt of, or pretended by me (or I think any man living) to belong to that beloved Disciple. I affirmed, in passing, that John had Christs favour, and the dignity of place before all others, and so visibly he had; and that was all I thought of, till by S. W. his jealousies this was converted into birth-right and inheritance.

Luc. 22. * 9.

12. 3. He will perswade himself, that the words of Chrysostom (which I had produced) ἔθνος ὁλόκληρον τὸ τ' Ασίας ἦν ἐμπεπιστευμένος, a whole intire nation that of Asia was intrusted to him, destroys all that I had said of S. Johns Jewish Province in the Lydian Asia; and then, great rejoycing there is for this εὕρηκα, and no less than unpardonable blindness is become my portion. But what pity it was, that the blindness should be on S. W. his side, after all this? For to omit that he that is there spoken of, is S. Timothy (which a seeing person might have discerned from S. Paul, when in the line before he had read, by him S. Timothy constituted Bishop there) the answer is obvious, that ὁλόκληρον ἔθνος, a whole intire nation in that place of S. Chrysostom, is not set to denote all the several sorts of cœtus in Asia, but only in opposition to the word ἐκκλησία precedent, some one particular Church of one City and Territory, viz. that of Ephesus. There Paul saith, he had left him Bishop, 1 Tim. 1. 3. and so the Author of the Martyrdom of Timothy, ὁ Ἀπόστολος Τιμόθεος ὑπὸ τῆς μεγάλης Παύλου χειροτονεῖται τ' Ἐφεσίων μητροπόλεως ἐπίσκοπος, he was by S. Paul ordained Bishop of the Metropolis of Ephesus: And this being the chief Metropolis of all Asia, S. Chrysostom stiles him Bishop of the whole nation. In Asia we know there were many Churches, of which Ephesus was the prime; and therefore having said, δῆλον ὅτι ἐκκλησίαν λοιπὸν ἦν ἐμπεπιστευμένος ὁ Τιμόθεος, 'Tis manifest Timothy was intrusted with a Church, he adds (by way of ἐπανόρθωσις) ἢ μᾶλλον ἔθνος ὁλόκληρον, or rather a whole nation, τὸ τ' Ασίας, that of Asia, which depended (all of it) on this chief Metropolitical See. By this interpretation 'tis evident, that what the other Church writers say of John (and hath in it as clear truth) is soon reconciled with this, viz. that he being returned to Asia, τὰς αὐτόθι διέπειν ἐκκλησίας, administred the Churches there, viz. those of the Jewish converts, the portion to which by agreement with Saul, he was to betake himself, and τ' Ἐφεσίων ἀντιλαμβάνεται μητροπόλεως, undertook the care of the Metropolis of the Ephesians, which in this other respect, had, before this, been intrusted to Timothy, from whom therefore, as from their first Bishop, the succeeding reckon themselves, as appears in the Council of Chalcedon, Acts 2. ἀπὸ τῆς ἁγίας Τιμοθέου μέχρι νῦν κζ' ἐπίσκοποι ἐγένοντο, from S. Timothy till now, there have been 27. Bishops ordained in Ephesus.

13. This being thus clear, was yet to be writhed by S. W. to another sence, that he might by that means have some opportunity to divert and wave the force of the instance, which consisted in this, that those Churches of Asia being wholly planted, and administred by other Apostles, S. Peter could not with any colour be pretended to be supream Pastor of them. And this is equally true, whether it were S. Paul or S. John, that had the managing of them. So little care hath S. W. to consider that, wherein the difficulty consists.

14. What follows Sect. 12. as if the mention of the early fame of the seven Churches of Asia, and of Christs letter to them, Rev. 2. were designed by me to contain a double proof of Peters not having the Pastorship over them, 1. Because Christ wrote an Epistle to those Churches, 2. Because they were early famous] is a sign that S. W. hath an excellent faculty in answering reasons of his own imagining; for 'tis certain I never used them as reasons, or proofs of any, much less of that conclusion. All that I designed was to mention these, as considerable parts of the Universal Church, desiring any Romanist to tell me, what can be said in any degree probably for S. Peters Pastorship over them, for whom there is not the least pretence, that he should be said ποιμαίνειν, to feed, or govern, or so much as to have medled with the administration of these Churches of Asia.

15. That the Gentile part was by S. Pauls own single power intrusted to Timothy, is there manifested, and here is confest by S. W. And for the administring it, that S. Paul personally gave him full instructions, leaving no other appeal or place of application for other directions, save only to himself, when he shall come unto him, I thought it was conclusible from his words, 1 Tim. 3. 14, 15. the words are these: These things I write unto thee, hoping to come unto thee shortly; but if I make any stay, that thou mayst know how thou oughtest to behave thy self in the Church of God. Upon this citation, very tragical tempests are raised, and to this hour I cannot discern what it was that conjured them up. That I infer'd this whole conclusion from the word [come] is one of his arts, to divert and amuse the Reader; I thought my grounds had been visible enough, being thus laid. The [ταῦτα, these things] which S. Paul now wrote to him, were a whole Epistle of Instructions; that it was no longer, was because he hoped to come to him shortly, when he might give him farther instructions, if there were need. In the mean, these told him, how he ſhould behave himſelf in the Church, diſcharge his Epiſcopal office; and the end of writing it was, that he might know this: Thus much is explicitly contained in thoſe Verſes. I now demand (and that is all that I then did, as will be ſeen in the place, §. 16.) whether S. Paul left any other appeal, or place for farther directions, ſave only to himſelf, when he ſhould come to him? Or whether any other Apoſtle could, by any power given him by Chriſt, countermand, or interpoſe in them? If any could, let him be named, and the power ſpecified, and proved, by vertue whereof he ſhould thus act: But S.W. after all his * acts of diverſion, dares not, I am ſure doth not, affirm this. And if it cannot be ſaid (as no doubt it cannot) then where was St. Peters ſupreme paſtorſhip over St. Paul or St. John, or (under the former) over S. Timothy in the Churches of Aſia? * arts.

As for the miſunderſtanding of the queſtion, which next he is willing to charge on me, certainly I ſhall not be found guilty of it, but he viſibly of miſunderſtanding my proceſs. I ſpeak not of any Apoſtolical commiſſion over the whole world (of which he pretends me to ſpeak, and will yield it to every Apoſtle) but of the peculiar power that Timothy had by S. Pauls commiſſion in Aſia, and Titus in Crete, under no other ſuperior juriſdiction, but of Chriſt and S. Paul; and if that be granted, as S.W. diſputes it not, I am ſure it will prejudge S. Peters primacy over (and therefore for once S.W. was concerned to be civil, and to ſet it only amongſt) the reſt of the Apoſtles. 16.

The two remaining ſuggeſtions of this 12*th. Sect.* 1. concerning S. Peters preaching to Jews in England; 2. concerning Eccleſia Gentium in S. Proſper; were gleaned from the Catholick Gentleman, and ſatisfied in the Reply, c. 4. §. 7. n. 9, 10. And ſo much for that Section. 17.

Evidences againſt an Affirmation, by ſolving of teſtimonies. The reaſon of omitting to inſiſt on Joh. 21. 15, 16, 17. Mr. Hart's confeſſion. The Romaniſts encloſing the Keys to S. Peter. S. Foundation ſtones.* Θεμέλιοι δώδεκα. The meaſuring of the Wall, Apoc. 21. The Jaſper ſtone.

THis 13. §. reflects on my view of the donation of the Keys, and that being touched on by the Cath. Gent. received its due anſwer in the Reply, c. 4. §. 8, 9, 10, 11. yet ſome few paſſages may expect here to be taken notice of, which were not there tendred, and ſo came not under conſideration. As when firſt he ſpends a page on the importance of the word evidence, I anſwer, I take it in the familiar vulgar notion, for a teſtimony to prove any queſtion of fact, either in the affirmation, or the negative, and ſuch was this, whether S. Peter were by Chriſt conſtituted Univerſal Paſtor: And the one poſſible way to teſtifie this (as any other) negative, is to take a view of the places, wherein he is by the affirmers pretended to be thus conſtituted, and to ſhew that thoſe places have no ſuch force in them. That they have ſuch force, is incumbent on the Defendant to ſhew, at leaſt to point at the particular word, or paſſage, which hath the ſuppoſed energie in it: And till that be done, he that undertakes the Negative, can only pitch upon thoſe places and ſpecialties, which he ſees the learneſt affirmers moſt inſiſt on, ſuppoſing it reaſonable to conclude, that thoſe are their moſt important evidences. 1.

By this it appears how far I was from prevaricating againſt my promiſe of evidences, when I went about to prove my negative, by ſolving the Romaniſts teſtimonies for the affirmative, which I acknowledge with him to have been my method, and I ſuppoſe no man can by any laws of diſcourſe oblige, or direct me to any other. 'Tis true (what he ſuggeſts) that he that undertakes to evidence, ſuſtains the part of the Opponent. But that he may do, while he oppoſeth the affirmations (as well as negations) of other men, and that he muſt do by invalidating their teſtimonies, on which they found or defend their affirmations; and if he can do ſo, why may not theſe be ſtiled evidences on his ſide, i. e. teſtimonies, to evince the reaſonableneſs of his negation? as when by any examination of a witneſs produced againſt me, I demonſtrate the invalidity of his teſtimonies. 2.

Secondly, When upon my omitting to inſiſt on the words of Joh. 21. 15, 16, 17. I am charged with a palpable injuriouſneſs, that in anſwering their teſtimonies out of Scripture, I omit the chiefeſt, the ſtrongeſt, and moſt important place of all] This is juſt as Dr. Stapleton deals with Mr. Calvin, Princip. Doctrin. l. 6. c. 8. when among the Romaniſts arguments from Scripture, he had made no mention of Luk. 22. 31. the Doctor ſaith it was becauſe he well knew, nullo cavillationis fuco tam manifeſta verba eludi potuiſſe, that this was the unavoidable convincing Text, juſt on the ſame ſcore, on which this muſt now go for the moſt important place, becauſe it was not mention'd. 3.

But for this, my reaſon was by me with perfect truth rendred, p. 93. from my full perſwaſion, that it had ſo very little appearance of ſtrength in it, and had been ſo often anſwer'd, that it would not be deemed uſeful to any, that I ſhould deſcend to it. That herein I have done the Romaniſt no injury, I have already given ſome account in the Reply, §. 8. n. 10, &c. and cannot farther ſeaſonably attempt it, till I am told, what yet I am perfectly ignorant of, wherein the pretended ſtrength lies of this moſt important place, and whether there be any farther reſerve of force in it, which Mr. Hart in the conference with Dr. Reynolds, fortified with all Dr. Stapletons armory, did not take notice of. If there be not any ſuch, yet inviſible reſerve, I muſt then remember the iſſue that it was brought to, in that conference, as we have it under both the Diſputers hands, Mr. Harts laſt Reply on this Text, being in theſe words, p. 102. This which you have ſaid might ſeem to be ſomewhat, toward the looſing of them (the knots of Dr. Stapleton's finding out) if the Scripture gave not clear evidence for the proof of his ſupremacy as well elſewhere as here, namely Luk. 22. 31. Out of which hold alſo being ſoon beaten, by evidence, 4.

that no more was there said to Peter, than Christ performs to every child of God, he concludes, p. 109. I cannot deny but that in some respect it may be truly said to all the children of God, if they fall as Peter did. Yet (I know not how) methinks I cannot be perswaded but that it maketh somewhat for Peters supremacy.

5. Thirdly, When he accuseth me of manifest calumniating, in saying that the Romanist pretends the donation of the Keys as a peculiarity and incloſure of S. Peter] To this I have answered already, Reply, Cap. 4. §. 9. And yet a little farther I shall now desire the Readers judgment of it, whether I have calumniated the Romanist, supposing S. W. to be that Romanist, whose pretensions in that manner are * set down gradatim, thus, 1. That something was said to Peter in particular, and by name; which was not said to any other Apostle particularly, and by name; That is his first step. 2. That since this saying was a promise, a promise of something was made to S. Peter in particular; That is his second step. 3. And by way of conclusion from hence, with a [wherefore] that seeing this thing promised was the giving of the Keys of Heaven, it follows that the promise of giving the keys of heaven was made to S. Peter in particular. In this process it is clear, 1. That the promise of the keys is by S. W. affirmed to be made in particular and by name to S. Peter; and 2. that saying or making a promise in particular and by name, is in his sence, so to make it to one particular, viz. to Peter, as not to any other Apostle; and what is that, but to affirm it a peculiarity, and incloſure of S. Peters? If here he fly back to his refuge of [particularly and by name] and say that he affirms no more, but that this promise was not made to the other Apostles in particular and by name, then 1. he gain'd nothing at all to S. Peter by that process; for as long as that which was given to S. Peter by name, were without naming every of them particularly, given to them all, so that each of them had it, then this will never be able to found S. Peter's supremacy over them.

* P. 90, 91.

6. But then 2. before he can thus escape, he will find himself intangled again; for in the words presently following, he thinks it most consonant to reason, and worthy our Saviour, to perform his promise according to the tenor and manner in which he promised, and that by a performance in particular (which therefore he calls his best and surest testimony, Joh. 21.) and I who produce a performance to them all in general, am rebuked for omitting that performance in particular, and in stead of it, producing only a performance to them all in general. Here I demand, am I rebuked for omitting something, or not? if for omitting something, then that performance in particular to Peter was something, which was not comprehended in that performance to them all in general (for if it were there comprehended, then I that am acknowledged to have produced that, cannot be said to have omitted this) and if it were so, then it was peculiar to him, and so his incloſure: and if the performance were so, then the promise was so too, by the foregoing confession of S. W. which will have the performance made according to the tenor of the promise. And so here is as much affirmed by S. W. (and by and by we shall have it more expresly repeated again) as that amounts to, which I suppose to be asserted by the Romanist; and that I hope will secure me from being like S. W. in calumniating him, with whom I came to dispute.

7. To conclude, was there, or was there not any thing here promised Peter, which was not promised the rest? If there was, then 1. that was S. Peters incloſure, and 2. that is contained in the promise of the keys, for that and the consequents thereof, power of binding and loosing, is all that is there promised him. And then 'tis vain to say you are calumniated, because you allow the power of binding to all the Apostles, for if you do, as indeed you do, and must, you must either shew somewhat else to be promised in those words, which mention nothing else, or else you must be forced to confeſs that either there was nothing promised the rest of the Apostles, or that you will still affirm something to have been promised him, which was not promised him.

8. In this place it is not amiss to note, that at the beginning of this his 13*th. Sect.* I am said to affirm that no power of the keys was given especially to S. Peter, and yet the Cath. Gent. (S. W. his very good friend, who might have saved him the labour of this, as he calls it, his larger confute) saith, that I confeſs the keys were especially promised to Peter. The truth is, I never said one or other, and if I had said one, I must needs not have said the other, and yet by these two Romanists, or (as seems to me most probable) two appearances of the same Romanist, I am said to say both. What trust shall be given to such disputers? I say, the power was given in common and equally to all the Apostles, and once mention the making the promise to him peculiarly, but that only as a colour, that the Romanist makes some use of, and reply to it, that in the repetition it is given to all, without any peculiarity of restriction, and that the applying, or addressing the words particularly to Peter, had a special energie in them, noting that the œconomy in Christs houshold belongs to single persons, the Bishop in each City, and not only to the Colledge or Consistory. But still nothing of all this, is to the giving the keys either specially or not specially to S. Peter.

9. What follows from Joh. 21. 15, 16. where, saith he, 'tis expresly recommended and incharged on S. Peter particularly and by name, once, twice, and thrice, with as many repetitions of his name particularizing him over and over, Feed my lambs, feed my sheep, feed my sheep, and asking him, Amas me plus his?] is a strange way of arguing, and yet gives us a view of the utmost that S. W. can attempt in this cause of S. Peters universal Pastorship: For when indeed that is the great foundation, on which the whole dispute of our schism depends, and when, as S. W. assures us, the place of Joh. 21. 15, 16. is their chiefest, and strongest, and most important place of all, and as it is evident by his arguing; the other place of [I will give thee the keys, Mat. 16. 19.] must receive all its force from the comparing it with this, and the consonancy betwixt the promise, and this (as he will fansie it) performance. Yet after all this, all that he can pretend to from hence, is but a recommending and incharging of him, Feed my sheep--- together with a question, whether he love him more than the rest of the Apostles? which what is it, but an exhortation to perform that duty, to which he was before commissionated, Joh. 20. 21. and with him all the rest of the Apostles equally. For as to the other circumstances of expresness, particularizing him by name, frequent repeating of it, asking him whether he love him more than these] one or all of them, they can never work a change in the matter. Christ praying the same prayer thrice, did not make it cease to be a prayer, and commence a precept; No more will an inculcated, expres, particularized (be it never so vehement an) exhortation, introduced with a question, to quicken, and impress it, be converted converted by theſe accumulations, into a commiſſion for ſupremacy; eſpecially when the cauſes, which viſibly ſuggeſted to our Saviour this manner of queſtioning, and preſſing his exhortation, were more juſtly matter of humiliation, than of exaltation to S. Peter, (and ſo were received, and interpreted by him, Peter was grieved becauſe Chriſt ſaid to him the third time, Loveſt thou me? ver. 17. and no doubt, deemed it a reproach of his thrice denying his Maſter) a remembring him of the foulneſs of his fall, but not the inſtating any principality or dignity upon him. But of this I have alſo ſpoken diſtinctly, Reply, c. 4. §. 8.

Beſides this force of the words, S. W. is willing to call in the interpretation of the Catholick Church 10.
according to her never erring rule of faith, and that gives him and his friends an infallible certainty that theſe and (he only ſaith it) ſome other teſtimonies from Scripture expreſs a primacy in S. Peter] But here he neither produces any one interpretation of either Fathers, or Councils, or any ſingle Writer, thereby to ſignifie what he means by the Catholick Church, or what is the way of interpretation, that muſt induce this. It is therefore left to his Reader to conjecture his meaning, viz. that the preſent Roman Church is the Catholick, that the interpretations of this, are the never erring rule of Faith, that this hath interpreted this, and ſome other Texts to ſignifie a Primacy not only of order but of power, an univerſality of juriſdiction, to belong to Saint Peter, over all the Apoſtles, and that this gives him, and all that are of his perſwaſion in all things (particularly in the belief of the Infallibility of the Roman Church) an infallible certainty of the truth of it. And this ſure would equally have done it, if our Saviour had never asked St. Peter three times, Loveſt thou me more than theſe----- And ſo all that I can conclude from hence is but this, that S. Peters univerſal paſtorſhip is as perfect a truth, as the Infallibility of the Roman Church; but withal, that it is to as little purpoſe to diſpute of that, or any ſubject, till the other be either reſolved, or ſet aſide, as it is to inquire, whether he ſay true that cannot lye. And therefore I ſhall thus take my leave of my inchanted adverſary.

What follows p. 93. by way of new attempt, and deduction from my words, when I mention the ap- 11.
plying the words particularly to S. Peter] is a very ſubtile reaſoning. By the applying the promiſe of the keys particularly to Peter, he will have it follow, 1. That our Saviour told Peter in the ſingular, and in a ſingular manner, that he ſhould be Steward of his houſe; and then ſeeing all particularizing is a kind of exception from an univerſality, and that univerſality is the other Apoſtles, it muſt follow (ſaith he) that St. Peter was particularized out of that community for the office of Steward in Chriſts houſe. And if he were ſo, ſay I, then here the particularity and incloſure of the keys to St. Peter, is affirmed by S. W. (which was a while ago ſuch a ſlander of my Pen againſt their Church) for ſure ſo 'twas, if Peter by this Donation was particularized out of the Community, for the office of the Steward (of which he after tells us there was none but he) in Chriſts houſe.

But letting that paſs, I ſhall attend to his reaſoning, and though very fine, without much ado, 12.
this Fabrick will ſoon be demoliſhed. The ſpeech (I yield) is addreſt to Peter in the ſingular, but that is a token only, that Peter, as a ſingle perſon, ſhould have power, but not either that no others ſhould have it too (or that when they had it, not ſingle perſons, but only Communities ſhould be inveſted with it) or that the manner, in which Peter ſhould have it, ſhould be ſingular to him, and ſo, as it was not to each of them. The particularity gives him particularly the power, but excludes not others from the ſame power, and the ſame degree of power, to whom it was at any other time promiſed, or given, and ſo it was to all and every of the Apoſtles, Mat. 18. John 20. And though the office of Steward be a particular office, yet in every particular houſe there may be one ſuch Steward, and every whether National, or Provincial, or Dioceſan Church, is ſuch an houſe, and not only the one Catholick Church that comprehends them. If it were otherwiſe, that power which Chriſt had in one perſon by Commiſſion from his Father, he could never have delegated to the plural Diſciples, as 'tis viſible he did, John 20. or elſe that muſt not be the Stewards office, as it is viſible alſo that it is, by comparing Mat. 18. with Mat. 16. where the binding and looſing is an effect of the keys, and thoſe the Stewards enſign of office: And by 1 Cor. 4. 1, 2. where the Apoſtolical office is ſo deſcribed, which conſequently inſtates every one in this Stewards office, as well as the Text, Mat. 16. doth S. Peter.

What is next ſaid of the keys, the badge of the function, that they are not read of to be given to any 13.
but S. Peter] is of the ſame complexion with the former Combatants. 'Tis ſure the badge and the power go together, and if they did not, 'tis the power and the Commiſſion for that, which alone is conſiderable in this matter, and that is apparently and expreſly given to all the Apoſtles, Mat. 18. and John 20. and for any more it matters little. The Commiſſion being cleared, either ſuppoſes the implicite donation of the badge, or elſe ſtands in no need of it.

But then 2. it is yet farther evident, that there were no material keys given to S. Peter himſelf, 14.
and thoſe only can be called a badge (ſpiritual, inviſible keys are not capable of being ſuch) and Chriſts commiſſion and the power accompanying it, are the ſpiritual keys, which he that hath, may open and ſhut the kingdom of heaven; and thoſe every Apoſtle had as well as S. Peter.

His third argument from the Apoſtles, being part of Chriſts houſe, whence he infers S. Peter Stew- 15.
ard over them, is anſwered moſt briefly by retortion, that if there be any force in it, then it will equally hold thus: S. Peter was a part of Chriſts houſe, and therefore Paul that was a Steward in Chriſts houſe, and is expreſly ſo called, 1 Cor. 4. 1, 2. was Steward over S. Peter.

What follows in this matter, introduced by Fourthly and laſtly, is only his expreſſion of diſlike to 16.
an argument of mine concerning Presbytery, and ſo is not pertinent to the queſtion before us, and beſides it hath not, I ſuppoſe, any ſhew of the leaſt difficulty in it.

As for the next paſſage on the ſame foundation, pag. 96. wherein I am ſaid to affirm moſt ſhameleſly, 17.
and moſt expreſly againſt Scripture alledged by my ſelf, that this power was as diſtinctly promiſed, Mat. 18. 18. to each ſingle Apoſtle as to S. Peter.] I leave it to the Reader to judge, whether it be calumny or no, by this ſyllogiſm; That which was promiſed to all the Apoſtles, as to twelve ſingle perſons, each ſingly to have and exerciſe it, and not all together in common, was as diſtinctly promiſed to each ſingle Apoſtle, as it was promiſed to S. Peter (I ſpeak not now of its being promiſed particularly by name, nor were any ſuch words found in this part of my former treatiſe; that is willingly allowed to S. Peter, and the full importance of it before considered) but the power of binding and loosing, was Mat. 18. promised to all the Apostles, as to twelve single persons, each singly to have, and exercise it, and not altogether in common, Ergo. The major is cleared by this, because the distinctness and particularity of the promise to S. Peter devolved no more on him, but this, that he should singly have and exercise that power, and not only in common, or in consistory with other Apostles. If it be said that it devolved any more, I desire it may be said what it was, and how it appears to be by these words devolved on him, and whatsoever it be feigned to be, if it be less than a supremacy over all the Apostles, it will be nothing to the purpose; and that 'tis sure it was not, because the supremacy is not competible to two, whether persons, or communities, and yet this power promised S. Peter, is acknowledged by S. W. to be also made to all the Apostles in common and in general, Mat. 18. 18. though not distinctly to each of them. The minor is in part confest by S. W. so far as that this power was promised to all the Apostles; and for the other parts, 'tis evidently proved in that Treatise out of S. Cyprian, Theophylact, and others, and is the interest of S. W. as well as of us, to maintain against the Presbyterians, who alone can gain by the questioning of it.

18. That about the meaning of the twelve thrones, was considered in the Reply, Cap. 4. Sect. 10. and there the sense which S. W. never heard of, vouched from Saint Augustine, to whom I may also add Hilarius Pictaviensis, and the Author imperfecti Operis. As for the words, that either judging should signifie ruling, or presiding, as Governors preside, or that θρόνος should signifie the Episcopal chair, 'twill be no news to any Man, that hath observed the use of words, either the most critically, or the most slightly, whatsoever S W. would make shew of believing to the contrary.

19. In the next place, the dumb negative (as he calls it) is by him mutilated, or else it would speak articulately enough, to all that I call'd it out to testifie. It is in the descent of the Spirit, Acts 2. the fires being divided, and sitting on every one of them. This fire represented the Holy Ghost, that Holy Ghost sealed that Commission to those on whom it fell, which Christ had promised to S. Peter, Mat. 16. and to all the Apostles, Mat. 18. Now this fire was divided, and ἐκάθισε ἐφ' ἕνα ἕκαστον αὐτῶν, on each, and every one of them, Acts 2. 3. And this I suppose an argument of some validity, that the promise being thus sealed distinctly to every one of them, was meant (in the making of it) distinctly to every one of them. And when I add, that there was no peculiar mark allowed S. Peter, though that be a negative argument, and therefore I meant not from that alone to conclude any thing, yet I hope by being annext to the affirmative probation precedent, it will not be a gagg to make that dumb and negative also.

20. But in this paragraph here is offered a very doubty proof to evidence on S. Peter's behalf (what I know not, for that is not expresst, but left doubtfully betwixt his being head of the Apostles, and his having some peculiar mark allowed him in the descent of the Holy Ghost, yet one I suppose designed to infer and conclude the other.) 1. Saith he, the Doctor was not there to see, and there is no history that expresses the contrary. It seems a Negative in S. W. his mouth is perfectly vocal, though it be but dumb in another Man's. 2. Saith he, If we may judge by exterior actions, and may believe that out of the abundance of the heart the tongue speaks, then perhaps the Doctor may receive some satisfaction in this point also, that S. Peter had in a more peculiar manner the Holy Ghost; for it was he that first burst out into that heavenly Sermon which converted three thousand. Here was one honest word, the [perhaps] But even this will fail, for granting the two postulata, that we may judge (probably at least) by exterior actions, and that our Saviour said perfect truth, when he said, Out of the abundance of the heart------ Yet the Doctor may not be satisfied from thence, or from S. Peters first bursting out, making the first, though so powerful Sermon, that he had received the Holy Ghost in a more peculiar manner, or was designed head of the Apostles. I shall answer it no farther than by repeating it, hoping that my silence will not again have such efficacy in it (if it have, dumb Negatives may hereafter deserve some consideration) as to render this also a strongest and most important place for the Romanists pretensions.

21. What is next represented (according to S. W. his meaning) as my fourth argument, viz. That they were all filled with the Holy Ghost, is sure no distinct argument of mine, but only a part of that Text before cited, where the fire sate on every of them, and this is a consequent of that, they were all filled with the Holy Ghost. And that this thus set, was an argument of some validity, hath already appeared. As for the possibility, that they which were all full of the Holy Ghost, might yet have it unequally, I am not concerned to doubt, if by [unequally] be meant the inequality of divine indowments. But though of these there is no certain ground of affirming, which of all the Apostles had the highest degree, Saint John excelling in some graces, Saint Peter in others, and Saint Paul that came after, having as rich a proportion as either, for ought we can discern, and labouring more abundantly than they all, yet not he, but this grace of God's spirit in him: Yet our question being only of power or Commission to authority, and dignity in the Church, and every one having that sealed to him by the Holy Ghosts descent upon every one, there is no remaining difficulty in this matter.

22. The testimonies which I * brought out of the Ancients to prove that there was no more promised to S. Peter, Mat. 16. than was promised, Mat. 18. and actually given, John 20. to all and every of the Apostles, are lookt on by S. W. as pretendings, that the Romanists build not the Church upon Bishops in the plural, nor allow any authority to them, but to the Pope only; and this, made a piece either of pitiful ignorance, or malicious calumny. But 'tis apparent they did not inject the least suspicion of that. What they were designed to infer, was clear by the matter of the testimonies, that though the words, Mat. 16. were spoken particularly to Peter, yet the intire power there spoken of, was promised and given to all the Apostles; that from that donation it is, that all Episcopal Power, which is in the Church, flowes; that in S. Peter's receiving the Keys, all Bishops received them; which is an evidence that either he received more than was comprehended in the Keys (which he cannot do by those words) or else he received no more than all other Bishops receive from the rest of the Apostles. And then how can his supremacy be founded in these words?

* Tr. of Schism, p. 89. p. 98.

23. In this paragraph he hath given us a very rare specimen of his reasoning; for not contenting himself to have said, that the testimonies of Bishops in the plural, touch not the Romanists, there being no word in them excluding the Pope, He adds, Nay rather they make for them: How fair they bid to excluding cluding the Pope, supposing that title to signifie not a Bishop only, but a supreme universal Pastor, hath been shewed already. Let us now observe how he proves this [Nay rather they make for us] for that will be a matter of some moment, if performed successfully. His way of inferring this his advantage, is, For the Churches being founded in Apostles, and Bishops, prejudices not S. Peter to be the chiefest; and if so, then the Church is built most chiefly and especially upon Saint Peter, which is all we Catholicks say.] Where not to dispute what is meant by S. Peter being the chiefest, whether no more than appears to be meant by the πρῶτος Σίμων, which he knows we willingly grant him, without imagining any supremacy of Authority over the rest of the Apostles, instated in him; All that I desire to observe, is the manner of his arguing, thus, If it prejudices not S. Peter to be the chiefest, then the Church is built most chiefly upon him: from those testimonies not prejudicing, presently assuming that it is true, as if saying nothing to hurt it (by not saying any thing to it) were a clear evidence on its side; and then the first Verse of S. Matthew infers it also, for I acknowledge that prejudices it not; and then S. W. may set up for immortal disputer, having as many reserves of such arguments still behind, as there are periods in the Scriptures, or Fathers which speak of other matters; for of each of them 'tis acknowledged, that they prejudice not St. Peters being the chiefest. Sure S. W. when he was so displeased with the dumb negative, foresaw not he should need to call in such Auxiliaries as these.

My answer to the Text of Tu es Petrus, is after his constant manner deformed by him, yet can- 24.
not miss to have this discernible efficacy in it, that there being no more meant by it, than that Peter was a foundation-stone, and all the Apostles being such as well as he, this cannot constitute him in any superiority over them, CHRIST only being the ἀκρογωνιαῖος, chief corner-stone, and no other place in the Foundation giving any ὑπεροχὴ of power to one Foundation-stone above another. This might be soon manifested, if it were needful, by the known position of Foundation-stones, one by, not on the top of another: And if S Peter were supposed to be the first, (as page 103. he saith the Dr. will not deny) and so next the chief corner-stone, and by that Superior to all the rest, then it must likewise follow, that that stone which was placed next to the stone that represented S. Peter, or in the next place of honour, next CHRIST on the other hand, must be also Superiour to all the rest, and the same rules of subordination hold on, through all the rest, which I suppose will not be S. W. his interest to affirm, and then I can foresee nothing that will incline him to that way.

Somewhat hath been added on this head in the Reply, Sect. 11. It remains only that I gather up 25.
some special objections of his against what I have said in the Tract of Schism of this matter, which were not tendred by the Cath. Gent.

And first, saith he, the argument is only negative, that no distinction is put (betwixt the Founda- 26.
tion-stones in Scripture) therefore there was none. I answer, the argument is this, Simon is by Christ called Πέτρος, a foundation-stone in the building of the Church, and the same title is, in another word, given every of the Apostles, when they are called δεμέλιοι δώδεκα twelve foundations; from whence my conclusion (and not my proof) is negative: Therefore the words Tu es Petrus, neither give, nor affirm more of him, than is given and affirmed of every of the other Apostles.

Next, saith he, it is a most pitiful piece of reason to perswade the Reader from only a plurality, and na- 27.
ming twelve Apostles, that all were equal. But this was not my reasoning, but that the rest of the Apostles were foundation-stones as well as Simon, and therefore that that title of Tu es Petrus was no proof of inequality.

Thirdly, The Doctor, saith he, hath quite overthrown his own cause, since granting a foundation-stone, 28.
and Πέτρος being the same, and only St. Peter having the name of Πέτρος, it follows on the Doctor's grounds that he only, and he more particularly should be a foundation-stone. This would be a strange syllogism, if it were put into form; but I shall not trouble my self with that; only when it is as certain that Πέτρος and δεμέλιος is the same, sure they that are every one of them δεμέλιοι, shall be, as far as this argument can conclude, as much and as particularly foundation-stones, as he that was called Πέτρος; so far from being inferr'd is his [only St. Peter] or [St. Peter more particularly.] 'Tis as if I should say, man and Enosh being the same, and only the son of Seth having the name of Enosh, it follows on these grounds, that he only, and in good reason that he more particularly should be a man. I suppose to this proposal of objection against S. W. his being a man, he would find out some answer or other to defend himself; perhaps this, that Isch and Enosh are the same, and S. W. is an Isch, and therefore as well and as particularly a man, as the son of Seth can be deemed to be; and then he hath no further need to be shewed the way to make answer to this argument.

But then fourthly, he must have it noted, that the Doctor will have all the Apostles called Peter.] 29.
And now I have helpt him to another quarrel with the Doctor as just as that, viz. that the Doctor will have every man call'd Enosh: But I answer, I shall not importune him, that all the Apostles may be called Peter (and therefore the eleventh dish in the bill of fare, was but a brick-bat put in paste, and meant only to fill up room at the table) δεμέλιος and Πέτρος are all one, and that will serve my turn as well, and therefore I content my self with the Scripture style, that the Apostles were twelve δεμέλιοι, and not twelve Peters.

The confirmation of the observations concerning Tu es Petrus, from the measuring of the wall 30. in the Apocalypse, is made matter of much game to S. W. But a little seriousness (in such matters very decent) would have taught him, that the analogie of some obscure things in vision, with some most plain, may render some parts of visions intelligible; and then what more obvious than this, that the wall being built upon the foundation, and so commensurate with it, and the foundation being distinctly made up of twelve stones, and the names of the twelve Apostles expresly interpreting each of them to be the so many Apostles, and the wall also being divided into twelve equal parts, the several portions whether of Province, of which the Church is made up, or else of power, with which the Apostles were invested, should be thought to be meant by them, and so this representative mensuration be exactly significative of that, which other plain Scriptures had given grounds of believing, and Tu es Petrus had offered nothing to the contrary, viz. the equality of the power given by Christ to all the Apostles. As for S. W. his subtile fetch from the quality and lustre of the first of the twelve Stones in that vision, the Jasper, I can allow him to make his advantage of it, to that which it is most proper to signifie, the lustre, of zeal and other gifts; and if he can find any means to assure himself, 1. That S. Peter was signified by that Jasper Stone, 2. That the lustre of that, exceeded the lustre of every of the other Stones, I shall very willingly grant him his conclusion, knowing that as the greatest Potentates are not always the most zealous persons in their Kingdoms, so Dominion is not founded in such graces, but only in the Constitutions and Commissions of Christ, which mediately or immediately bestows all supremacies on all that are duly possessed of them.

31. And so much for this large 13*th. Section* (which I have attended on precisely, and κατὰ πόδα, as being most important to our business in hand, the case of our Schism fundamentally depending on the supremacy of S. Peter) and consequently of his first part.

CHAP. IV.

A Survey of the Second Part of Schism Disarm'd.

SECT. I.

S. W. his one Evidence, Possession in the belief of Infallibility, Examined, in the general result, and the Special branches of it.

1. BEing now to enter on this second part of my Disarmers dexterities, I meet with one in the front, which if thought on timely, and well husbanded, might have superseded, and saved him the expence of all the rest both foregoing and subsequent, the one Evidence that he pretends to for his whole tenure, their Churches long and quietly enjoyed possession of the belief of Infallibility. Possideo saith he, quia possideo, olim possideo, prior possideo, is all the evidence and all the reason she is bound to give to her Rebel Sons or outlawed Subjects] p. 106.

2. This indeed might make short work, decide and conclude Controversies, sixty an hour for an Age together, if there were but this one thing granted, that the guilty were not only innocent but infallibly and unavoidably such, or that S. W. might be credited, when he affirms it.

3. By this we see, to what purpose it had been for me to have reformed upon his admonitions (concerning my omitting his strongest and most important place of Pasce Oves-----) when if I had let loose upon his direction, and refuted all Dr. Stapletons, and other Romanists pretensions from those words, I had been still as far as ever, from moving this rock: for when all other pleas fail, he is still as safe as the clearest Deeds could make him; he hath an inchanted Castle to retire to, their Churches Infallibility; and if any Man will question that, it matters not; the belief of Infallibility will serve turn; and if still you will be importunate, and demand some reason to found such belief, and that for the satisfaction of the weak (who would really give all the goods in the world, that they might be assured of the truth of it, but cannot arrive to such heights of believing, without, and against all grounds of believing) why then, in stead of satisfying those demands of frail fallible reason, here is the great Ἑλέπολις, the engine of battery, that will subdue in a moment all the intellectual fortresses, the long and quietly enjoyed possession of this belief, and so by these degrees S. W. his grand indenture is perfected, and all his evidence and reason summed up in this Breviate, Possideo quia possideo: Our Church is schismatical: why? because the Pope is universal Pastor, and we are divided from him. How doth he appear to be so? Why, the Church (that must be the Roman Church) affirms it, which is Infallible: But how is she evidenced to be Infallible? why, she believes she is so. I beseech him, upon what grounds doth she believe so? why, she hath possession of this belief. But a thief may possess that which he should not possess, and one may ask (with a desire to learn) how came she by this possession? Why she hath long and quietly enjoyed it: And if you further insist, and be so ill-natured, as to ask one question more, you are to know, You are Rebel Sons and outlawed Subjects, and this is all the reason S. W. in her name, is bound to give you, and (as he goes on) 'Tis your part, to evidence; hers, to hold and possess her own, (Poor Protestants are bound to dispute and demonstrate, to grind in the mill, or digg in the quarry; 'tis enough for them to possess the belief of Infallibility) till you sufficiently i. e. demonstrably evidence her title to be unjust.] One would think the very reciting of this arguing were sufficient reply to it.

4. And yet if after all this, it be remembred, either what title it is, that we are to prove to be unjust, or what kind of possession it is, that is maintained by this title, the arguing will yet appear more admirable. 1. 'Tis evident there is no title (properly so called) so much as pretended; Possession, long quietly enjoyed, is all that is tendred; and I hope possession, be it never so long and quiet, is no more than possession; a title is præcedaneous, and somewhat else, in which the Possession is, or ought to be founded; and if it were not, 'tis not bonæ fidei Possessio. For though prescription by humane Laws may be allowed to create a right; Yet it hath no such power by the Laws of Christ, either in vertue and vice, or in matters of true or false. If it had, both Heathenism of old, and Turcism now, would hold by the same tenure. But of this I have spoken in the Reply, p. 21.

5. So that this indeed proves S. W. to be ἀθάνατος πολεμίστης, an immortal invincible combatant. He need never dispute, or offer one word of reason for his Church, till we have demonstrably evidenced her title to be unjust; and yet he saith, he is not bound to produce any title at all; and then how shall it be possible for us to demonstrate it unjust? And yet this is but one less considerable part of his arguing. The possession which is wont to supply the place of a title, and to be ingredient in a plea, is, we know, the possession of some outward thing, of Land, of Goods, moveable or immovable, of Power, and the like: but the possession, which S. W. speaks of, is the Possession of one of our own operations, an internal act; for such is Belief; But of that also, as such, we have spoken already, Reply, Chap. 7. Sect. 1. n. 11. and I need add no more now, but this, that possession of belief, and the length of that possession, can signifie no more than that they have long believed it; and if that were sufficient ground to be rendred to any (whether Subject or Slave) who should demand a reason of the Faith that is in them, [they believe it, because they do, and have long believed it] I would gladly know, what the Apostle meant by that precept, 1 Pet. 3. 15. that we be ready πρὸς ἀπολογίαν πάντι αἰτοῦντι, to give an account, such sure as hath λόγον, reason in it, i. e. an account of the cause and reason, as of our hope, so of our belief, to every man that demands such a reason from us; or whether the bare having so long believed it, without any offer of reason for it, be yet a reasonable account of that belief.

Nay when to the plea of a possession, it is necessary that some competent testimonies to prove the prescription, be produced, and so S. W. might be supposed to have some reserve of expedient, to extricate him out of this Labyrinth; the present specification of the object of this belief makes this issue yet more impossible; For 'tis the belief of their Infallibility, and not only of their veracity, which he speaks of, (and of that I hope I have said enough in the view of the Romanists exceptions to my Lord of Falklands discourse of Infallibility.) 2. Of their Infallibility, indefinitely (and that is in effect universally) the impossibility that their Church should err in any thing she affirms, or defines; or shall ever affirm, or define; A thing, which as they cannot pretend to prove so much as by that way, that possessions are evidenced to be Possessions, by Testimonies of ancient Men, for sure never any Apostle or ancient Doctor of the Church did by way of prophecie foretel this, that the Church of Rome never should err, or render her self capable of erring; so after all this, 'tis as necessarily refuted by every particular dispute of ours, wherein we have or shall prove her actually to have erred, and wherein we shall demonstrate her to have varied from her self (as it is certain we can demonstrate) as any title in the World can be evidenced to be unjust. 6.

That I descend not here to this way of perfecting this demonstration, I have many reasons to perswade me. I shall mention but one, that this digression of his to the discourse of his one evidence, the belief of Infallibility, pretends to be founded in no more than an intimation of mine, that it belongs to them to evidence. And what had I said to intimate this? Forsooth the Title of my fifth Chapter was, The evidences from the Bishop of Rome succeeding S. Peter, examined] A foul injury indeed to S. W. to imagine that they use any such evidence, or that they are bound to use any at all. Well, if I have made such a dangerous intimation, I have now more than intimated my reasons for it; and when my intimations are more expreß (my whispers become vocal) I will endeavour my demonstrations shall be so also. In the mean, this may serve to secure my intimation, and so the title of my fifth Chapt. For sure the last crime that is laid to it, in relation to the subsequent matter of the Chapter, viz. that the Doctor is contrary to himself, inscribing the Chapter, an answer to their evidences, yet spending almost the whole Chapter in producing evidences of his own.] will soon be pardoned him. When it's considered, that those evidences of his own were produced to refute and invalidate their evidences, and so as proper a method as could have been used in the examining of them. 7. 8.

SECT. II.

Bishops properly Successors of the Apostles, and stiled Apostles. S. W. his disadvantage from pretending the contrary. The frail grounds of the Bishop of Romes supremacy. The place of S. Peter's death no means to affix the pretended universal Pastorship to the See of Rome; Peter's third coming to Rome. The Bishop of Rome succeeded him living.

HIS Answer to my first Paragraph, is most of it triumph for the victories of his former part (which I suppose have proved no better than those in Thucydides's story, the victories vanished, before he hath taken full possession of them) yet he cannot take leave of it, without giving us one tast of his faculty; I had said that after the first evidence, which concerned S. Peter, was manifested to be incompetent to infer the conclusion, 'twas unnecessary to proceed to the other; and he recites this into another form, that I brag I have super-errogated, and said more than needs, applying it to what I had done in the former Chapter, when my words evidently look forward, and relate to that which was next to be handled. 1.

What follows next, concerning the Succession to S. Peter at Antioch, compared with that at Rome, hath been spoken to and vindicated against the Cath. Gentl. in the Reply, Chap. 5. Sect. 2. and here is little Addition made by S. W. save only, 1. His denying, that Peter planted a Church at Antioch of Jewish believers only (whereas, 1. the contrary is manifested in the former chapter, by the distinctneß of the two cœtus there; and 2. This is not at all to the matter of our present argument, which is founded only in Peter's planting a Church, and leaving a Successor Bishop at Antioch, which he equally did, were it of Jews or Gentiles) 2. The recounting the two divers qualities of dignity in S. Peter resident at Antioch; the first of particular care of that Church, as private Bishop of that See; wherein, saith he, he left an improperly so called Successor, viz. a Bishop: the second of publick office of Head of the Church, in which consists his Primacy, and in which he only could claim the inheritance, who succeeded him dying.] Herein there be three things to be briefly adverted to. 1. That his whole answer is founded in a visible begging the question, viz. that S. Peter was head of the Church, and so had the Primacy, i. e. the supreme Pastorship of the Church; for as to any other notion of Primacy, that title will not be proper. 2. That in his opinion a Bishop was but improperly a Successor of S. Peter; whereas 'tis notorious in all antiquity, that the Bishops were the only (properly so called) Successors of the Apostles, and themselves frequently upon that account, stiled Apostles, and the Successors of S. Paul, and other Apostles in other Cities, equally so stiled, * Απόστολος Τιμοθέος, || Απόστολος Τίτος, * Απόστολος Επαφρόδιτος, || Απόστολος Ιγνάτιος, the Apostle Timothy, || Titus, var. ιγνω. 2.

* Anom. ap. Phot. Num. 254. & Theodor. in 1 Tim. 3. 1. & Theophan. || Theod. in Tit. * Phil. 2. 25. Theod. in Phil. 1. 1. & in c. 2. Chrys. ibid. || Chrys. Ign.

* Clem. Alex. Strom. l. 4. Titus, Epaphroditus, Ignatius, and many the like, as the Successor of S. Peter at Rome * Apostolus Clemens. And if it be said, that Bishops succeeded not in the whole Apostolical Power, that of preaching to all Nations, and so were but improperly their Successors; I answer, that is true; but little for S. W. his advantage. For then the Bishop of Rome not succeeding S. Peter in the plenitude of his power, can the less be proved to succeed in the Universal Pastorship of S. Peter (which if ever S. Peter had been possest of, must needs be founded in, and superstructed on his commission Apostolick) his succession in the Episcopal chair may be sufficient.

3. 3. That all the Bishop of Romes supremacy depends upon these frail grounds, and besides upon another perfect uncertainty; (even according to S. W. his unproved assumptions) viz. that none could succeed him dying, but only the Bishop of Rome; whereas 1. 'Tis evident, that whatsoever power S. Peter was invested in, he might at death, have delegated to any other Bishop constituted by him, as well as to the Bishop of Rome, to Euodius as to Clemens; If it be said, he could not: I ask what should hinder him? sure no command of Christ, for he had not said a word to this mateer; Nor was Peters will subject to any other authority; and therefore certainly he might, if he would thus have delegated it; and that he would not, is not pretended, or attempted to be proved, and so it remains a meer groundless, uncertain assertion, or conjecture of which sort many millions might be produced, which yet have really no truth in them. And whereas here is pretended a necessity in the matter, that where he dyed and was divested, there was necessary a succession into the dignity, which he left, and was wanting by his death to the whole Church] This is perfectly vain. For 1. that want, if any such there had been to the whole Church, might by any declared act of his will, by his delegation and institution have been as well supplied in any other City, if he had so pleased, as in that wherein he dyed: and without such expression of his will, the place of his death would have been utterly ineffectual: There is not the least necessity consequent to the Archbishop of Canterbury his dying at London, yea though he were also Bishop of London, when he dyed, to affix the Archiepiscopal power to that See; nor doth any kind of inheritance depend on such uncertain emergents as is the place of a man's dying.

4. Suppose the Emperour of the whole world were by particular title of Conquest, or Εμφύτευσις plantation, King of France first, and afterward of England, and before, or at the time of his death had assigned one Successor in France to his Crown and Kingdom of France, and another in England to that Crown, and without any provision appearing to be made for the succession in the Empire, he should dye intestate in England, would there be any necessity now from his dying there, that the King of England should succeed to the Empire of the World? His answer to this question, and his solid grounds of reason, on which to found his answer, whatsoever it shall be, will be useful to the clearing of this matter.

5. Mean-while, as 'tis obvious to any, that he that hath long lived in one City, may upon some sudden occasion remove, and dye in another; so it seems most probable, that this last coming of S. Peter to Rome, was after this manner, not long before his death. For though in Eusebius Chronicon there is mention of his sitting 7. years at Antioch, and then five and twenty Years at Rome, immediately before his death, (which is no way reconcileable with evidence of History in many particulars) yet in the third of the Ecclesiastical History κεφ. α. the words are expres. Πέτρῳ ἐν Πόντῳ καὶ Γαλατίᾳ καὶ Βιθυνίᾳ----κεκηρυχέναι τοῖς ἐκ διασπορᾶς Ιουδαίοις ἔοικεν, ὃς καὶ ἐπὶ τέλει ἐν Ρώμῃ γενόμενος ἀνεσκολοπίσθη. Peter having preached in Pontus, Galatia, Bithynia----- to the Jews, which were of the dispersion, at the end being at Rome, he was put to Death, &c. And accordingly * Onuphrius, to reconcile the contrary appearances, is forced to place this his third coming, and last return to Rome, in the last year of the reign of Nero, under whom he was put to death.

* Annot. in Platin. de vit. Pontif. in Pet. Apost.

6. Add hereunto the affirmation of * Epiphanius, Φημὶ δὲ τῶν περὶ Πέτρον καὶ Παῦλον ἐπισκόπους ἄλλους καθίζεσθαι, διὰ τὸ τοὺς Αποστόλους πολλάκις ἐπὶ τὰς ἄλλας πατρίδας τὴν πορείαν στέλλεσθαι, διὰ τὸ κήρυγμα τοῦ Χριστοῦ, μὴ δύνασθαι δὲ τὴν τῶν Ρωμαίων πόλιν ἀνευ ἐπισκόπου εἶναι----that of those that belonged to Peter and Paul, there were ordained other Bishops, because they went to other Countreys to preach the faith: and Rome might not be without a Bishop; which is farther prejudice to S. W. his argument for the Bishop of Romes succession to the plenitude of S. Peters power, upon that only score of his dying there; For thus his argument lies.

* Her. κζ. κατ. καρποκρ.

7. The dignity of Primacy annext to S. Peters person, went along with him whithersoever he went, and remained with him living, so that he only who succeedeth him dying (the Bishop of Rome) could claim the inheritance of this sacred dignity] To this I reply; but if the Bishop of Rome succeeded him not dying, but living, i. e. was constituted Bishop there in S. Peters life time, as Epiphanius expresly affirms he was, then all force of this argument is vanished. But of this whole matter I have formerly spoken in the reply, ch. 5. Sect. 2. and therefore I add no more of that.

SECT. III.

The Canon of Chalcedon. What the Bishop of Romes Primacy. ἴσα πρεσβεῖα. Constantinople equal to Rome in all but place. Ως ἐκείνην, noting an equality. Constantinoples Civil greatness, Ἐν τοῖς ἐκκλησιαστικοῖς πράγμασι, in all Ecclesiastical affairs.

1. IN the next place, my testimony from the Council of Chalcedon is to be examined by S. W. But that also was largely vindicated in the Reply, c. 5. sect. 3. But S. W. will ask some posing questions, which the Catholick Gentlemans curiosity did not suggest to him; as 1. How I know that ἴσα πρεσβεῖα signifies the Primacy, asking whether there be no other priviledges besides the Primacy] The Pertinence of this question, is first observable. The thing which I had in hand, was to shew the original of the precedence of the Bishop of Rome: For this, I cited the Canon of Chalcedon, that Constantinople should have ἴσα πρεσβεῖα equal priviledges with Rome (and be in place second, or next after Rome) upon this account particularly, διὰ τὸ βασιλεύειν τὴν πόλιν, because is was (at that time) the seat of the Empire, affirming that to be the reason (and not any donation of Christs to S. Peter, or succession of the Bishop of Rome from him) that Rome enjoyed such priviledges. And upon view of this, S.W. very demurely asks, how I know that ἴσα πρεσβεῖα signifies the Primacy] What propriety or seasonableness to the matter in hand, the original of Romes dignity, is yet discoverable in this question?

2. of

But then 2. I shall answer this question by this other, Whether the Bishop of Rome his Primacy were any thing else above what the Bishops of other Prime Metropoles enjoyed, save only Primacy of order or place? If it were in his opinion no more, then, as I willingly yield it to the Bishop of Rome, so it is the disclaiming all his pretended supremacy of Jurisdiction over all others, in which alone the charge of our Schism is founded. If it were more, then the Council of Chalcedon, that confirms to Constantinople the ἴσα πρεσβεῖα with Rome, excepting none but the precedency of place or order (ἐν τοῖς ἐκκλησιαστικοῖς ὡς ἐκείνην μεγαλύνεσθαι πράγμασι, to be advanced like her, or to have the like greatness in Ecclesiastical affairs, that Rome had, being δευτέρην μετ' ἐκείνην, second, or next after it) must needs give Constantinople that Primacy also. Or in plainer terms; was the Primacy that belonged to old Rome any real priviledge above other Primates? If it were, then Constantinople, that must have ἴσα πρεσβεῖα, equal priviledges, with old Rome, and not only some few equal priviledges without others, must have the Primacy also. For when that Canon confirms the ἴσα πρεσβεῖα, it doth it 1. Indefinitely, i.e. universally, equal priviledges; and 2. That equality is founded in having the same original of those priviledges, which therefore equally devolves them all that flow from that original; and Rome had no other claim by which to hold them, in the opinion of that Council, and she is judged to have them, with one exception, and that only of place or order, δευτέρην, &c. (and we know an exception confirms the rule to all things which are not excepted) And so sure that gives grounds of inferring the conclusion in that full latitude of all but place, and so of Primacy in the widest notion (place only excepted) in which Rome had it. 2.

To his second question, why [ὡς ἐκείνην,] which can exact no other interpretation but [as she] must be rendred [as much as she] deducing an equality or identity from ὡς, which only notes a similitude or likeness] the answer is obvious: 1. Because the parity, or agreement betwixt them in that place, is specified to be in respect of greatness, μεγαλύνεσθαι ὡς ἐκείνην, Constantinople shall be great in Ecclesiastical affairs as she; that must conclude it as great as she, to any reality of power or greatness. 2. By the only exception mentioned, that of place as was before said. 3. By the ἴσα πρεσβεῖα, which were expresly mentioned before, equal priviledges, and those, I hope, signifie equality, and not similitude or likeness only. 4. By the ground of these equal priviledges, the dignity of the City, of which we have the sence of Greg. Nazianz. in his Orat. 27. where he thus addresses himself unto them. Ὑμεῖς ἡ μεγάλη πόλις, οἱ πρῶτοι μετὰ τὴν πρώτην εὐθέως, ἢ μηδὲ τοῦτο παραχωροῦντες, Constantinople is the great City (S. Chrysostom calls it the metropolis ὅλης τῆς κόσμου of the whole world) the first after the first, or not yielding so much as this to it. And then if the Church were to keep the like proportion, we know what to conclude of it. 3.

Thus when * Sozomen sets down the passages of the first Council of Constantinople, where these priviledges were conferred, he hath these words; Μετὰ τὴν Ῥώμης τὴν Κωνσταντινουπόλεως ἐπίσκοπον τὰ πρεσβεῖα ἔχειν, ὡς νέας Ῥώμης τὸν θρόνον ἐπιτροπεύουσα. ἤδη γὰρ ὁ μόνον εἶχε ταύτην προσηγορίαν ἡ πόλις, καὶ γερουσίᾳ καὶ τάγματι δήμων καὶ ἀρχαῖς ὁμοίως ἐχρητο, ἀλλὰ καὶ τὰ σύμβολα κατὰ τὰ νόμιμα τὰ ἐν Ἰταλίᾳ Ῥωμαίων ἐκρίνετο καὶ τὰ δίκαια καὶ τὰ γέρατα περὶ πάντα ἑκατέρα ἰσάζετο. The Bishop of Constantinople shall have priviledges of dignity next after Rome, as having the throne or chair of New Rome. For already (at that time) the City had not only that appellation, and a Senate, and orders of the people, and Magistracies, the like to those at Rome; but also the ensigns of dignity, according to what was customary to the Romans in Italy, were adjudged to them, and the rights and dignities in all particulars were equal to them both. 4. * l. 7. c. 29.

In the third place his questions are turned into chiding the Doctor for Englishing ἐν τοῖς ἐκκλησιαστικοῖς πράγμασι in all Ecclesiastical businesses, whereas (saith he) there is no such word as [All] there;] I answer, that if by Englishing he means translating, I did not intend to English it, and the varying the letter is an evidence of that. But that I so concluded by way of inference from those, and the precedent words of the Canon, I willingly acknowledge; but am not, I conceive, to be chid for it. For if Constantinople be in Ecclesiastical affairs advanced to the same height of power as Rome, if it have indefinitely without any exception, but only of precedence of place, equal priviledges with Rome; and if this it have, upon this demonstrative account, because Constantinople now is what Rome was, and agrees with it in that for which Rome had her priviledges, συμβασιλεύουσα, saith Themistius, reigning together with Rome, then must this belong to all Ecclesiastical businesses (precedence of place being either excepted, or not deemed such a πράγμα) for otherwise if there were any matter of the Church, to which Constantinoples power was not exalted, so as to be magnified ὡς ἐκείνη, like Rome, in that, whatsoever it were, there would be a real inequality, and so that Canon fail of its design of confirming the ἴσα πρεσβεῖα, not this or that priviledge in some particular matters, but indefinitely, priviledges equal to those which Rome had. And therefore sure my pen was not herein, as he saith, too liberal of its ink; I made no addition to the real necessary importance of that testimony. 5.

SECT. IV.

Πρεσβεῖα Honorary, Pompous, Ceremonious priviledges. Some such belonged to Rome as the first Patriarchate, but no supream universal Jurisdiction from S. Peter. Constantinople equal to Rome in real priviledges. The notion of πρεσβεῖα in the Glossaries, and in the Councils, further proved by Leo's Epistles. Primacy an ambiguous word.

Fourthly, From questioning and chiding, he at length comes to some matter, and will give account why the Popes Legates might omit to oppose the reason there given for the collation of the πρεσβεῖα. And for his ground work he first lays this supposition, that the word πρεσβεῖα signifies nothing but certain honorary, 1.

honorary, pompous or ceremonious priviledges: which he will allow might accrue to ſome Church by the reſidence of the ſupream ſecular power there.

2. Before I give anſwer to this, I muſt firſt ask, what he means by honorary, pompous or ceremonious priviledges? If only thoſe that have no reality of juriſdiction joyned to them more than belonged to that City before, or abſtracted from the collation of thoſe honorary priviledges, then his words may bear this ſence, that the priviledges of a Patriarch, as that differs from a Primate of a Dioceſs in the Eaſt or Weſt (there being fourteen ſuch into which the Empire was moſt anciently divided) were but honorary priviledges, precedence in Councils, and the like, without any acceſſion of power or juriſdiction above that which belonged to them as Primates, and that theſe may accrue to ſome Church by the reſidence of the ſupream ſecular power there. And in this ſence, his words are moſt true, and applicable to the notion which I have of the Church of Rome from the Canon of Chalcedon, viz. that the Church of Rome, being ἀπ' ἀρχῆς originally a Primacy (proportionable to the Prefecture of the City of Rome in the diviſion of the Empire) by being the ſeat and firſt City of the Empire, became a Patriarchate, and the moſt honourable or firſt of the Patriarchates, and thereby had the firſt place in any Oecumenical Council, and the like. But this was nothing but an honorary priviledge without any thing of juriſdiction (any further than the Province which belonged to her as Primate, extended) accruing to her by theſe means. And when the Canon of Chalcedon ſpeaking of this, ſaith, ſhe hath it aſſigned her by the Fathers, διὰ τὸ βασιλεύειν τὴν πόλιν, becauſe ſhe was the Imperial City, the Legates did not, becauſe they could not with any juſtice, oppoſe this reaſon: but S. W. I ſuppoſe, will have more to belong to Rome than this, and means more by Romes Primacy, even a ſupremacy of juriſdiction above all other Primates and Patriarchs, and that as coming down to her from S. Peter. And againſt both theſe I argued from that Canon of Chalcedon; And by Conſtantinoples having equal priviledges with Rome, i. e. firſt the power of a Primate, then the dignity or honour of a Patriarch, and the next place to Rome it ſelf, and this upon this account of being the ſeat of the Empire, as Rome was, I conceiv'd, I had demonſtrated. 1. That Rome, in the judgment of that Council, had no ſuch ſupremacy of juriſdiction; for that was not conferred on Conſtantinople; nor indeed could it be competible to any ſecond, if Rome had been thought to have had it, and ſo was prejudged by the decree for Conſtantinoples having equal priviledges with Rome. And 2. That what Rome had above other Cities, Antioch, &c. it was not deemed to have by any right from Peter, but from being the Imperial See, and this by way of interpretation acknowledged by the Legates of Rome, by their not oppoſing this, when for other reaſons, and not for that, they refuſed to approve that Canon.

3. And this might ſerve for anſwer to his ſuppoſition of the bare pompouſneſs of theſe Priviledges. But becauſe he may more probably have another meaning in his words, that the Priviledges here made equal and common to Conſtantinople with Rome, were but ſome pompous, honorary priviledges, which notwithſtanding, Conſtantinople fell much ſhort of Rome in real power and juriſdiction; and ſo ſtill Rome might have the univerſal Paſtorſhip, though Conſtantinople communicated with it in the ceremonious priviledges: I ſhall therefore now farther examine the truth of this unproved ſuggeſtion, which indeed being thus taken out of the ambiguous words, and put into intelligible ſence, hath not any the leaſt appearance of truth in it. And having none, we may thence paſs judgment, what S. W. will adventure on, to maintain his cauſe, and what ſupports that cauſe ſtands in need of, and cannot ſubſiſt without them. What πρεσβεῖα ſignifie (which Conſtantinople is adjudged to have ἴσα equal to Rome) ſeeing it is his intereſt to queſtion, it muſt be decided by competent teſtimonies. And ſuch (for an ordinary Greek word) are the Greek Gloſſaries. Of theſe Heſychius may be allowed our firſt conſideration. Πρεσβεῖα, ſaith he, κράτη, καὶ ἀρχιερεῖα, καὶ ἀρχεῖα, καὶ ἱερά, it denotes Government, chief Prieſthoods, Principalities, and holy offices, or (as I may gueſs the reading ſhould be, without the laſt καὶ) ſacred Principalities, proportionably to πρεσβεῖς, which denotes γέροντες, βασιλεῖς, ἄρχοντες, προτιμώμενοι, Senators, Kings, Princes, thoſe that are dignified above other men. Phavorinus to the ſame purpoſe, Πρεσβεῖον ἢ διὰ γήρας προτίμησις, καὶ τὸ δι' αὐτὸ διδόμενον γέρας διὰ προτίμησιν, τὸ ἕνεκα ἀρετῆς γέρας, καλλεῖον, and πρωτεῖα τὰ τῆς πρώτης τάξεως γέρα, It ſignifies that preeminence of dignity that belongs to any in reſpect of honour, or the honour it ſelf thus given in reſpect of this preeminence, Honour for eminence, Primacy, the honours that belong to the firſt order. And Suidas, Πρεσβεῖα, τιμαὶ, γέρα, dignities; All manifeſtly ſhewing them to be real dignities, and power, and not only pompous and meerly ceremonious, which are comprehended under that word.

4. 2. Being a ſtile of the Canons, the more ancient Canons will beſt evidence the importance of it. In the ſixth Nicene Canon we find the word, where having defined, according to the ancient or original cuſtoms, that the Biſhop of Alexandria ſhall ἐξουσίαν ἔχει, have power of all that are under that Patriarchate, in proportion to what was cuſtomary to the Biſhop of Rome, it follows, ὁμοίως δὲ καὶ κατὰ τὴν Ἀντιόχειαν, καὶ ἐν ταῖς ἄλλαις ἐπαρχίαις, τὰ πρεσβεῖα σώζεσθαι ταῖς ἐκκλησίαις, that in like manner at Antioch, and in other Provinces, the πρεσβεῖα ſhall be preſerved to the Churches; There it ſignifies evidently the power that any the greateſt Biſhops, even of Rome, Alexandria, and Antioch, had in their Churches; and (which may prevail ſomewhat with S. W.) Antonius Salmatia a Doctor of the Ambroſian Colledge, who ſet out Zonaras's Comments on that Canon, and is approved by Anton. Olgiat. the Preſident of that Colledge, and by Camillus Olevanus, Commiſſary for the Inquiſitor, and others, hath given it us rendred by no leſs than privilegia, dignitates, & authoritates, as if he had (prophetically) meant malice to S. W. his affirmation in this place. Yet more particularly in this matter of Conſtantinople, the third Canon of the Conſtantinopolitan Council hath the word, and there it is πρεσβεῖα τῆς τιμῆς μετὰ τὴν τῆς Ῥώμης ἐπίσκοπον, the priviledges of dignity after Rome: and the Scholiaſt gives us the notion of the word, ἤτοι τὰ πρωτεῖα ἢ τὸ ἐξαίρετον, the Primacy (or principal powers) and privilegia ſingularia, ſingular priviledges, ſaith Salmatia. And not to be infinite in ſo plain a matter, the Canon of Chalcedon it ſelf makes it clear enough, where all the Patriarchal power (containing the Primatus in it) which was certainly conferred before, and there confirmed to the Biſhop of Conſtantinople, and this equal to that which Rome formerly had enjoyed (which I hope was more than bare * honorary, pompous, ceremonious priviledges) and by name the Ordaining of Metropolitans, which was ſure a real material priviledge, are comprehended under that title.

* ὅτι τὸ τῆς πολιτικῆς ἢ τῆς Ἀναπῆς καὶ τῆς Θεσκικῆς διοικήσεως μητροπολίτας χειροτονεῖσθαι ὑπὸ τῆς ——

This

This therefore of lessening or rather annihilating these πρεσϐεῖα, subduing them into nothing but honorary, pompous, ceremonious priviledges] is clearly an invention of S. W. contrary to the expreß nature of the word, the Canonical use of it, and the evidence of the fact in that Canon; and yet farther it is abundantly refuted by Pope Leo's three long Epistles, the 54*th* to Anatolius the then Bishop of Constantinople, the 55*th*. to the Emperor Martian, the 56*th*. to the Empreß Pulcheria, and a 4*th*. also, the 62*d*. to Maximus Bishop of Antioch, all sadly complaining of the invasion of the Primacies and rights of the Metropolitans * (alienum Jus præripere, tot Metropolitanorum impugnare Primatus) disturbing the Provinces which had been setled by the Decrees of Nice; ‖ desiring other mens rights, robbing the Churches of their priviledges instituted by Canons of Councils, and a great deal more: which I hope Pope Leo would not so declamatorily have poured out, if all that was confirmed to the Bishop of Constantinople in that Council, had been nothing but honorary priviledges; for those sure might have been enjoyed by him, without invading the rights of any others: nor indeed can it be imagined, that those were the priviledges of the Churches, which the Council of Nice had setled, Can. 6. 5.

* Fol. 120.
‖ Indebita concupiscit, illicito crescere optat augmento, Privilegia Ecclesiarum, sanctorum Patrum Canonibus instituta convellit — fol. 119.

In the next place upon this ground, that πρεσϐεῖα signifies no more but these honorary priviledges, he thinks he can give account why the Popes Legates did not oppose the reason there given for the collation of these πρεσϐεῖα, whereas, saith he, had the word πρεσϐεῖα signified Primacy, which was then as strongly and expresly pretended to come from Christs donation to S. Peter (as is evident in Pope Leo's Epistles, whose Legates presided in this Council) as it is now by the present Pope, then we should have heard another story] i. e. then the Legates would have opposed the reason there given for the collation of these πρεσϐεῖα. 6.

By Primacy I suppose he here means the Popes supream power over all, and then the whole vertue of this argument lies in this, that Pope Leo, at the time of the Council of Chalcedon, pretended this primacy of the Bishop of Rome to come from Christs donation to S. Peter. But to this semblance of proof, I answer, that S. W. having not produced any testimony of Leo's whereby we may discern his notion of Primacy, which is an ambiguous word, I must first demand the opinion of S. W. what Leo meant by Primacy? whether no more than that which belonged to the Bishop of Alexandria and Antioch, and some other Prime Metropolitans in their Provinces? Thus, 'tis certain he useth the Phrase in his Epistle to the Empreß, tot Metropolitanorum Primatus ---- the Primacies of so many Metropolitans: and if this were all that he pretended to from S. Peter, such his pretensions were easily reconcileable with the Canon of Chalcedon, which neither rob'd him of his Primacy, nor prejudged his having it from S. Peter, but (yet farther) supposed and yielded him the dignity of a Patriarch, and of the Prime or first Patriarch, and affirmed him to have ascended to this height, by Romes being the seat of the Empire. But then, not to build on this possible notion of the word Primacy (which I must not deem S. W. his notion of it) nor yet on a second thing observable from those Epistles of Leo, which concerned this matter, viz. that he seems to interpret all the injury that was done in that Council of Chalcedon, to have been only a breach against the Canon of Nice, and the dispositions of Ecclesiastical affairs made there (never making the least mention, that I discern of any other) I answer 2. That 'tis most plain through those Epistles of Leo, that in them he neither ever deduces his Primacy from S. Peter, for the bare mentioning the * authority of the blessed Apostle Peter, by which he himself acted (and so it is certain that by the same Authority the Bishop of Antioch acted also) or S. Peters founding Christian Doctrine speciali magisterio in Antioch and Rome ‖, cannot be deemed the thus deducing it) nor takes notice of any the least injury done to himself by that Council, but only to the Bishop of Alexandria, and (especially) of Antioch, and other Metropolitanes; which is a further testimony of the truth of what I had said, that the deducing the original of the dignity of the Roman See from the greatneß of that Imperial City, was never so much as quarrell'd at by the Legates in the Council, nor, as now I add, by the Pope afterwards, in this whole contest. And then still all that I said, hath perfect truth, and it matters little what at any other time either Leo or any other Pope pretended, whether concerning the universality of their jurisdiction, or the tenure by which they assume to hold it from S. Peter. For thus they might pretend, without such reality of solid grounds, which would be sufficient to justifie them in a Council. 7.

SECT. V.

How Constantinople struck not at the Primacy. The Canon of Chalcedon doth more than strike at Romes supremacy. No advantage to Rome, that the Canon is equally derogatory to Antioch. Ἰσα πρεσϐεῖα not noting Supremacy, is no advantage to S. W. his unjustice. Constantinoples greatneß only confirmed by the Canon of Chalcedon. So the second place. The regularity of this Act, and the great force of it to conclude this debate. The Romanists collection of Canons.

HIS fifth attempt is contained in these words, The Dr. grants that this decree was as derogatory to the authority of Antioch as of Rome; but it is evident that Antioch pretended to no Primacy over the whole Church; therefore evident it is, that Ἰσα πρεσϐεῖα could not signifie Primacy of jurisdiction, nor consequently was that struck at by the tumultuous Constantinopolitans.] 1.

Here now it is plain what he means by Primacy, that of jurisdiction, and over the whole Church. And this, saith he, 'tis plain the Constantinopolitans struck not at. This is true in some sence. 1. That the Constantinopolitan See at that time pretended not to any such universal jurisdiction for it self. 2. That it struck no blow at it in Rome, nor indeed could it, not apprehending (that is discernable by that whole transaction) any such to be pretended to by Rome, any more than what properly belonged to it as a Primacy (of which there were many other in the East and West) only with the honorary addition of the Patriarchate of the West, and the first or prime Patriarchate, and that upon the score of being the seat of the Empire. But then in another sence, which alone is to the purpose 2.

in

in hand, it is manifest, that this Canon of Chalcedon, that confirmed the ἴσα πρεσβεῖα to Constantinople, doth more than strike at the universal Pastorship of Rome, viz. by necessary consequence of their decree; for if Constantinople have equal priviledges, and so all the greatness that Rome hath, except only the dignity of the first place; and if all that Rome hath above other Prime Metropoles, belonged to her only upon the account of being the Imperial City; then sure this not only strikes at, but destroys all her pretensions to the universal Pastorship from S. Peter.

3. What he here adds from me, as my concession, that the decree was as derogatory to the dignity of Antioch as of Rome] will little avail him in this matter. Not only because it is no affirmation of mine, but a conclusion, inferr'd ad homines, from a suggestion of the Romanists (as is apparent in the * place) but also, and especially, because it is confest by me, and inferred in this arguing, that it was only a Patriarchal power, and not a Primacy over the whole Church, that was in that Canon adjudged to Constantinople. The truth is, Antioch only suffered real diminution by the exalting Constantinople, some part of the Province thereof being assigned Constantinople, and both that and Alexandria sunk a little lower in dignity of place; Constantinople being now placed next Rome, and consequently above each of them. But what doth this avail S. W. or how can he with the least colour conclude thence for Romes either having, or retaining the Primacy, as that signifies the supremacy over the whole Church? Certainly nothing at all.

* Of Schis. p. 99.

4. With what truth it is here suggested, that the Constantinopolitans were tumultuous, hath been shewed at large in the Reply, Ch. 5. Sect. 3.

5. To his sixth I answer, that I grant most willingly. 1. That the ἴσα πρεσβεῖα meant not the Primacy in his sence, for Supremacy: and 2. For the other Primacy which really belonged to Rome, to be the chief or first Patriarchate, I grant also that this was not concerned or taken from her by the decree, but remained untoucht. But then what hath S. W. gained by both these? and yet these are the utmost that all his endeavour can bring in to him; for these notwithstanding, the Council that gives Constantinople ἴσα πρεσβεῖα equal priviledges with Rome, prejudges Romes having any such Supremacy; for that cannot equally be had by any other; and besides, that Primacy that Rome is there said to have from being the Imperial City, cannot be the universal Pastorship which it (had not, but) pretends to have from S. Peter.

6. His seventh exception to me is very unjust, in making that my gross mistake, and an evidence of my not fetching this testimony from the fountains (the Canons I had thought, and Acts of the Council were the fountains, and from thence I fetcht it immediately, see Reply p. 83, &c.) which was only my inference from the Romanists concession. The Romanists, rejecting this Canon, add, though most untruly, that the Church of Antioch rejected it also, (when it is visible in the Acts of the Council, that Maximus Bishop of Antioch subscribed it.) However this is most true, that Leo then pretended it for his chief reason not to subscribe it, because it was to the Bishop of Antiochs prejudice, and so against the disposition of the Council of Nice, which he would not see infringed, never mentioning any injury done to himself by it, or to the See of Rome. Hence (i. e. from this their concession) I assumed it was granted by them, that Constantinoples acquisitions by this decree of Chalcedon, were as derogatory to Antioch as to Rome; and from thence again I further inferred, 1. That it must be confessed of Antioch, that it had equal priviledges with Rome (for else how could it be as derogatory to Antioch, as to Rome, that Constantinople had those ἴσα πρεσβεῖα to Rome) and so 2. That Rome was no more but a Patriarchate, because it was certain, that Antioch was no more than a Patriarchate. 3. That all that Constantinople had wanted of Rome (I mean ever since it became a Primates seat, for of old it is acknowledged that Byzantium was much lower) was only the dignity of a Patriarchate, without any ordinary jurisdiction over other Churches. All this being thus evident, S. W. would fain pick some holes, and first suggests that the Doctor tells him ἴσα πρεσβεῖα signifies a Patriarchate, and the pomps attending it: I said ἴσα πρεσβεῖα, equal priviledges with Rome, signified the dignity of a Patriarchate. And so much evidently it must, and no more: So much sure it must; for Rome was a Patriarchate, and none that was less, or under a Patriarch, could have equal priviledges with Rome. And no more it could signifie; for supposing Rome to have had more than Patriarchal power (that of universal Pastorship) none other could have that equal to it. If Rome were the universal Ecclesiastick Monarch, Constantinople could not be adjudged to be so also.

7. Secondly, Saith he, Constantinople was a Patriarchate before, but the fourth, and now pretended to be the second.] Some truth there is in this for the first part of it, but that such as is nothing to the prejudice of my pretensions, or to the advantage of my Disarmer. 'Tis true Constantinople was a Patriarchate before this Council of Chalcedon, first by a long continued custom, and then by force of the Canon of Constantinople; and accordingly I * took not this at Chalcedon, to be the first conferring of these πρεσβεῖα on Constantinople, but only a confirming of what formerly was deem'd to belong to that Church, and so the Fathers of Chalcedon expressly tell Leo the Pope, in their Epistle sent to him, and that what they now did, was but βεβαίωσις τ῀ τιμῆς, the confirmation of that dignity by this Oecumenical Council, which before it enjoyed. And thus far S. W. said truth; let him make his best advantage of it. But when he adds [but the fourth] as if till the time of this Canon of Chalcedon, Constantinople had been but the fourth Patriarchate, but now became the second, there sure my Disarmer struck at adventure, and that none of the καλὰς πληγὰς, luckie blows, which Aristotle says, they that wink or are blind, strike sometimes. For it is evident, that for this second place, the foregoing Canon of Constantinople was equally of force, as for the Patriarchal power. So the words of that third Canon are expres, ἔχειν τὰ πρεσβεῖα τ῀ τιμῆς μετὰ τ῀ τ῀ Ῥώμης ἐπίσκοπον, διὰ τὸ εἶναι αὐτὴν τ῀ νέαν Ῥώμην, It shall have the priviledges of dignity after the Bishop of Rome, because the City is new Rome; and so in the Epistle of the Fathers at Chalcedon to Pope Leo, it is voucht ἐβεβαιώσαμεν τ῀ κανόνα τ῀ διαγορεύοντα μετὰ τ῀ ὑμέτερον ἁγιώτατον κ῀ Ἀποστολικὸν, τὰ πρεσβεῖα τ῀ Κωνσταντινουπόλεως ἔχειν, we have confirmed the Canon of the 150 Fathers, that assembled at Constantinople in Theodosius's reign, which decrees, or declares that after your most holy Apostolick See, the Bishop of Constantinople shall have the priviledges (of honour or first place.) So when * Evagrius speaks of this Act, he doth it exactly after the same manner. Judgment, saith he, was given that the See of Constantinople, ἰσοτίμους μετὰ τ῀ Ῥώμης τετάχθαι, was rightly placed, or ordered already after the See of Rome, that surely must be next after, and so not now first advanced from the fourth to this second place. And what hath S. W. gained by such adventures as these, undertaking to discover the gross mistakes of another?

What follows of the tumultuousness and irregularity and want of freedom in this Act, had been sug- 8.
gested by the Cath. Gentl. (and proved to have no degree of truth in it. Reply, p. 82, 83.----) save only that 'tis here added, that it was disavowed and rejected by the Patriarch of Antioch and those under him.] Which is most absolutely false, the Bishop of Antioch subscribing, and defining in that Council, in the next place after the Bishop of Constantinople. (Μάξιμῳ ἐπισκόπῳ Ἀντιοχείας Συρίας ὁρίσας ὑπέγραψα) and the Bishops of the Metropolis of Asia, Pontus and Thracia, being called out in the Council, and examined before the Emperors Proxies or Judges, whether they consented οἰκείᾳ γνώμῃ, by their own will, and subscribing with profession ἐνώπιον θεοῦ, before God, that they did it willingly, and yet these we know of all others were the most concerned in this matter. So that we may believe there was some truth in the Fathers words, that what they had decreed was, πρὸς ἀναίρεσιν μὲν πάσης συγχύσεως, βεβαίωσιν δὲ τῆς ἐκκλησιαστικῆς ταξέως, for the removing of all confusion, and the setling of Ecclesiastical good order. Concil. tom. 3. p. 475. E.

And so now I hope by what hath here been added, to what is at large set down in the Reply, I 9.
may assume that I have obeyed S. W. his charge, laid so heavily upon me, to vindicate the validity of this Canon of Chalc[illegible] And truly when that is done, there is little need of adding more testimonies in that matter, [illegible]ing evident by that Canon, that all the Greatness that Rome had above other Primates, was, in the opinion of those Fathers, by being the seat of the Empire, not by any title of succession from S. Peter; and that, beside only the precedence of place, other Churches had equal priviledges and dignities with it, and so that Rome had not the Universal Pastorship or jurisdiction over all Churches.

What he adds concerning the Power the Pope had to reject this Canon, as being head of the Church, 10.
is on his side a begging the Question, that the Pope is such, and withal is answered at large, Repl. cap. 5. sect. 4. and the truth of, * Almaines resolution cleared, both to the issue, and to the Justice of it, meritò Concilium Chalcedonense Leoni resistenti prævaluisse: the Council of Chalcedon prevailed against Leo's resistance, and that justly. * *De Author. * In this place he tells us, this Act it self was not numbred among the Acts of the Council, till---- 11.

been thought to be really prejudicial to the Pope. (Howsoever he would by many attempts now sooth over the matter.) 2. It admonisheth us, what care we ought to have in relying on the Romanists collections. For it is certain this Canon is in all the Greek copies both Printed and Manuscript, and from thence the copy of that Council must originally be fetcht: And many of the Romanists confess there was such a Canon made, and the story of the fact is by all the Ancients agreed on; and Leo's Epistles, and many other evidences put it beyond all dispute; and indeed Leo's Legates resisting and not consenting to it, and complaining to the Judges, that it was done without them (when yet it was proved, that they voluntarily absented themselves) is an evidence still of the fact, that there was such a Canon made, and made by the Council (though without the consent of the Legates) and yet it is left out in Charanza's Summa Conciliorum, in the Codex vetus Ecclesiæ Romanæ, in Dionysius Exiguus his Codex, and in Peter Crabs large Edition of the Councils. I shall pass no further censure on these collectors, knowing in whose interest it was, that they thus did it.

The Ephesine Canon, what 'twas vouch't to prove. Cyprus independent for jurisdiction as well as ordination. Cedrenus's mistakes. Justinianopolis. The Canon of Ephesus extended to all other Primates, as well as Cyprus. What influence this hath on Romes pretensions. The Abassines. Britains. Romes Patriarchy limited. The Nicene Canon.

THE second Section begins with a view of the Testimony, which I brought from the Ephesine Ca- 1.
non, and thus it sets out; The Doctors next evidence, that the Pope is not head of the Church, is from a Canon in the Council of Ephesus.

But before I read on, I must take notice of S. W. his constant art of deforming of arguments, be- 2.
fore he adventures to Answer them, like the persecutors of old, that disguised Christians in beasts skins, and then brought them out to the Theatre, to be torn in pieces in those shapes. And none more ordinary with him than this, viz. having recited the premisse right, to affix some remote conclusion to it, as if it were produced by me for the inferring of that, and then to shew that it is unconcludent. Thus is it in this place. That which I vouched from that Canon, he duly recited, viz. that the Independency of Cyprus not only from the Patriarch of Antioch, but from all others, was contested then, as from the Apostles times---- But for the conclusion, which he pretends me to deduce from thence, he hath wholly changed it; for he that will review the Tr. of Schism, Sect. 6. p. 100. will find that the conclusion, for the proving of which the Ephesine Canon is produced, is not the Popes not being head of the Church (that had been shewed, Sect. 5. by Antioch and Constantinoples having ἴσα πρεσβεῖα, equal dignity with Rome, which manifested Rome to be no more than a Patriarchal See) but the reconcilableness of this kind of eminence (Patriarchal) in Rome, with the αὐτοκεφαλία and independence, the no subordination, or subjection of other Primates. For 'tis manifest that this was the last thing mentioned in the close of Sect. 5. and then Sect. 6. begins thus: This hath formerly been manifested. What this? Why sure the immediate Antecedent, that that eminence is reconcileable. And this appears beyond all dispute, by the place to which I refer, where I say it had been manifested, the discourse of the Original, and power, and dignity, of Primates and Patriarchs, viz. chap. 3. Sect. 21.

where I had manifested this very thing (but did not so early attempt to manifest that which I had not then till chap. 4. so much as proposed, that the Pope was not head of the Church) And this, and this only, is it, which I there say is put beyond all control by that Canon of Ephesus. And so certainly it is; for 'tis there determined that the Bishops of Cyprus shall δι' ἑαυτῶν χειροτονίας ποιεῖσθαι, be ordained by themselves (i. e. by their own Metropolitan, the Bishop of Salamis, or which is all one, Constantia (Κωνσταντία ἡ Κύπρε Σάλαμις, saith Stephanus) and his Council of Bishops) and so in that respect be independent from Antioch, though Antioch were the Patriarchate of the Orient of which Cyprus was a Province.

3. And whatsoever S W. suggests, of a dependency of subjection to the Jurisdiction of another, though they never received from that other their ordination] 'tis perfectly gratis dictum; and if it had any truth in it, 'twere yet a pitiful refuge; For though all other jurisdiction be not particularly named in the Canon, yet in all reason it must be concluded from the story, that Cyprus was exempt from Antioch in that respect, as well as of ordination. For this, saith Severinus Binius, was the occasion of the Canon, Johannes Antiochenus sibi Cyprias Ecclesias subdere moliebatur, the Bishop of Antioch indeavoured to bring the Cyprian Churches under him; and, Decretum fuit ne Johannes Cyprias Ecclesias neve alii Episcopi alias Ecclesias invaderent, It was decreed that John should not invade the Churches of Cyprus, and farther intended, that other Bishops should not invade other Churches; and this say both the Scholiasts on the Canon, by force of the * Canon of Antioch and the ‖ Apostolick Canon, which forbids Bishops to usurp ordination, εἰς τὰς μὴ ὑποκειμένας αὐτοῖς ἐπαρχίας, on Provinces which are not subject to them, supposing Cyprus not to be thus subject to Antioch, and therefore that this was an invasion to require to ordain the Bishops there, and accordingly Balsamon calls the Archbishop of Cyprus αὐτοκέφαλον (ἄνευ μόνων τῶν αὐτοκεφάλων Ἀρχιεπισκόπων, τῶν Βλαγαρίας φημὶ, καὶ τῶν Κύπρε) one that was head to himself, no more under Antioch for jurisdiction than for ordination. And it visibly appears by some contests of this kind, which soon after followed: as when Dioscurus Deacon of Antioch, to gratifie Peter then Bishop there, prest vehemently at Constantinople, that the Bishops of Cyprus should be subjected to Antioch. (See Surius die 11 Junii; and Baronius c. 6. an. 485. n. 63.) By which it is as evident that all other ἐλευθερίαι, and independency from Antioch, remained intire to Cyprus as well as that of ordination, viz. that that Island having not been converted from Antioch, but by Barnabas his preaching immediately, should remain αὐτοκέφαλον under its own Primate: And then what was thus defined in respect of Antioch, did certainly exclude all imaginable pretensions to the like of any other Patriarch, no cause being conceivable, why that which was free within it self, and so not dependent on Antioch, the Patriarchate of the Orient, should fall under the power of any other Patriarch, which had no more power than Antioch.

4. 'Tis true indeed, Cedrenus saith, that in Zeno's time being taken from Antioch 'twas put under Constantinople, ἔκλοτε, saith he, γέγονε μητρόπολις ἡ Κύπρος, καὶ τῶν μὴ τελεῖν ὑπὸ Ἀντιόχειαν, ἀλλὰ ὑπὸ Κωνσταντινούπολιν, From that time Cyprus became a Metropolis, and was not under Antioch, but Constantinople. But there are more errors than one in those few words; one mistake there is, in making the Island the Metropolis; he should have said Salamis, or Constantia the chief City of that Island: a second, that in Zeno's time it commenced a Metropolis; which was so, long before, at the Council of Ephesus; nay even ἀπ' ἀρχῆς from the first conversion: a third, that it now ceased to be under Antioch, which as appears both by ancient custom and Canons, mentioned in the Council of Ephesus long before Zeno, was never under Antioch: and a fourth beyond the size of all the former, that being taken from Antioch, it now was put under Constantinople (which could not have been done without great injury both to Cyprus and Antioch too) whereas it is clear, that it was at that time vindicated to its αὐτοκεφαλία, and so after confirmed by Justinian (both which are taken notice of by Nicephorus, Hist. 16. c. 37. though mixt with some other manifest mistakes) and when the Archbishop of Cyprus was driven thence by the Barbarians, and betook himself to Justinianopolis, he there retained the same liberty, that he held by the Ephesine Canon, as may appear by the sixth Council in Trullo, Can. 39. which decrees, τὸ παρὰ τῶν Ἐφέσῳ ---- τῷ θρόνῳ τῷ προγεγραμμένῳ ἀνδρὶ παρασχεθέντα προνόμια ἀκαινοτόμητα παραφυλαχθῆναι, that the priviledges confirmed to that See by the Ephesine Fathers, should be preserved to him intire: ὥστε τὴν νέαν Ἰουστινιανόπολιν τὸ δίκαιον ἔχειν τῆς Κωνσταντινοπόλεως, so that new Justinianopolis to which John Archbishop of Constance was now removed, shall have the right of Constantinople, i. e. be as free and independent in his own Province, as the Bishop of Constantinople is in his: unless, as Phil. Berterius conjectures, it should be rather read τῆς Κωνσταντίων πόλεως, that the Bishop being thus removed, shall retain the priviledges that belonged to that former City the Metropolis of Cyprus, Salamis or Constantia. But this by the way, as a digression, not to satisfie any importunities of S. W. but to prevent mistakes.

5. Mean while what was thus defined there, in behalf of Cyprus, being by that Canon expresly affirmed to extend to all other Churches in like manner (the thing being lookt on as κοινὸν πάθος, a common disease, and τῶν πάντων ἐλευθερίας ἁπλόμενον, that which concerned the liberty of all, and proportionably, care taken for the cure of all, τὸ αὐτὸ δὲ καὶ ἐπὶ τῶν ἄλλων διοικήσεων, καὶ τῶν ἁπανταχοῦ ἐπαρχιῶν παραφυλαχθήσεται, the same shall be observed in the other Dioceses (that was the word that then belonged to the fourteen divisions of the Empire, of which Rome was one) and all the Provinces every where) must in all reason be of equal and full force to the vindicating of the liberties of all other Primates, as well as of Cyprus, and an evidence that the Preeminence of a few Patriarchs is no prejudice to the freedom and independency of the many Primates and Metropolitans in the world; which being so, it is clear that what I pretended to prove from the Ephesine Canon, was really proved from it.

6. In conclusion of that 6. Sect. upon mention of that order given in that Canon indefinitely against all invasions for time to come, in whatsoever Diocese, that no Bishop shall usurp a power where from the Apostles times he had not enjoyed it, I add [which how directly it prejudges the pretensions of Rome, as well as Antioch, is so manifest, that it cannot need farther demonstrating. Here saith S. W. Dr. H. supposes it a first principle evident by the light of Nature, or begs it gratis, that the Pope hath thus incroached, though that be the only thing in controversie] and there is a Syllogism formed to shew the grosness of my arguing, and on this there is great rejoycing.

But

But to this I answer, 1. That there be divers things (beside first principles, evident by the light of nature) which need no farther demonstrating; such are those that are sufficiently testified already, such are matters of fact, obvious to every mans observation. And of this nature is that which I here speak of, that Rome pretends, and so usurps, a power, where from the Apostles times she hath not enjoyed it. The power which Rome pretends to, is universal over all the world of Christians. And is it not visible, that this hath not been enjoyed by her through all time ἀνωθεν καὶ ἐξ ἀρχῆς? The Abassines sure are a very considerable part of the world, and yet were not from their first plantation, ὑπὸ τὴν χεῖρα, under the hand, or power of the Bishop of Rome, ἢ τῶν πρὸ αὐτοῦ, or of his predecessors in that See. The Histories of those Æthiopick Christians tell us, that they were very early, Primi, vel inter Primos, the first or among the first of the Gentiles converted to the faith, first by Indica, the Eunuch whom Philip baptized, Acts 8. then more fully by S. Matthew, qui distributo Apostolis Orbe Æthiopiam sortito obtinuit, who in the division of the world among the Apostles, had Æthiopia for his Province; that by the Arabick * Canons, their chief Bishop is called Catholicus, & loco Patriarchæ, but hath not the power of Patriarch for Ordination, &c. but is under the See of Alexandria; that they ‖ use not the Roman Rites, but are averse from them, * fast exactly on Wednesdays and Fridays; and taste nothing till Sun set, and many the like; ‖ have kept no kind of Communion with Europe, till by the Portugueses navigation thither, David their King was inclined to desire the friendship of Emmanuel King of Portugal, and wrote to Pope Clement the seventh, that he acknowledged the Bishop of Rome Pastor of the Universal Church: yet when upon this, soon after, Pope Julius the third sent Johannes Nonnius to be their Patriarch, Claudius the successor of that David rejecting him, the design vanisht, and came to nought. And so still the power of their Ecclesiastical affairs remains in their own Patriarch, saith Damian à Goes. I shall therefore only ask S. W. whether from S. Matthews time to this, the Bishop of Rome hath enjoyed a power over the Abassines? and if not, whether without breach of the Ephesine Canon he can now pretend to have any such power, or whether this need any further demonstrating? 7.

Or if he be unwilling to go so far off, for the perfecting this demonstration, I shall need draw him no farther than these Brittish Islands of ours (the matter of our present controversie) and desire him to shew me any evidences, which may clear the Bishop of Romes pretensions to the supream jurisdiction over these Churches at the time of the Ephesine Council, and ἐξ ἀρχῆς ἀνωθεν from the time of planting the Christian faith here, till then: If he can, I desire he will produce them, and shew us, what Bishops of Rome they were which exercised it. If he cannot, then the Canon of Ephesus defines μὴ καταλαμβάνειν, that he shall not assume any such power, or if he have assumed, that he shall ἀποδιδόναι, make restitution, quit, and disclaim that power. And so this, I hope, needs no further demonstration. 8.

Secondly, That what I say, needs no farther demonstrating, is not by me supposed, or begged as a Principle, but as a conclusion so far formerly inferred, that on this occasion, loco non suo, it needed not be farther demonstrated. The interposition of the word [farther] prevented all this triumph of his. For to omit all that had been said in the former chapter, which I must be allowed to think, had so far disproved the Popes pretended Universal jurisdiction in the very fountain of it, the universal Pastorship of S. Peter, that I should not be bound under the pain of begging the question, to prove it anew in every Paragraph of the ensuing discourse; to omit this, I say, the Section immediately precedent had manifested, that Rome was no more than a Patriarchate; and then, looking upon it as such, and no more, the conclusion was irrefragable, that Romes present pretensions are incroachments, and most directly not only prejudiced, but destroyed by that Canon: For 1. as a Patriarch, 'tis not imaginable that the Bishop of Rome can have any authority farther than his own Patriarchal Province, and that is not the whole world, because there be other Patriarchs, and each of them hath his distinct assignation of Province. And 2. A Patriarch hath no jurisdiction over the Primates in his own Province, the Authority of Primates and Patriarchs being the same, as hath been shewed out of Anacletus, Tr. of Schism, p. 58. And 3. Some Metropolitans were exempt from the power of the Patriarch, as is evident by the Ephesine Canon. And so still this is destructive to Romes pretensions to Universal jurisdiction upon this account, which had formerly from the Canon of Chalcedon been proved to belong to it, of its being a Patriarchy. And 4. the Ephesine Canon referring to ancient and original Canons and customs, it must be supposed to agree to the sixth Canon of Nice. Now in that Nicene Canon 'tis plain, that there are bounds and limits supposed to belong to every Patriarchate, and order given that they shall be observed; that order expresly given for Alexandria, that Ægypt, Lybia, and Pentapolis shall belong to that, and the Bishop of Alexandria πάντων τούτων ἔχειν τὴν ἐξουσίαν, to have the power of all them; and the reason given for the observing those bounds, ἐπειδὴ καὶ τῷ ἐν ῥώμῃ ἐπισκόπῳ τοῦτο συνηθὲς ἐστιν, because this also is customary to the Bishop of Rome. Where unless the Roman Diocese were limited, it could not possibly be a copy, and reason of the limiting of the Alexandrian (sure 'twould never be deemed reasonable to say, Alexandria must have limits, because Rome hath, if it were possible to affirm that Rome had none) which yet that it was (besides the evidence of the words themselves) 'tis the expres affirmation of one of their own Popes, Nicholas 1. Epist. 8. Nicena Synodus Romanæ Ecclesiæ nullum contulit incrementum, sed potius ex ejus forma quod Alexandrinæ Ecclesiæ tribueret, particulariter sumpsit exemplum. The Nicene Synod conferred no increase on Rome, but rather took from Rome an example particularly, what to give to the Church of Alexandria. And then if at the making of the Nicene Canon, Rome had bounds, it must needs follow by the Ephesine Canon, that those bounds must be to all time observed, and so that will be most destructive to the Universal (for that is boundless, unlimited) Pastorship of that See. So that having now joyned the force of the Nicene and Ephesine Canon into one, I shall flatter my self, that it will not be easily broken asunder by S. W. And so, though much more might be fitly added to this purpose (and somewhat hath been said in the Reply, Ch. 5. Sect. 5.) this shall suffice at this time, till S. W. shall undertake to reconcile a limited Diocese with universal Pastorship; or shew that by the Nicene Canon, the Roman was not then such; or that being such then, it could commence so afterward, without violation of the Ephesine. 9.

SECT. VII.

Justiniana, Αὐτοκέφαλ. Receiving the Pall, no sign of subjection anciently. Since, it hath brought in gain and power to the Papacy. Supremacy in his own Province, not reconcileable with subjection to the Pope. A Manuscript chidden for being old, and of no antiquity. All Primates supream in their Province. The dignity conferr'd by the Emperor, not the Pope. Locus Apostolicæ sedis. Τόπ, for dignity, τόπον ἔχειν φυλάττειν. All the Popes substitutes are not his subjects. Subjection for Ordination must be subjection. Ordination of Primates by their own Council. Of inferior Bishops by Primates. Few independent Archbishopricks. All Primates such. Independency of Primates is no denying the Catholick Church. The Government whereof is not Monarchick. The Doctrine of the Councils, which the Pope vows to maintain, unreconcileable with universal Pastorship. The Milevitan and Constantinopolitan Canon. The Canon of Nice cited by the Pope, but not found in the Authenticks.

1. WHat he adds in the latter part of this second Sect. concerning Justiniana Prima, hath in part been prevented in the Reply, ch. 5. sect. 6. But some things are said by S. W. which were not there tendred, and therefore a few words may be thought due to them: First, saith he, Justinian's constitution is no decree of a Council.] Neither said I it was; yet being the constitution of a Christian Emperor, and formally inserted into the body of the Law, and never checked at (that we discern, or is pretended) either by any Council, or by the Bishops of the Church then living, or noted as irregular, or intrenchment on the Priviledges or Jurisdiction of the Church of Rome, or any other, and yet instating on that City all Ecclesiastical censure, supream Priesthood, supream dignity, it is a competent evidence, that this might lawfully be done, and consequently that the Church of a City and Province under it, might be exempt from all foreign Jurisdiction, αὐτοκέφαλ, within it self. And then that is all that it was produced to testifie.

2. Secondly, saith he, Justinians fact (in case he had pretended it) is not able to invalidate that sacred dignity of head of the Church, had any such been constituted by our Saviour. But here is a begging the question, that the Pope was by our Saviour constituted head of the Church; and it matters not what Justinians constitution would have done in that case, when it is so far from being granted that this was the case. It is much more reasonable to assume, that he was not in that age deemed head of the Church, or universal Pastor, by Christs constitution, when this act of the Emperor, which supposes the contrary, was yet entred into the Law, and stood in full effect, and never appears to be by any in that time lookt on as an injury or innovation.

3. Thirdly, saith he, Justinian never intended to crop the aspiring growth of Rome, as the Dr. imagines, which is manifest by his sending to Pope Vigilius to bestow a Pall upon his new Archbishop.] And truly I never said Justinian intended it; he intended only kindness, and to express that, honour and power to the place of his own birth, Achrida a City of Bulgaria, making it an Archiepiscopal See, and subjecting many regions to it, but leaving it subject to none, an image of his own αὐτοκεφαλία, or independent power. And this was no kind of diminution of that Patriarchal power, which Rome then had, the absoluteness of Primates being, as was shewed, reconcileable with that; and this that Justiniana now had, being no more than such. And at this time, whilest Justinian reigned, the Bishop of Rome had not ascended to any greater sublimity than that of the first Patriarch; the title of universal Bishop, which signifies that unlimited power, and Pastorship, which is now pretended to, being the concession of Phocas to Boniface, after the reign of Justinian. And therefore it signifies very little, what is here added for an evidence on S. W. his side, viz. Pope Vigilius his sending him a Pall. That was an honorary ornament, which the Emperors first gave the Patriarchs, and the Patriarchs sent to Archbishops and Metropolitans (but was in the East, common to all Bishops) and was then far from what since it hath been taught to be, a sign of subjection to him that sends it. The ancient custom was for the new Archbishop to make his profession of the Christian faith before his Patriarch, and from him to receive the Pall, as appears by the words of * Pelagius in the Canon Law; But latter Popes have made this, matter of gain first, and then of Power to themselves: Of gain, as appears in || Gregories Epistle to John Bishop of Corinth, where he notes this in his Predecessors, but saith an Act of Council had lately past against it. As for some * Xenia, gifts or presents, though he tells the Archbishop of this Justiniana, that he would not have received such à prædatis & afflictis fratribus, from pillaged and distrest brethren (which seems no rejecting them from others) yet upon remonstrance, that they were sent as an offering to God, he receives them from him. As for power and gain both, Pope Hildebrand laid the grounds, who required that every Archbishop should personally come to Rome (bringing presents was a consequent to that) and receive the Pall, which formerly had used to be sent; and Paschalis II. that soon followed him, made a decree that they that asked the Pall should make an oath of fidelity to him; And so now the receiving the Pall may be an argument for S. W. to witness subjection to the Papal power, but signified no such thing in Vigilius his time, and so is no prejudice to the αὐτοκεφαλία, and summum fastigium, the independent power (as of a Primate) which Justinian conferr'd upon him.

* Fidem tuam sanctæ sedi Apostolicæ exponere, usumque Pallii expetere & excipere. Corp. Jur. Decret. part. 1. Dist. 100. c. 1.

Novit sanctitas tua quia prius pallium nisi dato commodo non dabatur.
* Epist. 15. ad Corp. Jur. Decret. par. 1. Dist. 63. Quia.

4. Fourthly, He will hope to get some advantage by our answer to this question, Whether all Ecclesiastical Jurisdiction, supream Priesthood and supream honour, must mean a supremacy over the whole Church, or only in his own particular Dioceses? and supposing with reason that the former will not be said, he fastens on the latter, and then, saith he, he might be supream there, and yet subject to the Pope too.] But to this I answer, that acknowledging it to belong to him only in his own Province, now assigned him by Justinian, it must yet necessarily exclude the Popes Jurisdiction over him. For he that is supream within himself, and hath power finally to conclude all differences, within his own Province, so that there shall be no resort to any other; is certainly so supream in his own Province, that he is not subject to the Pope. And this was the expres priviledge of Justiniana, in the Constitution set out by Gothofred, Gothofred, Dirimant, finem imponant, nec ad alium quemvis eatur; and if other Primates may have the ſame priviledge, and exemption from all foreign Juriſdiction, I have little more to ask of S. W. for the gaining the whole Controverſie; for then our Primates ſhall have final, concluſive power within their own Provinces, and the Biſhop of Rome have nothing of juriſdiction here, which was all, (if not ſomewhat more) that by this inſtance I deſigned to demonſtrate.

It was therefore but neceſſary, that the witneſs that adventured to ſpeak ſo contrary to S. W. his 5.
intereſt, ſhould in the next place, be defamed; The teſtimony, ſaith he, is from an old Mouſe-eaten Manuſcript of he knows not what authority; and yet after he hath called it old, &c. he adds, it is of no antiquity nor humanity, and yet after all this, he ſaith moſt truly, that he hath not ſeen the Book, and it is hard to be found.]

I wiſh his memory would ſerve him from the beginning to the end of a period, or that he would teach 6.
us the new art of diſcerning, how that is old, which is of no antiquity; or how he can affirm that to be Mouſe-eaten, which he confeſſeth, he hath not ſeen. But the ſhort is, the weakeſt anſwers may, by being well worded, be much improved; and accordingly, the authority of an ancient Manuſcript, publiſhed by a learned Man, and ready for all men to view, that can but read, may be invalidated, and put off with the bare ſcorn, firſt of old (which ſeriouſly ſpoken, were the greateſt honor to it; ſure new Manuſcripts are not like new clothes, but like new wine, and new friends, the old are infinitely better) and then of hard to be found, and Mouſe-eaten, which are equally pertinent, and true; and for want of more evaſions, the Latine muſt be ſaid to have no humanity nor antiquity in it; and but one thing really wanting all this while, all degree of care that there ſhould be any the leaſt colour or appearance of truth in all this.

And when his conſcience could not but tell him this, and how diſcernible it was, he muſt then ſtill 7. proceed, and add, that this teſtimony is ſtill nothing to the purpoſe.

And can any man imagine him to think, what now he ſaith, who would call in, and make uſe of 8.
ſuch ſtrange preluſory arts to divert it? Sure if the force of this inſtance had been avoidable, and he had heartily thought it ſo, that would have been earlier ſaid, he would not have put himſelf upon the ſo much harder and leſs creditable task of reconciling contradictions.

But wherefore is it not to the purpoſe? Why, ſaith he, here is nothing ſaid which was not common to 9.
the Patriarchs, and ſuch Metropolitans as Cyprus was, to wit, that they had no ordinary appeal further, which, ſaith he, no way hinders but that extraordinary caſes, which could not be ended among themſelves, ſhould be carried to Rome: and ſo (he concludes) this leaves this Biſhop as ſubject to the Pope, as any of the Patriarchs, or any out of the Patriarchate of the Weſt was:] And truly I can grant this concluſion, and yet receive as much benefit by this teſtimony, find it as much to my purpoſe, as I ever deſigned it to be. For I that conceive (and have ſhewed) every Patriarch to have ἴσα πρεσβεῖα, equal power and priviledges with the Biſhop of Rome: (place only excepted, and the honorary conſequents of that) and 2. Every Primates power to be equal to a Patriarchs, and to be abſolute and independent from him; ſhall moſt willingly grant that neither Juſtiniana nor Carthage, after their exemption, aſcended any higher than theſe; and yet am thereby competently ſecured, that Rome had no juriſdiction over it, either ordinary or extraordinary; for ſo certainly the ſummum ſignifies, and the finem imponant, and the nec ad alium quemvis eatur, the ſupreme power, concluſive, and excluſive of all others, unleſs either there be higher than the ſupreme, poſterior to the laſt, and ſome-body who is no-body, and the Biſhop of Rome be all theſe.

There is no other force in this argument, but that which is willingly yielded to S. W. that what 10.
thus appears to have been the ſtate of Juſtiniana, is really the ſtate of all Primates; and then, when it is his own concluſion, I hope he will not chide me for aſſuming it, that in very deed every Primate, and ſo the Biſhop of Canterbury in this Nation, hath the ſupreme Prieſthood, Dignity, Juriſdiction belonging to him, within his own Province, that he hath power of defining all controverſies finally, without farther reſort or appeal, ad alium quemvis, to any other. And that is all S. W. hath as yet acquired by this anſwer.

A next Attempt he makes out of my own Teſtimony from Juſtinian, Nov. 131. c. 3. which he re- 11.
ſolves, will determine it for him after all this.] The words are, he ſhall have locum Apoſtolicæ ſedis, which he will render, he ſhall be in all that Dioceſs the Popes Legate, and after, he ſhall have the place or lieu of the Apoſtolical ſeat, or be the Popes ſubſtitute, asking me where I have read the Greek τόπος explicated for honour or dignity.] To this I anſwer, 1. That it were to be wiſht that he would provide him ſome teſtimonies of his own, and not ſo wholly, and ſo conſtantly rely on the advantages which his arts and dexterities can extract out of thoſe which I have produced againſt him; he muſt be a greater Maſter than S. W. yet appears to be, that can come thus weaponleſs into the field, and yet undertake to be a Diſarmer: Mean while 'tis viſible where his confidence (not his ſtrength) lies: it is pure ſlight of hand, that muſt work his victories, and ſupply all his want out of his enemies Magazin. How well this truſt hath yet ſucceeded to him, hath formerly appeared, as oft as it hath been depended on, and now it is as viſible as ever. To evidence it, I ſhall but demand, who it was that gave the Arch-Biſhop of Juſtiniana this priviledge (and that not perſonally to the firſt, but to all that ſhould ſucceed in that See) was it the Pope, or the Emperour? If it had been the Pope, there might have been ſome colour for S. W. his affirmations, for then he might reaſonably be yielded to make his own Legate or Subſtitute; and perhaps, to do it to a whole ſucceſſion, to affix that honour to a particular See. But it is plain, my Teſtimony was fetcht out of Juſtinian's Novel, not out of Vigilius's Epiſtle, an extract or Copy of the Emperours (διάταξις) conſtitution, not of the Popes deputation. And I hope the Emperour is not ſo much Maſter of the Popes Acts and will, as that he can decree, to whom (to all poſterity) the Pope ſhall give his Deputations. If he be, this is as much as I ſhall demand at this time; and that, I am ſure the Novel will give me, that whatſoever is meant by this locum Apoſtolicæ ſedis, the place of the Apoſtolical See, it was not by the Pope, which ordain'd the firſt Biſhop of Juſtiniana (yet none of the ſucceeding) but by the Emperour, who raiſed that See to that ſummum faſtigium, ſupreme height, conferr'd upon him.

12. In this matter it is possible S. W. may have a little mistaken my meaning, and therefore to cure it in him, or to prevent that possibility in others, I assure him I mean by the phrase, locum Apostolicæ sedis, the same that he would have me, the place of the Apostolick, as that signifies the Roman seat. And though the particle [an] instead of [the] may seem to prejudice that sense, yet I never made that use of it, but contrariwise in the Reply, added the Greek words, which take away all ambiguity, τόπον ἐπέχειν αὐτὸν τῆ Αποστολικῆ Ῥώμης θρόνῳ, that he shall in the Provinces subject to him, hold the place of the Apostolical throne of Rome; But still this is far enough from favouring S. W. his pretension, of his being no more but the Popes substitute. For as that is already prejudged, by the Emperors giving him this place; so other circumstances concur, to avert that interpretation. 1. The expres's words of * Julianus Anteces'sor, Nov. 109. Archiepiscopum Justinianæ Primæ eadem jura super Episcopos sibi subjectos habere, quæ Papa Romanus habet super Episcopos sibi suppositos, that the Arch-Bishop of Justiniana shall have the same rights over the Bishops that are under him, which the Pope of Rome hath over the Bishops that are under him. This gives him as clear an example of my interpretation of τόπον, and as full an answer to his question, as he could have wisht; He asks where I met it, for honour and dignity? And I answer, I rendred it place or dignity, and here it signifies that, yea and more added to it, the power and jurisdiction over those which are under him, equal, because the same, with those which Rome had over her subjects. And if he desire more testimonies for this notion of τόπος, I shall not omit to satisfie his curiosity in that also, though it be now very impertinent, and superfluous. ‖ Of Alexandria, Dion. Chrysostom hath these words, ἡ δὲ πόλις ὑμῶν τῷ μεγέθει καὶ τῷ τόπῳ πλεῖστον ὅσον διαφέρει, καὶ περιφανῶς ἀποδέδεικται δευτέρα τῶν ὑπὸ τὸν ἥλιον, for your City doth very much excel both in greatness and place (sure that must be dignity, attending that greatness) and is illustriously demonstrated to be the second of all under the Sun, i. e. next unto Rome in dignity. So when Josephus saith of Antioch, τρίτον ἀδηρίτως ἐπὶ τῆς ὑπὸ Ῥωμαίοις οἰκουμένης ἔχει τόπον, it hath the third place in the world which is under Rome, he expresses what he means by τόπον, μεγέθους ἕνεκα καὶ ἄλλης εὐδαιμονίας, such as belongs to it in respect of the greatness, and other felicity; that, sure, is the dignity of that City. And what thinks he of the words of Ausonius, Ambarum locus unus, they have both of them the same place; that sure must be the same dignity. And if S. W. will but have patience to spend a very little necessary time in Books, I believe he will soon be able to throw in more examples under this head.

13. Lastly, S. W. must learn a difference betwixt τόπον ἔχειν, ἐπέχειν, to have, to hold a place, on one side, and τόπον τηρεῖν, φυλάττειν, διέπειν, to keep, supply, and minister a place, on the other side. The latter of these indeed doth constantly belong to a substitute, as of the Pope, &c. his τοποτηρητὴς, or place-keeper, which the Law deduces ἐκ τῆ τηρεῖν, ὅ ἐστι φυλάσσειν ἤτοι ἀναπληρῶν τὺς τόπυς τῶν κελλόντων αὐτὺς, from keeping or supplying the places of them who send them, as is frequently to be met with in the subscriptions of Councils; But to τόπον ἔχειν or ἐπέχειν, to have or hold a place, (as when they are used of having the first or second place) that sense of substitution or vicegerency is not applicable, but this other of having, or possessing such a dignity, as one's own, in his own right; I shall not need to seek instances of this, the thing being fully cleared, as far as concerns the business in hand, by comparing the words of Julianus Antecessor, even now vouched, with these in Justinian's Novel, both speaking of the very same thing, and one expressing it by τόπον ἐπέχειν, locum habere, to have the place, and the other by habere eadem jura, or δίκαια, to have the same rights or powers, which evidently proves the matter in hand, and satisfies his demand, that τόπος place doth, and doth in this Novel, signifie dignity, and that the place of the Apostolick seat of Rome, is the same power in his, that the Pope hath in his Dioceß, which was the thing incumbent on me to be proved.

Vid. Zonaram in Præf. ad Concil. Carthag. p. 384.

14. And having thus far attended him, One farther misadventure there is yet in this Answer of S. W. (and there could not have been more expected in one paragraph) For having resolved from the words of the Novel, that this Bishop was the Popes Legate in all that Dioceß; he concludes it thence clear, that his Dioceß remained, notwithstanding all these priviledges, subject to the Pope.

15. How clearly this is hence deducible, will soon be discerned; That the Pope may choose one of his subjects to be his Legates, I willingly grant; but it follows not from hence, nor from any other medium here tendred by S. W. that this holds in conversion, that whosoever is his Legate, is his subject. And yet this is absolutely necessary to the clear inferring his conclusion from this medium, it being certain that he which by being the Popes Legate is not made free from his subjection, may yet be upon some other account; such is the Emperors giving him here the summum fastigium, and the final, conclusive, and exclusive power forementioned.

16. Now that the Pope may have a Legate or Substitute, who is not his subject, may 1. appear by the testimony of Balsamon in his Preface to the Council in Trullo. Where both from the nature of a Legate de latere, that it is one that must ὅτε δεήσει, παρεσιδεῖν, represent his person, when it is needful, and from the Bishop of Thessalonica, Athens, Corinth, Crete, Patræ, and Ravenna and others thus representing him, over whom, saith he, the Pope hath no δίκαιον χειροτονίας, right of ordination, he concludes, ἐκείνυς εἶναι τῶ Παπᾶ λεγάτυς ὲς ὁ καθ' ἕνα τύτων ὑρίζατο, ὁ μὲν ἔχειν τοσύτης ὑπεροχῆς ἐπισκόπυς ὑφ' ἑαυτὸν-----That those are the Popes Legats, whom he hath particularly chosen, but yet that they are not all within his bounds under him, but that this of having Legates was invented because of the length of the way, not as of his subjects, but as of those that were neerest at hand, to represent him the more easily.

Pag. 359.

17. If Balsamons judgment be not here thought fit to be taken, as being no friend to the Roman greatness (though I know no obligation lies on me to rely on no body but S. W. his friends, as long as he is so careful not to believe, or be concluded by his enemies, that in this, and generally in his affirmations, he makes use of no other but his own testimony) I shall offer this confirmation of it. A superior (or an equal) may have the proxy of an inferior, and be substituted by him, as is evident in the Guardian substituted by the Pupil, and acting for him. And so a Bishop may in Council have the proxy, and so represent the person of another Bishop from whom he hath no dependence, or subjection. Philippi was a Metropolis of a Province of Macedonia. Besides the words, Act. 16. 12. πρώτη πόλις τῆς μερίδος, a first or prime City of that portion of Macedonia, ‖ Photius is clear in it, ἡ Φιλίππων πόλις τῆς Μακεδόνων ἐπαρχίας μητρόπολις ἔσα, the City of Philippi the Metropolis of a Province of Macedonia, and by being ſuch, it is ſecured from being under any other (no more than) Metropolis. Yet in the great Council of Epheſus, Flavianus of Philippi ſupplied the place of Rufus of Theſſalonica, and ſo was his Legate, had his τόπον place, in S. W. his ſenſe. And I ſuppoſe nothing is more ordinary in Councils than this, that one Metropolitan, that is preſent, ſhall receive the proxy, and ſupply the place of any other Metropolitan indifferently, without loſing his liberty, or becoming his ſubject, or inferior, whoſe place he ſupplies: and if in thoſe parts, the Biſhop of Juſtiniana were by the Pope thus delegated, and made his perpetual ſubſtitute (as by the Novel 'tis plain he was not, for whatſoever was meant by it, 'tis evident that from the Emperour he had it, not from the Pope) yet would not that conclude him ſubject to the Pope, when the Emperour's ſo liberal donations had explicitely exempted him.

His next anſwer, or endeavour (again, after his old manner) to ſhew me doing againſt my ſelf, and 18.
by a Teſtimony out of Nicephorus, convincing, as he ſuggeſts, all my proceſs of nullity, was made uſe of before him by the Cath. Gent. and is anſwered in the Reply, ſect. 5. n. 5, &c.

But we are not yet at end of this matter. For beſide that from the Pope's ordaining the firſt Biſhop, 19.
he will needs conclude, that he conſented to his erection (which I ſhall willingly grant, ſo he mean not authoritative conſent, aſſuring my ſelf the erection was an act of the Emperour only, wherein the Pope had nothing to do) and ſo ſomewhat again, from his giving him the Pall, though he know not well what; It was, ſaith he, a ſign of ſuperiority, and a kind of benediction, and at leaſt an honour, if not a juriſdiction (and if it were thus, then perhaps it was no juriſdiction, and I have accounted for this of the Pall already) beſide theſe, I ſay, he proceeds in theſe words, In the next Paragraph the Doctor tells us, that this particularity that his Succeſſors were to be conſecrated by their Council of Metropolitans, is a ſecond inſtance of the point in hand; and (ſaith he) I do not deny, but ſometimes to be ſubject for ordination, was a ſign of ſubjection, but not always. The Biſhop of Oſtia hath the priviledge to conſecrate the Pope, yet the Pope is not held to be his ſubject.---]

Here be ſome conſiderable frailties diſcernible; firſt, in his intellective faculty, which had made this 20.
particularity, that his Succeſſors were to be conſecrated by their Council--- to be a ſecond inſtance of the point in hand, whereas 'tis moſt evident in the place, that the whole precedent diſcourſe of the erection, and independency of Juſtiniana Prima, and not only this branch of it, was the ſecond inſtance, as the priviledges of the Archbiſhop of Carthage had been the former, p. 101. but this was but a ſlip. What then was the ſecond, that to be ſubject for ordination was ſometimes a ſign of ſubjection, but not always. In propriety of ſpeaking indeed, being ſubject cannot be a ſign of ſubjection, either always, or ſometimes; but yielding him that impropriety alſo, what ſhall we ſay to this part of the propoſition, being ſubject for ordination, is not always a ſign of ſubjection] This is ſomething like the hard headed reſpondent, that ſatisfied himſelf, that a Gooſe-pie was not a Pye; for none but that ſort of Logick can ever conclude, that he that is ſubject for ordination is not ſubject.

But ſure S. W. had here ſome good meaning alſo, that ſubjection for ordination doth not argue all 21.
kind of ſubjection, or that he may be ſubject for ordination, that is not ſubject for juriſdiction: But 1. this is no way proved; 2. it can by no means be aſſiſtant to S. W. unleſs he could prove è converſo, that they that are ſubject for juriſdiction, may yet not be ſubject for ordination, for that only can anſwer my argument of Juſtiniana's not being ſubject to Rome's juriſdiction, becauſe 'twas not ſubject to it for ordination, the Biſhop being to all ſucceſſion allow'd by Juſtinian to be ordained by his own Council of Biſhops.

As for that which he ſaith in the inſtance of Oſtia, that that Biſhop hath the priviledge to conſecrate 22.
the Pope, yet the Pope is not held his ſubject] it might eaſily have been ſeen through by S. W. his Optick. For no doubt the Pope may be conſecrated by him, without being ſubject to him for ordination, as the Patriarch of Conſtantinople was wont to be conſecrated by the Biſhop of Heraclea, one of his Suffragans, or as the Kings of England have generally been crowned by the Biſhop of Canterbury, without any ſubjection on either ſide, either for ordination, or coronation. And ſo all Primates are, I ſuppoſe, to be conſecrated by the Council of their own Biſhops, and there is no ſhew of ſubjection in all this, for it being impoſſible that a Primate ſhall become ſuch, without being conſecrated, it is neceſſarily conſequent to his αὐτοκεφαλία or independence from all other Superiors, that his own Biſhops ſhould conſecrate him, but this without any note of ſubjection herein; But if the caſe be put of a Biſhop which is ſubject to the juriſdiction of ſome ſuperior Biſhop (as S. W. muſt ſuppoſe the Biſhop of Juſtiniana to have been) Metropolitan, Primate, or Patriarch, I ſhall then demand, whether ſubjection for ordination would not be that Biſhops portion, as well as any other kind of ſubjection? To this caſe he knows his inſtance of Oſtia belongs not, and as little that other which he brings of the decree of the Council of Sardica, that the next Province ſhall give Biſhops to a Province that wants, for this is viſibly but an act of charity to thoſe that want that almes; And when that Province is once furniſht, I ſhall ſuppoſe for the future, it may lawfully give Biſhops to it ſelf.

As for his other two inſtances of Alexandria giving the Indians Biſhops, and conſecrating the 23.
Patriarch of Conſtantinople, 'tis notorious that that Patriarch was cuſtomarily conſecrated by his own Suffragan, the Biſhop of Heraclea, and for the Indians, all that is pretended is, that the Patriarch of Alexandria gave them Biſhops, when they wanted, and ſo that falls under the other forementioned head of mercy, which is diſtant from all colour of juriſdiction; or if it did not, I am no way concern'd to vindicate the Indians liberties, or non-ſubjection to that Patriarch; ſo that ſtill it remains moſt firm, that if Juſtiniana prima had been ſubject under the obedience of the Biſhop of Rome, the Biſhops of Rome would have continued to ordain him, as a Primate, or Patriarch ordains all that are under their ſubjection; and this being part of Juſtiniana's priviledge, that the Archbiſhop be ordained by his own Council, as all other independent Archbiſhops (of which the ſtore is not great) and all Primates and Patriarchs are, this is a ſtrong prejudice to the Pope's having any juriſdiction over him.

What here next follows, is by asking, Who can tell what the Doctor means, when he ſaith the Em- 24.
perour did all this only by making Juſtiniana a Primate's or chief Metropolitan's See, and that Carthage's being the prime Metropolis of Africk, is expreſſed by having the ſame priviledges with prima Juſtiniana? pretending that this is nothing elſe, but to mock my Auditory, and that as far as he underſtands, ſtands, theſe words ſignifie that the Emperour ſaid only, be thou a Metropolis, and in ſo ſaying, gave all thoſe priviledges.] 'Tis much, his underſtanding ſhould be rendred ſo incapable in an inſtant, which hath ſerved him ſo faithfully, and ſure paſſed for very pregnant and piercing all this while. It is as if a Man ſhould ſay to himſelf, γενέσθω σκότος, καὶ ἐγένετο, Do not ſee what is before thine eyes, and then let him look never ſo intently, he ſhall be able to deſcry nothing; Otherwiſe ſure the words are plain, and the ſenſe as diſcernible, as of any period in the Book, that every Primacy is really thus independent, as a Primacy, (but that is not all one with a Metropolis, as he would ſet it. Juſtiniana had ſix Metropoles under it, ſaith * Miræus from Nectarius Biſhop thereof:) and ſo that all Juſtinians Privileges beſtowed on Achridæ, the place of his birth, are no more than what every Primate by right enjoyed, and conſequently that when Carthage was raiſed to this Privilege of Independency, or Primacy, being but an Arch-biſhops See, and every ſuch not being neceſſarily a Primacy, the compendious method was, to give it the Privileges of Juſtiniana, which being but an Archbiſhops See, had yet the Independent exemptions of a Primacy.

* Not. Epiſc. l. 1. c. 9.

25. Here is no ſubtilty to torture S.W. his underſtanding, but groſs matter of right, and of fact; the former of which he might have ſeen deictically laid before him, in chap. 3. ſect. 21, &c. if he had not faſtidiouſly overlookt it, indeavouring to perſwade his Reader, that there were not five words in that Chapter which could in any way be preparative to the queſtion before us, whereas indeed nothing can be more to the purpoſe, than the due ſtating the original and rights of Primacies, which was there handled.

26. But perhaps there was ſome obſtruction in the way, which thus made plain ſenſe ſo unintelligible with my otherwiſe quick-ſighted Diſarmer, and if we may believe him, 'twas this, that all the Doctor's labour and the Texts by him cited, wherein every privilege is ſet down ſo particularly, had infuſed this prejudice into him, for, ſaith he, they make it manifeſt that there were none, or not eminent examples of any ſuch Cities, or Biſhopricks, and therefore ſo many particularities were neceſſary to be expreſſed, and it be made an example to others. Yet upon this relieth the Doctors main evidence, and demonſtration, though if you will believe him, the concluſion of it ſelf is moſt certain, and might otherwiſe be teſtified by innumerable evidences, which he ought to ſuppoſe the Doctor omits for brevity ſake.

27. If there be now any ſincerity in this Diſputer, here will be a trial of it: for this prejudice, and miſapprehenſion of his own, being once removed, the matter will be ſo clear before him, that he will not be able to eſcape the apprehending of it.

28. Firſt then he is to know, that every Archbiſhop's See is not independent; Nay, that of ſuch there are but few examples, viz. Juſtiniana, and Cyprus, and Carthage, and Ravenna, and the Metropolis of Iberians, now called the Georgians in Aſia (as * Miræus concludes from the Council of Antioch) and ſo he ſees the reaſon, why four the moſt famous of theſe, were the choſen inſtances to be inſiſted on, viz. of Archiepiſcopal Sees, that were αὐτοκέφαλαι, heads to themſelves, ſubject to no other, whether Primate, or Patriarch, nor conſequently to the Biſhop of Rome.

* Not. Ep. l. 1. c. 9.

29. Secondly, That all Primates are of this independent nature, no way differing from Patriarchs, but in reſpect of place, or order, having, what Juſtinian gave Achridæ, Summum ſacerdotium, ſummum faſtigium, ſummam dignitatem, omnem Eccleſiaſticam Cenſuram, the higheſt Prieſthood and Dignity, all Eccleſiaſtical Juriſdiction, power of deciding all Controverſies within their Province, and doing this ultimately, ſo that it is not lawful to reſort or appeal to any other; and ſo alſo he ſees that there be as many evidences againſt the Pope's Univerſal Paſtorſhip, as there are evidences in Books, of the Independent power of Primates: thoſe I was bold by S. W. his good leave, to call innumerable evidences, not knowing any certain way to help me or him to the certain number of them. And ſo this great poſing riddle is explained, I hope, to S.W. his capacity: and that he may not think my ungrounded affirmations have helpt it to this perſpicuity, I refer him to the Council of Epheſus, where what was adjudged to Conſtantia is extended to all other διοικήσεις or Provinces, that the Primate thereof, he that had been ſo ἐξ ἀρχῆς from the beginning, ſhould be independent from all others; or, if he will, to the conſtitution it ſelf, wherein Juſtiniana's independent power is ſet down, Νεαρ. Διαλαξ. ρλα. For there, as it follows immediately, καὶ ὅμοιον τρόπον---- that the Archbiſhop of Carthage ſhall have this δίκαιον ἀρχιερωσύνης, this priviledge of the Chief Prieſt-hood in the like manner, that Juſtiniana, ſo it concludes. Καὶ ἄλλαι δὲ πόλεις καὶ τούτων ἐπίσκοποι οἷς ἐν διαφόροις τόποις μετροπολιτικὸν δίκαιον παρεσχέθη, τῇ τοιούτῳ προνομίᾳ εἰς τὸ διηνεκὲς ἀπολαυέτωσαν, And other Cities, and the Biſhops of them who in ſeveral places have Metropolitical juriſdiction allowed them, ſhall for perpetuity enjoy the like prerogative. The τοιούτῳ the like] muſt ſurely refer to the precedent examples of Juſtiniana, and Carthage, and then the concluſion is evident, that all Primacies ſhall enjoy the ſame (for ſo I conceive 'tis neceſſary the place muſt be interpreted of Prime Metropoles, or Primacies, and not of every lower Metropolitical See, for ſuch had not that ſupreme Prieſthood, &c.) which was adjudged to Juſtiniana, there being ſix Metropoles, as was ſaid, under that, and many under each Primate.

30. But there is yet one reſerve behind, and that he promiſes, will make any ſenſible man underſtand my former diſcourſes, that they were all vain and wicked, viz. that this my reaſoning from the independent power veſted in each Primate, is the denying of the Catholick Church, of which we ought to be members. And this he thus infers from my diſcourſe, You ſay, ſaith he, every chief Metropolitan was independent from all others, they made therefore ſo many abſolute Churches, therefore made not any one Church; where then is the Catholick Church? many houſes to be one houſe, is as fairly contradictory, as many men or horſes to be one man, or one horſe, and ſo of many Churches to be one Church: Adding from S. Cyprian, that a Church is a People united to their Biſhop: if then, ſaith he, there be a Catholick Church, there muſt be a Catholick Biſhop, and taking away the obedience of one Biſhop, you cannot ſave one Church] What ſolidity there is in this laſt refuge will be ſoon diſcernible, by going along with him ſtep by ſtep: For, 1. The affirming an independent power to be veſted in each Primate, is far from denying a Catholick Church. All thoſe Primates are eminent Governours of ſo many διοικήσεις or diviſions, of which the World firſt, and now the Catholick Church conſiſts.

2. Nothing

2. Nothing here produced by S. W. hinders in the least, but that every such παροικησις dioceß in the ancient notion of that word, for that which contains many Provinces under it, may be an absolute Church, Independent from any Superior on earth, under no others jurisdiction, but that of its own Primate. 31.

For thirdly, when from thence, i. e. from the absoluteneß of all the Primacies, he concludes, that therefore they make not one Church, there is no consequence in that; Many particular, or National Churches, each of them independent from any Superior, may yet fraternally be connected one with another, and make up the Catholick Church, as many Nations of the World, no one subjected to another, but each independent, and αὐτοκέφαλοι, may make up the World, or Universe, and yet these, as now 'tis evident, be under no one Governour on earth, Emperour, or whatever Monarchical [illegible] preme power. And so still his curiosity is satisfied, he sees, where the Catholick Church is. 32.

4. Though many houses cannot be one house, any more than many horses, or men, can be one horse, or man, yet many houses may be one City, many Cities one Province, many Provinces one Dioceß, many Dioceßes one World, or one Catholick Church. And the word Church being both in propriety and vulgar use capable of as many significations, as there can be sorts of Christian cœtus, or assemblies imaginable, is thereupon an ambiguous word, and belongs to the larger, as well as narrower Societies, equally fit to signifie a Parochial, Diocesan, Provincial, National, or Universal Church, and then many of these in the narrower, less comprehensive notion, may yet be but one in the larger, and more comprehensive. Thus we know many heaps may be put together, and make one heap, many Rivers may meet, and make one River; And there can be no need of examples to illustrate this so obvious visible truth, that many Parish Churches among the Romanists, as well as us, make one Diocesan; many Diocesan, one Provincial; many Provincial, one National; and many National, one Catholick Church. And so still for all his colours of the house, the man, and the horse, we have not lost the Catholick Church: such thin Sophisms may be seen through by ordinary eyes, and so, many particulars be as competent as one could wish, to make up an Universal. 33.

5. When S. Cyprian saith, a Church is a People united to their Bishop, 'tis certain he speaks of a particular Church, and so of a particular Bishop. The place where S. Cyprian saith it, is not referred to by him, but I who had * used the testimony, know where to turn to it, Ep. 69. where the Church is defined Plebs Sacerdoti adunata, & pastori suo grex adhærens, a People united to their Priest, a Flock adhering to their Shepherd: and the circumstances of the Epistle make it clear, that the Bishop there mentioned, is such as himself, the Bishop of Carthage, and every of the Coepiscopi with him, and consequently the Church there spoken of, the Church of Carthage, the exact parallel to the Church of Justiniana, now before us; and if you would know how that being a Church, can joyn with other Churches, and remain a Church still, he will tell you in that Epistle, that individual concord and charity of all the members of the Church, is that vinculum unitatis, band of unity, by which all Churches over the whole world may conjoyn and become one together. 34.

* Of Schism, p. 41.

6. When from this one testimony of Cyprian hastily cast down, he makes such full speed to conclude, that if there be a Catholick Church, there must be a Catholick Bishop; what is this but to infer, because Carthage is governed by one Bishop, and every other Dioceß by another, therefore the whole world is govern'd by one Bishop. Because Spain is governed by one King, and France by another, therefore the whole world is governed by one also; which as it is de facto, visibly false, so the unproved asserting of it, is founded on two Hypotheses, neither of which hath the least truth in it. First, that every the vastest body (for such is the Universal Church all the world over) must be under some one particular government; and secondly, that that particular government of the Church must needs be Monarchical; whereas 1. the whole managery of the world is certainly transacted without being under any common governor on earth; and no doubt the affairs of the Church may be so too, a fraternal union and communion of all Patriarchs, or even of all Primates, each ruling in their several Provinces by the Laws of Christ, may suffice for all ordinary wants of all; Ecce Roma, ecce Carthago, ecce aliæ & aliæ civitates, saith S. Augustine, in Psal. 44. filiæ Regum sunt,-----& ex omnibus fit una Regina; Behold Rome, saith he, behold Carthage, behold other, and other Cities, they are daughters of Kings, and of all of them one Queen is made. And 2. for extraordinary, an universal Council, or assembly of all these, may by way of Aristocracy, provide for, and administer them. And so still the Catholick Church is saved, and all our Phænomena preserved intire, without either talking (as he saith, like a Saint) of Christ our head in heaven, or paying all our obedience to any one supreme Bishop upon earth, as to him that is by Christ thus delegated to preside (but will never be able to produce his commission) over the whole world. 35.

This fifth Chapter of the Tr. of Schism I concluded with some words of our Bishops, in Convocation 1537. (and the same are recited again in the Necessary Doctrine, Anno 1543.) and there was great evidence of reason in them, two things affirmed, the truth of which is to be contested by proofs, and if evinced on our side, the whole controversie now depending betwixt us is concluded, 1. That it was many hundred years before the Bishop of Rome could acquire any power of a Primate over any other Bishops, which were not within his Province of Italy. 2. That the Pope now professing at his consecration, that he will inviolably observe all the decrees of the first eight general Councils, among which this is certainly one, that all causes shall be determined within the Province where they be begun, and that by the Bishops of the same Province; this absolutely excludes all foreign and so papal power out of this Realm. Now for the former of these, I thought I had evidenced it by the proofs preceding in that Chapter, the Canons of Chalcedon, and Ephesus, and the Novel about Justiniana, as that was extended like the Ephesine Canon, to all Primates; and then it was no hurt, I hope, to recapitulate in the words of our Bishops. As for the second, it was both built on the same foundation, and also a visible matter of fact in each branch of it, 1. That such was the matter of those Decrees, most unreconcileable with Universal primacy; And 2. That the Pope professes, and vows obedience to all those decrees. And to all this, he hath no least word of reply, but 36.

only in lieu of that, is willing to mistake my procedure, and so to feign that I appealed to our Bishops as to witnesses, and then to answer me with a proverb or two. But to this I reply, 1. That as, for this purpose, I acknowledge them incompetent to be produced to S. W. or others of his perswasion, so I never laid any such weight on their testimony, but only as what they said, had solidity of reason, and somewhat of evidence in it, and so would have deserved some reply from my Disarmer, if it had not been more for his turn and temper, to gibe than to discourse, to divert than to answer arguments.

38. 2. That what I set down as our Bishops conclusion, was by them, if he had pleased to have resorted to the Book, inferred by such reasons, as S. W. will not easily be able to answer, and so could not with justice complain of my brief reference to their conclusion, without setting down their premisses, which was his, not mine advantage. To clear this therefore, and because these Books are not commonly to be had, I shall recite but three of their many heads of argument.

39. 1. From the Milevitan Council, where S. Augustine was present and subscribed it, which decreed excommunicate any Clerk of Africk, that should appeal to any Bishop beyond the Sea.

40. 2. From the General Council of Constantinople, decreeing that every cause, or controversie, should be determined within the Province, where the matter did lye, and that, by the Bishops of the same Province, and that no Bishop should exercise power out of his own Diocese, or Province, this being also the mind of Cyprian, and the other African Fathers, before the time of any General Council.

41. 3. From the story of the sixth Great Council of Carthage, whither the Bishop of Rome sent his Legates to alledge and vindicate his Primacy, and by that title to maintain the receiving of appeals made unto him of controversies commenced in Africk. And when in the debating of this, the Bishop of Rome alledged a Canon of the first Council of Nice, and the Bishops of Africk denied there was any such Canon; for tryal thereof, Messengers were sent to the Patriarchs Sees of the East (Constantinople, Alexandria, and Antioch) to make search for the intire volume of the Canons of Nice, and when they were brought from thence, there was no such Canon among them, as the Bishop of Rome had alledged (the truth of all which is now visible to any in the Acts of that Council of Carthage, and particularly in * their Epistle to Cælestine, Bishop of Rome.) From this one instance they thought they might conclude these two things, 1. That the Bishop of Rome had no challenge of such Primacy, by any words of Scripture; for if he had, he would then certainly have alledged it on so important an occasion; and besides, the African Fathers were so learned in holy Scripture, that they could not have been ignorant of it; and so vertuous, that if they had known it, they would never have made any Act to the contrary, nor after so earnestly have refused it. 2. That the Bishops of Rome have no such power given them by any ancient General Council; or if they had, they would then have alledged it, rather than have vouched a pretensed Canon, which upon search, could never be found in the Authenticks. And these two conclusions thus deduced, might well set a period to this controversie. As it is, I shall, I hope, need add no more reply to his second Section, for the vindicating of my fifth Chapter, and refuting the Romanists second Plea drawn from the POPE's succession to Saint Peter.

CHAP. V.

A Defence of the sixth Chapter of the Tract of Schism.

SECT. I.

The Romanists Plea from conversion. Phil. Scot. The expressions of our real Gratitude to Rome. The Testimony of the Annals of Gisburne. The occasion of producing it. The planting of this Church before Augustine, and surviving Diocletian's persecution. The Pope's power in Ordination. The custome of making profession to the See of Rome. Receiving the Pall without it. Caerusk αὐτοκεφαλ⊙. Independency from Canterbury, implied it from Rome also.

1. IN his third Sect. of this his second Part, he proceeds to a view of my 6. Chapt. and the subject of that, being an examination of another plea of the Romanists, from the Pope's having planted Christianity among us, he begins with great displeasure, that I should deem this any plea of theirs, and so pronounces this ground of the whole Chapter to be absolutely false, and forged upon them, asking what Catholick Author ever affirm'd----

2. 2. That S. W. as the Catholick Gentleman before, do indeed renounce this plea, I have no need to repine, or regret, for then their other only plea from Christ's donation to S. Peter, and the Pope's succession to that legacy, being, I suppose, competently invalidated, there remains no more for me to contend in this matter, save only to render my account how I fell into this gainless misprision, even by that charity that makes me still apt to think men believe, and advert to their own discourses, and consequently that this was due to the Romanists disputings against us, for from thence it was undoubtedly, that I was deceived into a perswasion, that they laid some weight on this plea from our conversion.

3. To omit the Catalogue of those Romanists, that have insisted on it, I shall only mention the real occasion of my taking in this, for one of their pleas; A very little while before I set upon that Treatise of Schism, a little Book bearing this title, A Treatise of the Schism of England by Philip Scot, Permissu Superiorum] was conveyed to me from what hands I never knew, but had some reasons to think, that it was from a Romanist. Of this therefore (after I had read it with no kind of satisfaction, and found that Mr. Hobs, and another discourse, with which he proposed to combate, were such as I no way inclined to defend, or vindicate) I resolved so far to serve my self, as to take notice, what pleas it chiefly insisted on, to infer what he had undertaken, the Schism of this Church of ours. To this purpose I found him concluding, p. 163. that the case of the Bulgares, ought to be drawn unto us, to wit, for the title of conversion. And p. 165. speaking of the subjection of England to Rome, it was acknowledged, saith he, ever by our laws even from the conversion of the Country under St. Gregory: and p. 167. much less this Island ought to separate from the See of Rome, by reason of the title of conversion, not only under Gregory the first, but long before, under Pope Eleutherius, &c. This I supposed sufficient (if I had wanted other motives) to direct me to this branch of my method, to consider this title of conversion, and so S. W. discerns, to whom the crimen falsi is due, and I am only to ask pardon of Ph. Scot and his superiours, that I gave so much heed to them, as to bring this rebuke upon my self.

satisfaction,

As it is, I shall most willingly acknowledge my error, and now proclaim from these greater authorities of the Catholick Gentleman and S. W. that we are manumitted, and, by consent, set free from all obligation of subjection to the Pope's Primacy, which we causlesly feared might come upon us by this title of Conversion, and are now only to make good our gratitude for the benefits which we received from that See: And that, let me assure him most seriously, we shall indeavour to do, in any way that may be most proportionable to very great obligations, and never go about to divert, or make quittance, by putting into the counterpoise either the severity and bloody rigours which the Brittish inhabitants, the 1200. devout Monks of Bangor in the front, and then the rest of that numerous Army suffered from Edilfred, King of Northumberland, as the fruit of Augustine's menaces, or some other unkindnesses, since received, which have not been of the complexion of that paternal sweetness, which is said to have moved Gregory's charity to our Saxon Ancestors; but return our ἀχραντα ἀγαθα, our purest and most uncompounded offices of all Christian affection, our utmost effusions of that most etherial charity, our prayers and our tears poured out towards Heaven, that God will out of his richest treasure supply all their wants, and by the power of his grace, work those changes, which he discerns most necessary to be wrought in them, that the successors of St. Peter may timely imitate the repentance, and faith, and zeal of S. Peter, and the eminence of that See joyned again at last, as at the first, with the purity of all Christian profession and practice, become the real, effectual preserver of Ecclesiastical unity and communion, and attain that highest title, which can belong to any Church on earth, to be στύλος καὶ ἑδραίωμα a pillar and stabiliment of all saving truth, without any allay or mixture of error, to abate that glorious felicity, which from my soul I wish to it; If this be not the short image of that gratitude which S. W. is willing to mind us of, together with the most passionate desire to minister to them in the bowels of Christ, by indeavouring not to suffer sin upon our brethren, by admonishing them in the spirit of meekness (and not vomiting out, as he saith, any one venomous spiteful expression, but heartily and humbly retracting all such language, that hath ever proceeded from us) by heaping none but such coals of fire upon their heads, which may in God's good time, be most effectual to the melting of them; If, I say, this be not it, and if any Romanist of a more happy temper, than my Disarmer hath yet expresst, will direct me to any other method of discharging this obligation of the most exact refined gratitude, I shall be most thankful for the advertisement, presuming that nothing of injustice, or sin against a duly instructed conscience, can ever be ingredient in it, and then hoping for so much mercy from God, that no true Son of this Church of ours, will ever be wanting in any other way of expressing it. 4.

The rest of this third Section concerning holding by two titles, and the conversion of this Island (whether of Britains or Saxons) was in substance proposed by the Catholick Gentleman, and is accordingly superseded in the Reply, p. 100, &c. And so likewise the Abbot of Bangors answer to Augustine, was vindicated in the account of H. T. his Appendix. 5.

Only the testimony out of the Annals of Gisburn, which had not formerly been taken notice of, is here a little considered, and the parts of the testimony being two; 1. That the Bishop of S. Davids was consecrated by his own Suffragans; and this 2. without any profession or subjection to any other Church; He is willing to invalidate both these: the first, because, saith he, the Pope may be head of the Church without consecrating all the Bishops in the World; the second, because, saith he, the custome of making a profession, or exhibiting subjection to the See of Rome, when the Bishops were consecrated, was not then in use; and besides, the words being alteri Ecclesiæ, not specifying Rome in particular, affords nothing to my purpose, but may bear the interpretation of the Bishop of St. David's being independent of any within that continent, or of any private Patriarch, with which may consist a subjection to the Pope, as the Universal Pastor.] 6.

But here first S. W. must be advised to permit testimonies, brought to infer a conclusion, to connect with the conclusion, to which the producer applied them, and not still out of jealousie of his own Helena, to feign every thing that is said on any other subject, to be designed to the impugning the Popes Supremacy. 'Tis evident to what that whole fourth Section belongs, viz. to demonstrate the planting the Faith here long before Augustine the Monk, and its surviving the slaughters of Diocletian. Among other evidences of this (to which I now add the expres words of * Bede) comes in the early mention of three Metropolitans, and among them of the Bishop of Caerusk (and his Province Britannia secunda) afterward in King Arthurs time translated to S. David's (and this we know, fifty Years before Augustine's coming) where it continued an Archbishoprick 500. Years 7.

* Ubi turbo persecutionis quievit in publicum, fideles Christi, qui se tempore discriminis silvis ac desertis abditisque speluncis occultaverant, renovant ecclesias ad solum usque destructas, Basilicas sanctorum Martyrum fundant, construunt, perficiunt, ac veluti victricia signa passim propalant, dies festos celebrant, sacra mundo cordo atque ore conficiunt, manſitque hac in Ecclesiis Christi, quæ erant in Britannia pax, usque ad tempora Arianæ vesaniæ. l. 1. c. 8. What is there added of infusing this poyson, and every other Heresie in this Nation, and the great levity and inconstancy in the faith, the Reader may observe to be an insertion in the Latine Copy of Bede, which Alfrid's Saxon Paraphrase hath no word of; and as it might be evidently refuted, as far as concerns the Arian Heresie, so as to the Pelagian, 'tis disclaimed by Bede, l. 1. c. 12, 13. the words are set down in the Reply, pag. 103.

more, without dependence on any, till in the reign of Hen. I. it was subjected to Canterbury; which how fit it was to concur with other evidences, to prove the point then in hand, I leave any man to consider, and then there is no more required of me for the vindicating that testimony.

8. Yet secondly, when 'tis remembred, that though the Pope oblige not himself to consecrate all the Bishops in the world, yet as far as his jurisdiction extendeth, he takes upon him to dispose all ordinations, and accordingly (as appears by the expres's words of his Epistle) Pope Gregory appointed Augustine to ordain the Metropolitans, of London and York (though not all the Bishops under them) and for the future, provided for their ordinations by their own Synods, by sending each of them a Pall, as the same Epistle expresseth; it is hence visible, that his first Answer hath no force in it, but leaves a visible difference betwixt the Metropolis of S. Davids, and the two other Metropoles in respect of ordination. And

9. Thirdly, S. W. his fair confession, that the custom of making profession, or exhibiting subjection to the See of Rome, was not then in fashion] must be lookt on as some degree of liberality, which I must suppose he had some motive to extort from him, and sure concludes, that the introducing this fashion since, is an innovation.

10. Fourthly, That when 'tis remembred, that at this time Gregory sent the Pall to Augustine, and promised the same to the Bishops of London and York, it must be inferred by force of his second answer, that the Pope's sending a Pall, had not always annexed to it an exhibition of subjection to his See, from him that received it, and then how could Justiniana's subjection to Rome, even now, be inferred from the Pope's sending a Pall to the Archbishop thereof?

11. Fifthly, That S. Davids making no such profession, exhibiting no such subjection for the space of 500 years, and so long after Augustine's coming, viz. till the reign of Hen. I. and not so much as receiving a Pall from Rome, and yet holding the dignity and power of an Independent Archbishop, consecrated by his own Suffragans (as the Bishop of Cyprus was) and thereby evidenced to be αὐτοκέφαλος, is still, by force of his second answer, a farther proof, that the present Romish practices are usurpations, and innovations, and a prejudice to the pretended universal acknowledgment of his headship.

12. Lastly, When 'tis so well known by the forementioned * Epistle, that this whole nation, and all the Bishops of Britain, were by Gregory required to be subject to the See of Canterbury, where Augustine sat, and yet by this testimony of those Annals, and by evidence of the fact, through all History of those times, it appears that the Archbishop of Caerusk, or S. Davids, was independent from all other power (a Metropolitan long before Augustines coming hither) and never subjected to Canterbury, nor consequently to Rome, for so many hundred years, till Hen. I. It is from thence most manifest, that S. W. his answers, are of no force even to that, which he doth so solicitously ward by them, this of consecration by his own Suffragans, not held by any Pall from Rome, and the making no profession or subjection, alteri Ecclesiæ, to any other Church, be it but, as S. W. would have it, to any within that Continent, particularly to Canterbury, being as full an evidence as could be wished, that he acknowledged no subjection to the Pope, who had subjected all the Bishops of this Island to Canterbury. And this is all that can be due to be replied to his third Section.

* Tua fraternitas omnes Britanniæ sacerdotes habeat subjectos.

SECT. II.

S. W. his Arts. S. Paul's chair at Ephesus, &c. Conversion of Britany before Peters coming to Rome. Exemption from the Pope's Jurisdiction, a prejudice to his universal Pastorship. Carthage's Contestation before Justinian's time. Justinian's Act approved, a President to England. The questioning it.

1. HIS fourth Section begins with one of his dexterities, of which we have had an instance or two formerly. To invalidate the title from conversion, I had regularly proved these two things: 1. That the Britains were not converted by them. 2. That for the Saxons, which were converted from Rome, that title of conversion was of no force; And these two together, were the full proving of my conclusion, which the former single did not pretend to do, yet had enough of prejudice to the pretence for universal Primacy, for one exception was destructive to that; and the Dominions of Wales as much so, as all England would have been.

2. Now S. W. his art was, to divide these two branches, and to make answer to the former of them, taken alone, Sect. 3. and by that means to gain opportunity of rejoycing, that I have left my self and my fellow Englishmen in the suds, and only proved the Welsh no Schismaticks (adding only, that now the Welsh are so subjected to the English Bishops, that they must be involved in the same Schism) and so he triumphantly ends that Section, beginning this fourth with a view of the branch which belonged to the Saxons, as of a second part of my text (as he calls it) by this imposing on his Reader, who if he had foreseen that there was any thing said to that of the Saxons, or could carry it in his memory from one Section to another, must needs discern, that what was before said of leaving the English in the suds, had not the least degree of truth in it. For if indeed I equally proved it (though not by the same medium) of the English and the Welsh, how could it ever, with truth, be said, that I proved it of the Welsh only? Such arts as these, which receive all their force from a hope, that the Readers memory cannot hold out from the end of one Section to the beginning of another, are one of S. W. his Master pieces, which have rendred him so much a shrewder man, than the Catholick Gentleman.

3. What follows, 1. of S. Paul's Plantations, and the independency thereof, both from the See, where S. Paul sat at the time of converting them, and more especially from the See of Rome: And 2. of the independency and absoluteness of Timothy, and Titus in their several Provinces, hath been briefly vindicated in the Reply, cap. 61. sect. 3, 4. only when S. W. here asks what I intend by the chair where S. Paul sat, adding, that it was meerly a fiction, that S. Paul ever sat in any chair, or was first Bishop in any place, but but at Rome only with S. Peter. I answer, 1. That this ought to have had some offer of proof annext to it, and not only be so magisterially affirmed by him: 2. By chair I mean a place of his particular residence, and ruling (after he had planted) for some time, before he left a Bishop in one, and went to some other place; And thus 'tis sure he resided in many Cities and Provinces as properly as at Rome he can be affirmed to have done. At Rome, he so resided not, as not to make excursions very far from thence, to plant and confirm Churches, and in the like manner he resided at Antioch for one season, at Ephesus, and in all Asia, under that Prime Metropolis, for no less than three years, and so at Corinth, at Philippi, and at Thessalonica, and all these before ever he saw Rome, and to no one of these were all other Churches (where at that time he wrought conversions, founded and setled Churches) subjected by him, any farther than this, that the Churches of the Regions were subjected to the City-Church, the Churches of inferior Cities to the Metropoles, and those united again in the Prime Metropoles of each διοίκησις. And so this was a competent instance of the point in hand, and Timothy and Titus clear evidences of it, both those demonstrated to be clearly independent from Rome, whether upon the score of Peter's, or of Paul's presiding there (not by force of my negative, unsufficient proofs, as he calls them, but) upon this irrefragable evidence, that those were placed Bishops at Ephesus, and Crete, before either of these were yet so much as come to that imperial City. And the like upon the same account might, if we can believe story, be resolved of this Island of ours, where (saith Gildas Brito, or Badonicus, anciently stiled Sapiens, Gildas Albanicus in his book of the victory of Aurelius Ambrosius, and the Vatican M. S. in Baronius) a Church was planted before the end of Tiberius's reign, and that manifestly before S. Peter was come to Rome, secundo Claudii, as might be shewed by unquestioned records, if this were a place for it.

The next particular of the power of Princes to erect or translate Patriarchs, hath also been vindicated, Repl. c. 6. sect. 4. and there it appears how little reason he hath to affirm, that this is the begging of the question, viz. that the Popes power is meerly Patriarchal, when that on which my proofs proceed, the independency of those prime Churches, which have been erected by Emperors, is as destructive to the Pope's pretended title of universal Pastorship, as to the immoveableness of his Patriarchal power; while exempting any from his jurisdiction being as contradictory to the universality of his jurisdiction, as any thing could be supposed to have been. 4.

Next, when of one of my instances, Carthage, he concludes from my own words, that all that the Emperor did, was to restore it to its Primacy, after the Vandals were driven out, and so only an act of preserving the Canons inviolate, which every good Christian Emperor ought to do] this is but a catching of any thing that comes, though it be but like Hierocles's Scholasticus, that in the shipwrack caught hold on, and meant to save himself by the anchor, which served only to discover his fear, and ascertain his perishing. For 'tis certain, that before the Vandals inrode, Carthage, though within the Patriarchate of Rome, had refused to submit to her jurisdiction; or to allow of any appeal thither. The contest set down from the African Council, in the close of the fourth Chapter of this Reply, is an evidence of that; and he that knows any thing in Church story, cannot be ignorant of it. And if Justinian's restoring of that, after the expulsing of the Vandals, and (which is somewhat more, and yet was there subjoyned) his annexing two new Provinces, which had not before been under that Bishops jurisdiction, be that, which every good Emperor, not only may, but ought to do, then shall I never desire any more to infer my conclusion, 1. that Hen. VIII. in restoring that independency to the Church of England, which it had before Augustine's coming hither, nay, ἀπ' ἀρχῆς, from the first conversion of this nation, and so ought to retain it by the Ephesine Canon, was but the preserving the Acts of the Church inviolate, and no more than every good Prince may, and ought to do. 2. That by S. W. his acknowledgment, Justinian in this matter of Carthage, did but as a good Prince ought to do; and then, doing no more in the erection of Justiniana, than in the restitution of Carthage he had done, it must likewise follow, that herein also he no way misbehaved himself; and yet upon the presumption that he did, his whole answer depends, which next follows to my instance of Justiniana. 5.

For though upon a former mention of this matter, he had never attempted to asperse Justinian, but in this second part, sec. 2. gave very plausible answers, that Justinian never intended to crop the aspiring growth of Rome, but sent to the Pope for a Pall for his new Archbishop, and a great deal more to the same purpose; yet now upon another incidental glance on the same instance, as if the Catholick Gentleman and he had divided the cup of Lethe betwixt them, he now questions the power of Justinian to do what he did, and the legality of the act, and compares it with the Act of the late Parliament in taking away Bishops, having no power to take them away. 6.

Thus every the most contrary colour (of answer) becomes S. W. as well as ever it did Aristippus; but this slip having befallen him, by following the footsteps of the Cath. Gent. I have spoken sufficiently to it there, Repl. c. 6. sec. 4. n. 11, 12. and fully manifested the legality of Justinians action, without any delegation from the Pope to do what he did, n. 13. 7.

1. HIS next attempt is against the Instance of Ravenna, and he sets out with a special piece of wit, that when I say, the Emperor Valentinian did by his Rescript constitute Ravenna a Patriarchal seat, I quote no Author but Ann. Dom. 432.] where 1. 'Tis strange, that he that hath yet (to my best remembrance) produced but one citation of his own, and withal, hath oft reproacht my unnecessary citations, should yet now exact of me the producing of Authors for every period; and yet more strange, that when I quote the Emperors Rescript, wherein it was thus constituted, he should yet say I quoted no Author: The Emperor himself was vouched as my Author, and his Rescript the Testimony; and yet upon the Catholick Gentleman's doubt of this, I produced the Author, which conveyed this record to us, one very fit for the turn, the writer of the history of that City, Hieronymus Rubeus, who sets down the words of this priviledge out of a most ancient record, which saith [illegible] in tabulario Ursiano adhuc servatur, is still kept in the Archives of that City. Of this Author who produces it, it may be considered, 1. That his History was at a second publication of it, seventeen [illegible]s after the former, dedicated to the Pope Sixtus V. by the Senate of Ravenna (who testifie that it [illegible] collected ex tabulariis potissimùm civitatis, out of the Records of the City;) And 2. that it was by himself dedicated to their Archbishop, a Cardinal, appealing to his knowledge, that he had been in antiquitate investigandâ satis accuratus, sufficiently accurate in the search of antiquity: And 3. to remove all suspicion of partiality to his own City against Rome, he hath approved himself to be as great an admirer of the Papacy, as any, calls it in his Preface, sedem de cœlo in terras demissam, a See sent down from Heaven to Earth, for Learning most divine, for Religion most holy, for Empire most sublime. And in this very matter of Ravenna's contending with Rome, de Principatu, he is very bitter against his own Countrymens temerity, and perfidiousness, together with insolent pride, affirming the Popes to be Vicars of Christ, in Ecclesiæ Universalis administratione, in the administration of the Universal Church. If these be indications of the Preposterous love of his Country, which Rubeus is blamed for by S. W. it will be very hard to gain his favour; And 4. to conclude, his authority with the Romanists is such, as Baronius, the principal Author, that hath questioned this priviledge, makes use of his testimony with confidence, when it is for his turn, (though in a matter much more liable to mistake, the relation of a vis[illegible] himself also confessing, that the Rescript is very ancient, and acknowledged by several writers.

2. And truly that Annalist's and his followers disputing against it by those little probable arguments, which S. W. hath here transcribed (as nothing was ever really done, but some light colours might be brought against it) as it signifies no more, but that this act of the Emperor's was repugnant to the interest which that learned Annalist had professedly espoused, the absolute Universal Dominion of the Romish See, so is it an evidence irrefragable, that that priviledge which Ravenna is pretended to have had, was not reconcileable with the pretensions of Rome, which yet was in effect, no greater, than those which without doubt were soon after conferred on Justiniana and others, by other Emperors, before either of these, and to which the Council of Chalcedon had laid the foundation, that the τάξις order Ecclesiastical should follow, and bear proportion with the πολιτικοὶ τύποι the imperial acts of building, or repairing, or inlarging, and dignifying of Cities.

3. As for the objections against the authentickness of that decree, I shall need say no more, but that they are very unproportionable to be put in the balance against the original record and testification of the fact in the plain words of the Edict. First, saith he, it begins in a different manner from the constant tenor of all other Rescripts,] but he did not think good to tell us how it began, lest that might discover the vanity of the exception; nor to remember what was the subject matter of this Rescript, which might fitly occasion and own this difference. It was the Donation of a Priviledge to the Church, to the honour of God, and accordingly it begins in such a form, as most exactly accords therewith, and is the ancient, as well as modern stile in such matters, In Nomine Domini Dei Salvatoris Nostri Jesu Christi, In the name of the Lord God our Saviour Jesus Christ. This, as it had been less proper for some other secular matters, so was most agreeable to the matter of an Ecclesiastical priviledge, or collation. So in the Novels of the Emperors, which confer, or confirm privileges, to the Church, there is nothing more frequent. The first of Heraclius, being of this sort, begins so, * ἐν ὀνόματι τῦ δεσπότυ Ἰησῦ Χριστῦ τῦ θεῦ ἡμῶν, Ἡρακλείῳ ---- In the name of the Lord Jesus Christ our God, Heraclius --- to Sergius --- And so the ‖ second, and the * fourth. So begins Justinian's Edict, de fide Orthodoxâ, ‖ ἐν ὀνόματι θεῦ ---- In the name of God the Father, and of his only begotten Son Jesus Christ our Lord, and of the holy Ghost. I shall trouble the Reader with no more examples. And then, what could have been objected more unseasonably, or untruly, than that this manner of beginning, differs from the constant tenor of all other Rescripts?

* P. 83.
‖ Ib. l. 8 p. 521.

4. Next, saith he, The decree is singular, and consequently to be suspected in this; that all the other Rescripts made in the Reign of the two Emperors, though constituted by one of them only, yet were ever authorized by both their names, whereas the name and authority of the Emperor Theodosius was wanting to this.] But there is as little truth in this, as in the former suggestion. In the constitutions of Heraclius, the first indeed begins with the names of both the Emperors, Ἡρακλείῳ, καὶ Ἡρακλείῳ νέῳ Κωνσταντίνῳ, νῷ, πιστοὶ ἐν Χριστῷ βασιλεῖς; and so the fourth after the like manner. But then in the second the stile is singular, Αὐτοκράτωρ Καισαρ Φλαβιος Ἡράκλειος ---- and the third in like manner, ὁ αὐτὸς βασιλεύς, Heraclius alone without naming the other. 'Tis strange such matters of ordinary visible practice, should be so confidently denied, to gain a poor, pitiful, probable argument against an Edict, that is irrefragably testified by the Records, and is no way concerned in such Topicks as these, if they had (as they have not the least) truth in them: But besides, if it were reasonable to conclude a matter of fact by reason, 'tis clear there is reason of this also. Valentinian was born in this City, as before * Rubeus, Marcellinus Comes delivers, and now resided there (as Honorius had long done, ever since Alaricus's coming into Italy) and accordingly makes that a special motive of giving this privilege (Et maximè ubi serenitatis nostræ præfulget præsentia) in the words of the Edict: And of him particularly 'tis * noted and cited from Agnellus, a grave Author, that he both rebuilt, and inlarged the walls of the City, and constituted it, after Rome, the head of Italy. All which being peculiar acts of his kindness to the City, and not common to Theodosius with him, as they make it reasonable, that they should bear none but his name in the front of the Donation, so without question they no way invalidate the authority of it.

* Ibid. p. 98.

5. The third objection is, that the Inscription, Imperator Major, is new, and unheard of, all the rest intitling Valentinian Imperator Maximus.] But the Inscription is, Valentinianus fidelis Jesu Christi Major Imperator. Aug. The [Major] is not here subjoyned to Imperator, but to Valentinian (as Augustus to Imperator) and is, I suppose to distinguish him from others of the same name, as Theodosius, ὁ μικρὸς, the Little, that reigned with Valentinian, is so called to distinguish him from Theodosius, ὁ μέγας the Great, Honorius's Father. So Leo ὁ μέγας, and Leo ὁ μικρὸς, and so Valentinianus Major to distinguish this from Valentinianus, Gratian's Father, who in respect of him was Maximus. 2. As for the title of Imperator Maximus (Maximus subjoyned to Imperator) it might have been worth his pains to set down some of those Edicts (which he calls all the rest) that so intitle him. I am sure Rubeus affords him none. Pontifex Maximus was once an ordinary title for the Emperors, and Imperator Clementissimus, and the like, but sure Imperator Maximus was not so; And yet 3. if it were so, it would prove little; for this Valentinian, which is here stiled Major, is ordinarily known by the title of Junior; Major, in respect of Maximus, being Junior, as Theodosius μικρὸς the Little is ordinarily Theodosius Junior in the Comparative, and many such like, so that still I have no reason to admire S. W. his Arguments.

6. He objects from the mention of Regium, Placentia, and Brixillis named in the Rescript, as under the Jurisdiction of Ravenna, which, saith S. W. is a plain forgery, since not long after, Pope Leo commanding Eusebius Bishop of Milan, to gather a Provincial Council of the Bishops subject to him, those three Bishops met there, and subscribed in that Council, as appears by the Synods Epistle yet extant.] Of this suggestion some parts are true, but that on which alone the whole force of the Objection against the Rescript depends, hath no offer of proof, nor yet appearance of truth in it. And therefore it was prudently done, to cite the Synodal Epistle for the subscription of these names, but neither to direct us where to find that Synodal Epistle, nor to offer any reason or testimony, that all that subscribed there, were subject to Milan.

7. The truth of the whole matter lies thus; In the year 450. Pope Leo sent four Legates, two Bishops, and two Presbyters to Anatolius, Bishop of Constantinople, successor to Flavianus, with an Epistle, anathematizing Eutyches and Nestorius, and all their followers, which was accordingly read, and fully consented to, and subscribed in Council by Anatolius, and the neighbouring Bishops, assembled with him, and sent to all the Metropolitans of the East to be subscribed by them. See Concil. Tom. 3. p. 701, 702. Upon the return of these Legates, Leo commands them to go to Eusebius the Bishop of Milan (in the most ancient Notitiæ, the Prime Metropolis of Italy) and treat with him for a meeting of other Bishops of Italy, which, we know, consisted of many Provinces, to subscribe and profess the reception of the same doctrine against those Hereticks, to the end that in the meeting of a General Council, the Pope's Legates might go, in the name of the whole Western Church, and inform the Council of the judgment of those Bishops, who should not be able to be present there: And accordingly it was done; and upon this meeting (called thence Mediolanense Concilium in the Councils, T. 2. p. 702.) the Bishop of Milan, and nineteen other Bishops of Italy, some of his Province, and some of others, wrote a Letter to Leo, and subscribed their consent to that confession of faith, which he had sent into the East. The Epistle is to be seen among Leo's, with this title, Eusebii Mediolanensis Episcopi cum aliis Episcopis consentientibus, and after him the first that are named are the Bishops of Regium, Placentia, and Brixillis. But now, that all the Bishops that are there named, were of this particular Province of Milan, and subject immediately to that Bishop, as it is the only thing of force in the present objection, so it hath no offer of proof, or that I discern, appearance of truth in it. Of the nineteen Bishops, which are there named to subscribe after Milan, Miræus, out of the Ancient Roman Provincial, sets down but twelve, under the Metropolis of Milan, and two of them with an Asterisk for exempts, Placentinus, and Papiensis (which is all one with Ticinensis in these subscriptions) so that beside Placentia, Regium, and Brixillis, here named in the Edict, the second of which he places expresly under Ravenna, and the third was destroyed Ann. 586. saith * Rubeus, there remains Augustana under the Archbishop of Mentz, Comensis under Aquileia, Curiensis in Rhætia Prima, under the Archbishop of Mentz, Genuensis and Albingaunensis, both in Liguria, none of which can with any reason be pretended to be under the particular Province of Milan, and so this is sufficient to evacuate the seeming force of that argument.

* P. 181.

8. It must be farther remembred, that in order to this design of having this Profession of Leo's faith, subscribed by the Bishops of Italy, it was as necessary that other Bishops consents should be had, as those of the particular Province of Milan. The Legates were sent in like manner to the Gallia, and from thence the subscription come of * 44 Bishops, which sure were not all of one Province: In a word, there is little reason to believe, but all Italy were as much concerned in this action, as those under Milan; only the meeting being in that place, as that which had been anciently the prime Metropolis of the Diocese of Italy, there were more of that present there, than of any other particular Province,

* Leo Ep. 56.

Province, yet the three first of the subscribers, the Bishops of these Cities under Ravenna, which was a competent number for that Exarchate; so that still this Edict may pass for authentick, though it put Regium, &c. under the Archbishop of Ravenna, for there still they are, for ought this of the Mediolanense concilium proves to the contrary.

9. Or if this be not yet sufficient, then I shall oppose the authority of Blondus and Sabellicus, for the confirming the Edict, and invalidating this pitiful shew of objections. Blondus, who had said (from other evidences, and not from this Rescript) that the Emperor subjected twelve Bishops to the See of Ravenna, naming Regium and Placentia for two of them, and Sabellicus in his Enneads, and others with him, affirm there were fourteen, as the Edict doth, and so doth Miræus, out of the ancient Roman Pontifical, though in specifying the names of them, he differ from this Edict.

10. But his last argument is that on which he seems to place his confidence, as a Rub which, saith he puzled Rubeus, that the same Rescript which gives them an Archbishoprick, granted them also the use of the Pall, which, saith he, was never used to be given by the Emperors, but by the Popes only, as appears by the Epistle of Gregory the Great, to the then Archbishop of Ravenna; and this, saith he, forced Rubeus to explicate that Pall to be Cæsareum paludamentum, such an imperial Robe as the Cæsars used to wear; whereas besides the unlikelineß of the action, it is contrary to the Rescript it self, which grants them such a Pall, sicut cæteri sub nostra Christianissima potestate sæpe degentes fruuntur Metropolitæ, as the rest of the Metropolitans in his Dominions often wore; which, saith he, every one who hath but tasted of the study of ancient History, knows to have been another manner of thing than the Emperors robe.]

11. What solidity of truth there is in all this, will be soon discerned: For 1. that this rub is said to have puzled Rubeus, and that to smooth it, he was forced to explicate it of the Cæsareum paludamentum,] hath no kind of truth in it: What he saith, is not from any such necessity, to avoid the importunity of any objection, but as an instance of the Emperors gratitude to that Church, and John the Archbishop thereof, maximum beneficium adjecit, he added this greatest favour, a Pall, but that such an one as in the City, and in any pomp, or solemnity, the Cæsars alone were wont to use, as an universal and perpetual prerogative of him and his successors in that See.

12. But then 2. if Constantine's Donation to Sylvester, which is entred into their * Corpus Juris, and must not be despised by the Romanists, be by S. W. believed to have any truth in it, or if the fiction of it be not founded in gross absurdity, and impossibility, we cannot but learn this from it, which here S. W. will not allow any man to think that hath but tasted of the study of ancient History, viz. that the superhumerale, the Pall, that belongs to Archbishops, was the lorum quod Imperiale circundare solebat collum, the very imperial ornament, that encompast his neck (and so the purple robe, and the scarlet gown, and omnia Imperialia indumenta, all the Imperial vestiments) communicated from the Emperor to the Pope, and by him imparted to Archbishops. The same we are taught by Balsamon from the Greek Church, that several Ensigns of the Imperial authority were communicated to the Patriarchs, * μόνοις τοῖς Βασιλεῦσι καὶ τοῖς Πατριάρχαις ἐπιφιλοτιμηθῆναι τὸ δίκαιον, this priviledge (speaking of the Λαμπάδες) was allowed to none but the Kings and Patriarchs (having before said expresly, that the Archbishop of Bulgary, and some others, had received them, ἀπὸ φιλοτιμίας Βασιλικῆς ἰδικῆς, from the Emperors especial munificence, and * Philippus Berterius, who, I hope, had tasted of ancient History, cites it from him, and subjoyns σαυροπήγια ἐπιμανίκια, Pallia & cætera hujusmodi quæ fere omnia tandem Metropolitanis sunt concessa, almost all kind of habits, particularly the Pall, all which almost were at length allowed to the Metropolitans, he might have said (as far as belongs to the East) to the Bishops also. Thus when Anthimus of Constantinople was deposed, * it is said of him, that when he saw himself turned out of his See, he restored the Pall which he had, to the Emperors. And ‖ Pope Gregory himself speaking of the return of Anastasius Patriarch of Alexandria, saith that he had made * earnest request to the Emperors, ut concesso usu Pallii ad Beati Petri limina ---- transmittere debuissent, that they would grant him the use of the Pall, and send him to Rome to him, to officiate with him, quatenus mecum in honore suo viveret, and to live and enjoy his Patriarchal honour with him.

Sure these are more than obscure indications, that the Pall having this original from the Emperors donation, was, and consequently may, by the Emperor, particularly be bestowed upon a See, advanced by him to some more than ordinary eminence, after the manner of those, whom a King will honour, by putting some part of his royal ornaments upon them; and it will otherwise be hard to imagine, from whence the Pope himself shall originally have received it, if not from the favour of the Emperor; for as to that of the Sheep taken upon the Pastors shoulders, which may be thought to deduce it from S. Peter, it is sure as Apocryphal, as Constantine's donation can by any be imagined to be, and beside other Anomalies in the Emblem, 'tis that which must equally belong to every Bishop, whose office is as perfectly Pastoral, as any Metropolitan, Primate, Patriarch, or the Pope himself can be pretended to be, though his Diocese be not so wide, nor his power so absolute, and so can by no Analogie be the Ensign discriminative of an Archbishop.

13. But I shall not need to insist farther on this, for if I should grant, that the Pall were originally Ecclesiastical, and a thing perfectly distant from the Imperiale lorum, and so that the Emperor could with no propriety confer it, as for himself; this notwithstanding would be very incompetent to prejudge, or disparage Valentinian's Rescript, in the form, wherein Hier. Rubeus hath conveyed it to us; for of it, this may very fitly be the interpretation, that the Archbishop of Ravenna being thus exalted by the Emperor, the said Emperor ordained and decreed, that as other Metropolitans in his Dominions, have the use of the Pall, receiving it from their Patriarch, according to custom, upon their consecrating, so should he receive it from the Bishop of Rome, the Patriarch of the West. And this being the only objection against the Rescript, which hath any shew of validity in it, it now appears, I suppose, that this is but a shew, and so the Rescript may yet stand firm upon the vanishing of it.

14. Yet is this argument of such force with S. W. that he is resolved (and he cannot, he saith, in reason think other) it must (some way or other) invalidate this instance of Ravenna; but which way it shall do it, he is not yet resolved; only he hath pitcht on one of these two ways, either that the Rescript is false, forged in the time of the Schism, or at least, that it cannot be imagined to have been made without the Popes consent.]

These

* Suggestionem summis precibus plenam. ibid quantis valui precibus postulavi, ib. Ep. 7.

These conjectures are distant enough and so prove themselves to be but conjectures, for if the Rescript were false, and forged in time of the Schism, then sure the Pope never gave consent to it, and if he gave consent to it, then sure 'twas not false, nor forged in time of the Schism. And yet he tenders his proof for each of these, which fighting thus unreconcileably one with another, it were almost pity to interpose, it being certain that the leaving them thus ingaged, must be the shortest end of the Controversie. But I shall not give him the example of despising tenders of reason. 16.

For the first then, that the Rescript is false, and forged in the time of the Schism, (besides what hath already been mentioned of the Pall, and I suppose removed) he hath no farther offer of argument, but this, that no new Bishop of Ravenna could use the Pall without a new concession from the Pope, as (saith he) appears in S. Gregory, l. 5. Ep. 8. and therefore it was forged in time of the Schism, that they might have some pretence to retain still the use of the Pall, which they accounted honourable.] 17.

Whether the new Bishop were to receive the Pall from the hands of the Pope, I shall not need dispute; This might be a formality due to him as Patriarch of the West, and is perfectly reconcileable with the Emperors conferring this priviledge on this See, to all succession (as the Edict declares) without any active concurrence, or joynt authority of the Pope. But he that shall look on that * Epistle, will find no more than this, that Pope Gregory sends the Bishop of Ravenna a Pall (provocatus antiquæ consuetudinis ordine, moved thereto by the order of ancient custom) ‖ for him to use at the times, and in the manner, as, he saith, he doubts not his predecessor had used it, adding, Omnia enim privilegia quæ tuæ pridem concessa esse constat Ecclesiæ, nostrâ authoritate firmamus, & illibata decernimus, permanere, for all the priviledges which appear to have been heretofore granted to your Church, we confirm by our authority, and decree that they shall remain untoucht; and (beside some good admonitions to adorn his office and dignity, with the probity of manners and works) this is all that is to be found in that Epistle. 18.

* Ep. ex Regist. l. 5. Indict. 14. c. 108.
‖ Ep. ex Reg. l. 5. indict. 14. c. 108.

And considering that the priviledges which he formally confirmed, were acknowledged by him to be pridem concessa, granted to the See of Ravenna long before, without mention of their being granted to him by the Popes, and so must most probably refer to this act of the Emperor Valentinian, which gave it these priviledges; all this doth very well agree with the Edict, and conclude that it must have been unjust in the Pope to deny the Pall to any new Bishop of that See; And then the least that can be said, is, that S. W. will never be able by any Engine to fetch out from this Epistle his designed conclusion, that this Rescript was forged in the time of the Schism; and if it were not then forged, I mean while Ravenna stood upon her Independency from Rome (for that, I suppose, he will have deemed a Schism, by a mean begging the question) there can be no time imaginable for the forging it, for while Ravenna yielded to Rome all that she desired, this cannot sensibly be suggested: And so still here is not the least colour of pretence for the forging of it. 19.

What follows upon the other branch of his conjecture, to make it probable, that it was not made without the Pope's consent, if it have any appearance of force in it, it again concludes, that it was not forged, nor then lookt on by any (not by the Pope himself) as an Innovation, for the Emperor thus to advance a Church to this independency; and against this I have no reason to dispute, but shall most willingly yield to it S. W. his affirmation, without the least tender of proof, and only resolve from thence, that Valentinian herein did nothing contrary to the duty of a very good Emperor, nothing but by the very Bishop of Rome's very good liking, and consequently, that the Ravennates that insisted on this their priviledge, were far from being Schismaticks, or culpable in so doing, as my Disarmer will have believed to be the acknowledgment of all the world. 20.

If any more than such a consent as this, a good liking, or not checking at it, be here meant by S. W. as the mention of the Pope's appointing and constituting (even those at Ravenna at first being unwilling) S. Peter Chrysologus to succeed in that See, after the decease of John] seems willing to conclude, viz. an authoritative consent, or that which hath any thing of jurisdiction in it; I shall then answer, that supposing the Edict to have been really made (as in thus arguing S. W. supposes, for else how could the Pope thus consent to the making it) it is most evident that the Pope had thus nothing to do in the making of it. The words are plain, Imperiali authoritate sancimus, we decree by our imperial authority, that it shall be thus advanced to the Metropolitical dignity: and constituimus, the Emperor again by his authority, constitutes, or appoints the disposition of the whole Province of Æmylia, under the government of that Church, and the Creations of all those 14 Bishops, &c. adding, Conferentes ei ob decorem Apostolicæ dignitatis honorem Pallii & omnem Pontificalis decoris usum, conferring on him for the glory of the Apostolick dignity, the honour of the Pall, and all the use of Pontifical glory or splendor, and this, as was said, not to the person of the present Bishop John, but to the Church, atque Universos posteà Præsules, all Bishops which should succeed in that See. Which puts the matter beyond dispute, that the Pope had neither in the making of the decree, nor in the Bishops succeeding to the benefit of it, any authoritative consent. It came wholly from the Imperial munificence, the same by which it was once resolved in Honorius's time (as Rubeus cites it from * Johannes Baptista Pigna) that the seat of the Empire should be translated from Rome to Ravenna. 21.

* In hist. Principat. Estens.

What he saith of the Pope's appointing and constituting Chrysologus to succeed in that See, even those of Ravenna, at first being unwilling] lies thus, clearly, in the story, That the Ravennates sent the Archbishop whom they had created, to Pope Xystus III. for his customary confirmation. The Pope had seen a vision that night, wherein S. Peter and S. Apollinaris, the first Bishop of that See, having a young man between them, foretold him, that he should create him Bishop of Ravenna, and should not confirm him whom the Ravennates had chosen; this therefore he did obey, and rejecting their Bishop, ordain'd Peter Chrysologus to that See, and the Ravennates taking it ill, he told them his vision, and then they acquiesced in reverence to S. Peter. If there be truth in this story, 'tis little to the advantage of the Pope's authority, the vision being evidently that, which gave Peter Chrysologus this dignity, which the Pope could not have done without the vision. If it be not true, sure S. W. can conclude nothing from it, unless it be this, that Rubeus is to be believed by a Romanist in the relation of a Legend, which looks a little kindly to the Romanists side, but must not be believed in the vouching an ancient Record, when that should seem against them. 22.

23. He next tells us, the after-Bishops of Ravenna were sometimes Schismaticks, none excusing them, or bringing that action of theirs for a testimony or example, till such as D. H. arose, who were involved in the same crime.] But herein is manifest injustice. For wholly to omit the inquiry, whether the Bishops of Ravenna were afterwards Schismatical, or no, I know every thing which seems averse to the plenitude of all power in the Romish See, shall be sure to be looked on by them as an act of Schism, or else we had never lain under that charge: to omit this, I say (though it be but a begging the main question in him that suggests it) it is manifest that the testimony produced by me was not founded in the actions of those after-Bishops, but in the first collation of dignity on that Church by the Edict of the Emperor, that being the one thing that was pertinent, and fully concludent to the matter, which I had then in hand, from Sect. 9. the power of Kings to erect or translate Primacies or Patriarchates: For if Valentinian had that power, and actually made use of it, Imperiali authoritate sancire, constituere, conferre, to advance Ravenna to that honour and power, to assign him such a Province, and to confer such priviledges, on that See for ever, and no check made against this at that time, either by the Popes, or other Bishops of the Church, as against an innovation, or usurpation of undue power in the Emperor; then sure another Prince, which hath the same power in his Kingdom, which Valentinian had in his Dominions, may as lawfully do the same; ὅπερ ἔδει δεῖξαι, which was the only thing which by this example of Ravenna, and testimony of that Edict, I attempted to demonstrate.

24. But now follows an intolerable mistake of the Doctor's, which must needs have some of S. W. his Discipline. And what is the mistake? Why, That from Valentinian's time, Ravenna held the Patriarchate without dependence on the Bishop of Rome, till the time of Constantinus Pogonatus.] For this my Disarmer hath not yet so approved his fidelity, that his own bare word should be concluding: From his tribunal I appeal to Anastasius, in vita Doni. Hujus temporibus, i. e. Constantini Pogonati, saith he, Ecclesia Ravennatum, quæ se ab Ecclesiâ Romanâ segregaverat causâ autocephaliæ, denuò se pristinæ sedi Apostolicæ subjugavit, In the times of Constantinus Pogonatus the Church of Ravenna which had separated it self from the Church of Rome, upon the account of being independent, and an head to, or within it self, subjected it self again to the former Apostolick See. What can be more punctual for the full defence of my intolerable mistake? And yet, saith he, every one meanly versed in History, knows 'tis thus. But I demand whether Anastasius were not so, nay, whether there can be produced any one Historian, that doubts of it, much less that affirms the contrary?

25. But, saith he, 'Tis manifest by Pope Gregory's Letters to the Bishops of that place, who was made Pope in the year 590. whereas Pogonatus began his reign in the year 668.] This is a manifestation indeed fit for one who had once spent so many lines to set down the nature of an evidence, as the standard for future discourse between us. And what if one should put this into mood and figure, and exact of it a conformity, with the most vulgar of those necessary rules? It would then run thus, Pogonatus began his reign 78. years after Gregory ascended to the Papacy, and Gregory wrote Letters to the Bishops of Ravenna, therefore Ravenna held not the Patriarchate without dependence from Rome, from the reign of Valentinian to Pogonatus. A conclusion very irrefragably inferred, and yet there is no possibility to assist this medium of his, unless it may some way appear from those Epistles of Gregory, that Ravenna was not independent in his time. But that from S. W. his arguing, no way appears, no one passage being by him tendred from thence, unless what was before cited from Li. 5. Ep. 8. and that hath already been accounted for, and cleared to have no such intimation in it, but only that he sent him the Pall, and confirmed the priviledges of his Church, which by the Emperors Rescript were sufficiently authorized, if he had not confirmed them.

26. Many other Epistles indeed this Gregory wrote to the several Bishops of Ravenna, many to John, l. 1. and 2. some to Marinian, l. 4. and 5. and to the whole Church, l. 5. and in these he oft takes upon him to find fault, especially for the frequent using the Pall in publick processions; but this proves not their dependence on him, either de jure, or de facto, either that it was really due, or by them acknowledged, and yielded to him. Nay many indications there are to the contrary, priviledges pleaded by them, though by him denied to belong to them. And indeed, had he really consulted either the story, or Gregories Epistles, he must have discerned the truth of mine, and the groundlesness of his affirmation. For of John III. to whom Gregory's Epistles are written, l. 1. and 2. it is by the writers for the most part, resolved, that he was the first Archbishop of Ravenna, qui palam tentaverit, who made a publick attempt this way, drawing many of the Bishops of Italy to his side. See Hist. Raven. l. 4. p. 181. and 184. where the whole contest is set down, collected punctually out of Gregory's Epistles, (and he that shall compare them, shall find it done exactly) together with a copy of John's Epistle to him, modest, but yet standing to his priviledges, with a Nullus ergo contra me Domino meo conetur surripere, quia si vult, Deo custode, non esse potest, quòd à me aliqua novitas fuisset introducta, & adjuro vos per ipsam sedem Apostolicam, ut in nullo, Ravennati Ecclesiæ privilegia, quibus huc usque usa est, minuatis ---- looking on Gregory's disputing his priviledges, as an invasion, and intolerable innovation, and adjuring him by the dignity of his place, not to be guilty of it. And so nothing can with the least shew be inferred from the Epistles of Gregory, against the truth of what I affirmed from Anastasius, concerning the independence of this Church, held out till Pogonatus's time, i. e. till the necessity of their affairs, (occasioned by the invasion of the Longobards, and want of relief and support from the Greek Emperors Vicarii) drave them to the Bishop of Rome for aid, who would not give it, but upon this price of giving up their former liberties.

27. What he adds again of the Ravennates being Schismaticks as well as we, (though even now one of his answers was taken from the Pope consenting to the Edict, and I am sure Gregory oft professes to have confirmed their priviledges) ought not to be of much force with any that knows his Notion of Schismaticks, such as yield not obedience to the Universal Pastorship of the Pope, which is evidently the question at this time, and should be gained and won, not assumed and begged by him.

28. But at length he is content that plain reason should judge in this Controversie. And what reason doth he offer to prove, that the Ravennates pretended ἀυτοκεφαλία from the time of Valentinian's Edict, was an act act of Schism? Why, saith he, at the breach of the Ravennates from their subjection, the Popes made head against them, and stood upon their authority, as Universal Pastors, which therefore in all likelihood would have been looked on by the rest of the Catholick Bishops, as a proud usurpation, and being against their common interest to let the Pope pretend this, ought in all reason to have ingaged them in the Ravennates quarrel, and there being no news of such siding, one may at least conjecture, that they thought the Popes pretence to the Primacy lawful.

Here is the plain reason we were promised, which at the beginning of the Paragraph undertook to judge in the controversie, and yet when it hath had audience, the utmost that S.W. that produced this plain, decisive (that sure must be demonstrative) reason, can dare to say of it, is, that it is able to induce a conjecture; and in a matter of fact contrary to his interest, they would indeed be strangely weak grounds, on which one, i.e. S.W. would not found a favourable conjecture. And yet this is the solid pregnant reasoning, beyond all possible confute. 'Tis pity to enter farther into the secrets of it. Yet I cannot but mark, 1. that the Ravennates ἀυτοκεφαλία, given them by the Emperors Edict, was of the same nature exactly with the many other examples frequent in the Church, of Primacies conferred by the Imperial Constitutions, which were never resisted, or checkt at, at the time of their first donations. 2. That if S W. his way of arguing hold, then it follows as consequently, that what Valentinian did, was no innovation, or assuming of undue power. For then in all likelihood it would have been lookt on by the Catholick Bishops as such; and this no way appearing, one may as reasonably conjecture, that they never deemed it unlawful; especially if to this we add, what the stories tell us, that John III. of Ravenna, that contested with Gregory about the Pall, had gotten many of the Bishops of Italy to his side. See Hist. Raven. p. 180. Thirdly, That if the collation of this Independency be it, which S.W. calls the breach of the Ravennates from their subjection, it is in no degree true, that at that breach, i.e. at the time of their first assuming this ἀυτοκεφαλία, the Popes made head against them. This I shall assume from what he even now supposed, when it appeared useful to him, viz. that the Edict was made not without the Pope's consent, (and by Pope Gregorie's confirming their priviledges) for if so, then sure they did not make head against it, for that were strongly to dissent, and expres their dissent, which consequently must have been visible, and then he could never have been so blind, as to deem them consenting. Fourthly, That the first dissent that S. W. takes notice of, is that of P. Greg. who, according to his own just computation ascended to the Papacy, An. 590. and that is 158. years after the date of the Rescript of Valentinian, and for ought yet appears, the Independency was undisputed for all that time, a pretty competent space for a proscription. Fifthly, It is not yet proved by S.W. that the Popes thus early, no not this Gregory himself, which disputed Ravenna's priviledges, stood upon their authority, as Universal Pastors of the Church (as he assures me the Doctor will grant, and thereby signifies nothing, but that he is not very ready to prove it) I am sure he sadly * complains to Mauritius the Emperor, of the proud and pompatick stile, the name of vanity, the new and profane words of Universal Bishop, which John Bishop of Constantinople had attempted to assume, adding, that for all the Elogies and promises made to S. Peter, he was not yet called Universal Pastor, and infers this horrible absurdity upon it, that whereas some of his Predecessor Bishops had been Hereticks, Nestorius, and Macedonius; if this title had belonged to that See, it must follow, that the Universal Church, à statu suo corruit, fell from her state, when he that was thus stiled Universal Bishop fell; withal assuring the Emperor, that he did not plead his own cause, or avenge his private injury: which assures my charity, that this Pope could never assume this title of Universal Pastor of the Church, or make head against Ravenna, standing upon this, (i.e. the Papal, as that is above, Patriarchal) claim of authority: And indeed, this was before Boniface's time, who was the first, to whom Phocas gave that title, and therefore I may with all reason assume, that as yet the Popes could not make head against Ravenna, on that score.

* Ep. ex Reg. l. 4. Indict. 13. Ep. 32. and l. 7. Ep. 30.

29. 30.

Sixthly, When this title was assumed, and then the Ravennates Independency became such an Eye-sore, most intolerable to the See of Rome, there is no necessity, that all that lookt upon it, as an usurpation, should engage in the Ravennates quarrel (though, as hath been said, many of the Bishops of Italy sided with them) weakness and fear, and many other secular considerations might interpose, and leave the just cause to be oppressed by the unjust; and there is no consequence to be drawn from not ingaging in the cause, to the not approving of the innocence. The Greeks aided the Ravennates a while, but the Longobards were too hard for them; and the Papacy taking this advantage, would either leave them to be devoured, or would themselves prey upon them; and the Ravennates were not the first examples of those, that bought their lives at this price of subjection to the Romans. So perfectly vain, from one end to the other, is all my Disarmers discourse in this matter; 'tis a long work to discover most hastily all the flaws and nullities in this procedure, and judgment of his plain reason.

31.

Lastly, When he demands how the Ravennates behaved themselves in the business, did they stick close to, and constantly claim their non-subjection from Canons or Scripture?] The answer is obvious, they stood to it, as long as they were able, and at length they yielded to necessity, mean while never vouched either Scripture or Canons. It is the Popes singular priviledge to vouch both those, without all right to either: the later, as long ago he did in the African Council, from the Canon of Nice, when no authentick of the Council sought for, in the East, could be found to own any semblance of any such Canon, the former, as his Successors have oft done from tu es Petrus, and Pasce oves ---- where the words being found, cannot be discerned to have any such importance. The Ravennates pretended, what they had, the Edict of the Emperor, and long continued custom, for the injoying of their priviledges, and could not have been refuted in this plea, if their secular affairs had not first made it necessary to wave the insisting on it, and if afterward the Pope had not prevailed with another Emperor Justinianus Ῥινότμητος, to subdue, and inflict severity on them. And thus I doubt not, the steadiest, and best radicated priviledges may be extirpated, and if rescinded by the same power, that first gave them, I shall after that, no longer plead for the continuance of them: and so I was far enough all this while, from falling justly under the censure of resisting the decision of those who were lawful Judges in the matter; all that I did was to vouch the priviledge when it was given, and before it was judged fit to be taken away again by the Emperor, and that S. W. cannot but know, is all, that was any way useful for me in this Testimony.

SECT. IV.

The Exemptions from Patriarchs in Balsamon. His Discourse of Patriarchs no way derogatory to Rome's Canonical Rights. S. W. his unjust exactings. The removal of the Patriarchate of Aquileia to Grado. S. W. his Exceptions answered.

1. TO the other examples which I had cited out of Balsamon, of Exemptions held by the Emperors Charter, his answers are also remarkable. First, saith he, Balsamon seems in this very place and Treatise, to plead for the Greeks against the Bishop of Rome; and then an enemies saying is no slander.

2. I answer, The thing which I produced from Balsamon, was the exemption, or independency from Constantinople, that some Archbishops had by the Emperors Charter, and then what colour of pretence is there, that this should be a part of a plea in Balsamon for the Greeks against the Bishop of Rome? Certainly, Constantinople is not Rome, nor the interests of Constantinople the interests of Rome. 2. That this discourse of Balsamon's, from whence this testimony was cited, lays its foundation in the Synods of Nice, Constantinople, and that in Trullo, and from thence evidently deduces his conclusion for the number and order of Patriarchs, giving Rome the first place, and so is no way injurious to the just Canonical rights of the Bishop of Rome; and if being so, it must yet be deemed an opposition to his other pretensions, this is little for their credit, that they are thus improved beyond what those Canons allowed them. But whatsoever S. W. will think of that, 'tis most evident that the testimony which I voucht out of that discourse, had nothing to do with that controversie, 'twas only a casual mention in him (on occasion of the λαμπὰς πατριαρχικὴ) of some Metropolitans, that had from the favour of Emperors an ἀυτοκεφαλία with some honorary priviledges belonging to it, as of a known matter of fact, which could no more be questioned, than the ἀυτοκεφαλία and immunity of Cyprus and Bulgary, which he had named immediately before, the one from the pretensions of Antioch, the other from the Metropolitical power of Thessalonica, under which it formerly was.

3. Next, saith he, If we may trust Balsamon, then two things must lie upon the Doctor to prove, ere he can conclude any thing, to wit, that the Emperors did it not with order from the Church, or in case they did not, that it was done lawfully, and next, that the Emperor priviledged them from subjection to the Pope, as head of the Church. To these I answer, 1. That all I was to prove, was, that the Emperor, and so other Princes, have power to erect and translate Primacies, &c. And such ancient examples of the Emperors practices, never checkt at by them, in whose time they were, is a competent proof of that; and if it should prove, that the Canons of the Church gave either general or special order, that thus it should be, 'tis so much the better, so much the more unquestionable, that thus it belonged to them. 2. That I can in no reason be required to prove that the Emperors exempted them from the subjection to the Pope, as head of the Church, when 1. it is but a begging the question, to assume thus, without proof, that the Pope is head of the Church; and 2. it is manifest that the Emperors did not then look on him as head of the Church, for then they could not have done such Ecclesiastical acts, imperiali authoritate, and διὰ γραμμάτων βασιλικῶν, by imperial authority, and Princely Writs. And 3. I had my full design in having shewed, that Princes may erect Primacies, without proceeding in every period to demonstrate that anew, which had been the design of the former Chapters, that Primates were free from all subjection to this pretended head.

4. His answer to the mention of the erection of the Patriarchate at Grado, is still suitable to his former. I had cited out of Warnfridus, that this was done under Phocas; out of Eginartus and Regino, that it was done by Charles the Great. And he catches presently at the shadow of the word [under] and then saith, it seems the testimony says not it was done by him, but under him, or while he reigned.] I answer, 1. That [under Phocas] in the first place is to be taken exactly in the same sence, as in the latter is expresst in the words [by Charles the Great] the only question among the Writers being, not, whether it were done by the Emperor, or no, but only, by which of the Emperors, or in whose reign it was done. This was the only cause why I cited it in that form, because I was not sure, to which I ought to adhere of the two mentioned authorities, where yet 'tis visible that it is as much to my purpose, if Eginartus say true, as if Warnfridus; and from him it was cited, that it was done by Charles the great, and not only under him, or whilst he reigned.

5. 2. Saith he, Since it was not of new erected, but translated thither from Aquileia, burnt not long before by the Longobards, it was no sign of a presumed jurisdiction, but rather of a pious generosity (in the Emperor) to bestow a new seat on the destitute Patriarch.] And I that grant it was not a new erection, but translation from Aquileia, have yet as much by this instance, as I designed, viz. that the Emperor, and so other Princes; in like manner, may translate, as well as erect Patriarchates; and sure if this might not lawfully be done by the Emperor, it could never be an act of pious generosity in him to do it; charity and piety (or pity) to the distrest, and generosity, must always be founded in justice, and then as pious generosity may fitly move one Prince to it, so any other lawful, much more necessary care of the good of his subjects, may as reasonably move another; and then this was all I contended for by this instance.

6. What he saith he omits, and yet mentions, the reading the Epistle of Pope Pelagius II. in the Council of Grado, granting to Elias the place of the Patriarch of Aquileia.] I may be allowed to omit also, it having certainly nothing of force in it, the Patriarchate having been there placed, before that Council was called, and then the Pope's grant signifies no more, but that he had nothing to object against againſt the lawfulneſs and fitneſs of the tranſlation, as it had paſt, or if it were alſo a confirmation of it (ſuch acts the Popes have been willing to multiply above what was neceſſary, to gain conſideration and honour to themſelves) this may be willingly granted alſo, upon his title of Weſtern Patriarch, which I never doubted to yield him, without diminution or prejudice to any of my pretenſions. And ſo at length we are gotten to an end of this his fourth Section.

SECT. V.

The Twelfth Canon of Chalcedon reſcued from miſtakings. Abuſe of Power. The effects of that. Irregular grants of Metropolitical power. Τιμή. Ὄνομα. Honour. The Objections anſwered.

THE Fifth Section enters on the view of the teſtimonies, which I had brought for the erection of Metropoles, by the power of Princes, out of the Canons of Councils; and firſt begins with that from the twelfth Canon of Chalcedon, and Balſamon's note upon it. And firſt, ſaith he, the Council ſaith only that thoſe Cities were honoured, τῷ ὀνόματι, with the name alone, which the Doctor Engliſhes, name and dignity, the latter of which, ſaith he, they wanted; that which ſhould dignifie them in a degree of a Metropolitan, being abſolutely interdicted them by this very Canon, in theſe words, μόνης ἀπολαυέτωσαν τῆς τιμῆς, let them enjoy only the honour: And ſecondly, what this honour was, Balſamon tells, only καλεῖσθαι μητρόπολιν, to be called a Metropolis: And thirdly, anſwerable to this are the words of the Council, calling the former Metropolis, in contradiſtinction to this, the true one, ſignifying the other to be meerly titular.] 1.

Here is a ſpecious ſhew indeed, and the Reader may be impoſed on, if he do not pleaſe to take this caution with him, that there are two things conſiderable in that twelfth Canon; one, the premiſing a mention of the practice, or cuſtom of erecting Metropoles διὰ πραγματικῶν, by regal conſtitutions (as the latter part of the Canon, the words of the Scholiaſt, and the mention of δυναστείας Potentates, interprets it) the ſecond, a cenſure, or ſentence of the Council on ſome perſons, who had in an undue manner, acquired this dignity by that means. Thoſe things, we know, that are in themſelves moſt lawful, when regularly uſed, may be very fit to be forbidden, and cenſured, when irregular. And thus it was here; a power Princes had to erect Metropoles: but if it were exerciſed ſo, as to thwart known Canons, and cuſtoms of the Church, this certainly was an abuſe: As for example, One Canon it was, that there ſhould be but one Biſhop, of one Church, and one Metropolitan of one Province. See Photii nomocanon, Tit. 1. c. 20. Another, which is oft repeated, that Dioceſes and Provinces ſhould be preſerved intire, without one Biſhops encroaching on another; If therefore where there is one Metropolitan already, to whom the government of the Province by right belongs, another ordinary Biſhop in that Province ſhall by ambition, baſe ſolicitation, whiſpering, or falſe ſuggeſtion, gain a pragmatick from the Prince, to make him a Metropolitan alſo, ὡς ἐκ τούτου δύο μητροπολίτας εἶναι ἐν τῇ αὐτῇ ἐπαρχίᾳ, ſaith the Canon, ſo that by theſe means there are two Metropolitans in the ſame Province, (which muſt needs diſturb the adminiſtration, and invade the rights of the former Metropolitan) here certainly is an abuſe, fit for a great Council to take cognizance of, and provide againſt, and by cenſures to reduce this irregular Biſhop to ſome order. And this was exactly the caſe here, and conſequently the Canon begins with ἦλθεν εἰς ἡμᾶς, ὡς τινὲς παρὰ τοὺς ἐκκλησιαστικοὺς θεσμοὺς προσραμόντες δυναστείαις διὰ πραγματικῶν ἢ μίαν ἐπαρχίαν εἰς δύο κατέτεμον, It hath come to our ears, how contrary to the Eccleſiaſtical Canons, ſome men running to the ſecular powers have by Pragmaticks cut one Province into two, and therefore the Synod declares, that no Biſhop ſhall dare, or attempt any ſuch thing; or if he doth, he ſhall fall from his own degree; but thoſe that have formerly been thus honoured by the Kings Writs, they ſhall injoy the honour alone, but the rights ſhall be preſerved to the true Metropolitan: where there is nothing more clear than this, that the irregularity of the particular erection, in reſpect of theſe circumſtances and conſequences, of unworthy ſolicitation in the Biſhop, and the tearing a Province into two, to the bringing in of violence and confuſion, was it that made that Council cenſure ſuch ambitious perſons: and yet this ſo, as not wholly to caſſate the Princes act, even when 'twas thus irregular; much leſs to intimate in the leaſt, that ſuch power belonged not to the Prince, or would not ſtand valid to all effects, if it were duly exerciſed by him, without wrong to any. The validity of ſuch acts is fully cleared by the ſeventeenth Canon of that Council, and by the thirty ſeventh in Trullo, and the way of reconciling this ἐναντιοφάνεια, or ſeeming difference, is clearly ſet down in that Treatiſe of Schiſm, from the law of Alexius Comnenus, and the Canon under him, as is viſible in the latter part of that fourteenth Sect. viz. that in caſe the King did it ἀνθόρμητος, of his own incitation, it ſhould ſtand good, but it ſhould not be lawful for any by baſe ſolicitation, to ſeek or obtain it, and conſequently, that the Patriarch ſuſpending the confirmation till he had remonſtrated to the Emperor, what the Canons were in that caſe; if it appeared that the Emperor did it οἰκοθεν of his own motion, he was preſently to admit it. 2.

So that now it will ſoon appear, what juſtice there is in all S. W. his ſuggeſtions in this matter; as 1. when he ſaith, that the Council ſaith only that thoſe Cities were honoured with the name alone, charging it as a fluency of the Doctors expreſſion, that he Engliſhes it [name and dignity.] I anſwer, that I well underſtand what is meant by ſuch fluent, or large expreſſions, and will never once be willingly guilty of any ſuch, and therefore to clear my ſelf in this particular, I wiſh it be remembred, 1. that as ὄνομα, name, is the word here uſed, ſo τιμὴ, dignity, or honour, is alſo uſed of the ſame thing in another part of that Canon; and even when it is ſaid by way of cenſure on them, that they ſhall enjoy τιμῆς μόνης, no more but that, yet it is τιμὴ ſtill, and that is ordinarily rendred honour, or dignity; 2. before this cenſure falls on them, when ὀνόματι, name, is mentioned alone, yet the verb joyned with it is ἐτιμήθησαν, they were honoured, i. e. dignified by that name (for honour * ſay the Lawyers, eſt adminiſtratio provinciæ cum dignitatis gradu, an adminiſtration with a degree of dignity; ſo in the African 3.

* L. 14. D. de muner. & honor.

Can.

Can. 68. ἐν ταῖς ἰδίαις τιμαῖς ἀναδεχθῆναι, they shall be received in their own honours, i. e. their Episcopal powers and offices, and so in Augustine, Ep. 50. in suis honoribus suscipiendos, in the same matter) which they could not be, if that name were not a dignity to them that had it; 3. ὄνομα, ordinarily signifies dignity and power, and not only name, as when the name of Christ, and of Jesus, in the sacred style, signifies more than the bare name, or title, the power and dignity of his person. All which, I suppose, will justifie me for englishing ἐνόμασι μητροπόλεως, by name and dignity of Metropolis.

4. But then 2. when he saith, the Council saith only that they were honoured with the name alone.] There is no sincerity in this, for 1. the word [alone] is put in by S. W. 'tis ἐνόμασι, name, not ἐνόμασι μόνῳ, name alone: 2. 'tis in the second part of the Canon (that which sets down the mulct, or punishment of those which had unduly ascended to this dignity) that that interdict is found in these words, Let them enjoy only the honour] and not in the first part, where the name and dignity, which they receiv'd by the Pragmatick, is mentioned; and consequently 'tis so far from being hence inferred, that they had from the Pragmatick nothing but the name, that on the contrary, 'tis clear by the Canon, which thus punisheth them for their offence (that they shall enjoy μόνης τῆς τιμῆς the honour alone) that if they were not thus punisht, or before they were, i. e. before the making of this Canon, they should and did enjoy more than the honour alone, and so more than only the name.

5. 2. When he saith Balsamon tells me what that honour meant, viz. only to be called a Metropolis: This is another falsification, for besides that he saith no more than this, that some asked, and heard, or were told thus, i. e. that some thus interpreted it, beside this, I say, it is clear, that this of the being only called Metropolitans, was the punishment inflicted on them by the Council, which, as I said, resists not, but necessarily supposes, that they had further honour, than meerly that titular, conferred on them by the Prince, for otherwise they could not be thus mulcted or punisht by the Council for their irregular ambition, by having it taken from them.

6. 3. The contradistinction between this and the true Metropolis, is of no force to his, or against my pretensions. For that again only signifies, that the rights did truly and duly belong to the other Metropolis, and that this which was thus unduly advanced, though by the Emperours constitution, did not acquire any just or solid right, which I most willingly grant, in such cases as that which was there mentioned, and can from thence receive no prejudice to my conclusion, viz. that in the East many Emperours had erected Metropolitans, which was the main thing to which I designed that testimony, both from the words of the Canon, and from Balsamon, who affirms it distinctly of the Metropolis of Lacedæmonia, of Madyta, and Abydus, and never gives the least reason to suspect that those acts of these were invalid. Thus wholly vain are all S. W. his ἀντιθέσεις, and consequently his suggestion, that the consequences of this testimony are totally against my self, though thus indeed they might seem to the hasty Reader to be, before his Arts of disguising, by confounding the distant parts of the Canon were thus discovered. Herein I acknowledge he hath shewed himself a dexterous manager, but as it falls out, hath made no real advantage of his artifices.

7. What he yet farther adds in the fourth place from Balsamon, that he shall be ordained and judged by the old Metropolitan, is already answered, that this was the Councils penalty inflicted on him; as for others that should after that Canon attempt the like, the Canon decrees that they were to be degraded from the power which they already had.

8. As for the fifth thing, of the power given to the Prince ἄνωθεν, which he will have rendred olim, by some precedent Council, it was, upon some occasion, spoken to in the Reply, cap. 6. sec. 4. n. 19. and evidenced in whatsoever sense it were taken, to be favourable, and not contrary to my pretensions.

SECT. VI.

Balsamon's words of the Emperour's erecting many Metropoles. Of what times to be understood. Ἄνωθεν. Helenopontus. Paphlagonia. Phrygia Capatiana. Cappadocia prima, secunda, Basil. Anthimus.

1. IN the next place, on a view of a first observation of mine, that if Balsamon say right, that at the time of that Council of Chalcedon, many Emperours had erected many, there must needs be others before Valentinian, who was but twenty years before that Council, he saith, the observer is fallen into a great mistake, Balsamon's words being to be interpreted, saith he, in his own times, in which he lived, i. e. 600. years after the Council, that then such Metropoles were made.] To this I answer, that Balsamon's words lye indifferently, without notation of the particular time, of which he speaks, only διάφοροι διαφόρως ἐτίμησαν, divers Kings have honoured divers, so that neither can I conclude from the bare force of them, that he spake of any before that Council, nor he on the contrary, that he spake of those of his own times; to which it belongs, must be judged by other circumstances, and though the matter be not great, which way it be determined, nor at all necessary to my pretensions, to be interpreted of the times before the Council, yet I shall mention the reason, which inclines it that way, and let it be of force, as it shall deserve. Upon the mention of divers Bishopricks thus dignified by the Emperours into Metropoles, he mentions his opinion, collected from the 17. Canon of Chalcedon, and 38. in Trullo (ἔοικεν ἀπὸ τῆς ιε'. κανόν⊙------ it appears to me from those Canons) that such ὅρισμοι were made by Kings, according to the power given them, ἄνωθεν from above, or of old; Here first I shall gratifie S. W. that ἄνωθεν may indeed signifie olim, and if it so signifie in that place, then it must in all probability refer, not to this Council of Chalcedon, and in Trullo, which he names, and from which he concludes that this power was given them of old, but to times before those Councils. And so this very probability, if there were no more, will make it unreasonable to confine his precedent words [διάφοροι ἐτιμήθησαν, divers have been honoured] to the times so long

after

after that Council, as those wherein Balsamon lived, when the words will bear so much a greater latitude, and signifie such grants before that Council. Now that it doth thus really refer to some more ancient times, I thus farther infer, 1. from the nature of the word ἄνωθεν, which is all one with ἀπ' ἀρχῆς from the beginning, and elsewhere frequently notes an original right, from the first, i.e. the Apostles times, or first plantations. And agreeably to this, 2. from the general Aphorism, which we have in Origen, who was before this of Chalcedon above 200. years, ἡ ἀρχοῦσα ἐκκλησίας ἑκάστης πόλεως ἀρχούσῃ τῶν ἐν τῇ πόλει συγκρίσεον, that the Governour of the Church in each City must be corresponding to the Governour of the inhabitants of the City, viz. the civil Governour; which, supposing what is undoubted, that a King may dignifie an ordinary City, and make it a Metropolis, amounts to the same effect, that he may by consequence thus advance a Bishop into a Metropolitan; 3. and chiefly from what Balsamon here adds, διὰ τοῦτο ὑπερέκλησε----- for this cause, i.e. because of this power, which was of old given to Kings, the third chapter of the first title of the third book of the Basilica was out of use, or obsolete, continued not of force in the Church.

To understand the importance of which words, 'tis necessary to consider what that chapter is, 2.
which he saith was by this means out-dated, and in what times it was so. What that chapter was, he tells us expresly, though it be now (as being long disused) left out in the Basilica. It is, saith he, to be found in the 20. chap. of the first title of his present work, i.e. of Photius's Nomo-canon. Thither if we turn, we shall find the first part of it to be this, that there must not be two Metropolitans in one Province; which how it was out of use, or obsolete, and when or how long it had been so, appears by the κείμενον, or text subjoyned, Ἑλενόποντος δύο ἔχει μητροπολίτας, ὡς ἡ κη'. νεαρά----- Helenopontus hath two Metropolitans, as appears by the 28. Novel, Paphlagonia divers, as the 29. Novel witnesseth, and so Phrygia Capatiana, and the second Cappadocia. Now by these examples I may assume to prove, what I have in hand, for in what time these examples shall appear to fall, of those in any reason Balsamon's words must be interpreted. And for the former of them, those that are mentioned from Justinians Novels, the case is pretty clear, they both were evidently thus, long before Justinian's time ὑφ' ἑνὶ πρώτῳ ἄρχοντι, * saith he of one of them, 'twas in some former Governours time, not naming whose, that it was erected; but of the other, that of Paphlagonia, he saith expresly, that it was done, ἐπὶ τῶν Ὠνωρίου χρόνων, in Honorius's time, διατ. κϑ'. and that we know was before this Council of Chalcedon, and before Valentinian, which was all that I attempted to prove from Balsamon's words. As for the instance of secunda Cappadocia, 'tis manifest that it was the act of Valens, collegue to Valentinian the elder, and so, evidently before those times either of the Council of Chalcedon, or the other Valentinian.

* διατ. κη'.

This instance is considerable to the main business, and not insisted on formerly, and therefore I 3. shall a little inlarge on it. Cæsarea had at first been the one Metropolis of Cappadocia, and Basil the Great, Bishop of it, but Valens dividing Cappadocia into two Provinces, the first and second Cappadocia, made Thyana Metropolis of the second, and Anthimus was Metropolitan of it. Upon this grew a contention between Basil and Anthimus, Basil insisting on the ancient customes of the Church, καὶ τῆς τῶν πατέρων ἄνωθεν διαιρέσεως, and the original division of the Fathers. Anthimus, on the δημόσια, or civil forms, or constitutions saith Gregory Nazianzen, and Anthimus overcame, and then Gregory Nazianzen himself, Basil's dear friend, that had formerly favoured Basil's pretensions, doth after that expresly acknowledge the Bishop * of Thyana for his Metropolitan (Nazianzum being in Cappadocia secunda) and implores his aid to set some other Bishop in his place, now he was by sickness disabled to discharge it, in these words, εἰ μὲν ἄλλην τινὰ κεφαλὴν εἶχεν ἡ ἐπαρχία----- If the Province had any other head, I should appeal to it----- τῆς δὲ σῆς εὐλαβείας ὑπερκειμένης, πρός σε βλέπειν ἀναγκαῖον, but you being advanced to that place, I must necessarily look and seek to you. And this still continued valid, and firm, and Justinian, that by Edict retrencht those two formerly named, Helenopontus and Paphlagonia, was so far from retrenching this of Cappadocia, that he made a yet farther change, εἰς τρεῖς ἔτεμε, saith the Scholiast of Nazianzen in Fun. Or. Patris, he cut it into three, erected a third Cappadocia, and Mucissus the Metropolis of that, and the Ecclesiastical Government followed, as appears by Euphranta, Bishop of Thyana, and Theodosius, Bishop of Mucissos, in quinta Synod. Collat. 5. sub Justinian.

* Ep. 88.

Having said thus much for this interpretation of Balsamon's words, and upon this occasion added 4.
these evidences of the ancient practice, and power of Kings to erect Metropolitical Churches (according to the rule of Demetrius Chomatenus, Archbishop of Bulgaria, βασιλεὺς ἐνάγει ἀπὸ ἐλάττονος τιμῆς εἰς μείζονα, δηλαδὴ ἀπὸ ἐπισκοπῶν εἰς Μητρόπολιν, the King advances from a lesser to a greater honour, viz. from Bishopricks to a Metropolis) I should be willing to compare and balance with it any arguments that S. W. could produce for his opinion, that Balsamon speaks of his own times. But he hath been so reserved, as not to offer any such (only magisterially to affirm, that the Doctor is fallen into a great mistake, but 'tis not worth arguing or clearing) and therefore I have no more to add in this matter.

SECT. VII.

Rights of Kings acknowledged and confirmed by Councils. The Testimony out of Balsamon on Conc. Carth. Can. 16. The grievous mistake, whose it is. The Kings Canonical power, and liberties. Destruction of our Hierarchy no way imputable to the asserting of them.

WHat now follows for a leaf together, p. 147. by way of answer to my second observation, 1. and to the same purpose in another leaf, p. 149. in answer to my second testimony, doth somewhat surpass in its kind, all that hitherto hath been afforded us. The breviate of it is this; when I undertake that Kings have power to erect or translate Metropoles, Primacies, and Patriarchates, and to prove it, produce (beside known and allowed practices) the decrees and Canons of the Church

in

in Council, that so it shall be; presently he concludes, that the Doctor disputes against himself, he is, saith he, to prove that it is the Kings proper right, independent of the Church, or her Canons, and he brings for proof a Canon of a Council, and calls that a more expreß attributing this power to the Prince, which is indeed not attribuere, but tribuere, not an acknowledgment, but a bestowing and conferring it:] And on he runs a very fair loose in this chase, and clearly carries all before him.

2. Of this I have already spoken to the Catholick Gentleman, Reply, p. 112. and I shall need add but this, that the rights of Kings have been ever since the Apostles times preserved inviolate by all good Christians, that what without and before Universal Councils reasonably belonged to them, hath by Universal Councils been yielded to them. And this I deemed a fit way of judging of any particular right, whether it belonged to them or no, by inquiring what the Christian Church hath still yielded to them, meaning thereby, not the Decrees of the Pope, S. W. his pretended head of the Church, but the Canons of the Oecumenical Councils, truly so called, and the avowed Doctrine of the Universal Church, by which it hath always been yielded lawful for Princes to dispose of, and administer matters of exteriour order in the Church, and so to erect or remove Patriarchates, and consequently beyond all dispute, Princes still have this power, and the Pope, that at his creation hath vowed to observe all those ancient Canons inviolate, cannot without violation of his oath, attempt to deny any Christian Prince this power in his own dominions.

3. To this, all that S. W. hath to object, is, that the Church confers this power on Kings, and so doth not attribuere, but tribuere, attribute it, but bestow it.] And I that meant not to dispute of such niceties in Grammar, or mysteries of State, desirous to unite the civil and ecclesiastical power, and not to sow seeds of jealousies or dissentions betwixt them, finding the same thing assumed by Kings, as their right, and yielded them by the Church to be injoyed by them (for that sure is all that Balsamon's words can import, which he thinks so much for his advantage, φαμεν ὡς ὑπὸ τῦ παρόν[Θ κανόνΘ ἐνεδόθη τῷ βασιλεῖ ἐπισκοπὰς ποιεῖν ἐκ νεῦ, we say that by this present Canon (in Trullo) 'tis yielded to the Prince to erect Bishopricks anew, for 'tis certain that in Trullo, being after the Canon of Chalcedon, it was not by this present Canon so given him, that it was not his before; and the other testimony, that affirms this priviledge given to the Kingly power, παρὰ τῶν θείων κανόνων indefinitely, by the divine Canons, will stand him in little stead) I thought I might hence conclude this to be unquestionably their due, but whether it were from God immediately conferred on them, and independently from the Church, or whether the Church in any notion were the medium that God used now under the Gospel to confer it on them, truly I neither then was, nor now am, inclined either to inquire, or to take upon me to determine, being sure that this is not the hinge, on which the controversie betwixt us can depend, when it shall once be granted, that as now things stand in the World, Kings have this power really vested in them; this being most certain, that they that give the King any thing, do not, if he had it before, (nor indeed can be imagined to) take it away by giving it him. This Dilemma will secure both my pretensions, and my method of arguing for them; if this were the Emperours right, before the Church yielded or gave it to him, then sure the liberality of the Church is not so much worse than an ἄδωρον δῶρον, as to betray and rob him of it; If it were not formerly his right, but the Churches, then sure it is become so, by that donation. And when both these powers concur in the same instance, the King doing it of a presumed right, and the Canons of the Church expresly according with it, what doubt can there be of the conclusion? Thus the same Balsamon tells us in that very place, of Alexius Comnenus the Emperour, whose Edict S. W. here cites, that he made a διάγνωσις βασιλικὴ, an imperial decree, κατὰ παρουσίαν καὶ γῆς τότε συνδιαγνωμονήσης συνόδε, in the presence of the Synod that then was, and with their consent also, ἐφεμένον εἶναι τῷ βασιλεῖ προεδρίας θρόνον ταῖς ἐκκλησίαις χαρίζεσθαι, καὶ τὰς ἐπισκοπὰς καὶ τὰς ἀρχιεπισκοπὰς εἰς μητροπόλεις ἀνάσειν, that it was lawful to the Princes to grant to Churches the chair of presidency, and to advance Bishopricks and Archbishopricks into Metropoles; where, as the decree is the Kings, and the Synod only is present, and consents, so 'tis not that decree that gives the right, but it was by the Synod granted to be the Princes right before, or else we are to believe that they would not have consented to it; and again, in case it were granted to be first given to the Prince by the Canons of the Church, i. e. by the Canons of some universal Council, and that resolved to be the sense of that Emperors words in that Edict, τὸ παρὰ τῶν θείων κανόνων διδόμενον βασιλικῇ ἐξουσίᾳ προνόμιον, the priviledge given to the regal Power by the divine Canons; yet being so given, 1. it cannot now be taken away by the power of the Bishop of Rome, who is himself obliged to observe all such Canons; and 2. it cannot want any new act of the Church to enable the Prince for the exercise of it; the power which he hath so long enjoyed, is of it self sufficient to every particular act comprehended under that power, and wants no authoritative new concurrence, or consent of the Church for the confirming of it. And truly when in the close of that Paragraph S. W. hath fairly confest, that for the Emperour to erect Metropolitans, is an indulgence or priviledge granted and given him by the Church in her Canons.] I may well conclude the debate, having my whole conclusion granted me, as far as I pretended in that Section, and as far as I need ever pretend in order to our present controversie.

I now proceed to behold him in the second part of career in the same field, the δολιχοδρόμιον, wherein he promises himself such victories, having at the very entring on this stage, the good fortune, as he thinks, to have left his adversary behind him irremediably, over head and ears again, saith he, in a grievous mistake.] But the word [again] yields me some comfort still. For, if I have been once in this condition already, and yet escaped that danger, 'tis more than possible I may again meet with the like deliverance, of which I shall not despair till I have examined what it is, wherein this grievous mistake consists. Why, saith he, the Doctor begins thus, And accordingly the same Balsamon (on Con. Carthag. Can. 16.) doth upon that Canon professedly found the authority of Princes, ἐπισκοπὴν εἰς μητρόπολιν ἄγειν, to advance an Episcopal See into a Metropolis----- whereas, saith he, neither doth Balsamon found the authority of Princes to execute such acts on that Canon, there being not a word in it to that purpose, nor doth he professedly say any thing as of himself--- and had he said it, I conceive it no such strong argument, that a professed adversary should speak so professedly against one.]

Among

Among these three heads, I am set to seek out my grievous mistake. And for the last of them, I hope it will not very heavily oppress me, when S. W. in his last paragraph made use of Balsamon against me; and to say no more, I see not why a learned Patriarch of Antioch, that had served the Church of God so worthily, in his great and excellent pains on the Canons of the Ancient Church, should not be worthy to be named in a controversie concerning the Interests of the Church, or why it should not be as great a prejudice to S. W. his pretensions, that this Patriarch should be a professed adversary of them, as it can be to ours, that the Pope of Rome is not favourable to them.

The like I may resolve of the second, for 1. granting that the words made use of, are by Balsamon cited from other men, yet the opinion of others recited by Balsamon, and not disproved by him, but made use of, for the removing a difficulty before him, was, as I thought, by interpretation, the profession of Balsamon: And 2. those others would by their plurality be rather of greater, than of lesser authority than Balsamon, to prove that this Canon was esteemed in the Church a ground, whereon to found the authority of Princes, which was the only thing I vouch from it. 3. If the first objection have indeed truth in it, that there is not a word in the Canon to that purpose, then it matters little who 'tis that founds this authority of the Prince on that Canon, be it Balsamon, or any other, whom he cites, the mistake is equal. The weight then, or grievousness of the mistake must, I suppose, be laid on the first of these, that the Doctor cites any, that professedly found the authority of Princes on that Canon, which, saith he, hath not a word in it to that purpose.] 6.

But now, what if the mistake should be on S. W. his side after all this? Thus he must certainly be obliged to acknowledge, when I have minded the Reader of one trope, I know not whether involuntarily, or industriously put upon him by S. W. When in accord with what had been said in the former part of that 14*th.* §. from the Canon of Chalcedon, I cite out of Balsamon the profest founding the authority of Princes on that Canon (in a parentheſis expressing the place in Balsamon, where it is to be found, on Concil. Carthag. Can. 16.) he hath made a shift to interpret my words to this sense, that I affirm that the authority of Princes is professedly founded on the 16*th. Canon* of Carthage, which indeed saith not a word of it. Now what a project for victories is this? and who would ever submit to such meannesses, that could hope for any other way of tolerable subsistence? The short is, the 12*th. Canon* of Chalcedon, as that is reconciled with, and interpreted by the 17*th. Canon* of that Council, and the 38*th. in Trullo*, was the subject matter of that section, and upon that Canon (that sure is the Canon of Chalcedon) Balsamon, or those in Balsamon, found the authority of Princes to advance Episcopal Sees into Metropoles; and though the 16th. Canon of Carthage have not a word to this subject, yet Balsamon's Scholia on that Canon do thus, though but occasionally, mention it: If there be any question of this, do but turn to the place in Balsamon, in Synod. Carthag. p. 627. where having recited the very words by me set down, that the King hath power to do many things, among these, ἐπισκοπὴν εἰς μητρόπολιν ἄγειν, ἐκ νέα ἐπισκόπες καὶ μητροπολίτας καθιςᾶν, to advance an Episcopal See to a Metropolis, and to constitute Bishops and Metropolitans anew, he adds, χρῶνται δὲ καὶ τῷ ιβ'. καὶ ις'. κανόνι τῆς ἐν Χαλκηδόνι συνόδε, καὶ τῷ λη'. κανόνι τῆς ἐν Τρύλλῳ συνόδε, τὰ αὐτὰ παρακελευομένοις, they use the 12. and 17. Canon of Chalcedon, and the 38. Canon of the Council in Trullo, which command the same things. What now can be more evident than this, that 'twas not I, but S. W. that was in this grievous mistake?

Or if yet he shall insist, that there being mention in the line before, of Concil. Carthag. Can 16. [that Canon] in the subsequent must refer to that Carth. Canon. I answer, that those words (on Concil. Carth. 16.) are in a parentheſis, the known nature of which is, that it may be left out without disturbing the sense, or connexion of the insuing with the precedent words: And then the sense must be complete thus, leaving out the parentheſis. The same Balsamon doth upon that Canon professedly found the authority of Princes--- and then 'tis not possible to feign any antecedent for [that Canon] to relate to, but the Chalcedon Canon in the former part of that Sect. 8.

What here he hath gathered up out of that place of Balsamon, that the King is neither under laws nor canons, and therefore he may securely do this; from whence he collects, that this power of the King to remove Patriarchates, is deduced from no other ground than this, that his will is his law, that he may lawfully do what he lists, adding, that these grounds supposed, he blames not the inference, that he should erect, transplant, nay pull down, not only Bishops and Patriarchs, but the whole Hierarchy it self, (your present lot, saith he, consequent to these your grounds) this is still of the same unsincere piece, and is visibly so, as soon as ever 'tis remembred, that they that say this of the King, χρῶνται τῷ κανόνι---- cite three Canons of Councils for their affirmation: For sure if the King have this power, in their opinion, by the decrees of Councils, then he hath it upon some other ground than this, that his will is his law.----- 9.

The short is, the ancient Canons have made prohibitions, and interdicted Bishops some things, which yet the same Canons allow them to do, when it is by the Kings appointment; they forbid any Bishop to meddle with secular affairs, to incroach on another Man's Diocese; so again they forbid any ordinary Bishop to take upon him to be a Metropolitan, nay to seek or solicite for such increase of power to his See; and yet they allow a Bishop to meddle with such secular Ministeries, καθ' οἰκονομίαν βασιλικὴν when the Prince shall thus appoint, and in that case ὑπὸ τῶν ῥηθέντων κανόνων κωλυθήσεσθαι ἢ βλαβήσεσθαι, he shall not be hindred or hurt by the forementioned Canons: so again they allow liberty to the Prince to advance a Bishoprick into a Metropolis, and the like, adding that the King ὅτι νόμοις ὅτε κανόσιν ὑπόκεισθαι, is not subject to Laws and Canons, i. e. these Laws and Canons that were made for the retrenching other mens enormous irregular actions, were never meant to extend to the restraining of the Prince, as appears by the very words of these Canons, which yield this power to the King, though they take it away from all others. Thus in Demetrius Chomatenus his first answer to Cabasila, Jur. Græco-Rom. l. 5. p. 317. τοῦτο κανονικὸν οὐκ ἐστὶν, ὅτε μὲν τῆς ἐγγράφε ἢ ἀγράφε παραδόσεως, γίνεται δὲ πολλάκις βασιλέως κελεύοντος, διὰ τινὰ οἰκονομίαν λυσιτελοῦσαν κοινῇ, this of a Bishop removing from See to See, is not Canonical, neither by any written or unwritten tradition, yet 'tis ordinarily done upon the command of the King for some administration useful to the publick; adding by the way of general Aphorism, τὰ τοιαῦτα κίνησις μόνη βασιλικὴ δύναμιν ἔχει μεταλλάττειν τὰ καὶ καινολομεῖν, such things as these the regal Edict alone hath power (that sure is not a violent tyrannical presumption) to change and innovate; and by and by after a great deal to this purpose he concludes, ταῦτα πάντα ῥᾴδιόν ἐστι καταμαθεῖν ἀπό γε τῆς τῶν ἱερῶν καὶ θείων κανόνων προλήψεως, 'Tis easie to learn all this from the volumes of sacred and divine Canons, which it seems allow this. And many the like may be met with in Ecclesiastick Writers. And for this there is evident reason; because what would tend to injustice and disorder, being done by Bishops on their own heads, or from their own ambitions, being yet ordered and commanded by Governours, whose office it is to judge of publick commodity, and accordingly to give rule in it, tends to the most contrary ends, preservation of peace, and order, and justice, and all that is desirable among Men. 'Twas not possible S. W. should be unable to discern this, whether in the practice (so frequent) or in the palpable reasonableness of it, and therefore the fault is the greater, that he should 1. thus shuffle together things that are most distant, the irregular wills of Tyrannes, and the Canonical liberties of Princes, and then vouch as our grounds, that the Prince may pull down the whole Hierarchy it self; and having ascended to this high degree of that which no Christian should once be guilty of, speaking confidently what he knows hath not the least semblance of truth in it, 'tis admirable that he should yet be able to transcend himself, and advance to this most superlative pitch of affirming our present lot (the pulling down our Hierarchy) to be consequent to these forementioned grounds, as if He which died in the defence of the laws and hierarchy of our Church, had been guilty of the demolishing of it. 'Tis hard I confess to reply to such reasonings as this.

SECT. VIII.

Anselm's interpretation of 2 Thes. 2. 7. Lawful power of Kings. Kings founders of Bishopricks in England. Regali authoritate, in the Charter for Battel Abbey. Bishopricks bestowed by Kings by Investiture. Non-reception of Legates. Kings power to remove Patriarchates, prejudicial to the Papal, not Patriarchal pretensions.

1. HIS next tender of answers to my 15. and 16. Sections, begins with many good words to Anselme, in pure gratitude for the kindness he expresst to the Pope, in saving his authority, before he would consent to the erection of the Bishoprick of Ely. And seeing he is by S. W. afforded the Elogie of the gravest Prelate our Countrey hath ever been honoured with, for this one merit of refusing the Kings sole authority to conclude such businesses, without his and the Pope's consent] I shall ask him what he thinks of Anselm's words, on 2 Thes. 2. 7. Romanus Pontifex qui tenet nunc Ecclesias, teneat illas donec de medio fiat, i. e. donec ab ipsâ Romanâ Ecclesiâ, quæ est medium & cor Ecclesiarum, fiat iniquitas, ob quam ab eâ multæ discedant Ecclesiæ. The Bishop of Rome, who now holds the Churches, let him hold them till he be taken away, i. e. saith he, till iniquity be committed by the Roman Church it self, which is the middle and heart of the Churches, for which many Churches depart from her. What ill luck was it that S. W. his profusest acclamations should be bestowed upon one that hath no better deserved them?

2. I have no more to say, but to desire the Reader to read over the Sections, to which they are accommodated, and only to remember, that when I speak of the power of Kings, I speak only of their lawful power, such as was by all disinterested persons accounted really to belong to them, such as is approved and allowed them by the Canons of the Universal Church, and in the exercise whereof, the Bishops or Governours of the Church then being, expressed their sense that it was so, and concurred, as far as they were concerned, to the acts of it (yet this still without the authoritative consent, or concurrence of the Bishop of Rome, as to this Realm of ours) and that for any all-lawful inerrableness, as he calls it, I that do not allow it the Pope in any his narrowest sphear of motion, in his own territories, or chair, did never plead it to belong to Kings in theirs; Nor do I any more pretend, that they which are obliged to make no law, but by consent of Parliament, should make laws of themselves, without and against that consent; which is all the Reply due to his Answer to the instance of Kenulphus in his next Paragraph.

3. As for his other answer taken from the Kings founding of Abbies---- it will rather assist, than prejudice our pretensions, who acknowledge him founder of our Bishopricks also, and from thence framed an argument for this power of his, Sect. 18.

4. What he adds of Regali authoritate, in the Charter of William the Conqueror to Battel Abbey, that it signifies the Jus Regis, 1 Kin. the power of the sword, and injustice, and this consequent to his being the Emperour] needs no other answer than this, that he that came in by the sword, professed to rule by law, and is no more to be presumed to have broken his oath, than the Popes that vow to rule according to Canon, though they have come in by Simonie. And the particular Charter by me cited from him, having the attestation of the Bishops and Barons joyned to his regal authority, 'tis to be presumed (there appearing no cause of fear to extort it from them) that they thought it agreeable to regality and justice too, what he thus did, or would not have thus attested.

5. The three particulars behind in this 5. Sect. have been briefly toucht on already here, or in the Reply, and there is no appearance of weight in what is here suggested, to exact my farther inlarging. For, 1. If the Kings of France and England, and Emperours of Germany, have always claimed to bestow Bishopricks by investiture, then I must still suppose this some prejudice, or retrenchment to the Pope's Universal Pastorship, as S. W. will inlarge the fringes of it; and this his own words confess to me, when at length he minds me of the Pope, and Clergie's resistance to Kings, that usurped these Investitures: for if so they did, sure they must be thought to have deemed it some invasion of their pretended rights, that the Kings thus claimed and injoyed them, or else they would not have been so peevish to make such unjust at once, and gainless resistances. And this was all that I pretended from that instance.

So

So also for the Legates receptions, it cannot miss to be an indication of the Supreme power of Kings in all causes within their own Realms, and consequently of the no Supremacy of the Pope, that his Legate, which is interpretatively himself, cannot without leave from the Prince, lawfully enter the Kingdom, or exercise any jurisdiction in it, this sure being the priviledge of every Supreme Governor, that his Dominions should lye open to him, and to the πεμπομένοις ἀντ' αὐτοῦ, 1 Pet. 2. 14. his ἡγεμόνες, be they ordinary Judges of circuit, or fixt Procurators, or any that any way represent his person, as certainly Legates do, and are therefore styled ἀπὸ προσώπου from his person, or à latere, from his side, and come, and are either received, or rejected in the virtue of him that sent them. Of this see the Reply, p. 124. And then the greater the number is of such Nations, which still deny this liberty of admission to the Pope's Legates, the more proofs there are of the no Universal agnition of his Universal Supremacy. 6.

And lastly, for his suggestion, that all this while I mistake the Papal power for a Patriarchate, See Reply, c. 6. sect. 4. n. 21. or remember, that the Supreme power of Kings being once asserted (particularly to this, to erect in their Realms, Primates, or Bishops, independent from all foreign power) is a competent prejudice to the Popes highest pretensions, those of the Universal Pastorship, and indeed most proportionable, and particularly adequate to that, and was never designed by me, as the Engine to oppugn his Patriarchal just rights, nor if it had, could it have hoped to be successful to that end. The unlimited Papal usurpations are they, that are found unreconcileable with the power of Kings in their own Realms, as one society cannot have two Supremes. This advertisement may assure him, I was not so blind as to mistake Rome's pretensions to be for no more than a Patriarchate; If I had, I should either never have disputed at all, or have made use of some other Arguments, viz. The Pope's fastidious rejecting and disclaiming that title, relinquishing and renouncing those his just rights, in order to these higher pretensions. 7.

SECT. IX.

Testimonies of the power of Kings in the Church vindicated, from Demetrius Chomatenus. οἷα. Constantine in an Assembly of Bishops. His Ecclesiastick Laws. τὰ ἔσω, and τὰ ἐκτὸς ἐκκλησίας. The Bishops and the Kings power. Constantine's titles, and oversight of Bishops. Leo Isaurus stiling himself ἱερεύς. Socrates his testimony of the Churches dependence on Kings.

HIS sixth Section, after some of his wonted Discipline, to remind me of what I was competently assured, that I was far gone in his displeasure, is pleased to apply answer to my marginal testimonies concerning the power of Kings in the Church: And first, to that of Demetrius Chomatenus, Archbishop of Bulgary, in his response to Constantinus Cabasila, Archbishop of Dyrrhachium, where he had no temptation to flatter Kings, yet affirms, ὁ βασιλεὺς οἷα κοινὸς τῶν ἐκκλησιῶν ἐπισημονάρχης καὶ ὢν καὶ ὀνομαζόμενος, the King is as it were the common directer and ruler of the Churches, both in title and reality: he answers, that this signifies rather he was not so, than was so, unless I can prove, that quasi, as it were, can bear the sense of revera, in deed and in reality; where to make short, and gratifie S. W. I shall undertake to prove what he thinks so impossible, both that [οἷα] can, and in that place must, signifie revera, indeed, and in reality. 1.

And 1. I premise, that the rendring οἷα by quasi in Latine, or, as it were, in English, cannot prejudice the notation of the word in Greek, particularly in the use of that Writer. Οἷα, saith Hesychius and Phavorinus, denotes ὥσπερ, καθάπερ, ἅτε, and is in ordinary use the same with utpote, scilicet, videlicet, as, to wit, and so hath no intimation of a bare shew, or similitude, as that is opposed to reality. In the fifth line of that Response, μηδὲ ἐξὸν μοι---οἷα εὖ εἰδότι, it was not lawful for me--- as knowing well---- where sure he affirms himself really to know, and not in resemblance, as that is opposed to truth. So within few lines after in the first page, μηδέτερον ἀποσώζειν ---- κενινδύνευκα, οἷα τὴν μὲν ὑπακοὴν ὀκνῶν, I have been in danger to preserve neither, as being slow (not only appearing to be so) in respect of obedience; and thus 'tis evidently in this place; the occasion of the Speech is contained in the words immediately precedent, which I had occasion to recite even now, that the King hath power by his sole Edict to change some things in order to publick advantage, which the Canons of the Church have determined, δύναμιν ἔχει, saith that Bishop, his command or Edict hath power, and that μόνη alone by it self. And the words themselves in the full period, of which I cited but the breviate, run thus, ὁ βασιλεὺς γὰρ, οἷα κοινὸς τῶν ἐκκλησιῶν ἐπισημονάρχης καὶ ὢν καὶ ὀνομαζόμενος, καὶ συνοδικαῖς γνώμαις ἐπισκοπῶν, καὶ τὸ κῦρος ταύταις χαρίζεται, ἐκκλησιαστικὰς τάξεις ῥυθμίζει, καὶ νομοθετεῖ βίῳ καὶ πολιτείᾳ τῶν τῷ βήματι προσιόντων---- For the King, as both being, and being called the common directer and ruler of the Churches (evidently οἷα in the notion of utpote) hath the presidence over the Synodical determinations, and gives them the validity, regulates the Ecclesiastical orders, and gives law to the life and conversation of those that wait on the altar, and more to the same purpose in that place; which sure will abundantly reprove S. W. his κρητύγελον from the quasi, as it were, which he thought would stand him in such stead, to avoid and retort the force of that first testimony. Ὡς, saith the Scholiast on Thucydides, is ἀληθῶς, ὄντως, not appearingly only, but really and indeed (see Joh. 1. 14.) and so is οἷα also. 2.

The second testimony from the words of Constantine, he thinks hath brought in great pomp to his triumphs, but it will not prove so upon the review: For 1. the words I said were spoken in an assembly of Bishops; but I did not say, in a general Council of Bishops, nor meant I, nor foresaw that any, either the simplest Reader, or learned as S. W. should ever mistake me so. We use [assembled together] Act. 1. 4. of Christ and his Apostles, when the Greek συναλιζόμενος signifies eating together, and the propriety is equal, and the word in frequent use, for being together in any common meeting, whatsoever the occasion of the assembly be, and therefore S. W. hath sure gained little by this: It was, I acknow- 3.

ledge moſt willingly, at a feſtival aſſembly of Biſhops, that Conſtantine thus ſpake; yet I ſuppoſe, that, no more prejudice to the truth of his ſpeech, or to the importance of it, than if it had been ſpoken in the very Council of Nice, or in any other the fulleſt, and ſolemneſt Aſſembly; and therefore it was no ſuch rare εὕρημα, to add to S. W. his great ſucceſſes, that either he found the place in Euſebius, which is vulgarly known, (and therefore could not, as he ſuggeſts, be prudently omitted by me) or to find the Emperour and Biſhops at dinner, when he came, or that he was fain to ſeek to his Latine Euſebius to eſpy this, and make his reports of it.

4. 2. Whereas S. W. reſolves, that there never was teſtimony, nor can be imagined in ſo little room more expreſly witneſſing that Kings have nothing to do with Eccleſiaſtick affairs, than this of Conſtantine, which the Doctor brings to prove the contrary] I deſire this may be judged, 1. by the immediate antecedents, then by the words themſelves in the Original Greek, and not in his miſ-rendring Latine Euſebius. The immediate antecedents in that * very page, tell us of many ‖ laws of his concerning the obſervation of the Lords day in all the Provinces, concerning a ſet form of prayer to be uſed by all (μεμελετημένην ἐυχὴν ἐξ ἑνὸς συνθήματος ὁμοῦ τὰς πάντας ἀναπέμπειν θεῷ, and again, ἐνθέσμους ἐυχὰς) concerning the uſe of it by the Roman Souldiers in their vulgar, i. e. ῥωμαϊκὴ γλώττῃ, Roman tongue, concerning Holy-days, or the feaſts of Martyrs, and ſome other the like, which ſure were exercises of power in Eccleſiaſtical affairs. Then for the words themſelves, it matters little what the title of the Chapter in the Latine edition is, when Euſebius neither wrote Latine, nor, that we know of, affixt titles to his Chapters. The words in the Greek might eaſily have been come to, Euſebius εἰς τ βίον Κωνσταντίνε, is not ſo great a rarity, and S. W. was lately willing we ſhould know he could read Greek: And there theſe are the words of Euſebius, Λόγον ἀφῆκεν, ὡς ἄρα εἴη κ̓ αὐτὸς ἐπίσκοπος, literally, he delivered this ſpeech, that he was alſo an Overſeer, or Biſhop, adding the very words in which he delivered himſelf; in that Writers hearing, Ὑμεῖς μὲν τῶν εἴσω τῆς ἐκκλησίας, ἐγὼ δὲ τῶν ἐκτὸς ὑπὸ θεοῦ καθισάμενος ἐπίσκοπος ἂν εἶην, literally thus (ſeeing paraphraſes of obſcure words muſt not be indured, when they ſound to S. W. his diſadvantage) ye are Biſhops of the things within the Church, or overſeers of the Church, of the things within, but I am conſtituted under God, Biſhop, or overſeer of the things without. Here 'twas neither my intereſt nor deſign to take the word ἐκκλησία Church (as S. W. ſuggeſts) for a material Church of ſtone, but for the Congregation, or aſſembly of Chriſtians, ruled or adminiſtred by the Biſhops in ſome things, by the Emperour in others. Matter of ſacred office of Function, adminiſtration of Sacraments, ordination, excommunication, and the like, which are the τὰ εἴσω, the internal acts, were peculiar to the Biſhops of the Church; but the τὰ ἐκτὸς, matters of external order, ſuch as were even now mentioned out of Demetrius Chomatenus, belong to the Chriſtian Emperour: he is by God appointed to be the ἐπίσκοπος, Biſhop, or overſeer, or adminiſtrator of ſuch: (in which reſpect I ſuppoſe it is, that St. Chryſoſtome is ſaid to have told Arcadius, οἱ κοσμικοὶ ἄρχοντες ἀρχόντων κ̓ ἐπισκόπων ἔργον ἐνεπιστεύθησαν, that the ſecular Magiſtrates were intruſted with the work of Biſhops as well as Rulers, (Georg. Alex. Βιὸς χρυσος. p. 187.) and accordingly Arcadius proceeds againſt the Arians, p. 198. l. 20. and againſt their Hymns, p. 199. l. 4.) and among theſe is particularly ſet down in the inſuing relation, the inſpection and care of the lives of Eccleſiaſtical perſons, which by his adjoyning exhortation, he expreſt to be one part of his ἐπισκοπὴ; and certainly this is an evidence of the Emperor's power in Eccleſiaſtical matters (and ſo in ſpiritual things in that notion of ſpiritual, for matters of external order in the Church, ſuch is erecting or tranſlating Metropoles, &c.) ſo is it the very thing that I was to conclude from that, and the other teſtimonies: And ſo all that S. W. hoped to have gained by a corrupt Latine copie, which, ſaith he, renders τῶν εἴσω & τῶν ἐκτὸς τῆς ἐκκλησίας ἐπίσκοποι, intra & extra eccleſiam Epiſcopi (which the particle τῶν demonſtrates to be a ſenſleſs rendring) is viſibly come to nothing; they were things of the Church, that Conſtantine was Governour of, as well as thoſe that the Biſhops adminiſtred; all the difference this, that the former were but τὰ ἐκτὸς τῆς ἐκκλησίας, external matters of order, &c. of the Church, and Churchmen (whereas the Biſhops inſpection, or rule, belonged to other matters) to which agrees the ſenſe of the Greek Church, expreſt in the Calendar of the Church of Conſtantinople, ſtyling that Emperour ☩ ἐν Βασιλεῦσιν Ἀποστολον, and ἰσαπόστολον, an Apoſtle among Kings, and equal to an Apoſtle, not only in aſſiſting the plantation of the Church in ſo eminent a manner, (which gave him the title of Religionis & fidei author, the author of religion and faith, in an * old Marble) but in the governing it when it was planted.

* Euſeb. de vit. Conſt. edit. Rob. Steph. fol. 150. ‖ ἐν νόμῳ διεκελεύσατο, ἐνομοθέτησε πράττειν, νόμῳ ἐφοίτα, ἰσῦμα βασιλέως.

* Gruter. p. 159.

5. What he farther adds out of the Latine copie, to render his interpretation more probable, and that all that was meant by his calling himſelf a Biſhop, was, that it was his calling to exhort all his ſubjects to lead a pious life] is again a pitiful ſtratagem; for whereas his Latine hath, animum in omnes qui ejus ſuberant imperio intentum habuit, hortatus pro virili ut piam vitam excolerent, the Greek reads τὺς ἀρχομένους ἅπαντας ἐπεσκόπει, πρὸτρεπέ τε----- he overlookt or ruled, or took care of all his ſubjects (and the Clergy and Biſhops themſelves, if we may believe the Fathers, were of that number) and exhorted them moſt earneſtly to follow a pious life, and as long as the Biſhops did continue to do ſo, there was, I hope, no need of more than exhorting.

6. 3. For the words of Leo Iſaurus, that told the Pope he was ἱερεὺς, as well as βασιλεὺς, S. W. was able without an interpreter, to have underſtood the meaning of them, the very ſame that the Kings of England have aſſumed, not to be Prieſts in the ſtrict notion of that word ἱερεὺς, as that refers to matter of Order; that had been very extravagant indeed, and that puts it out of queſtion, that it was not meant by him; but to have power ἐν ἱεροῖς in ſacred or Eccleſiaſtical matters, and not in civil only; and 'tis more reaſonable and Chriſtian, to ſay with J. C. in Goldaſtus, that Gregory II. was not ſo paſſionate a pretender to the incloſure and monopoly of all Eccleſiaſtical power, but that he could allow the Emperour his part of it, than with S. W. to pronounce an Emperour extravagant, Archheretick, infatuate, becauſe he had unhappily incurred his diſpleaſure, by ſaying what was not for S. W. his intereſt, to have believed from him.

Another

Another [thirdly] now follows in anſwer to the teſtimony of Socrat. that from the time of the Emperors receiving the Faith, the affairs of the Church depended on them] and this is very ſharply rebuked, and poor I, for the ſake of it. 1. Becauſe the word Supream is not there to be found, and becauſe the affairs of the head may depend on the arms and ſhoulders, and becauſe I catch at a word, and think to deduce thence a full ſentence.] But to all this the anſwer is brief; 1. That the Church, whoſe affairs are there ſpoken of, is not the head, but the body, and that on, or (ἐξ) from which the body depends, is ſtill the head, though the head it ſelf may in ſome ſence depend on other parts of the body. 2. That 'tis plain, the dependence here ſpoken of, is of the inferiors on the ſupream, by that which here follows, as a proof of it in the next words, καὶ αἱ μεγίσται σύνοδοι τῇ αὐτῶν γνώμῃ γεγόνασί τε καὶ γίνονται, and the greateſt Synods have been, and are convoked by their appointment, and that ſure is an evidence of their ſupream power; for neither the arms nor the ſhoulders were ever called to that office of convoking and indicting of Oecumenical Councils, but only the ſupream power, whereſoever that was placed. 7.

SECT. X.

Optatus his words of the Pope's headſhip. Petrus Primus, in many reſpects, before Chriſts promiſing the Keys. Caput omnium Apoſtolorum. Cephas. Cathedra Apoſtolica, in other Churches as well as Rome. Romes change from the Primitive Zeal and Faith. Power of Princes to ſuppreſs Schiſm. Eccleſiaſtical perſons not ſecured from Intereſts.

THE place in Optatus, noting it as a Schiſmatical piece of language in the Donatiſts, to ſay, Quid Imperatori cum Eccleſiâ?] might, I doubt not, have been eaſily found in him, if S. W. had lookt with that deſign, though the figure of the book was miſtaken by the Printer. The words are to be found l. 3. ed. Caſaub. p. 81. and ſo before in the full ſence, l. 1. p. 27. De nobis dicitis, quid Chriſtianis cum regibus? aut quid Epiſcopis cum palatio? You ſay of us, What have Chriſtians to do with Kings? what Biſhops with the Palace? And it may be worth S. W. his obſerving, what return Optatus makes to this ſaying and practice of the Donatiſt, l. 3. p. 81. Cum ſuper Imperatorem non ſit niſi ſolus Deus, qui fecit Imperatorem, dum ſe Donatus ſuper Imperatorem extollit, jam quaſi hominum exceſſerat metas, ut ſe ut Deum non hominem æſtimaret, non verendo eum, qui poſt Deum ab hominibus timebatur. But ſometimes diverſion is the beſt way of anſwering arguments, as of avoiding of enemies forces; and accordingly this method is here choſen (and I am ſo obedient to all his directions, as to attend him in it) In that ſecond Book of Optatus, he finds, forſooth, that ancient Father calling the Doctor Schiſmatick, and quite confuting and contradicting all his book, ſaying, Negare non potes ſcire te in urbe Româ Petro primo Cathedram Epiſcopalem eſſe collatam, in quâ ſederit omnium Apoſtolorum caput Petrus; then he proceeds to reckon up all the Popes of Rome, till Siricius, cum quo nobis totus orbis in commercio formatarum in unâ Communionis ſocietate concordat, and afterwards --- probatum eſt nos eſſe in Eccleſia ſancta Catholica --- per Cathedram Petri quæ noſtra eſt, & per ipſam cæteras dotes apud nos eſſe, etiam ſacerdotium, and then alas poor Dr. H. who having loſt communion with that Church, hath loſt alſo his Prieſthood, miſſion --- if this holy Father ſay true. --- 1.

I ſhall have S. W. his pardon, I hope, for the digreſſion, and then being very unwilling to wave the conſidering any thing brought out of antiquity to this purpoſe, for the Pope's ſupremacy; I have no other temptation to decline following him καθ' ὁδὸν, through this whole paſſage, not meaning to caſt off this ancient Father, as he hath ſtiled Optatus, for no other fault, but that, which neither he nor S. W. could mend, of not being born in due time, or having wrote after the 300*th. year*, which he is pleaſed to fanſie the fatal period, lower than which we will allow of none, with how little ground of truth, may anon appear alſo. 2.

The firſt advantage then, I ſuppoſe, deſigned from Optatus, is, that he calls Petrus Primus, for thoſe two words are written in Capital letters; And I anſwer by theſe ſteps, 1. that thus much was ſure to be met with in the firſt 300 years, even in the Evangeliſts, πρῶτος Σίμων, which I have oft acknowledged, and is the ſame in Greek that this is in Latine; 2. that Peter might be firſt in ſome other reſpects, without bringing any advantage to S. W. his pretenſions, which depend only on his Primacy of power and authority, not amongſt, but over all others. 3.

Firſt he might be in age, and if he was not ſo ſimply of all, yet without queſtion of thoſe three, to whom Chriſt generally vouchſafed his ſpecial favours above the reſt: 2. he was in Diſcipleſhip firſt, as that ſignifies, the following, and ſtrict attending on him (though Philip were firſt called by Chriſt, Joh. 1. in which reſpect, ſaith * Auguſtine, Petrus Primus Apoſtolorum, Paulus noviſſimus, Peter the firſt, Paul the laſt of the Apoſtles; one ſo the firſt, as the other the laſt:) And 3. Firſt in confeſſion, and many eminent virtues (though the moſt eminent in falling alſo) and ſo firſt in three conſiderable reſpects (and perhaps in as many more, which I diſcern not) without having the dominion aſſigned, or promiſed him over the reſt of the Apoſtles. 3. That the Primacy which he had, he had before the donation of the Keys, or the tu es Petrus, Mat. 16. (on which, and on what was after that, Feed my ſheep, the Romaniſt grounds it) This appears by Mat. 10. 2. where that title is given him, and ſo by the Fathers Scholia on Mat. 16. 16. loci non immemor ſui Petrus Primatum egit, primatum confeſſionis utique non honoris, ſaith S. Ambroſe, * he was mindful of his place, he had the Primacy of confeſſion, not of honour; of faith, and not of order; and this ſuppoſes that he had it before Chriſt's anſwer to him, wherein the Keys were promiſed; and that his confeſſion, and Chriſts anſwer upon that, was rather the effect, than the cauſe of his Primacy. And ſo ſaith * Cyril of Alexandria, προεξάλλεται τῶν ἄλλων κορυφαῖος καὶ τῶν ἄλλων προτέλαγμένος, καί φησι --- as the Coryphæus of the reſt, and one placed before the reſt, he firſt breaks out and ſaith, Thou art Chriſt --- having formerly obſerved of that Apoſtle in general, ὑπερίσροφος ἀεὶ πᾶς ἦν ἀνθρωπος, κεκινημένος ἀμείνως εἰς τὸ ἐπὶ τὸ δρᾶσαί τε καὶ εἰπεῖν προθυμίαν, διὰ καὶ πρῶτος ὁμολόγει τὴν πίσιν, he was alacrious and nimble always in a high degree, in reſpect of forwardneſs both to act and ſpeak. 4.

As

5. As for the second title, Omnium Apostolorum Caput Petrus, 1. That signifies no more than Primus did before, and so exacts no new answer: 'tis no news that the word head in all languages should denote oft-times the Primacy of Order, not Supremacy of Jurisdiction; as when Antioch is called the head of the Christian world, because they were there first called Christians: 2. 'Tis no special observation, that Optatus calls him so, others did so before Optatus, who yet appear to have designed no eminent favour to S. W. his pretensions; witness * S. Hierom, or rather Jovinian in S. Hierom, who calls Peter head, inter duodecim unus constituitur, ut capite constituto schismatis tollatur occasio, and yet in the very same period affirms, that as the Church was founded on Peter, so 'twas, in another place, super omnes Apostolos, upon all the Apostles, and cuncti claves cœlorum accipiunt, all received the keys of Heaven, and ex æquo super eos Ecclesiæ fortitudo solidatur, the strength of the Church is established equally on them all; and if Optatus's words, and the title of Head, may be interpreted by the same stile in this place in S. Hierom before him, 'tis visible what is become of all the advantage S. W. can reap by that testimony.

* Ad Jovin. l. 1 c. 14.

6. But then 3. if to the mention of Caput Petrus, in Optatus, he had set down the words immediately following, it would have been little for the dignity of the citation, Omnium Apostolorum, saith he, Caput Petrus, unde & Cephas appellatus est, Peter was the head of all the Apostles, from whence he was also called Cephas. But doth Cephas a stone signifie a head with Optatus? was the Greek Κεφαλὴ a head, drawn in to favour this Etymologie? This may lawfully diminish ones reverence to these words of Optatus, though I preserve it never so intire to his other excellencies.

7. As for the rest of the words recited, that the whole world agrees in one society of Communion with Rome, and that they that have the Chair of Peter are by that proved to be in the holy Catholick Church, and to have the rest of the dowries of a Church, particularly the Priesthood.] Take it at the utmost of the literal importance, and I doubt not but it hath perfect truth in it; and so it would also, if it had been spoken of any other of the Apostles plantations, the Chair of S. John in Asia, &c. the meaning of the chair being evident to signifie the ruling power of the Church brought down (as it was in every Apostolick See) by succession from the Apostles, which, saith he, the Donatists could not pretend (and l. 3. he expresses it in another stile, Unitatem cum toto orbe terrarum, & cum memoriis Apostolorum ---- habere noluistis, Ye would not have unity with the whole world, and with the memories of the Apostles, in the plural, as well as with S. Peter) and so must be pronounced Schismaticks.

8. Thus in the same second book, he useth the same language of other Churches as he doth here of Rome, ‖ Extra septem Ecclesias, quicquid foris est, alienum est, Whatsoever is without the seven Churches (of Asia, mentioned Rev. 1.) is strange, or schismatical, and so of * Thessalonica, Corinth, Galatia. All which inlarges these priviledges of the Church, and so the Priesthood and mission among them, to all other Churches that have continued their succession from the Apostles (as I doubt not, we of the Church of England have done) and confines them not to the Roman See, exclusively or peculiarly; and so the poor Doctor may retain his Priesthood, and mission, and power to preach, and not be fain to seek out the Donatists Ghosts to hold communion with, and yet this Father be allowed to be of age to speak, and by my free consent his testimony be taken.

‖ P. 45.

* Tibi unitas displicet; hoc si crimen putas, argue nos Thessalonicensibus, Corinthiis, Galatis — communicasse. Ib. d. p. 52.

9. But the truth is, the full importance of these words in Optatus, must yet further be fetcht out from the consideration of the Schismatical Donatists practice. Of them 'tis well known, that they raised a Schism in the African Church, and every where set up a Bishop of their own Sect, even where there was an Orthodox Bishop already setled. This is lookt on by S. Austin, as the formal part of their Schism, erecting Altar against Altar, as he often expresseth it. And because they would gain to themselves the reputation of communicating with other Churches, they * created a clancular Bishop in Africa, and sent him to Rome, that he might gather together the Africans that dwelt at Rome, and there be Bishop over them that were of that Sect, and so they might have mutual intercourse commercio Formatarum betwixt Rome and their Sect in Africk. This design of theirs was first set up in the time of Constantine, about the year 321. in the City of Rome; the first Bishop of this Sect was Victor Garbiensis: Therefore Optatus l. 2. adverss. Parmen. useth that as a sure proof that they made a Schism at Rome, because at the time when he wrote, there had been but six Bishops in Rome of that Sect, Victor Garbiensis, Bonifacius Ballicanus, Encolpius, Macrobius, Lucianus, Claudianus; whereas the succession of Catholick Bishops there, had continued from S. Peter to Siricius by lawful election. Moreover those Bishops of the Donatists had no Canonical election, but were sent over and thrust in by the Africans, toti Afri & peregrini in illa civitate sibi successisse noscuntur, Opt. l. 2. p. 40. and had not so much as one Church in Rome to perform Divine Offices in. Ecce præsentes sunt ibi duorum memoriæ Apostolorum: Dicite si ad has ingredi potuit, ita ut obtulerit illic, ubi sanctorum memorias esse constat. Opt. l. 2. p. 39. and, inter quadraginta ---- basilicas, locum ubi colligerent, non habebant, p. 40. S. Austin urgeth the same arguments against the Donatists, Ep. 165. wherein he instructeth Generosus against the pretensions of a Donatist Presbyter, who boasted of a short succession in Constantia the Metropolis of Numidia. So that evidently the arguings of Optatus and S. Austin from the succession of the Roman Bishops, are set in opposition to that claim of a few successions, and those irregular, whether in Africa, or Numidia, or at Rome; and so they are very concludent against them, and the arguments serve to prove which of the two were Schismaticks at Rome: but that succession is not set down, as an infallible Rule for all Churches to be guided by, and give Rome a Title to be instructor of the whole world. And so this is a full answer both to those words in Optatus, so oft urged by the Romanists, and to the like of S Austin contr. part. Donati, Numerate Sacerdotes vel ab ipsa Petri sede, & in ordine illo Patrum, quis cui successit videte: Ipsa est Petra, quam non vincunt superbæ inferorum portæ. Number the Priests even from the very See of Peter, and see who succeeded whom, in that order of Fathers, That is the Rock which the proud gates of Hell overcome not. The meaning of which is now clear out of the Authors own words, without any foreign conjectures; For beside what hath been already said, if that were not abundantly sufficient, this further consideration will not fail to supersede all force of this argument from the bare sound of Optatus's words. The See of Rome had from the Apostles to Optatus's days shined in that lustre as to be the most eminent Church of any in the world; and if it had done so still, there might still have been place for Optatus's words, but since since the change hath been so great, that I may well take up Priscus's words in Excerpt. Ἡ πολιτεια Ῥωμαίων ἀγαθὴ· οἱ δὲ ἄρχοντες οὐχ ὁμοια τοῖς πάλαι φρονοῦντες, αὐτὴν διελυμήναντο, The Faith and Government of the Church of Rome was Apostolical and good, but the later Governours being not affected as anciently they were, have sorely wasted it. God give her a return to her primitive zeal and faith.

So that S. W. may now return from whence he came, to the view of my testimony, and free him- 10.
self from the number of those Donatists, which would not allow the Emperor to have any thing to do with the Church: and all that he hath to say to it is, that being the nursing Father of the Church, his power was to be granted sufficiently authoritative to punish and repress the Donatists.] And if the Prince elsewhere may have the like power to repress all those that transcribe the Donatists guilt, or Schism, though they are most unwilling of any to own the name, then truly this is all that I ever designed to conclude from this testimony, and this being in thesi granted me, I have no more to contend for, this being no season to descend to the hypothesis, or application.

What he fastidiously subjoyns to the mentions of the Heathen practices in that Margent, I shall 11.
not attempt to make reply to, having placed no trust in that medium, though it could not, I thought, be amiss to annex the consent betwixt all Professions, of false, as well as true Religions, in this Doctrine. But if his severity be such, that the mentions of Heathens put him into ill humour, he may please, the next time he views that place, to pass more slightly over it, and not think it necessary to refute every casual Marginal note, which might be allowed such an unconsiderable place in a discourse, as this was, without offending any man. In his answer to it, one thing there is which he may please to review and correct at leisure. For though the sacred mysteries and the Churches Government, be incharg'd as he saith, to those persons, whose state of life is purely dependent on God and his service, yet sure there is no shew of consequence in what he adds, as the superstruction on this ὑπόμνον, that this state of life secures them from being cross byass'd by worldly intrests, and secular pretences. I heartily wish this had all truth in it, but shall not need endeavour to disprove it, the lives of some such men speaking louder than any arguments.

SECT. XI.

David's ordering the courses of the Priests. Solomon's Dedication of the Temple. Hezekiah's Ecclesiastical Acts, Josiah's. S. Paul's Appeal from the Jews Sanhedrim to Cæsar, Acts 25. 9, 10. Judged before me, v. 9. Capital Judgment taken from the Jews. Justinian's Ecclesiastical laws in the βασιλικα. S. W. his falsifications and answers. Justinian's charge of Tyranny brought in at a dead lift. Theodosius no Tyrant.

THE instances from the Jewish practice now follow: And to the first, of Davids ordering the 1. courses of the Priests; his answer being the same that had lately been given me by Mr. Cawdry (a person of somewhat different principles,) viz. that David was a Prophet as well as a King, I refer him to my answer * there, that this was no act of Davids prophetick, but meerly of his Kingly office, founded on prudential considerations, and the change of times, God having formerly disposed otherwise of it. But it seems his second thoughts have better advised S. W. in this matter, for upon them he presently, in effect, retracts this answer (only it went against his heart to lose so much precious ink as must have perished by blotting it out again) and resolves there was in this no strain of an higher jurisdiction (by higher I suppose he means higher than is ordinary and regular for Kings, and then sure 'twas done by the King, not the Prophet) and that as his greater zeal might invite him, so his exacter knowledge might make his assistance requisite to order the courses of the Priests.] And then it seems I was in the right, and my instance was pertinent to infer my conclusion, that for matters of outward order in the Church, Princes were very competent, and no doubt were indued with power and authority from God, or else their zeal and knowledge could not have justified the interposing their assistance in them.

* Account of 3. Diatr. ch. 5. Sect. 4. n. 6, 8.

To the 2. of Solomon's consecrating the Temple, he answers, it was performed by offering sacrifice, 2.
which he himself offered not, but the Priests, so as his consecrating it, was nothing else but causing them to consecrate it.]

I reply, that besides the Priests part in this work, the offering of sacrifice (which I never imagined 3. to belong to Solomon, nor from thence pretended it lawful for the Christian King thus to invade the Sacerdotal office, in baptizing, consecrating the Host, or assuming any of the τὰ ἔισω τῆς ἐκκλησίας, that even now Constantine spake of) many other acts there were, conducing to that one main of dedicating, or consecrating the Temple, 1. calling the Assembly, and afterward dissolving it again; 2. disposing and appointing the actions of the Priests; 3. making the oration on that occasion; and lastly, the prayer and the blessing of the congregation of Israel, kneeling on his knees before the Altar, and spreading forth his hands toward Heaven, in the presence of all the congregation; and all these being Ecclesiastical acts, were yet performed by Solomon, 1 Kings 8. and that was all that I designed from that instance, and there neither is, nor can be any question of it.

To the third, of Hezekiah, and Josiah, there was more due than his Sarcasm will any way defray, 4.
(and yet that is all he can afford them) Reforming within his dominions, the affairs of the Church, exercising the ἐπισκοπὴ, or inspection over the Clergie, when they neglect their duty, the highest, as well as the lower sort of them, is the least that can proportionably be inferred from what is there done by the commandment of the King Hezekiah, 2 Kings 1. 18. and 2 Chron. 28. in removing the high places, breaking the brazen Serpent in pieces, and cleansing of the Temple, and restoring the sacrifice and musick of the Temple, and whatsoever was then wanting, or neglected in Gods service, by default of Priests or Levites: And so in like manner, from King Josiah's act in repairing the breaches of Gods house, and destroying Idolatry, and restoring, by Edict, the solemn observation of the Passover --- 2 Kings 22. and 23.

To

To the nothing which he returns to these instances, all that I need say, is, that my conclusion is inferred, and he hath not attempted to invalidate it.

5. The next instance was that of S. Paul, appealing from the judgment of the Chief Priests to the tribunal of Cæsar; which if it had any infirmity in it, were not in reason to be imputed to me, but to him from whom I cited it, Gregor. de Heimburg, a person formerly well reputed of by Pope Pius II. till by defence of the just rights of his Prince, Sigismund Duke of Austria, he fell under his displeasure. But it seems though my citation were never so true, yet his name is not able to secure the Doctor from a most grievous mistake, such an one as hath brought a very ill report upon him for the like in almost every place of Scripture he hath yet produced.

6. What this so unlimited a charge signifies, I thank God I cannot divine, but that S. W. is now a drawing his Chancery-Bill, and thinks it not material, what degree or semblance of truth there is in any thing he casts in. This hath formerly appeared as often as he hath made the like charge, and 'tis not improbable it may yet prove so here also, when we have heard what he hath to object. S. Paul, saith he, appealed not from the tribunal of the Jews, but from the tribunal of Portius Festus, a Roman Governour, unto Cæsar himself; and this he will prove so plainly and convincingly, from Acts 25. 9, 10. that he shall need only to put down the words in our own translation, and so leave the Doctor to be accused either for wilfully abusing, or ignorantly mistaking them. The words he recites, are these, But Festus willing to do the Jews a pleasure, answered Paul, and said, Wilt thou go up to Jerusalem, and there be judged of these things before me? Then said Paul, I stand at Cæsars judgment seat, where I ought to be judged.]

7. These words then are left by their own native force, without any aid from S. W. to infer his conclusion, that Paul appealed not from the tribunal of the Jews, but from the tribunal of Portius Festus to Cæsar himself: Let us see how they will be able to do it: And first, to omit the harder part, the negative, let us examine what they say for the affirmative, that he here appealed from the tribunal of Festus. But for this 'tis most certain, that this text alledged can no way possibly conclude it. It is only an insisting on his right to be judged by Portius Festus, in opposition to going up to Jerusalem. This the very words by him alledged do evidence; Festus then hath him before him at Cæsarea, where he kept the Assizes, v. 6. and he is now sitting on the judgment seat, and it being the Jews request, v. 3. that he might be sent to Jerusalem, Festus to gratifie them, v. 9. proposes the removing him thither, which Paul directly disclaims and refuses, and challenges his right, as a Roman, I stand, saith he, at Cæsar's judgment seat; he means certainly this tribunal of Festus, Cæsar's Procurator, where he stands already, and where, saith he, as a Roman I ought to be judged; he makes no farther appeal as yet in these words from the tribunal, before which he stands, but requires to be judged there. This being cleared, S. W. his affirmative part hath certainly failed him, that of his appealing from Festus's tribunal, in those two verses alledged by him, as the only medium to conclude it. His appeal to Cæsar himself, or to Augustus's hearing, follows in the next words, ver. 11. and that expressly, not from Festus's judging him there at Cæsarea, at the Roman bar, but from his delivering him to the Jews to be judged at Jerusalem, and that I hope is contrary enough to his negative, his not appealing from the tribunal of the Jews.] Nothing can be more manifest, If, saith Paul, I be an offender, or have committed any thing worthy of death, I refuse not to die, (let him be judged there by Festus, and whatsoever the event be, he willingly submits to it, without any appeal from that Judicature of Festus, before which now he stands) but if there be none of these things, whereof these accuse me, no man may deliver me unto them (i. e. to the Jews) I appeal unto Cæsar, So that 'tis not from Portius Festus judging him, that he appeals to Cæsar himself (if Festus would judge him, he would readily submit to it, and requires it as his priviledge to be so judged) but from his delivering him to the Jews to be judged at Jerusalem, i. e. from that tribunal of their Sanhedrim (which represents the Christian Church, and where the High Priest was the principal person, c. 24. 1.) he makes his appeal to the secular Magistrate, the Roman Emperor himself, and hopes for much more justice from him, though an heathen Prince, than he doth from such a tribunal of Ananias and his consistory.

8. If this be not yet plain enough, then 1. remember where 'twas that Paul was arraigned, (before Lysias the Roman Commander sent him to Cæsarea) at the Council or Sanhedrim of the Jews, Acts 23. 1. where the High Priest sat down to judge him after the law of Moses, v. 3. and from among them, i. e. that Council, the soldiers, by the chief Captains command, take him by force, v. 10. thither again they purposed to signifie to the chief Captain, that he should be brought on the morrow, v. 15. but upon discovery of the conspiracy to take away his life by the way, he is sent by safe conduct to Cæsarea, v. 23. Then upon Festus's coming to the Province, the Jews renew their suit ἵνα μεταπέμψηται, that he would send for him to Jerusalem, c. 25. 3. this Festus then denied, v. 4. meaning to judge him by the Imperial law at Cæsarea, the Jews being required to go and prosecute him there, v. 5. When nothing could there be proved against him, v. 7. Festus having so far changed his resolution, to do the Jews a pleasure, proposes his going up to Jerusalem, v. 9. there to be judged before him (what is meant by that phrase, we shall see anon) and this he accounts of, as a delivering to them, and from that it is, that he makes his appeal to Cæsar, and that I suppose to be from the Jews tribunal, and so Festus expresses the meaning of it, v. 20. I asked him (saith he to Agrippa) whether he would go to Jerusalem, and there be judg'd of these matters; upon that occasion again expresly mentioning his appeal to the hearing of Augustus, in opposition to his going up to Jerusalem to be judged.

9. There is but one possible difficulty which appears to remain in this matter, and that is, what is meant by his being judged before me, i. e. before Festus at Jerusalem, c. 25. 9. for that may be thought to infer, that it was Festus's Tribunal, and not the Jews, from which he appealed. To this I answer, that the power of the Jewish Sanhedrim at this time was but a very limited power, they might not put any man to death, John 18. 31. and consequently when any was judged by them, if the offence seemed capital, the Roman Procurator was to be called to assist, and thus to sentence, as in the crucifixion of Christ it was manifest. And this is all the reason of this phrase [before me] because treason against Cæsar, being put in amongst his accusations, the Jews could not judge of such matters, but only take upon them the part of accusers, as we therefore see they do, c. 25. 2. whereas for other other things concerning their own Law, their tribunal was competent to take audience, and give judgment.

And this is the importance of those words of Festus, Acts 25. 20. wherein he gives the reason to Agrippa, why he asked him, whether he would go to Jerusalem, there to be judged of these matters, i. e. of those questions, or accusations, concerning the Jewish superstition, or religion --- because Festus doubted, or was ignorant of them, knew not what judgment to pass in them, and therefore would have had him to Jerusalem, for the Sanhedrim there to take cognizance, and judge of such matters, himself going also, there to sit upon him, in case any capital crime, censurable by the Roman laws, should be proved against him. And from the former of these it is, i. e. the Sanhedrim's judicature, that Paul appeals, as hath hitherto appeared, and only from that, and so not from Festus's Judicature; For that he was already under at Cæsarea (as much as he could be at Jerusalem) and yet appeals not from that, but saith he ought to be judged there, and only averts the going up to Jerusalem. A visible difference there is betwixt his being judged by Festus at Cæsarea, and at Jerusalem before him. In the former he stood only at Cæsar's judgment seat, to be judged by none but his Procurator, according to the Roman law; and if he were found guilty of no capital crime, rebellion, and the like, he was sure to be set free; and this he feared not, whersoever he was judged; but if he went up to Jerusalem to be judged there, then whatsoever his innocence were as to such capital accusations, he might be deemed guilty of some breaches of the Judaical law, and for them be judged to other punishments, such as remained in their power, by the Sanhedrim; and besides, the high Priests, and chief of the Jews, that pressed so earnestly that he might be remanded to Jerusalem, had a treacherous purpose in it, having laid an ambush in the way to kill him, Acts 25. 3. and so Paul had all reason to appeal from this proposal of delivering him to be judged by the Jews, though none to distrust Festus's sentence at Cæsarea: and so still it is most visible, that from this it was, that his appeal was made, and not from Festus's bench at Cæsarea, which was the thing I undertook to conclude from these passages. 10.

Thus have I clearly deduced this whole matter, and evidenced the truth of Gregorius de Heimburg his observation, not that that Emperor was head of the Christian Church, but that S. Paul expected relief from this heathen Emperor against the oppressions of the high Priest, and his Sanhedrim, which is all that from Heimburg was pretended. 11.

And then who will ever take S. W. his word again about a grievous mistake, who yet never had the luck to be himself in the right, when he came in the greatest rage of Discipline to chastise mistakers? 12.

If there be not in all his darts some desperate incurable poyson (by strength of the old Aphorism, Calumniare fortiter, aliquid hærebit) I shall for once adventure to advise S. W. if it be but for his own interests, never to cry [grievous mistakes] again, till he hath gotten some firmer title to infallibility, than yet he hath attain'd to, lest still it be the looking-glass, and not the perspective which helps him to all the mistakes. 13.

In the last place he is come to that meanness of changing my words, that he may get some advantage of carping at them, which otherwise he must miss of. I said that in the βασιλικὰ, the whole third Book is made up of Justinians, that is of the Emperors, constitutions de Episcopis, Clericis, & sacris, concerning Bishops, Clergie-men, and sacred Offices. And he will read this, that Justinians third Book is made of Constitutions de Episcopis, Clericis & Laicis, Bishops, Priests, Lay-men, and then answer, that all the laws found there must not be necessarily Justinians.] What will this dealing advance to, by and by? First, Laicis must be suborned to turn out Sacris, and that we may be sure the Printer had no hand in this, 1. the Englishing it Lay-men, instead of sacred Offices, and 2. the no notice of either of these in the Errata, is full evidence. And then what trust is to be given to such fingers? 2. How came we by the mention of Justinians third Book? Or what third Book doth he mean? I spake of the third Book of the βασιλικὰ, which if he knew any thing in the affairs, or Canons of the Church, is a Synopsis of LX. books universi Juris Romani set out Eighty years since in Greek and Latine with Scholia, by Jo. Leunclavius. And if he knew not what belonged to this, why might he not have softly glided over it, rather than have adventured blindfold, and in the first words changed this into Justinians third book of He knew not what, and then solemnly applied answer to it, which cannot possibly be accommodated to the matter in hand. Keepers, saith he, of laws, use not only to put in their law books those Constitutions themselves made, but also those they are to see observed, among which are the Canons and Laws of the Church made before by Councils and other Ecclesiastical powers.] But this cannot be applied to the present instance. 'Tis certain, Justinian personally made many διατάξεις concerning Ecclesiastical matters, which are now visible in his Novels, each of them cloathed with those particular individuating circumstances of the Authors name, and the persons to whom they were written, which remove all possible doubt in this matter; and the third book of the βασιλικὰ is a collection or breviate of such as these, which are thus at large to be found in his Novels, and there discern'd to be none but his. Such luck hath S. W. constantly, when he combates blindfold. 14.

But he satisfies not himself with this first answer; he hath a second, that Justinian may make Constitutions of his own concerning Bishops and Clergie-men, in what relates to temporal offices, or as they are parts of the civil Common-wealth.] But it is evident, if he will now upon advertisement turn to the Basilica, or to the Novels themselves, that many of them are of matters purely Ecclesiastical; I must not adventure losing my Reader, and my self, in reciting them. 15.

But because this answer was so feeble also, a third is called in, to relieve at a dead lift: If neither of these answers will serve, If he shall be found to have made any laws concerning them, and without the authority of the Church, then, saith he, let the Doctor prove he had power to make such, minding me of the note of Tyranny which is objected against Justinian. But 1. this is strange hewing asunder, instead of untying of knots, and difficulties; If the argument could be answer'd any other way, then Justinian may stand right in the Court; but if S. W. be so driven up to the wall, that he have no way to invent for his escape, then in great sadness Justinian must be content to be a Tyrant, rather 16.

than S. W. be foil'd in this manner. 2. Though Justinian for some other unkindness to the Pope, have been lookt on unkindly by the Romanists, and call'd by some ill names, so long after his death; yet I believe S. W. will not be able to produce any Romanist, which hath affixt this ill character on him upon this single score, which alone I have now insisted on, making of constitutions for the good government of the Church; and then I hope he that hath offended once, is not under a necessity of doing all things amiss; if so, truly S. W. will have a hard time of it, can never redeem, as long as he lives, what he hath offended in this one leaf, if as he judges this Emperor, he shall be judged. But to conclude, 3. my argument vouched the Theodosian Code for decrees in Ecclesiastical affairs, and this reserve, of the Emperors being a Tyrant, is no way appliable to him; and so we have done with his last answer.

17. For the appendage of this argument, and answer concerning the Canons of the Councils receiving their authority and publication from the Emperor, I need not reply, having never pretended, or seemed to pretend what he charges on me, concerning the Emperors Negative voice in the Council; what I pretended, I spake out in plain words, that the Canons have been mostly set out, and received their authority by the Emperors (and this receiving their authority, is I suppose, in order to their powerful reception in their dominions) and this he acknowledges in the fullest latitude, not only mostly, but always; and so we are for once friends, though he knew not of it, and no man knows how little while it will last.. As it is, 'twill be a good season to sit down in peace, at this end of the sixth Section.

SECT. XII.

Answer to his seventh Section. Strictures on the lighter part of it. Ethelberts erecting the Primacy at Canterbury. Removal of Primacies, and Addition of Provinces, to whom justly assignable. Caerusks remove to S. Davids. Valentia and Flavia Cæsarienſis. From York to Canterbury.

1. THE first three pages of his seventh Section have no appearance of weight, or difficulty: to which any more answer is in reason due, than the Section in the Treatise, to which they belong, will readily, if it be consulted, afford any man. But he, 1. finds fault with parentheses, which are a very visible part of the Scripture stile, and so may not reasonably be found fault with in mine; 2. misreports my arguing, which neither denies tradition as he would have it, nor lays any more weight on the negative argument, than evidently belongs to it, and requires not of him, as he suggests, to find the name of Primates or Patriarchs in Scripture, but saith that there is no imaginable obstacle there, against which, though but interpretatively, the Prince can be said to offend, when he shall make such changes; and 3. from faber fabrilia tractet, he concludes it the testimony of common sense, that Kings must not meddle with such matters, as if none could ever judge which were the largest City, and most fitly accomplisht to be a Metropolis, but he who had spent his age in the study of Divinity, which yet no way belongs to it; and 4. he resolves that nothing hath been said either to disprove the Popes Universal Pastorship, or to evidence this right of Kings to remove Patriarchs, to be founded in the Canon of Chalcedon ---- when I have all reason to think, that he hath not said one word in defence of either of these pretensions, which is not now answered, and when without any id est, the seventeenth Canon of Chalcedon is plain, that whensoever any City is erected or restored by the Imperial power, the order of the Ecclesiastical divisions shall follow the Civil forms; Of which, and of the Canon in Trullo, and the acknowledged force thereof to this matter, I have in this Reply inlarged abundantly.

2. But what he next proceeds to, hath transported him into several passions, betwixt which he hath found out another grievous mistake, if it have but the luck to stand good to him; However it makes a dish in the bill of Fare, that allowance of an house to dwell in and meat to eat, is the erection of a Primacy. And was it not truly said of old by the Deipnosophist, that οἱ μαγειροὶ ποιηταὶ, Cooks are Poets, and that a little skill in that Art, is sufficient to convert the Rape root into a delicate fish service, at a time when nature denied, and all the Ocean would not afford the like. Just thus it is here; I said that Canterbury or Dorovernia was the seat of King Ethelberts Kingdom, and proved it by the words of Bede, who calls it * Imperii sui totius Metropolis, and that King at the time of Augustines planting the faith, did erect a Primacy in that City, not bringing any proof of this, but mentioning it as a certain thing, that needed no probation. And he very diligently seeks out the place in Bede, where those words are, Imperii sui Metropolis, and finding there a mention of his giving them a mansion and food, this forsooth must be drest out for my proof of his erecting a Primacy there, and that at a time when Ethelbert, he confesses, was not yet converted, and all this managed with great demureness, as if I had been really guilty of this senselesness. The short is, I did really prove from those words, what I designed from them, that Canterbury was King Ethelberts seat of his Kingdom; but never dreamt of inferring from that place, the erecting of an Ecclesiastical Primacy there. I know that could not be done, till after the Kings conversion, and then it is distinctly mention'd by the same Bede in the * next Chapter, in the title whereof we read, Ut in urbe Regis sedem Episcopatus acceperit, how Augustine received the seat of his Bishoprick in the Kings City: and so in the chapter it self in these words, Nec distulit (Rex) quin --- doctoribus suis locum sedis eorum gradui congruum in Doroverniâ Metropoli suâ donaret, simul & necessarias in diversis speciebus possessiones conferret, The King deferred not to give his Teachers the place of a seat, agreeable to their degree, in Canterbury his Metropolis, and together with it conferred on them necessary possessions in several kinds. And there can be no ground of doubting it. The Pope sent them to preach, * appointed Augustine should be ordained Bishop, if the English should receive them. The || Archbishop of Arles ordained him according to the Popes direction. But where the seat of his Bishoprick should be fastned, it is not imaginable, who should give order for for that, but only King Ethelbert; the Pope could not, who did not certainly foresee his reception; the ordainer the Bishop of Arles had nothing to do with it; nay, this he was first to have as his title, before he could by Canon ordain him; and accordingly so it is in story, that, and the Pall from the Pope, his ordination, and consecration were both consequent to the Kings assigning him the seat, the first in 27. the other in 29. chap. And so much for the childish picce of insincerity, as he calls it: the Reader will now judge, on which side it lies.

Next follows the arraignment of my words about the Removal of the Primacies in England, and addition of Provinces, which I conceived assignable, i. e. justly, or so as might agree with the truth of History, assignable to nothing but the acts of Princes in removing, and erecting Metropoles; but he affirms these to be assignable, 1. to the Popes power, 2. to the consent of Bishops.] Here if by the consent of Bishops he mean the concurrence of their consent to the Kings act, I shall make no question of that; this differs from an authoritative consent, and so still the King might do it, though the Bishops concurred and consented to it: his doing it, was never by me intimated to be his doing it against their will, but his doing it regularly and advisedly, as in reason, and for the good of the Church he ought to do it. The former then is the only matter of question, whether it were the Popes or the Kings act; and as yet there being nothing produced on S. W. his side, but the bare mention of the possibility that the Pope should do it, without all tender of proof, that he did, there is nothing to be answered, or replied by me; yet I shall by one instance (which will suffice in this matter) evidently prove that in that at least, he neither did, nor could do it. The Archbishoprick of Caerusk in Monmouthshire was removed to S. Davids in the reign of King Arthur, and that as hath been shewed, as before Augustines coming into England, so before the Pope had any hold here, and whilst Caerusk was not subject to any other Bishop whatsoever, as hath formerly been proved and vindicated; and therefore I conclude, this is no way assignable to the Pope, without confounding, and denying all that our Histories tell us in this matter. As for the addition of Valentia and Flavia Cæsariensis, it was certainly done by the Roman Emperors, and those are not the Pope And the choice of Canterbury for the Metropolis having even now been cleared to be the act of Ethelbert (though Augustine the Bishop there was sent from Rome, and ordained by the Bishop of Arles, and after had a Pall from Rome) the removal of it from London (where it was formerly, even at the time of the Nicene Council) must be assigned to that original; and the rather, because that which the Pope in his Letter to Augustine, saith of London, that the Bishop thereof should semper in posterum à synodo propriâ consecrari, be for ever afterward consecrated by his own Synod, i. e. be an Archbishop, never came to any effect, the Archbishoprick continuing to be established at Canterbury, and no remembrance remaining to us, of Londons being an Ecclesiastical Metropolis after this: So that Neubrigensis resolves, it must be understood of Canterbury, what Greg. Ep. saith of London; discerning it seems, that as to London it found no accomplishment. Lastly, for York, the principal Colony of the Romans in Britain, and the seat of the Emperors Palace, and the place of the Lieutenants residence, and adorned with other dignities, mentioned in Tract of Schism; 'tis certain the Primacy continued there, while the Romans held the Government, and after that, while the Britains held England, and in memory thereof Gregories appointment to Augustine after his coming was, that * if that City received the Faith, it should so far enjoy the former priviledge, as to be the seat of a Metropolitan, with twelve Bishops under him, and without any subjection Londinensis Episcopi ditioni, to the power of the Bishop of London, or (as Neubrigensis with all reason saith it must be understood) of the Bishop of Canterbury, and ‖ for the future after Augustines death, he to be the first of those two Archbishops, which from time to time was first ordained, which again being not agreeable to Canterburies having the Primacy, (for that differs from all such equality) 'tis evident that that Pope did not remove the Primacy from York to Canterbury; and that any successor of his did, I know not that it is pretended. And thus he sees the grounds of the Doctors reasoning not so irrational, in respect of the process, or unconcluding in respect of the Medium, as he would have perswaded by his Sarcasms (not his Reasons) which make up the far greatest part of his confutations.

SECT. XIII.

The African Canon contrary to the Roman. Lenity to the Donatists. The History of the Canon. S. W. his Exceptions answered. The feigned Revocation, and Request. Romes Umpirage between Cæcilianus and Donatus, no act of Jurisdiction.

THat the power which is duly vested in Kings, in case it be taken away by foreign, i. e. by the Popes Laws, is perfectly lawful to be resumed by the Original possessors, i. e. by our Kings of England, I endeavoured to shew à pari, by the practice of the African Church, set down in the Council of Carthage, Can. 71. Where when the Pope had determined one thing about the non-reception of the Donatists, and by letter signified that to the Council of Carthage, they prudently and deliberately decree another, and incur no danger of Schism, by this means. This in the Treatise of Schism, p. 128. I shortly toucht, but now upon this occasion must more largely deduce, to vindicate the truth, and force of that testimony for the inferring of my conclusion. 1.

When that great dissention fell out in Africk, between Cæcilianus Archbishop of Carthage, and Donatus à casis nigris, and S. Augustine tells us, that though Pope * Melchiades, by the judgment of his Collegues, or Bishops in Council assembled with him, condemned Donatus, yet they so spared the Donatists, as many as should repent, that they were ready to give them free choice to regain the peace of the Church; and even for those that had been ordained Bishops by Majorinus, so that they were two Bishops in one See, they thus compounded it, that he that was first ordained in each See, should be confirmed, and some other Church and flock be provided for the other. And the same he affirms again 2.

Ep. 162.

again in his 50. Ep. The Bishops, saith he, in the Church of Rome, thus judged in the difference betwixt Cæcilianus and the Donatists, that all, beside Donatus, the author of the Schism, should upon reformation be received unto their honours, though they had been ordained out of the Church; not that they might have the holy Spirit out of the unity of the body of Christ, but that they might not, by continuing out of the Church, deceive others, and that being thus mildly handled, they might more probably be cured. This was thus resolved in Constantine's time, about the year 300. But 100 years after, Pope Anastasius in a Synod at Rome determines a greater severity necessary toward the Donatists, and sends an Epistle to the Council of Carthage to signifie this their judgment. The Epistle of Anastasius, I suppose, is * not extant, but the || Acts of the Council of Carthage assure us thereof, and set down the summ of it to be an advice to the Africans, that they should not by any means παραπροσποιεῖσθαι περὶ τὸ τῆ --- Δανατισᾶν ἐπιβουλῆς καὶ ἀναισχυντίας τὸ τε κατὰ πᾶσαν τὴν Ἀφρων χώραν Καθολικὴν ἐκκλησίαν βαρέως πορθέσης, dissemble, or proceed with that lenity, toward the treachery and impudence of the heretical and Schismatical Donatists, which did grievously waste the Catholick Church through all the African region. On receipt of this letter, the African Fathers in Council give humble thanks to God for his mercy, and to Anastasius and his Council, for their pious care for them, as for fellow-members of Christ, τοῖς κἂν ἐν διαφόροις τῆ ᾗς μέρεσιν, ἀλλ' ἐν μιᾷ σώματος καὶ ἁρμονίᾳ καθισαμένοις, who though they be situate in several parts of the earth, yet consist in one harmony and concord of a body. But that being done, they proceed conciliarly to handle, and consider that matter, and all things that seemed to tend to the profit of the Church; and finally they resolve ἡπίως καὶ εἰρηνικῶς διαπράξασθαι, to continue to deal mildly and pacifickly with them, deeming that the likeliest means to convince gainsayers, and to reduce them to the knowledge of the truth; and accordingly several things they * decree, particularly to write an Epistle to their other brethren and fellow-Bishops, especially to the Apostolical See of Rome, where Anastasius presided, to signifie to them μεγάλην ἀνάγκην, the great necessity, lying on them in order to the peace and utility of the Church, to receive the Donatists to their dignities, as many as should return to the unity of the Church, proposing to all other Bishops to do the like after their example, who were first infested with them, and with a non obstante, notwithstanding what had been decreed at Rome, Μὴ ἐμποδίσῃ τούτοις τὸ ὁρισθὲν κατὰ τῶν τιμῶν αὐτῶν ἐν τῇ περαμαρικῇ συνόδῳ, that which is determined against their honours in the beyond-sea Synod (ἤγουν τῇ ἐν Ἰταλίᾳ, viz. that in Italy, saith the Scholiast) shall not, say they, hinder or prejudice this decree; and again, οἱ χειροτονηθέντες ---- they that have been ordained on the part of the Donatists, if they shall reform and return to the Catholick faith, shall not be proceeded with according to the transmarine Synod (which had determined that they should not be received to their own dignities) but shall the rather be received as those that take care for Catholick unity.

3. Here thus anciently, i. e. in the year 401. 'tis clear, that the decree at Rome was not thought fit to prejudice or hinder the African Synod, to adhere to their former resolution, and so, to laws contrary to the Roman See; and that was all that I undertook to infer from it.

4. Now to this what hath S. W. to say? Why, confessing the former part of the story, about Melchiades, first, he resolves that the Donatists obstinacy permitted not his decree to be executed, and therefore it was recalled; then that under Pope Anastasius, the African Council commanded a request to be made to the Bishops of Italy by whose predecessors the Revocation was made, that the Donatist Bishops might retain their places, adding that the cunning Balsamon puts the provision it self for a Canon of this Council, and the Doctor takes no notice of the request, though he must needs have read it in Baronius whom he there cites.] And out of these premises his conclusion is, that as far as can be drawn out of the fact and Council, it argues the direct contrary to what the Doctor concludes, viz. that it was not lawful for their national Council to infringe what was done at Rome.]

5. What truth there is in these premises, but especially how his contrary conclusion is inferred from them, he hath not used any medium to shew us. And therefore 'tis all as easily denied, as suggested. But I shall farther desire it may be observed, that he doth not so much as pretend, that what the African Council here did in this, was Schismatical; and then without more ado, it follows, that a national Council may without incurring of Schism, make contrary laws to what is decreed at Rome, for this it is evident the Africans did in that Synod, 401. and he no way denies their having done it, and yet neither doth he accuse them, for what they did. This being thus yielded, there is no more that I desire to gain from this testimony. And therefore, 1. I need not be solicitous whether Melchiades decree were revoked. There was indeed no need of revoking, for if the Donatists would not take the benefit of it, but as Optatus farther tells us, appeal'd from it (Donatus appellandum esse ab Episcopis credidit, l. 1. p. 29.) it voided it self, and became of no force of its own accord: 2. I demand, when, or by whom it was revoked; not before Anastasius, for then sure that Council under him, that sent to Africk to press that severity, would have pressed that Revocation; and it is sufficient to say, no such precedent Revocation appearing in any Popes, or Councils time betwixt Melchiades and Anastasius, there is no ground to affirm that before Anastasius it was revoked; and yet that 'twas not Anastasius that revoked it, is confest by S. W. when he saith the revocation was made by the predecessors of those Bishops of Italy that were under Anastasius.

6. But then 2. for his suggestion, that under Anastasius the African Council ordained a request to be made to the Bishops of Italy, that the Donatists Bishops might retain their places, there is not the least proof offered, save only from Baronius, who is far from being a competent witness in this matter. And on the other side, we have these strong prejudices against it; First, that the Decree from Rome, read at the opening of the Council of Africk, having been directly contrary to all mercy, or mildness to the Donatists, it no way appears by any subsequent decree, that they after softened it; and for that decree it self, being so contrary to the Donatists retaining their places, it could be no answer of favour to the Africans request, that they might retain them; 2. Of any such request we have not the least footstep in that Council, and 3. that * Canon from whence || Binius's note deduces it, belongs not to any such request, but is clearly the setting down what the Africans had * already decreed in this matter, contrary to Anastasius's conciliary determination, brought to them, and read at the opening of the Council, and is that very Canon, from which I fetch the evidence of their making a decree contrary to what had been determined at Rome, with the μὴ ἐμποδίσῃ, or non obstante of Romes contrary determination.

This

This being briefly thus cleared, I may add thirdly, that if the African Fathers did so request, and thereupon the Council at Rome made any decree to revoke their revocation, and consequently to agree with the Africans in the milder way, yet this could not have been to the prejudice of the Africans, for still this was to comply with, not to over-rule the Africans; and we know that even in Melchiades's time, when it is granted that the Council of Italy did judge betwixt Cæcilianus and Donatus, the Catholicks and Heretical Schismaticks in Africk, this came not before them by way of ordinary appeal, as to legal judges or superiors, but of extraordinary complaint, because the Bishops of Africk being divided one from the other in a horrible Schism, and Cæcilianus the Bishop of Carthage and Primate of Africk, being a party in the controversie, it could not possibly be determined at home, and so was most properly, and necessarily to be done by foreigners, and accordingly not by the Pope alone, but by a Council of Bishops; and Augustine saith, Ep. 162. that there were thousands of those Collegues, where the differences might have been determined, meaning a fraternal determination, (by allowing the one, and granting communion with him, and expressing disallowance of the other) and not an authoritative act of Jurisdiction, a neighbourly interposition, such as the present case, and necessity of the Church of Africk required, but not any injunction or command as to legal subjects. And indeed this sufficiently appears by the Africans behaviour here, upon that decree of Anastasius and the Council, which was certainly sent from them, and read at the opening of that African Council, and yet deemed no way constringent to them, but a decree presently made by the Africans quite contrary to that from Rome. How little that of subjection was owing or acknowledged from Africk to Rome, I shall now add no more, having formerly made it clear, when I spake of the exemption of Carthage. 7.

4. When he attributes it to the cunning of Balsamon, that he puts the provision it self for a Canon of this Council, I know not well what to answer; for I am not sure, I judge right (and I believe the Reader will be as little able to resolve as I am) what he means by the provision it self; Only I am sure Balsamon doth no otherwise set down those Canons, than now I see Binius himself doth, out of the Codex Can. Eccl. Afr. (save only that the numbers of the Canons are varied) as may appear to any by comparing Balsamon p. 692, &c. with Binius's Councils, Tom. 1. p. 942, &c. and so sure the cunning was not on Balsamons, but on S. W. his side, who having nothing to say, was to divert by finding fault, and accusing some body. 8.

5. That the Doctor took no notice of the request, he now hath given a sufficient account, because though Baronius mentioned it, he had many weighty prejudices against it, and no motive to believe Baronius. 9.

And then lastly for the conclusion, it follows most evidently, as I inferred it, that the African Council decreed the very contrary to what Rome had determined at this time, and that when they had taken so solemn a cognizance of her determination, and yet were under no mark of Schism for so doing. 10.

SECT. XIV.

Laws against the Civil right repealable. S. Peter's priviledges interfere not with Regal power. Sayr's resolution. My using it, no begging the question.

WHat was added by me §. 22. that a Law though made by a General Council, and with the consent of all Christian Princes, yet if it have respect to a civil right, may in this or that nation be repealed] was directed by me to infer this, formerly set down, conclusion, that the power of Kings to remove Primacies, if taken away by foreign Laws, viz. those of the Court of Rome, is resumable; This I suppose was proper to induce that, because the Law of a General Council, with the consent of all Christian Princes, was so much above Phocas's donation to Boniface, or a Pontifical decree, that my conclusion would follow à majori, and with advantage. Now to this saith S. W. that ere it will do me any good, I must first suppose the title of Head of the Church to be a thing belonging to a Civil right. 2. that that title is denied our Kings upon pretence of a Canon of a Council, and not on Christs donation of it to S. Peter. 1. p. 128.

To these I answer, 1. that the power of removing Primates Sees, being the thing I spake of, and not the title of Head of the Church, all that I am to suppose in the first place, in order to my conclusion, is, that this is legally annext to the Regal, or Imperial power, and that I suppose I have formerly proved, and so do not rely on an unproved supposition. 2. That all that I need add to that, is, that Christ never took away from Kings any thing, that was vested in them, to bestow it upon S. Peter, and consequently that whatsoever Christs donations to S. Peter were, this priviledge of erecting Metropoles may, and doth still remain to Kings, and the decrees of the Councils, that the Ecclesiastical forms shall follow the Civil, will farther secure it to them, without recurring again to the question long since debated, concerning S. Peter's priviledges. 2.

That of §. 23. from Balsamon, as saith he it hath by S. W. been already answered, so hath it also been vindicated in this Reply, and shall not be here repeated. 3.

To the last §. where from the resolution of Sayr, their own Casuist, I inferred the no force of prescription to alienate any such right of Kings, he offers two prejudices, 1. that Sayr was a Monk, his book written at Rome, and so not likely to speak much on the Doctors behalf. 2. that in case he say any thing against them, he is but a private Casuist, and so his opinion with the same facility rejected as alledged.] But to this I reply, 1. that to matters of this nature, none being so fit to judge, as Casuists, no Casuist could by me be produced with more advantage against the Romanist, than honest Sayr, as he calls him, who if he were honest, did not prevaricate; if he were a late Monk, wrote not in favour of us; if he wrote at Rome, had his Book examined and licensed, every period in it, by the Inquisitors there; 4.

there; and if after all that, he do really ſay any thing, on which my concluſion is regularly founded (as his words ſet down in the Tract of Schiſm, p. 130. do teſtifie, that he doth) it matters not, how unlikely it is, that he ſhould ſay it; ſuch arguments of improbability againſt a matter of fact, are of all others the moſt improbable arguments.

5. But theſe were but the procinctus to his anſwer, and that comes more ſolemnly after them, yet ſuch as you might know it at firſt ſight, it is ſo like, what ſuch harbingers promiſed, viz. that by uſing this teſtimony, I ſuppoſe, two things which muſt not be granted me gratis, 1. that the Pope preſcribed againſt the Kings of England in their pretended right in Eccleſiaſtical matters, 2. that this preſcription of the Pope hath not its force from any thing but a Canon or Civil Law,] and great ovation there is in obſerving this infirmity in my diſcourſe.

6. But I deſire to be adviſed, and directed by Artiſts from their ſevereſt laws of νομίμων ἀθλησις, whether a treatiſe be obliged to be made up of no more than one propoſition, or when a foundation is laid, and competently eſtabliſht, it be unlawful ever to proceed farther, either by way of inlarging the foundation, or ſuperſtructing any fabrick upon it. I had in the former chapters indeavoured to ſhew, that neither from Chriſt to S. Peter, nor from S. Peter to the Pope, nor from the planting the faith among us in this Iſland, nor from any preſumed right in ancient times, any ſupreme authority or Univerſal Paſtorſhip divolved or deſcended on the Biſhops of Rome, and having propoſed that, which I thought ſufficient to the deducing of theſe, I was willing to foreſee and examine all their other pretences, and among them, not to omit their long poſſeſſion of this power, (which both the Catholick Gent. and S. W. have ſince pleaded, Sch. Diſar. pag. 24. [on the one ſide, ſay they, is the authority of Antiquity and poſſeſſion] and which I cannot but acknowledge as reaſonable a plea, as that, which alſo they both have made uſe of, taken from the poſſeſſion of the belief of that and their other doctrines) and in order to the refuting of that, I could not, I hope, be obliged to eſtabliſh afreſh, that which had been formerly confirmed (and was ready to be viewed by him that queſtioned it) any more than the Geometer is to demonſtrate anew every foregoing Propoſition, whenſoever he adds a ſubſequent. For the Popes Univerſal Paſtorſhip being not by the Romaniſt deduced either from the Law of Nature, or Nations, and their pleas from the Divine Law or donation of Chriſt being examined, and, as I had reaſon to think, found invalid, it was no begging the queſtion ſure, to ſuppoſe it held either by preſcription, and that at the moſt from force of Canon or Civil Law, or elſe by ſome leſs valid or no title.

7. This renders the account manifeſt, why I inlarged no farther to the applying this reſolution of the Caſuiſt to the precedent diſcourſe, and it now appears, that if I had done it, I had prevailed nothing with my Diſarmer, unleſs I had reverted again to prove the Univerſal Paſtorſhip, and yet ſo ill provided is his table, that even this muſt be put into the bill of fare, as a ſpecial piece of wit to add to the entertainment; And I cannot but have ſome guſt of it, becauſe it is a concluſion of his declamation againſt my 6th. Chapter.

CHAP. VI.

A Defence of the ſeventh Chapter of the Tract of Schiſm.

SECT. I.

Henry the Eighth's Vices not Schiſm. The cauſe of Biſhop Fiſher's death, from his Chaplains hiſtory. The fear of the præmunire cauſed their ſerious conſideration. The recantation in Queen Mary's days. Charge of Schiſm on the Romaniſt.

1. HIS 8th. Sect. of this ſecond part, beginning his Reply to my 7th. Chap is ſpent on the view of Henry VIII. his fact in caſting off the obedience to Rome; And his firſt and principal task, aſſumed on himſelf ſpontaneouſly, being to declaim againſt the luſt and other vices of that Prince, who, ſaith he, had a little before ſet out very excellent doctrine againſt Luther, I have no obligation to make any return to it, having ſaid already upon the Cath. Gent. his importunity, as much as our preſent queſtion requires of me; and the vices of this Prince being no more chargeable to the prejudice of our Reformation, if it be otherwiſe regular, than the as many, and as eminent vices of ſome Biſhops of Rome, who have advanced the Papal greatneſs to that height, wherein it now ſtands (particularly thoſe of Pope Hildebrand) can prejudice the legality of their preſent pretenſions, in caſe there were nothing elſe againſt them.

Repl. ch. 7. ſect. 1.

2. We know that S. W. hath great fluency in the declamatory ſtyle, and that Henry VIII. was no Saint; yet it might have been remembred what Cardinal Perron (Opuſc. p. 440.) ſaith of him, that he was un de plus celebres & virtueux Princes de ſon ſiecle, one of the moſt virtuous and famous Princes of his age; and again, what many of the eminenteſt Univerſities and learned Men in Chriſtendom thought of his divorce from Queen Catherine, judging his act more Chriſtian than the Popes. However, when all is done, 'tis ſtill manifeſt, that neither his luſt, nor his ſacriledge was ſchiſm (any more than his burning of Proteſtants, or his writing againſt Luther) much leſs is my confeſſing him guilty of theſe, my excuſing, as S. W. ſaith, the imputation of them. In brief, the ſins which I acknowledge him guilty of, I mean not to defend, and the ſchiſm, which I deny to be cauſed by him, cannot, 1. be ſuppoſed to be chargeable on him, and then the original of it be examined, without begging the queſtion of the whole Book, which is too unreaſonably large to be put into one requeſt; and and yet the undertaking to diſcover the grounds of this ſchiſm, and to devoid it of all excuſe (which is the deſign of the greateſt part of this ſection) is viſibly that, and therefore this is all I have to ſay to his firſt propoſition. For as to thoſe grounds of mine, which he ſaith, abſolved the Rebel, Outlaw, and Anabaptiſt, and might abſolve King Henry too, by ſaying it was his preſent perſwaſion, I have long ſince diſcovered what a calumny that was, when 'twas firſt ſuggeſted againſt me, and it hath not yet provided it ſelf with any more artificial viſard, to perſwade or deceive any man.

His ſecond conſideration, beginning with the mention of King Henry's force to make the Eccleſiaſtical ſtate ſubſcribe, to the ejecting of the Papacy, and the examples of Biſhop Fiſher, and Sir Thomas More] will loſe its weight, by remembring what King James affirms knowingly of the cauſe of the death of Biſhop Fiſher, which was the only Eccleſiaſtical perſon, that is pretended to have ſuffered on that ſcore. Is nec ſolùm nec præcipuè carceri mandatus eſt propter cauſam Primatus, the ſupremacy was not the only or principal cauſe of his impriſonment. And this is more fully expreſt in that Biſhops life, written ſoon after his death by his Chaplain, in theſe words: After the Biſhops had been with him, his own man blames him for not aſſenting, and tells him, he may think as he liſt. To whom Biſhop Fiſher replied, Thou art a fool, thou knoweſt little what this matter means, thou mayſt know more hereafter; but I ſhall tell thee, 'tis not for the Supremacy only that I am thus toſſed and troubled, but alſo for another thing, (meaning the Oath of the King's ſucceſſion) which if I would have ſworn, I doubt whether I ſhould ever have been queſtioned for the Supremacy or no: God being my good Lord, I will never agree to any of them both. And this thou mayſt ſay another day, thou heardſt me ſpeak, when I am dead and gone. Thus far the words of that Hiſtory. 3. In Apol. pro Juram. Fidel.

What he adds from my words, of their fear of the præmunire, which he will reſolve to have been of force to make the Clergie ſubſcribe againſt conſcience, and to conclude my charity to them uncharitable, a cenſure of their obduration, inſtead of weakneſs] is wholly deſtitute of all grounds to infer it; For as it is obvious to believe, that their fear put them upon deliberation of all lawful means to avert their danger, and ſo upon the ſtudy of the queſtion of the Pope's ſupremacy, from the very bottom, and root of it; ſo 'tis no leſs than duty of charity in us, who ſee by the Books, then ſet out by them, the ſolidity of the grounds, whereon they founded their reſolution, to believe, that their conſciences being duly ſatisfied, their ſubſcriptions were after that, cordial and unfeigned. 4.

As for his only συνέκλικον ὑποθέσεως, which can pretend to ſalve his phænomena, and make his way of arguing conſiſtent to it ſelf, the Recantation of all the Biſhops in Queen Mary's days, 1. it is far from all appearance of truth; we know that many of the Biſhops in Queen Mary's days remained conſtant to death, and ſo ſealed the contradictory to what he ſuggeſts of them; and 2. for thoſe that did recant, 'tis as viſible, what their motive might be, the bloody examples before their eyes, now, as it can be imagined, that the præmunire over their heads before, could perſwade their ſubſcriptions. In Biſhop Fiſhers ſtory 'tis plain the Biſhops perſwaded him to aſſent and ſubſcribe; and if ſome that ſo perſwaded him, recanted afterwards, their fears being granted to have force on them on both ſides, is ſure as argumentative to infer mine, as his concluſion, and the advantage on my ſide, becauſe the fagot was more formidable than the præmunire. But why ſtrength, and force of conſcience ſhould make them recant againſt the reaſon of their ſubſcription, rather than to ſubſcribe what they afterward recanted, without anſwering thoſe former grounds, or offering more powerful reaſons to the contrary, there is no other account to be expected from S. W. but that the one was agreeable, the other contrary to his eſpouſed intereſt. 5.

His third thing falls into the Cath. Gent. his way of proving us guilty of ſchiſm, from the poſſeſſion of their claim to the authority of the Roman See. And that hath been largely conſidered, and refuted in the Reply, Chap. 7. ſect. 1. from n. 10. to the end of that Chapter; And that will ſecure us from the force of his ſyllogiſm, and all the auxiliaries called in to ſupport it, it being no undertaking of ours to confeſs firſt, and then excuſe our ſchiſm, or avert the criminalneſs of it, but denying our ſelves to have ſeparated from any our lawful ſuperiours, whilſt we renounced the Papal ſupremacy, or from the body of the Catholick Church, to which both by faith and charity we are ſtill cloſe knit, in the unity of that ſacred body, to lay all the charge of the ſeparation and ſchiſm on them, which will not admit us to their communion. 6.

SECT. II.

S. W. his diſcourſe of the nature of Schiſm. The continual begging the queſtion in it. Poſſeſſion of obedience, Romes only claim, invalid. S. W. his wonderful arts. The Kings power of removing Patriarchs, a prejudice to the Papal power. The neglect of the uſe of Communicatory Letters. The uſe of them to Catholick Unity.

IN his ninth and tenth Sections he hath forſaken the propoſed method of anſwering my arguments, and now he is become the aſſailant; And it will not be a work of any great length to ſhew him how little he hath gained by this variety, the whole weight of his diſcourſes being laid on ſuch ſlender Elenchs, as is the begging the queſtion almoſt in every period, which is a very ineffectual expedient to infer his deſigned concluſion with that evidence, to which he hath oft pretended. 1.

I ſhall ſhew this as briefly as I may. And firſt, when he undertakes to open, and deſcribe the nature of Schiſm more clearly and exactly, and in order to that, to conſider, 1. the formal unity it ſelf, and 2. the reaſon of that unity; the unity it ſelf, in ſubmitting to one common head, and acknowledging the ſame Articles of faith with other Churches, &c. and this not only negatively, a not diſacknowledging, but poſitively, when there is an obligation, to do both theſe; and the reaſon of that unity inſtantly reſolved to be the infallibility of the Church.] What is this but to lay for the ground-work of all this new Treatiſe of Schiſm, the obligation to acknowledge 1. the Monarchick (as that is oppoſed to Ariſtocratick) 2.

govern-

government of the Church, and that explain'd to import the chief Pastorship of the Bishop of Rome, which 'tis strange he should affirm acknowledged by us (whether that be by us now, or those which then cast it out) to be universally extended over all Patriarchs, and the whole Church, when he cannot but know, that neither we now, nor they then de facto, or de jure, did, or do think it is, or ever was so extended; and 2. the Infallibility of the same Church; the denying of which, he saith, is not only the reason of all schism and heresie, but the very heresie of heresies it self. Thus the two things that are most denied by us (and must be evidently proved by him, before ever any charge of schism can be found against us) are S. W. his postulata, his undeniable first principles, which for this only reason, that I guess at, must not be questioned, because they cannot be proved; And to this issue is his whole argument suddenly brought, by attending him, while he lays the foundation of it.

3. And yet when this is done, there being yet another pair of difficulties still behind; In case the Government of the Church were Monarchick, to assure us that Rome is that Monarch; and in case the Church were thus infallible, to prove the Church of Rome to be this only infallible Church; these two are by turns either to be believed, as principles again, or to induce and prove one the other; One while each of them is to be believed, as a principle; the later, when it is silently assumed, and yet the denying thereof affirmed to be the heresie of heresies; for certainly it is the Infallibility of the Church under the obedience of the Pope, i.e. of the Western and the Roman Church, which he then speaks of, as soon after he makes no scruple to express, p. 197. The former, when he resolves that the unity it self consists in the obligation of submitting to this, without rendring any other reason either for that obligation of submitting, or for Unitie's consisting in it, but only his affirmation, that it doth so, and his mention of an undoubted possession, which ought to be founded in, and not it self to be the ground of the obligation. By the way, What now is become of the title from S. Peter, and Christs donation to him? which formerly was, and §. 11. is again voucht, as their only tenure, and yet here is no one mention of it in this whole discourse, or intimation of any such thing, nor indeed of any other, but that which may equally be had, without any original right, an establishment (as, it seems, first principles may be confirmed à posteriori) in an undoubted possession: And yet this again cannot possibly hold, as to the Universal Church (whatsoever it is feigned to do, in respect of this Church of ours, at the time of the Reformation) for Rome cannot pretend to have had the possession of the supremacy over the Greek Church, when they acknowledge them Schismaticks; nor over the Abassines, when they acknowledge them aliens; nor of any other, but of those, which for the time, upon what motives soever, acknowledged obedience to them: which bare acknowledgment, if it were of force, without farther right, the disacknowledgment upon due proofs of liberty, will be of greater force against it, whensoever 'tis pleaded, as by us it hath been, ever since we renounced it.

4. And yet another while (in the laying these very grounds) each of these is mutually brought to induce the other. For 1. the subjection to the one head (which sure must suppose the head to be one, and to the Romanist, that the Pope is that head) is * brought as the medium to prove that they are a Church, which till they are proved to be, they cannot be supposed to be, though it were granted that the Church is infallible. And 2. the infallibility of the Church being ‖ made the only tye to communicate (among other things, particularly) in Government, that is again (by way of retribution) become the medium to induce the subjection to the one head. And indeed when at the same time that he concludes the necessity of the subjection, he contents not himself with the negative subjection (or indifferent acknowledgment, having no tye) but exacts the expres positive obligation to obey this head, without which, saith he, it may be a multitude, but not a Church; as he will never be able to produce any such expres positive obligation to all Christians, to obey the Bishop of Rome, save what is founded in the dictate of his infallible Church, so it is most evident, that this his Infallibility must be the principle of this subjection to this head of the Church, as before, this subjection was the principle of the very being, and so of the Infallibility of his Church. And he that can do such miracles as these, take two the most movable stones, and with no more than blowing on them, fix them like two immovable rocks (and yet St Peter himself not so much as mentioned to be one of these) and whilst each of these stands thus firm upon its own basis, without any help of the other, or indeed of any third foundation (a rock firm in the midst of the Air or Sea, without any thing to support it) can, in the very twinckling of an eye, so conveigh one of these to bear and support the other, as that the other shall at the same time, bear the whole weight of that, which supports it, is, I confess, too great a Master at his Weapon, too profoundly skilled in the Magick, rather than Mathematicks of Arms, for me to fence with him at his own foils. So again, that he may with ease conclude us unexcusably guilty of formal sin (which I profess to grant) in case we were proved guilty of dividing, and so of the material schism, he will needs assume this as granted, and confest by us, which sure I expresly deny.

* A positive obligation to acknowledge that Head is that which only can make a Church. Sch. Dis. p. 194.

5. Having said this, I shall now therefore leave him to skirmish with the Air, or his own shadow, for those two Sections, which, by thinking it high time to return to over-look the work, he acknowledgeth (and I have many more reasons to grant) to be long digressions, and presently fall in with him at his return, in the beginning of his eleventh Section.

6. Only before I leave it, I shall first mind him of one fallacy, (oft before discernible) in accusing the frivolousness of my digression, to prove that Kings may remove Patriarchs, when, saith he, the Papal is greater than Patriarchal power.] For 1. this is but the begging the whole question again, viz. Whether there be any greater power in the Church, than that of Primates or Patriarchs? And 2. that question is decided in the Negative, by this one, which he calls frivolous digression: For sure if there be any such power of removing Patriarchs, vested in any other but the Pope, (as there must be, if Kings can remove Patriarchs) then the Pope is not the supreme Governor, or Pastor of the whole Church, over all the World, and consequently can be no more than the first Patriarch.

7. 2*dly*, I shall ask his advice in two things, on occasion of * his mention of the ancient use of communicatory letters, which, saith he, was afterwards, by reason of the perfect colligation of the several members with their head, neglected, as unnecessary.] 1. How then it can with justice be pretended, that the Popes Universal Pastorship or headship was anciently and universally acknowledged; for then

ſure the colligation being ſo early ſo perfect, the Communicatory Letters would, as anciently, have been unneceſſary, as ſince that perfect colligation they are by S. W. acknowledged to be: And 2. what hinders but that Unity over the whole Chriſtian world might ſtill thus be maintain'd between all National Churches, each under their own Primate, by the help of theſe Communicatory Letters, without need of one viſible head, in ſubjection to whom all unity is by S. W. ſaid to conſiſt.

When theſe two queſtions, together with the exceptions here premiſed to the ground-work of his 8. Argument, are ſatisfactorily anſwered, I ſhall have incouragement farther to inlarge on the view of the remainder of his 9*th. Sect.* and to make anſwers for my ſelf inſtead of thoſe, which in the 10*th.* he hath put into my mouth (and may without much difficulty anſwer the queſtions, which himſelf hath propoſed, and that on a ſubject, which before he begins, he acknowledges to be confeſt by me, viz. that there can be no juſt cauſe given of ſchiſm.) In the mean, being confident I have here, and in the foregoing parts of this Reply laid ſufficient, and evident grounds to ſatisfie all the objections, which here are made to us, I ſhall reſiſt the temptations, which are before me, to purſue this new path any farther, and indulge no longer to ſuch Divertiſements.

SECT. III.

Conceſſion of Kings renounced by S. W. Strictures on his 11*th. Sect. The King cannot alienate his regality. Some gifts revocable. The Suns light ſuch. So God's graces. The Pope's Territory. The admiſſion of Legates an acknowledgment of power.* S. W. his calumnies. The Oath of Supremacy to ſecure Allegiance.

IN the 11*th. Sect.* I am rebuked for mentioning the voluntary conceſſion of Kings (as formerly the 1. title of Converſion) for any part of the ground of the Popes pretenſions to ſupreme authority in this Nation, which, ſaith he, they found only on the ſucceſſion to S. Peter.] If this will indeed be ſtood to by all, I am again diſcharged of an unneceſſary fear, and by analogie with, and conſequence from this, of all need of conſidering the title of poſſeſſion, which ſurely hath ſometime been mentioned by ſome body, whilſt the very name of S. Peter, or ſucceſſion by him, was quite left out in the whole ſcheme, as was ſhewed in the laſt ſection; And then the whole matter is once more reduced to that one head of S. Peter's right to Univerſal ſupremacy, and the Popes ſucceeding to him. And having not only diſproved this, as I then thought, by thoſe 4*th.* and 5*th. Chap.* of Schiſm, but alſo thus largely and doubly vindicated them now, from all that hath been objected by the Cath. Gent. and S. W. to thoſe chapters, I diſcern not, how it is poſſible, I ſhould have any more to do in this buſineß; Or how I can ſafely add any word to any other head but that, without danger of relapſing into this impertinent, as well as toilſome errour of treating thoſe things, which are not queſtioned by them.

I ſhall therefore in obedience to his repeated Rebukes, indeavour to make ſhort work of the remain- 2. der of this ſection, (and ſee whether the third part will afford any new reaſon of farther ingaging) there being indeed nothing behind here, beſide ſcurrility, that requires any further anſwer, than what is already made in the Reply, chap. 7. ſect. 11, &c. and what the addition of a few ſtrictures may diſcharge.

As 1. when he ſaith, the Papacy was never imagined at any private King's diſpoſal, till Dr. H. his 3. time. I anſwer, that till he hath ſolidly aſſerted the Popes Univerſal Paſtorſhip from Chriſt's donation to S. Peter, and all his ſucceſſours in the See of Rome, there cannot any other colour of tenure be imagined for the Pope's having the ſupreme juriſdiction over this Church of ours, but the conceſſion and diſpoſal of ſome of our former Kings; and that was all I was to conclude in that place, and is no way invalidated by S. W.

2*dly*, When he blames my inference, that if it were in the Kings power to diſpoſe of it to the Pope, 4. then the ſame power remains in the Kings to diſpoſe it from him to ſome other, inſtancing in the King's yielding an Iſland, &c. to an over-powering enemy. I anſwer, that the parallel holds not, upon this reaſon, becauſe in that caſe, that Iſland muſt be ſuppoſed to go out from under that Kings power, which notwithſtanding, he may remain in the full intire ſupreme power over thoſe parts of his Kingdom, which are left him, and ſo be a ſupreme Monarch ſtill over all his remaining ſubjects, although his Province, or ſphere of adminiſtration be leſſened; but if the ſupremacy it ſelf in every part of his Dominions, be thus parted with, as that Iſland is parted with, i. e. not to remain to him, then he becomes leſs a King, than formerly he was, and, as I ſaid, ſuch acts, which make him ſo, are acknowledgedly invalid acts, it being above the power of a King himſelf, to alienate the ſupremacy or regality.

3*dly*, When from his ſorts of prayers, and ſeekers, which neither ſeek nor pray, he would have it 5. believed, that I have committed the like abſurdity, in making one ſort of gifts to be ſuch as are not given, and this as a rare ſervice to be rejoiced in, in the bill of fare; this is nothing but the obſcuring and perverting of a plain intelligible propoſition, the truth whereof is every day exemplified to us by a Kings removing his Chancellour from his place, upon any good cauſe, without any wrongful diminution to his former liberality, which beſtowed that office upon him. Is it not ſenſe to ſay, ſome things are given revocably, as well as others irrevocably? ſome quamdiu ſe benè geſſerit, ſome durante beneplacito, or as far as to the uſus fructus, as well as others by parting with the propriety, and finally diveſting my ſelf of all power and right either in, or to them? Or muſt this be δῶρον ἄδωρον, a gifteleß gift, if I retain any ſuch fundamental Original propriety in it, of ever recalling it again?

4*thly*, I wonder what infirmity it was, either in Philoſophy or Theologie, to exemplifie this, either 6. by the Sun communicating his beams, or God his graces, * without emptying, or diſpoſſeſſing themselves of that, which they bestow on others; and consequently, without parting with this power of revocation. This, saith he, is to affirm, that the very beams sent hither by the Sun, are notwithstanding retained there still, and so in far more distant places at the same time, than I will grant the glorified body of Christ in the Sacrament.] I answer by denying his consequence; 'Tis only to affirm, that the Sun retains the power over his own bounty, and may as freely withdraw it from this, and bestow it the next minute on some other, as it formerly bestowed it on this. This was evidently signified by the phrase of retaining all which it communicates, not retaining at that minute the particular beam, which was already sent out, and parted with; that would indeed imply the same contradiction, that we affirm their doctrine of transubstantiation doth; but retaining the power over its own light and beams in general, so as to continue them no longer to any one, than it pleaseth, and so that when it shall depart and inrich some other, the former usufructuary cannot plead prescription against this act of revocation of free bounty. Thus, saith * St. Basil, is the fire in the Iron, ὃ μεταβαλικῶς, ἀλλὰ μεταδοτικῶς, ὃ γὰρ ἐκτείνει τὸ πῦρ εἰς τὸ σίδηρον, μένον δὲ καθ' χώραν μεταδίδωσι ἑαυτῷ τῆς οἰκείας δυνάμεως, ὅπερ ὅτε ἐλατῶται τῇ μεταδόσει, ᾗ ὅλον πληροῖ ἑαυτῷ τὸ μέτεχον.

* So ſaith S. Baſil of Chriſt, Hom. de Pœnit. T. 1. p. 616. Χαρίζεται τὰ ἑαυτῦ ἀξιώμασι, οὐκ ἀποκενούμενος, ἀλλ' ἔχων ἃ δίδωσι. τοῦτο δὲ σημεῖον πλουτίου. τὸ ἔχειν καὶ χαρίζεσθαι — and ὅσα ἐὰν χαρίζηται, τοσοῦτον μένει πλούτου ὤν, ὅσπερ πάγη ἀένναος. ὅσον ἂν λάβῃς, οὐκ ἀπομειοῦται τὸ ῥεῦμα.

*in Chr. Nativ.

7. And then S. W. might have spared the cost of providing the long strings and pullies, which he talks of, to fetch back those beams, which he resolves incorporated in other bodies; for unless the whole treasure of beams be so poured out, that the Sun retains no power for the future, to withdraw from Rome and fix on Canterbury, so that now for the future, the latter shall have the same benign influences as largely, and as justly communicated to it, as formerly the former had had, the parallel still stands exact enough, to conclude the Kings power to remain to him, of removing and revoking from Rome, what he had at any time bestowed on it.

8. 5*thly*, For the instance of God, though S. W. hath chosen an unlucky phrase, saying that God never takes away what he gives, when the Scripture saith so often the contrary, If he take away our breath, we dye, and from him which useth not his grace which he had, auferetur, it shall be taken away; yet his explanation of himself is the yielding of all I affirm in this whole matter, that God is then said to take away any thing, when he with-holds his bountiful hand from a farther bestowing it. And then I that said the very same of Kings, that might thus give, and yet retain power of thus withholding the hand from this farther bestowing, concluded all, by S. W. his own suffrage, which I attempted to conclude. And then ad quid perditio hæc? why might not all S. W. his laborious bounty, and expence of so many lines also, have been otherwise bestowed?

9. 6*thly*, What the territory meant, which I said the Pope was willing to inlarge unlimitedly, was obvious enough by the foregoing mention of a Principality, and the contenting himself with that, might well enough be reconciled with his greatest zeal and industry in bringing in the fulness of the Gentiles to the faith of Christ, (which certainly is a very distant thing from obedience to the Papacy, as Xaverius's Gospel of S. Peter was somewhat different from S. Matthew's of our blessed Saviour) and then to what purpose again was all that ensuing harangue of the present prosperity of theirs, and improsperity of our Church?

10. 7*thly*, What I observed of Queen Maries time, did distinctly enough belong, and was applyed by me, not to her own private affections or judgment, of which I never doubted, but to the publick acts of state made in her reign. And then to what purpose is his justifying of that Queen, that she was no way favourable to our pretensions? But to that I have spoken in the Reply, p. 123 as also to the business of refusing the Popes Legates, the admitting of whom, I now see to be made use of twice in a Page, by your Bishop of Chalcedon, in his late survey of the Bishop of Derry, as a testimony of our Princes acknowledging the Popes Supremacy; And then sure, if the admitting will infer the acknowledgment, the * refusing must imply the disacknowledgment of it. Nor can I perceive what proportion that act of refusing of Legates, can be thought to bear with the Peoples denying the Kings subsidies, to which he parallels it; for sure if the Pope have any supremacy in this Kingdom, it must be the same offence against that supremacy, to exclude his Judges of Assises, or his Lieutenant, by him authorized, (and such his Legate is) as to exclude a Prince out of his Dominions (which is no way implyed, or intimated in the other) and if, as S. W. saith, all Catholick Countreys, when they see it convenient, do the like, It will be less strange, that I think that safe, which hath so many precedents, and consequently that our offence was not great, when we excluded him, whom that Legate represented.

* Of the danger of receiving Legates, see Archbish. Chichle's letter to Henry vi. in Vita Henr. Chichl. p. 79. of the King's power to refuse him, see Rich. Cawdray the King's Attorney his Protestation, Ibid. p. 82. Of the Kings of France practice in this matter, see Lud. Servin aux Plaidoier, Vol. 4. before the Parliament of Paris, Ann. Dom. 1590. when Cardinal Cajetan was sent into France. Ibid.

11. 8*thly*, I believe not that S. W. was ever Bishop Cranmer's Confessor, or consequently hath had real intelligence of his being guilty of that Carnality, which no story that I ever could hear of, charges on him, till this impure Pen suggested it against him. And with this may be associated another calumny that follows in the next Page, that Robert Wisdom's hymns were a part of our Reformation.

12. 9*thly*, What is objected to the Ordination of Bishops in Queen Elizabeth's days, was prevented in the Reply, Ch. 7. Sect. 4.

13. 10*thly*, When he objects to me, that I know not the difference betwixt the Oath of Allegiance and Supremacy, adding that there could be no need to press the latter to approve Mens fidelity and allegiance; I answer, that this is not any error or ignorance, but a truth visible enough by the effects of it: If the Bishop of Rome be supreme in this Kingdom, and so our King in the number of his subjects, we know one obvious effect arising from hence, that then 'tis in the power of his Bulls to absolve all subjects from their obligation to allegiance; and then what means can there be to secure, or approve any Man's fidelity, and allegiance to an Excommunicated Prince, beside disclaiming that Papal supremacy, and these so consequent attendants of it, which is the matter of that Oath?

As

As long as the allegiance is duly paid, there is no need indeed of any farther security, as whilst men do universally perform their duty, there is no need of laws or punishments; but when another supreme is acknowledged, beside and above the King, who need not unking him by any new act, having done it already by being his superior in his own dominions, the first contestation that shall happen between these two, must render the inferior criminous, and punishable, and the punishment we know is such, as renders him unfit for government, the King shall be in S. W. his style, the head of Schismaticks, and then what fidelity is he to expect from those, who acknowledge his enemies Supremacy?

This last objection of reforming end-ways, had been made use of by the Catholick Gentleman; 14. and is answered in Reply, p. 130. And so much for what hath been attempted by S. W. (not over prosperously) in his second Part.

CHAP. VII.

A Survey of the Third Part of Schism Disarmed.

SECT. I.

The second species of Schism. Unity of faith among brethren. The Apostles Institutions reducible to Faith. Disobedience to Superiors, without casting out Government. My method vindicated. The Popes supremacy not fixt by any appointment of Christ. The Bishop of Chalcedon his confession that 'tis not de fide, that it is jure divino; The Doctors of Paris. Jerom's testimony of S. Peter being made head. Christian unity equally conserved by all the Apostles plantations. Vigour of tradition in Rome, not for ever.

I Come now to his third Part, which begins with some quaint observations on my eighth Chapter. And for the introducing of the first of them, he falls very early into an open falsification of my words, against the plain testimony of his own, and the meanest Readers eyes; for having duly set down the second sort of schism, (now to be treated of) an offence against the mutual unity, peace, and charity which Christ left among his Disciples] in the very next line he will abbreviate this, and call it schism against charity, and then one species of this second sort, being a departure from the unity of the faith, &c. Here is a special infirmity observed in the Doctors method, that he makes faith and charity all one, putting his schism against faith, for the first species of schism against mutual charity] But 'tis evident this was not my fault, but his mis-representation. The genus which I divided into those species, was schism against the mutual unity, peace, and charity, (as mutual notes equality of fellow brethren, opposite to the relations of subordination) and there being an unity of faith between fellow-brethren, as well as of charity, 'tis visible that the departure from the unity of Faith, is a species of that second kind of schism, though not of the schism against charity, and so there is an end of his first subtilty. 1.

And the next is like unto that, whether for want of understanding, or of somewhat else, I cannot define [the Dr. saith he, ranks the rejecting Christs institution of government, under this second schism against charity, which was the first head hitherto treated of, i. e. offence against subordination] But I answer, 1. as before, that 'tis departure from mutual Unity, of which I make this a species, and not of schism against charity alone. Secondly, this is not coincident with the former kind, the offence against subordination, but falls under this head of departure from the Unity of the Faith, by way of reduction at least (as I there set it) or so as to be comprehended under it. For the objects of Faith being the doctrines of Christ and the Apostles, &c. the Institutions of Christ, and the Apostles are comprehended under that head, as being taught by them to be practised by us, (for that is the meaning of an Institution) and the manner of Government, which the Apostles left for the Church, being the matter of one of these, hence arises the propriety of this reduction, and consequently the casting out of the Church of God that form of Government, which Christ or his Apostles placed in it, or instituted, is a branch of offence, by reduction at least, against the unity of the Faith, a not believing, or not acknowledging the whether necessity, or but lawfulneß, or even expedience of that form, which so great an authority, as is that of Christ or his Apostles, not only countenanced and practised, but fixt for continuance in the Church. As for his way of arguing to the contrary, because, saith he, there can neither be subordination without Government, nor Government without subordination] it is founded in a very thin sophism which will presently be seen through; for meaning by Government, as 'tis plain I do, that particular form of Government, which Christ or his Apostles instituted, and by subordination, that regular living under the Government of all our lawful Superiors, as it evidently signified in the former part of the discourse of schism, 'tis thence evident, that there may be Government without this subordination, i. e. the same Man that acknowledges the Government of the Church by Bishops, may yet divide and separate from his own Bishop, and he that separates from his Bishop, may yet not deny, nor cast out the Episcopal order out of the Church; and so, besides that first sort of schism which was an offence against subordination, i. e. a breaking off from the Communion of, and obedience to their lawful Superiors, there may be also another species, referring to Government, a disacknowledging or rejecting the due Government: As supposing an Aristocratical Government of the Church, whether by Bishops and Metropolitans, or with the addition of Primates also, to be that which was placed in 2.

the Church by the Apostles, then as the reducing this either to Democrasie or Anarchy on the one side, is a departure from the Apostolical institution, so the erecting a Monarchick Government, a Papal universal Pastorship over all, will be a departure from the same institution, on the other side. And so certainly there was good reason of this Method of mine, and all the confusion that was fansied, was but an invention of S. W.

3. A third now follows, which came out of the very same forge, for he will needs perswade us, that there is no difference between breach of external peace, and want of that charity which is due from every Christian to every Christian] which is in effect, as if he said, there is no difference betwixt external and internal, for to that internal charity it is, that that last species belongs. Thus successful is he in all his nice observations.

4. After this προπύγμη, wherein none but the Air was wounded, or fled before him, he now advances to his more serious strokes, and after some recital of my words, (which when he hath never an objection in the forge, he can perform well enough) he pitches on my answer to their objection, that by casting out the authority of the Bishop of Rome, we have cast off the head of all Christian unity: And my answer being in these words, 1. That the Bishop of Rome, was never appointed by Christ to be the head of all Christian unity, or that Church to be a conservatory (for ever) of all Christian truth, any more than any other Bishop or Church of the Apostles ordaining or planting, he designs great advantage by the skilful exercise of his faculties, on these words. For 1. saith he, what signifies, the Bishop of Rome was not appointed by Christ? Christ, saith he, not being on earth when S. Peter's successors sat there, and when he ordain'd S. Peter chief of the Apostles, S. Peter was not yet Bishop of Rome] I answer, that my words exacted not of him the proof of such a personal or immediate appointment, I shall yet be content, if by any other means more remote, by any certain, though not close connection or consequence, he shall prove that the Pope was ever designed or foreappointed by Christ to be the head of all Christian unity. And truly if this be not done, I must suppose, that we are secured from the guilt of that sort of schism, of which in that place I was treating, which consists in a departure from those rules, appointed by Christ for the founding or upholding in his Church the unity of doctrine, upon this one score of our rejecting the Papal supremacy in the Church.

5. For if Christ hath no way, mediately, or immediately, fixt any supremacy in any single person in the Church, or in a succession in some one singular See; or if that single person, that shall be said to be appointed to succeed Christ in all his power, so as no other succeeds him, shall not also appear to have left the Bishop of Rome to all posterity, as his hæres de asse, inheriter of that universal supremacy, vested in him by Christ; then certainly the casting off any such pretended power of the Bishop of Rome, is not the departure from any rule for the founding, or upholding of unity appointed by Christ, nor consequently a rupture from that faith, which was once delivered unto the Saints, which is the sort of schism I there spake of.

6. And because S. W. was not at leisure to speak home to this question, whether or no it were by any divine right, or institution of Christ, that this supremacy in the Church belongs to the Bishop of Rome: It may not be amiss to take notice, what his ordinary the Bishop of Chalcedon in his answer to the Bishop of Derry hath, with less reservation, acknowledged in this matter. To us, saith he, it sufficeth that the Bishop of Rome is S. Peter's Successor, and this all Fathers testifie, and all the Catholick Church believeth; but whether he be so jure divino or humano, is no point of faith, and many things are de fide which are not de jure divino. Where not to examine the truth of the affirmation, that the Bishop of Rome is S. Peter's successor, it being yet as certain, that he is S. Paul's successor, as S. Peter's; nor of the close, that some things are de fide, which are not jure divino: All that I take notice of is, that when to conclude the point in hand, that the casting off the supremacy of the Bishop of Rome, is an act of schism, as that signifies a departure from the faith of Christ, or those rules which Christ appointed to uphold the unity of doctrine, two things must necessarily be proved by the Romanist, 1. That this supreme power over all, was by Christ given to S. Peter; 2. That the Pope is S. Peter's successor in this; these are not so much as pretended to be so proved by the Romanist, as to be able to infer the conclusion. For that they may do so, it is necessary both that S. Peter's right to the supremacy, and the Popes from him, should be de jure divino, and that it should be an article de fide that they are so, for if both of them be not jure divino, then neither is the Popes supremacy, which depends upon these two, as a conclusion on premises, jure divino, nor consequently any such appointment, or institution of Christs, as that the casting off that, shall be the casting off a doctrine, or institution of Christs. And if it be not de fide that they are both thus jure divino, (as that Bishop saith they are not) then 'tis no breach of the unity of faith, to deny these to be of divine right, nor consequently to deny the Popes supremacy to be of divine right, which depends on these, and cannot be of divine right, if these are not; which was all that I had to demonstrate.

p. 69.

7. And as, if this be granted me, there is very little more, which I need contend for, in this whole matter of our present debate, so if my intelligence do not deceive me, it is the common opinion among the Doctors of Paris, that the Pope hath not universal jurisdiction jure divino, (and then certainly not from tu es Petrus, or Pasce oves) and that his headship of the Church consists only, in being Primæ sedis Episcopus, the Bishop of the first See.

8. As for the testimony of S. Hierom, which S. W. here opposeth to my affirmation [that among the twelve one was chosen, that a head being constituted, the occasion of Schism might be taken away] 1. those words seem not to be S. Hierom's, but Jovinian's, for so it begins. At dicis, super Petrum fundatur Ecclesia, But you say, the Church is founded on Peter.

9. Secondly, whose soever that testimony is, it hath been by me formerly produced, and answered, and must of necessity be so interpreted, as shall be reconcileable with his words in the same place, that the Church which was founded on Peter, was founded on all the Apostles as well as on him, and that ex æquo, equally, the strength of the Church was established on them all.

Ch. n. Sect. 10. 1, 5, &c.

And

And thirdly, of S. Hieroms opinion in that place, it is evident, that whatever priviledge it was, 10.
that he allowed S. Peter, it was but upon the account of his seniority, either of years, or of his reception into the Discipleship, but rather of the former, for so it there follows: Cur non Johannes electus est virgo? Ætati delatum est, quia Petrus senior erat. Why was not John who was a virgin chosen, or preferred before the rest? (so electus est, is in the ensuing words interpreted by præferretur, not in Dominion over, but in place before the other Apostles) his answer is, Because Peter was the Elder, the deference being given to his age: Which being but a personal advantage, not communicable to all that should sit in the Roman See after him, is no way appliable to the benefit of the Romanist, who is to prove the Popes supremacy, and not only the Primacy of S. Peter.

And fourthly, if the utmost were granted that can be pretended from these words, it could never 11.
inforce or acquire to the Pope any more than the dignity of the Prime Patriarch, who in case of extraordinary difficulty, or contention falling out between two Primates, neither of them subject to any superior Bishop, or the like, might by way of voluntary appeal by mutual consent of parties, be resorted unto (and that would be beneficial to the unity of the Church, in case the Bishop of Rome persisted in the footsteps of S. Peter, and no way varied from him) But still this is nothing to the plenitude of power, as of an universal Pastor, which was that which I had at that time under consideration. And so all S. W. his hopeful fabrick, which depended on S. Hieroms words, is fallen to the ground, without any farther pains of ours, toward the demolishing of it. As

When he adds thirdly, that hence it follows that Christian unity is conserved by the Bishop of Rome, 12.
more than any other Bishop, contrary to the Doctors assertion] this is not in these words by him recited, of any force against the Doctors assertion, who made the comparison not simply betwixt the Bishop or Church of Rome, and all other Bishops, but betwixt that Church and any other Church of the Apostles plantation; And sure many such there were, as well as the Church of Rome, and more ancient than the Church of Rome, as the Church of Jerusalem and Antioch, the Churches of Asia, and many others, and consequently, if Rome have any priviledge above others, it is not from any appointment of Christ, whether mediate or immediate, that it thus hath it.

Fourthly, saith he, the Doctor equivocates in the word Roman Church, and takes it in a sence which 13.
he knows we never meant it, our acception of it being of the universal Church, communicating with the mother Church of Rome, his of the private Dioceß of Rome it self.] But it is manifest I did not equivocate, I spake of the authority of the Bishop of Rome, meaning just as he doth, the pretended authority over the whole Church of God, for else how could I speak of our casting out that authority, sure we never cast out, or denied his having authority in his own Dioceß; But then to deny the truth of their pretension, and to appeal to my former proofs, that the whether Church or Bishop of Rome never had any appointment from Christ to be the head of all Christian unity, more than every other Church or Bishop of the Apostles planting and ordaining, (which was all I said in that place) this was as plain on the other side, and no kind of eqdivocating in that.

Fifthly, When of the private Church of Rome it self he saith, that the Fathers hold that it had a 14.
greater vigor of Christian tradition than any other Church,] though this he hath not proved, yet the yielding of it, is perfectly reconcileable with all that I there said; For 1. it was of Christs appointment, that I spake, and whatsoever reverence the Fathers pay that See, yet they affirm not of Christ, that he by any peculiarity of promise conveyed any such priviledge to that See, of having a greater vigor than all other Churches of Apostolical plantation; Secondly, it was of the perseverance or conserving for ever all Christian truth, that I spake; and against that, the Fathers say nothing, but speak of it as of a matter of fact, that in their time Christian tradition was most eminently preserved there, not undertaking to divine, that it should to all perpetuity be so faithful a repository. Nay 'tis not * long since I told him out of Anselm, his prediction of the iniquity of that See, which should cause * Ch. 5. Sect. 8. n. 1. many Churches to depart from her. And it is small advantage to have this vigor once, if it have since betrayed that truth, and obtruded Pontifical dictates instead of such Tradition.

And lastly, When he is so unsatisfied with my interposing this word [for ever] as if, saith he, 15.
Christ might perhaps appoint her to conserve truth for a while, but meant after some time to discharge her of that office, I answer, that speaking, as we now do, of the particular See of Rome, there is no colour of appointment or determination of Christs, that it should for any time be a conservatory of all Christian truth, any otherwise than it is his will and command and appointment, that every Church should conserve all Christian truth, and therefore that was not the motive to my putting in the word [for ever] but because to make good the Romanists pretension, that the casting off the authority of the Bishop of Rome, is the casting off the Faith of Christ, it is necessary not only that that Church be appointed by Christ to be a conservatory of all Christian doctrine, but that it be secured to continue so for ever, else as the Churches of Asia, which were once very zealous conservatories of Christian truth, afterward forsook their first zeal, and admitted foul heresies, so it may be true of the Church of Rome also.

SECT.

SECT. II.

The Apostles depositum. Grounds of belief. Our State fallible as peccable. Regal power differs from Sacerdotal. Peters Primacy what it signifies. Whether given him by Christ. Primacy of jurisdiction never without Dignity of place.

1. WHat I said in the second place concerning the acts of Apostolical providence for the preserving unity in the faith: And 1. their resolving on some few heads (of efficacy to the planting of Christian life) to be deposited in every Church, hath somewhat perplext S. W. For 1. saith he, Doctor H. is suddenly become a plain Papist (and if he be, I must only wonder how a Romanist can find in his heart to write in confutation of him any longer) but then 2. he fears very much that Mr. H. in this his doctrine, neither goes to Church, nor stays at home] (and this very fright of his, the factor or stationer hath put in his bill of fare for a notable piece of wit, a special service) But to give him full satisfaction, I have written an intire tract on this subject, and given him the sum of my belief in this matter, what that depositum was that the Apostles thus deposited in all Churches, the several articles of the Apostolick faith or Creed, and if the Church of Rome would keep close to that depositum, and not corrupt by increasing of it, coin no more articles, than they had from the Apostles mint, there is not a more promising way of return to that unity, from which Christian professors long have swerved; and that the Church of Rome will not yield to this, is absolutely a breach of the Canon of Ephesus, to which I have spoken at large in the reply, Chap. 8. Sect. 2. and shall thither refer the Reader for what might be added in this matter.

2. But he proposes in this matter a subtle Quære, whether these Churches, in which these heads of such special efficacy were deposited, were infallible, or no?] I answer briefly, that every of those Churches single, and particularly the Church of Rome was no farther infallible, than they should actually adhere to this depositum intrusted to them. If they swerved from it, by addition or substraction, they so far failed of their trust. And that they might, any one of them so fail, I have no reason of doubting, who see so many visible demonstrations à posteriori of many of those Churches failing thus. But that all of them should uniformly, without ever consulting of it, agree to impose upon posterity somewhat else, instead of that Apostolical depositum, I think not any more probable, than that so many Atomes should casually yet orderly concur to make this Universe. But on the contrary, I think the universal consent, and attestation of all the Apostolick plantations, so forcible an argument to induce belief, that the Apostles did really deposit these Doctrines in all Churches, that any prudent man may safely venture his life or his soul on the truth of it, and resolve it as impossible to be otherwise, as that he and a multitude of other men should be deceived in that which they affirm from their own sensations.

3. Much more might be here said, but this is all that is necessary to be answered to that question. For as to his answer to my addition, that if we hold these doctrines deposited in the Church as zealously as the Romanist, we must hold them as of faith, and that the depository is so trusty, as it cannot deceive us.] I reply, 'tis sufficient to hold it of faith, and upon prudential grounds of resolving, that all the world of Christian Apostolical Churches would never concur wilfully, and gainlesly to deceive; not that any one or more of them single cannot possibly have been first misled themselves, and then mislead others. And therefore when I said, those few heads were asserted by us as zealously as by any Romanist, my speech belonged to sincerity of belief induced thus as I now express, and to the degree of that sincerity; and if I that pretend not the same motive to induce my faith, as the Romanist pretends, have yet the same faith that the Romanist hath, and will adventure as high a stake, practise what Christ commands as confidently upon this faith, not built on the belief of their Churches infallibility, as the Romanist doth upon his supposed infallible ground, my faith will still be as much (if not more properly) faith as his, and I doubt not as secure of its acceptation and reward in Heaven. And then sure I am as far from the sceptick School of Academicks, as the firmest, and most undoubted faith can secure me to be. For though I willingly grant, that mans wit cannot invent a better way to preserve unity of faith, than belief of their Churches infallibility would be; yet I, that for all fundamental truths of Christ, thus derived to me by undoubted tradition, am so richly provided for, and must not for all other particulars invent or carve for my self, but sit down satisfied with that portion which God hath thought fit for me, and cannot believe all that I would have; (my fancies, or my wishes;) ought in reason, for all these, to content my self with such means, as God hath afforded me; and till I discern by some infallible argument, that there is some man or society of men, which hath the never-ceasing priviledge from God of being infallible, never go about to deceive my self into a groundless confidence, or perswasion of a present Utopian infallibility. I know it agrees with Gods good providence to leave me in a peccable, and I cannot resist, must not repine, if he hath left me for some things in a fallible state, and only support my self with my diligence and my prayers, that I fall not willingly into fault, or mistake, sin or error.

4. What next follows upon my second way of preserving unity in faith, is lightly varied from the questions and answers in the Catholick Gentleman, and was punctually answered in the Reply, Chap. 8. Sect. 1.

5. As for his great care of providing a place for the King among the Bishops (which next follows in his play-some mood) it shall be seriously examined, whensoever he finds in any of my Papers, either that the King is by me stiled head of the Church, as he will feign me to call him, or that he, whose office office it is to be Supream Governour over Bishops even in Ecclesiastical causes, and to order the external affairs of the Church, hath the censures of the Church, or the Ministry of the Word and Sacraments, and so of admitting into, and excluding from the Church committed to him. If he knew not the difference of the Regal and Sacerdotal, the coercive and directive power, he may learn it more seasonably of those, which have written ex instituto on that subject, than expect a new treatise of it from me here, loco non suo, who have a task of a competent wearisomness already before me.

Here follows now a special piece of art, on occasion of my allowing a Primacy of order or dignity among Primates or Patriarchs, proportionable to the πρῶτος Σίμων in Scripture, and agreeable to what is by the ancient Canons allowed the Bishop of Rome, [If so saith he, then for any thing you know, it may be a Primacy of jurisdiction, and it stands only upon the certainty of yours and our interpretation of Scripture, whether it signifie such a Primacy or no.] I answer 1. that a [may be] no way concludes that it is; a thousand things may be, or might have been, if God had pleased, of which no one ever was or shall be, and I willingly grant S. Peters Primacy of jurisdiction over all the Apostles, to be one of that number. 2. My not knowing, or having no certainty of interpreting Scripture, can have nothing to do in this matter, with the grounds which S. W. can produce to infer from Scripture what he affirms; and the solidity and irrefragable force of those grounds, are the only considerable in this business, and he that is, and acknowledges himself fallible, may yet by the right use of those means which God affords him, discern the truth, when they that use not those means, but rely on their feigned priviledge of inerrableness, do by regular consequence from this presumption, swerve and fail in judging of truth, and interpreting Scripture. And so these are too weak Topicks to conclude a matter of such importance to the whole Church, as is this of Peters, and from thence the Popes Supremacy, and universality of jurisdiction. 6.

But S. W. hath yet a more efficacious Topick, at least ad hominem, which will conclude it impossible to be otherwise, (neither could it be any other, saith he) if any hold may be taken from his words. For, saith he, S. Peter, as you grant, and as the words πρῶτος Σίμων Simon the first of the Apostles, plainly evidence, had some kind of Primacy then given him, and if it were then given him, he then had it, i. e. in our Saviours life-time. But you told us Chap. 4. Sect. 14. that S. John had the dignity of place, which is the same with Primacy of order, before all others in Christs life-time, even before S. Peter himself, the Primacy then, which S. Peter had in Christs life-time, must be some other Primacy, and what Primacy could this be, but the Primacy of jurisdiction. 7.

I answer 1. to the question in the conclusion, by telling him what Primacy it was, that Peter had at this time, when the Scripture saith πρῶτος Σίμων; It was Primacy both of years and discipleship, he was the ancientest man, as Hierom told us even now, at least the ancientest of them which had any special remark of Christs favour on them, of the three, ὑπὸ τῦ κυρίυ προσλημμένοι, as * Clemens calls him and the two sons of Zebedee, and the ancientest disciple of Christ: not the first that was called, that appears to be Philip, but the first that so obeyed his call, as constantly to adhere to him. And this having nothing of jurisdiction over all his fellow disciples annext to it, on the one side, only the dignity of speaking first, or being spoken to, and answering in the person of all, and yet being very reconcileable with all that I said of John, Chap. 4. Sect. 14. viz. that he had the favour of Christ, and the dignity of place before S. Peter himself in Christs life, leaning on his breast, having the πρωτοκλισία (for the younger man and the later disciple might by Christs favour, have that) there remains no force in this argument against my pretensions. But then 2. what is by the disputer assumed, both as granted by me, and plainly evidenced by the words, First Simon, viz. that some Primacy was given Peter] may have some ambiguity in it, and therefore must be cleared, before I can either grant it to be true, or disclaim the granting it. If by [given] he mean no more than I have already said, that he had it by that favour of Christ, which was specially afforded to three of them, of whom he was the ancientest, both in respect of years and discipleship, then I freely grant it, and am no more incommodated by it, than just now I appeared to be. But if by [given] he mean any farther particular donation of Christ to him, then this Primacy no way appears to have been thus given him. For whatsoever is by the Romanists supposable to be given him, upon tu es Petrus, cannot be applied to this; the title of πρῶτος Σίμων being mentioned by the Evangelist, before that part of the story, which sets down Christ's delivering those words to him. And for any other donation precedaneous to that, 1. the Scripture mentions none, and 2. 'tis not conceiveable there should be any, or indeed such force in that, when all the time of Christs life, John had the πρωτοκλισία, the dignity of place next Christ. For though that dignity of place may be (and was in John) without any superiority of power or jurisdiction, yet the Superiority or Primacy of Jurisdiction is never to be found in any without the πρωτοκλισία or priority of place: and therefore I say, it is not Imaginable (when the Scripture is silent) that any such Primacy of jurisdiction should at, or before the time of the [first Simon] belong to S. Peter by Christs donation, and yet the dignity of place remain to S. John by Christs indulgence. And so much for the argument ad hominem, which doubtless made him promise of doing him special service, but hath much failed his expectation. 8.

* Κατὰ τυπωσ. l. 5.

But this great advantage must not be lost so, if it be good for nothing else, yet it may be so disguised and brought out a second time in other dress or garnish, that it may serve very well for a quelque chose in the bill of fare, and so indeed it is improved in the next onset; and from our Saviours making Peter the first, there must needs be some better thing bestowed on him, saith he, than a dry Presidency, or an obliging all the Apostles under pain of damnation to make a leg to S. Peter.] I answer, it now appears what the design was in the former urging of the argument, to shuffle in the giving of the Primacy to him. But that art being now discovered, and no donation of Christs being discernible to be included, or intimated in this title of S. Peters, the puff-paste may have served to furnish the table, but hath not fed any of the guests: and so we have done with that Paragraph. 9.

SECT.

SECT. III.

The Romanists peace not perfect. The Greek Church, acknowledged not the Popes Supremacy. The Politick Problem. The Kings power in externals. His judgment what good for the publick.

1. IN his answer to Chap. 8. Sect. (it should be) 6. he hath made a shift at the entrance quite to mistake my words, and design. I speak of the unity of the whole body, i. e. of the whole Christian Church, and all the parts of it, Eastern as well as Western, &c. to which I thought the subjection of this Nation to the Pope, could not effectually contribute, because before the time of our pretended departure, the Eastern Churches had long renounced all subjection to the Papacy. And he refers me to the great tranquillity which they enjoy who are under that government now.] I answer, 1. that I discern not the truth of his affirmation, nor acknowledge the so perfect peace which he boasts of; I need not go far for instances; 'Tis not long since we saw the seculars and regulars far enough removed from such huge tranquillity, ingaged at a competent distance (as Watsons Quodlibets will testifie) in many things; particularly, and more lately in that controversie concerning the necessity of an Ordinary in these Islands, and S. W. may remember it, by the token of the Jesuits Creed; and whether their agreement be now so perfect in respect of the questions long agitated betwixt the Jansenians and Molinists, even after the Popes decision on the Molinists side, he may please to inform us in his next; And till then I shall omit the debate concerning the state of the souls departed, and the doctrines attending that, which are of some weight of importance.

2. Secondly, Be the tranquillity of the Romish Subjects and Votaries never so profound, yet 'tis evident the unity of the Romanists is not the unity of the whole Christian world, and that being it I spake of, 'tis certain he yet renders no answer to that. 'Tis true indeed, if it were all Christians duty, and so ours, to be subject to the Bishop of Rome, others default would not secure or justifie us, but that this is the duty of all Christians, or of any more than of right belong to the Roman Province, is the principal question all this while, and must not be begg'd (as in the process of this answer it is) while it is under dispute.

3. But at length he comes nearer the point in hand, and considers the Greek Church, and of them affirms these three things. First, that for rejecting the Popes Supremacy they were by all the Christian world held and called Schismaticks; and yet Secondly, when they were in their right mood, as in the Council of Florence, they admitted it as much as any Roman Catholick. Thirdly, that when they were disgusted and refused unity, they acknowledged the power of the Bishop of Rome, as, saith he, appears by the testimony of Gerson, cited by Bishop Bramhal against himself, which witnesses that the Greeks departed from the then Pope with these words, we acknowledge thy power, we cannot satisfie your covetousness, live by your selves.]

Just. Vindic. p. 16.

4. To these I answer, 1. that their being the greatest Schismaticks for the rejecting the Supremacy, and yet their acknowledging as much as any Catholick, and when they refused unity, yet acknowledging the Popes power] are riddles for none but S. W. to expound, and when he hath done that, he may very justly turn Southsayer, and set up ex tripode to deliver Auguries or Oracles which he please. For certainly if their Schism consisted in denying the Popes Supremacy, and that is his power, then when they refused unity, in which refusal their Schism consisted, they did not acknowledge his power. Secondly, if sometimes they were in the mood to deny the Popes Supremacy sometimes to grant it, then, for ought S. W. hath here attempted to prove by any other means, than that of his own approving it, the yielding the Pope's power doth no more appear to have been their good mood, or interval, than their much more constant and continued refusing. Thirdly, for their subscription in the Council of Florence, he cannot but know, how invalid it is to infer their submission to the Popes power, else it were great unkindness to account them as great Schismaticks since, as before that Council (of the Greeks doctrine in this Council, I have also spoken in the reply, Chap. XI. Sect. I.) Lastly, for Bishop Bramhal's citation out of * Gerson, part of the Bishops words are, that the Greek Church never acknowledged any obedience to be due from them to the Bishop of Rome, and he that is acquainted with the Chancellor John Gerson's writings; or but with as many pieces of his, as are put together by Goldastus, in his Monarchia, will not doubt that the same was his sence also, and we need no further evidence, than the words thus cited from him, for sure they that bid the Pope live by himself, res suas sibi habere (the solemn form of divorce or separation) did in these words profess to separate from him, moved thereto, among other things, by his grievous exactions, and cannot at the same time acknowledge any such power, as S. W. pretends to, or any more than that of the Prime Patriarch, or beginning of unity, which that learned Bishop was there willing to acknowledge. The truth is, the words are not potestatem, but potentiam tuam recognoscimus, we acknowledge thy might; and that was proper enough to be said to the most violent usurper or exactor; and the other words, and the whole context, restrain it to that sence.

* P. 4. Serm. de Pace & Unit.

5. He next replies to my mention of the Politick Problem, whether the Bishop of Rome be probably able to administer so vast a Province, the truth of which I thought belonged to prudent persons to judge, and especially to Kings intrusted by God with the care of their own Realms; And first he is willing to interpret my words of such humane policy, as was to be had among heathens, and streightway to advance to such a fastidious despising of my conclusion drawn from the Christian Kings being nursing Fathers to the Church, as to make it equally to infer Nero to have right and title to be head of the Church, whilst he remained an heathen Emperor.] But all this hath no more appearance of weight or earnest in it, than will briefly be answered, by my telling him, 1. that I spake of Christian policy, or skill of managing and regulating the external matters of the Church, such is this of dividing or bounding of Provinces, appointing of Bishops Sees, or Metropoles, and the like in such a manner as may most tend to publick good, and as an Heathen Emperor by accident may do somewhat in this, viz. by dividing the Empire into Provinces, as we know Augustus did by Mecenas's advice, and S. Paul in his ordaining Bishops in Churches, follow the τάξις order, as he found in the civil notitiæ. So now that Princes have received the faith of Christ, and undertaken the defence of it, sure none is more fit to judge of all things of this rank than he, whom in every Nation God hath appointed to be Supream over all, even Ecclesiastical persons, viz. the Christian King, as (both in this particular, and more generally) had before been proved to be the sence and resolution of the Christian Church and Councils, and as the very title of Father, which the Scripture gives Kings, in relation to the Church, Isa. 49. 23. doth demonstrate; For to the Fathers power, subjection and obedience in external things is relative, as even by the instance, which he thinks most confutes it, is manifest; for though Joseph was but a foster Father to Christ, yet the text assures us, Christ lived in obedience to Joseph, for else it could not be truly said, that he was subject to them, in the plural, Luke 2. 51.

or

What he adds in conclusion of that Section as a consequence from my words, that by making the King in each Nation Judge of this Politick Problem, I make the party in the controversie to be Umpire of it] can really have no place here, where I am speaking, not of the point of right, whether the Pope be rightfully the head of our Church (for if that were the thing now under consideration, I should acknowledge the Prudential or Politick Problem it self to be very unseasonably interposed) but whether it be most for the good of our, or any particular Church (abstracting from the point of right) that the Pope should be head of it, or whether he being himself of but finite faculties, and at such a distance from us, and many other nations, he be fitly qualified to administer that vast Province, one Monarch over the whole Christian world, For of this it was evidently, that I there spake, and in that I thought it reasonable that the Prince, that is the Common ruler both of S. W. and of me, should be deem'd the most competent judge betwixt us, what is best for either of us, and for all others in the same condition with us, which is far enough from making either party the Umpire, as S. W. suggested me to do, and is only angry with me, because I would not let him be guilty of the same fault himself, which he unjustly accuses me of, for if the Pope should be Umpire, as he would have it, 'tis visible that a party is Umpire. And so much for his first Section. 6.

SECT. IV.

The first Ages most competent testifiers of Tradition. Scripture a witness of Apostolick practice, and not only Tradition. Scripture as infallibly interpretable as Tradition, or Papal Decrees. The four first Councils preferr'd before all subsequent, Why? The Articles of Faith consigned in them, not to be increased. Authority of Councils. Docibleness in a Church no fault. Not learning of Rome our only charge. Belief without Infallibility. Purity the flourishing of a Church.

HIS second Section though well lengthened with exaggeration and sarcasm, is but a recitation, and enlargement of the same mistake of my sence, which the Catholick Gentleman had hit on before him, concerning my mention of the first three hundred years, and the four first general Councils, as if I rejected all the rest of the Church, which was not comprised within those bounds, as erroneous, and such as I refused to be tried by, for the Doctrines in Controversie between them and us; Whereas it is most manifest by the occasion, and whole contexture, that I mention'd the Scripture, and those, as the safest Depositaries of all that faith which was delivered by Christ and his Apostles, and so, as the most competent testifiers of tradition, which certainly they must be, if either he that was an ocular witness, or lived neareſt the times of such, be more creditable, and authentick for the relating a matter of fact, than any other, no more honest than he, which hath not so good means to attain to the knowledge of it. Do not we cæteris paribus, give more credit to one eye-witness, than to many that were not such, but make distant relations from times which were long before them, offering no testimony, or record of any αὐτόπται, for what they say? Or indeed is it possible for us at this distance by any optick to discern or judge, what the Apostles did or taught, if it were not conveyed to us by some who lived in, or soon after their times? Is there any satisfactory motives to induce belief of a matter of fact (such it is, that the Apostle did institute, or teach this or that) but the authority of the Reporter? and is there any proper ground, whereon to build this sort of authority of one man, or society of men above another, but the consideration first of the means, he hath to inform himself rightly, than of his fidelity, that being not deceived himself, he was not presumeable to be willing to deceive others? So that what infallible judgment soever the Church of this or any former Age can be deemed to have, yet sure matters of fact, such are all traditions, are not the proper matter whereon 1.

to exercise it; 'tis not imaginable that the most inerrable Pope or Council, should by strength of that, unless they have also (which I suppose they pretend not) immediate revelation, and inspiration annext to it, affirm infallibly, either what S. W. hath written in Schism disarm'd, or what Simon Zelotes preacht in Britain, or indeed that ever he was here, or any one Christian Doctor for many hundred years, or consequently what Depositum was intrusted to our Church, any farther than they are advertised by some Records of the times, wherein each thing was done, or of the succeeding times, within such a distance, as it can by some sure means be conveyed to them. What can be more plain and evident than this? What less liable to those ridiculous consequences, of being judged by those that speak nothing of our differences, of making the whole Church first pure, then impure, then pure again, as it sutes best with my purpose, of expressing a plain tergiversation, and the like, which are affixt to my mention of the 300 years, and the four General Councils? But of this I have spoken enough, in the Reply, Chap. 8. Sect. 3.

2. But S. W. hath one specialty here, wherein he surpasses the Catholick Gentleman. His first objection is against my but naming Scripture for any way of judging of Apostolical doctrines and traditions.] The concordant testifications of the first ages of the Church, and the four General Councils, I had particularly named, as means to conveigh to us the knowledge of Apostolical traditions, only I set Scripture in the front, as having Vincentius Lirinensis his direction to do so, (duplici modo munire fidem, primo scil. divinæ legis authoritate, &c. contr. Hær. c. 1. and quascunque antiquiores vel schismatum vel hæreseon profanitates nullo modo nos oportet convincere, nisi aut sola, si opus est, Scripturarum authoritate, &c. c. 39.) and as verily believing that at least some Apostolical practices and doctrines, were conserved there, suppose it were Christs Sermon on the Mount, or his institution of the Sacraments, or his very death and resurrection, &c. And I must be arraigned and chastised, and very demure arguments formed against me, for no more but this; For first he will ask, Are those doctrines clearer expresst in Scripture, than in the depositories of the Church, or no? If they be, saith he, what needed we those Depositives? If not, how can we judge of them by Scripture?] I answer, what need hath the world of the itch of disputing, which suggests arguments against the Suns giving light at noon-day? and S. W. his invention serves him as well on such a Theme, as for the defending any of his most precious concernments. Or if a man is bound either to be a Schismatick, or to render punctual satisfaction to all such forked dilemmas as these, like the brute in the fable, which mistook his own ears for horns, it then sufficeth me at the present, that which soever is most obscure, should receive light from the more perspicuous, and so that sometimes the Scripture should illustrate the Depositories of the Church, sometimes receive lustre from them, and such very good friends as are the writings of the Apostles, and the records of their preachings, live amicably and profitably together, and administer each to the others necessities, and we receive our instruction from both, when they are both willing to afford it, and content our selves with either, when the other is silent, and never question Gods bounty, what need we have, or what benefit we can reap of that which he hath afforded; It being visible both in thesi, that that which is not needful at one time, may be beneficial, nay necessary at another; and in hypothesi, that this is the very case of Scripture, and the faith once delivered to the Saints (as that is mentioned by, and so is a disparate thing from the Scripture) that one lends at one time, and at another time borrows light from the other.

3. As for his singular instance, to prove how difficult a thing it is, to judge when things are clear in Scripture, when not, from the Doctors not being satisfied from thence, that S. Paul converted Jews, S. Peter Gentiles,] 'tis long since demonstrated to be a calumny, and that all that I said was no more than what was affirmed by the plainest words of Scripture, set down as intelligibly, as ever any tradition unwritten can be delivered, or as the Pope or Council can define any thing, viz. that by compact between those two Apostles and some others, where they met in a City of mixt inhabitants, one should betake himself to the Jews, the other to the Gentiles. And therefore, as to that supernumerary exception, let S. W. but tell me what sure rules he gives us to settle our judgment, when things are clear in the definition of a Pope or Council, when not, or in case of a doubt, what the meaning is of such supposed infallible decree (which if it want an interpreter, is a Barbarian to him that understands it not, though in the spirit, it delivereth never so infallible an oracle) and I will not fail to satisfie his importunity, and direct him to as proper and safe means to interpret Scripture also, or else I will not impose on him the believing this or that sence of it.

4. The equality of the authority of all Councils, he also presseth, against my naming but the four first (which the Catholick Gentleman was not acute enough to take notice of.) But besides many other grounds of difference between those four first, confestly Oecumenical Councils, and the fourteen more which he sets under that title (which I shall not now insist on) I have already more than intimated the reason which in that part of my Discourse gave the deference to those, because those were so near the first times, that they were competent witnesses or judges of the Records, which were then produced for the truths, which were there defined as from Apostolical tradition. This I suppose the ground of Pope Gregories exalting these four Councils so high in these words (l. 1. Regist. Ep. 24.) Sicut sancti Evangelii quatuor libros, sic quatuor Concilia suscipere & venerari me fateor, Nicænum scil. &c. quia in his velut in quadrato lapide sanctæ fidei structura consurgit, & cujuslibet vitæ & actionis norma consistit. And although he add the fifth, with a pariter veneror, yet sure this lessens not the eminent veneration yielded to the former. In like manner Pope Gelasius in the name of the Roman Church, after the Scriptures, yields authority to these four Councils, and for all other post istorum quatuor authoritatem & custodienda & recipienda decernimus & mandamus. See Corp. Jur. Can. Decr. par. 1, Dist. 15. c. 2. & 3. To which I farther add, because the Creeds, or summaries of the credenda, were in these so consign'd, as that they might not afterwards be inlarged by any to any new matters, as appears both by the Nicene Creed, form'd by the Fathers of that first famous Council (the Athanasian being but an explication of that) and the expreſs words of the Epheſine Council Can. 7. ἐτέραν πίστιν μὴ ἐξεῖναι, that it ſhould not be lawful for any man to produce, write or compoſe any belief, beſide that which was thus eſtabliſht by the Fathers of Nice. And that they which ſhould dare συντιθέναι, προσκομίζειν, ἢ προσφέρειν τοῖς Ἕλλησιν ἐπιστρέφειν εἰς ἐπίγνωσιν τῆς ἀληθείας, to compoſe, or tender, or offer any ſuch other Faith to any that were willing to convert to the acknowledgement of the truth from Judaiſm, Gentiliſm, or any other Hereſie whatſoever, if they were Biſhops, ſhould be degraded, if Laicks, anathematized or excommunicated; which as it renders a direct account of my pitching on this way of trial, whether the Church of Rome's conditions of Communion are too ſevere to us or no, ſo is it our evidence, that we are not hereticks, who believe all this faith of Nice and Epheſus, &c. or if we were, and for no leſs than hereſie caſt out by the Church of Rome, they muſt not under pain of degradation and excommunication, I may add the crime and pain of perjury alſo, (the Pope at his Conſecration ſwearing to obſerve inviolably all the ordinances made in the eight firſt General Councils) impoſe any new Articles of belief upon us, (I mean ſuch as were not in * ſubſtance comprehended in thoſe former Creeds) in the way to our readmiſſion or return to their Churches peace.

* See Vincent. Lir. c. 28.

By the way, when there have been in the Romaniſts account ſo many General Councils above the number of the Eight firſt, I might ask, whether in the Popes * Conſecration-Oath he ſwear the obſervation of all the whole number indefinitely? Or if he do not, whether I may not as ſeaſonably retort the Queſtion, as S. W. could propoſe it, whether all the Councils are not of equal authority, there being nothing found to authorize the firſt eight, which was not found in the ninth, tenth, &c. And then ſure, that anſwer that can be ſo eaſily retorted upon the reſpondent, is no unrefutable anſwer. 5.

* See the words, Corp. Jur. Can. Decr. par. 3. diſt. 16. c. 8.

What now hath been ſaid, demonſtrates ſufficiently how little ingagement lies upon me by force of the mention of the four firſt Councils, to imbark in a new Ocean of Controverſie, concerning the ſacred and obligatory authority of all Councils, any farther than their determinations appear to be grounded on Apoſtolick tradition; ſo far indeed my words obliged me, and to that I have ſpoken already, (and I ſuppoſe, yielded as much, as is demanded by many learned Papiſts) but to any more, my leiſure is not ſo great at this time, as to invite me to expatiate ſo unneceſſarily, though if it were ſeaſonable, I might ſafely adventure on the queſtion in the very terms, that S. W. hath propoſed it unto me, viz. with his interpoſition of thoſe two exceptions, unleſs their votes have not been free, or ſome other known defect have been in the managing of it. In which ſecond rank of exceptions, I ſhould not think fit to name the Primate of England his not conſenting to the Canon, as S. W. will be forced to decry the Canon of Chalcedon, becauſe the Pope conſented not to it, and this after he hath rebuked it in me, as illogical and illegal, to commit the Umpirage to a Party. 6.

The laſt on-ſet is againſt my extolling the humble docible temper of our Church, i. e. in plain terms againſt imitating our Saviour, who did more than commend or extol humility, even μακαρίζειν, pronounces it a prime ingredient in bleſſedneſs, and commands us to learn and tranſcribe it from him. If it were an hypocritical or falſe humility that I had thus extoll'd, and I were now chid for talking like a ſaint (as juſt before I was, when I did but profeſs, that our ignorance, if we ſhould be found to miſtake, is an unaffected ignorance, which S. W. ſuch is his Chriſtian temper, reſolves to be a conſciouſneſs to my ſelf, what pitiful ſhifts I make uſe of, inſtead of grounds) If I ſay, the pretending to the humble and docible temper, whilſt it were far from us, had been the matter of the charge, this had been but the old S. W. ſtill, and I could not with reaſon ξενίζεσθαι think ſtrange of it, having been ſo long ſo intimately acquainted with his humour, and taught to expect ſuch conſtructions from him. But it is the very humility which we profeſs to have, the docibleneſs which I verily thought had been our ſtricteſt duty, which is become S. W. his greateſt ſcorn. Truly Mr. Doctor, ſaith he, it is a wonderful commendation to your Church, that ſhe is yet to be taught; pray when will ſhe be of age to leave going to School?] In anſwer to this queſtion, I confeſs I am forced to ſpeak like a Saint (but that is not indeed like an hypocrite) in the words of S. Paul, when that which is perfect is come, then that which is in part ſhall be done away. For now we ſee through a glaſs darkly, but then face to face. Now I know in part, but then ſhall I know even as alſo I am known. Since I firſt read thoſe words, I thought I had reaſon to expect nothing in this world above an imperfect fallible eſtate, which ſignifies not any ſceptical ἀκαταληψία, any doubt of the truth of any thing, which we believe our ſelves to be taught by the Apoſtles of Chriſt, or an imperfectneſs, or darkneſs of any truth, which from him either by written or unwritten Tradition hath been ſurely and clearly conveighed to us, (We ſure believe all the Articles of the Creed as firmly as any Romaniſt believes them) but an imperfection in reſpect of the object or of the light; ſome things being believed by others, which we do not believe, becauſe we have yet no convincing motive to induce the belief of them; other things alſo, wherein though as far as appears to us, they are falſe, and not reaſonable to be believed by us, at leaſt by divine faith, as long as we have no divine ground of that faith, either from Scripture or Tradition; yet becauſe we believe our ſelves fallible, and that we may poſſibly come, even in this world, to ſee more than yet we ſee, therefore humility and docibleneſs, is in this reſpect, all that we pretend to, and truſt it will find a more favourable acceptation at his hands, to whom we deſire to approve our ſelves, than here with this diſputer it hath met with. 7.

But it is evident enough, that it is not our humility or docible temper, that hath ſeriouſly diſobliged S. W. If we will but give him leave to chuſe a miſtreſs for us, we ſhall then be allow'd to be as humble and docible as we pleaſe; For ſo it follows. Is it docibleneſs or humility to forſake a miſtreſs which had all the qualities which could give her authority?] To ſee, whither paſſion or intereſt will drive one! 'Twas even now a fault that we were not out of our Prentice-like Tutorage, that we did not ſet up for our ſelves, to profeſs truth as a Church ſhould do; and that he thought, the Church ſhould have been the pillar and firm foundation of the truth] and leſt we ſhould do ſo indeed, become his Scholars, and having ruminated upon this his firſt lecture, reply to him, that upon that very account our Church acknowledges no miſtreſs upon earth, no not the Totius Orbis Domina, the Univerſal Miſtreſs, the Roman See; being for all neceſſaries ſufficiently furniſhed 8.

by that depositum which the Apostles left with us, and for what remains dark and undiscovered to us, secure, that the knowledge or explicit belief will never be exacted of us; Upon this sudden apprehension, a pin is fallen out of the Machine, and the scene is perfectly changed, we must now be disciplin'd afresh, that we will set up for our selves, that we will ever be of age, that we have at length out-grown our Pupillage, that we are not so docible, or rather so tame, as to believe all that can be told us by one, whose Proctor S. W. assures us she is infallible, when in the very truth there is no one thing she doth, or can tell us, that we have less reason or authority to believe, than that the Roman Church, which is this Mistress all this while, is either infallible, or free from many gross errors, and have no greater prejudice against learning of her, than this, that she hath no other possible means to infer the belief of many of her doctrines, but this fallacious circular one, because she cannot erre.

9. What yet farther follows in reproach of this magnanimous piece of our docible humility, that we hold Articles of faith upon that authority, which it is an article of our faith that it may deceive us,] hath been answered many times over, viz. that we may reasonably believe without doubting, what yet is made known to us, by an authority, which we know to be fallible, having so little reason to distrust its testimony, though it be fallible, that I adventure my life confidently upon no securer terms. And indeed the magnanimity or temerity is not lessened but increased, by my taking up all my belief in gross from S. W. his infallible guide, for that she is truly so, as she pretends, I am far enough from being infallibly ascertain'd, so that the balance or competition hangs but thus, betwixt a fallible authority, believed or affirmed by it self to be infallible on the one side, and another, or the same fallible authority believed to be fallible, on the other side, and which of these two is really the safest guide, the one that leaves no place for caution to S. W. the other that leaves me as safe, but more cautious (for certainly if these guides are really such, as cannot mislead me, my believing of them, though I think them, as all humane things, fallible, will not render them fallible, if they are not, or me deceivable by them, who really cannot be deceived) I now leave S. W. in his humble pusillanimous fit of believing nothing but what is represented by an infallible authority, to consider, and 'tis possible it may go for reason, and not for folly or fancy, in his severest retirements.

10. What he means by asking, why the Primitive times must needs just end then, when the Church began to flourish] expounding that by [the times when the Fathers began to write against our doctrines] I cannot well divine, who think Christianity may flourish, when the profession of it is outwardly persecuted, ('tis not the grandeur of professors, but purity of Religion, which is the true verdure and flourishing of it) and who am assured, that in the time of the four general Councils, Christianity was in all respects as flourishing as ever: and that the coming in of new doctrines into the Church, which had not been taught by the Apostles, is the decay and withering, not the advancing or greater flourishing of it. I shall rather ask, why the Church must then attain to its plenitude of authority with S. W. when it begins as he saith, to write against our doctrines, when it is certain we embrace no doctrines, but what the Church delivers us from the Apostles, and are accused by the Romanists, not for introducing more doctrines, than they acknowledge us to have received, but only for questioning the truth of, and tradition for some which they have introduced, and for which they cannot pretend Apostolical tradition, unless they find them testified in those first ages which were next the Apostles, (and so are the only competent testifiers of what is Apostolical) which ages if they have testified the truth of all the Romish doctrines, and the Romanists take up their doctrine, upon their testification, then we cannot be blamed by a Romanist, who are by his very objection here acknowledged to believe all that they have testified. And this is all that is due to his second Section.

SECT. V.

Retaining Apostolical Government, one indication that we are no Schismaticks. Vindication of my method. The one sort of Schism with the Romanists. Altare contra Altare, Schism: yet all Schism consists not in that. The Primate in each Church. The Kings Supremacy in Ecclesiastical causes, wherein it consists. Of Liturgies and Ceremonies, and Discipline. Of Sacriledge. Of the Mass. Of the Popes Monarchy, and Festivals.

1. IN his third Section his first dish, or jest (for it is with the Stationer under one, with the Author under the other of these notions) is raised out of the view of my method again, which when all is done, is as exact, as he could have taught it to be; That dividing from our Ecclesiastical Superiors was fitly set for a first kind of Schism, that against subordination, and that casting off all government quite, was a species of another kind, by way at least of reduction, as the institutions of Christ and his Apostles, are reducible to the faith of Christ, hath been vindicated already; And all that is now behind to be justified in this place, is, that external communion being one part of unity, and the offences against that one part of Schism, our retaining and living regularly under that form of Government, under which the Apostles founded Ecclesiastical Assemblies, is one evidence of our not being guilty of Schism against external Communion. And to this purpose what proofs can be needful, when it is once considered, that external Communion is nothing else but συνευχεσθαι joyning regularly in the Ecclesiastical Assemblies, and that that is stiled being ἐντὸς θυσιαστηρίου within the altar, in Ignatius's phrase, in communion external with all those whom God hath set over us, and with all those that keep close to them, all others that live out of this, being, as S. W. told us even now, a multitude, but not a Church. And indeed when the rulers of the Church are the Masters and Ministers of the Assemblies, who have the ordering and transacting of all in them, what possibility is there of considering external communion, without an explicite consideration of this head, the form of Government appointed by Christ, and the regular living under it.

To this I shall only add, that if there had been any infirmity in my method, and if that were the very default, which he would have reprehended, the reverting desultorily to the matter of Government, S. W. would have been the unfittest person in the world to complain of it, or upon this one score of the immethodicalness of my process, to feast his neighbours as he doth with the news of my preaching in a Wilderness; For certainly none can be more guilty of it in the very kind, than he, for the denying the Popes Supremacy being his schism of schisms, as the denying his Infallibility is his heresie of heresies, 'tis consequent and certain, that whensoever he comes to distribute schism into its parts, Denying the Popes Supremacy must be the root and branch in every one of them. Thus very unsuitable it is to S. W. his condition, to blame other Mens methods, who if he were never so subtle an artist or methodist, could not serve his rules and his hypothesis at once, but must be fain to divide his theme (Schism) as the keen stomack did his short Commons, or the blunt Friar his Text, into one bit, or part. For that is the breviat of the Romanists divinity, that all that live in obedience to the Bishop of Rome are Catholick, and all that do not, schismatical. 2.

But he tells us next, that Arians and other hereticks have after their breaking from the Church of God retain'd the authority of their own Bishops] I answer, that when heresie and schism went together, and the Bishops themselves were not the ring-leaders of it (as among the Arians it was) there generally the hereticks renounced the authority of their own Bishops, and set up others against them, and so erected altar against altar, i. e. Bishop against Bishop, the ordinary stile of schismaticks in the Fathers, and notorious in the instance of the Donatists. But then 2. I grant that retaining the authority of their Bishops, is not, being taken alone, any certain argument, or evidence of not being schismaticks, and therefore I took it in consort with others, and made it but one of six indications, on our side, for our not being guilty of this one branch of schism, against external Communion; and that I hope was just as S. W. would have directed me. This being still one branch of schism in them that are guilty of it, though all schism do not consist in this. Which also may be useful advertisement to him, if he please, and mind him, that the adhering to the authority of the Bishop of Rome is no certain defensative against schism, and that there may be other schismaticks besides those, which are either by, or without their own default or consent, divided and separated from that See. 3.

What he here adds of my not telling him of the main hinge of our Churches Government, which is of the King being its head and supreme in Ecclesiastical matters] is a special device, For I ask, doth he believe the King to be in any Nation head of the Church? If he doth not, why am I to be rebuked, for not putting him into my scheme, and so for not telling him of it? I acknowledge indeed that I do not tell him of it, and that with very good reason, because in my poor opinion, the King makes no part in our Hierarchy, the Primate of each Nation is he, whom, according to the Apostolick Canon, and that of Antioch, we acknowledge. The Apostolick Canon is express. Τὺς ἐπισκόπυς ἑκάστ ἔθνες ἐιδέναι χρὴ τὸν ἐν αὐτοῖς πρῶτον, καὶ ἡγεῖσθαι αὐτὸν ὡς κεφαλὴν, the Bishops in every Nation ought to know the first or Primate among them, and to account him as their head; and the Canon of Antioch is as full, τὺς κατ' ἑκάστην ἐπαρχίαν ἐπισκόπυς εἰδέναι χρὴ τὸν ἐν τῇ μητροπόλει προεστῶτα ἐπίσκοπον, the Bishops in every Province must know the Bishop which presides in the Metropolis, and do nothing of common concernment without him. As for the King, we know the title and power which by our doctrine belongs to him, viz. to be Supreme over all persons in all causes whatsoever. That he is Supreme, the Scripture tells us in many places, and particularly S. Peter; and how far this Supremacy extends in respect of Persons, the Fathers of the Church have made no scruple to affirm, without excepting of any; so Saint Chrysostom on Rom. 13. 1. Πᾶσι ταῦτα διατάττεται, καὶ ἱερεῦσι, καὶ μοναχοῖς, οὐχὶ τοῖς βιωτικοῖς μόνον, The precept of subjection to Kings as Supreme, belongs to all, both to Priest and Monks, and not to seculars alone, and, κἂν Ἀπόστολος ᾖ, κἂν εὐαγγελίστης, κἂν προφήτης, κἂν ὁτισοῦν, though thou be an Apostle, an Evangelist, a Prophet, or whosoever, thou art under this precept of obedience to the higher powers. And indeed the matter is clear, that if as men we are born Subjects, 'tis neither in the power of our baptism, which makes us of men Christians, nor of our Ordination, which makes us of Christians Priests, Bishops, Metropolitans, Primates, to rescind the obligation, and oath, under which we are born, to quit us in the least degree of our allegiance before incumbent on us. And as for persons, so for causes also, the Supremacy of the King is universally extended, the Church having its foundation in the Kingdom, and not the Kingdom in the Church, and Christ having interposed no exemption in this kind, save what the law of God and nature had always supposed, that we must serve, obey, and fear God, more, and rather than men, (timendo Majestatem contemnere Majestatem, i. e. adhere still to the supreme) when there is a competition and unreconcileableness betwixt their commands; But when there is none, then subject and prostrate all our obedience before him, who bears God's image and superscription, being indeed his vicarius or proxy, commissionated by him. From whence it is visible what causes they are, wherein the Church or Ecclesiastical persons depend not on the Prince, what powers they have, which flow not from him, viz. those to which their calling from God, or office to which he hath commissionated them, doth oblige them, and which they cannot omit without the same woe, under which S. Paul was obliged to preach the Gospel; Agreeably we know, these things the Bishops in this Nation have done in the name of God, and as Ministers of his, and commissionated by him, in their own names. The Censures of the Church were never slighted out, as the 4.

civil acts of judicature, in the name of the Prince, but after the example of S. Paul, 1 Cor. 5. In the name of our Lord Jesus Christ, by the Bishop, as his Officer and Minister and Embassador. In a word, the internal acts of the Ecclesiastical Function are those, wherein the Primate is under Christ, the chief in each Christian nation. But the external acts, or causes of the Church it self, such are all those, that in the discourse of Schism have been attributed to him, are as regularly subjected to the Prince, as the Βωτινὰ, whatsoever is most purely civil or secular.

5. When therefore he saith, we substitute the King instead of the Ecclesiastical head we rejected, i. e. the Pope, The meaning, if it have any truth, must evidently be this, The Bishop of Rome having assumed a Primacy in this Kingdom, and usurped a transcendent uncanonical power over our Primate, such as neither Apostolick, Nicene, Ephesine, Antiochian, nor any other ancient Canon afforded him, or gave him any ground to pretend to, contented not himself with this, but assumed as confidently the Supream Regal power, as far as to Ecclesiastical causes and persons, in external things, such as no way belong'd to a Primate by the same ancient Canons, but were reserved as the Priviledges of Majesty, to every Christian Prince. Consequently, at the return of each part of this usurped power to its due chanel again, that which really belong'd to the Ecclesiastical Primate, reverted to the Archbishop of Canterbury; and what as duly, and regularly belonged to the Supream Monarch, returned to its proper seat of Majesty.

6. And thus, I hope, I have, if not satisfied S. W. yet secured his seducible reader from being imposed on by him, in this his grand particular, which promised such flowers to his Crown, such advantages to adorn his triumphs over us.

7. His next fling is at my method again; but they that have eyes in their heads, cannot chuse but see, that they that acknowledge Episcopal, nay Papal Government, may yet not live regularly in obedience under it, and so, that as the want of that obedience is a several branch of Schism, so to secure our selves from being Schismatical offenders against external communion, the obedience to, as well as acknowledging of our Lawful Superiors, was to be mentioned in my defence.

8. In his answer to my third plea, as he calls it, many passages there are, before we find the least motion toward truth, or earnest, or arguing: For that 1. all Schismaticks meet at such appointed places as I spake of, viz. Churches; or 2. observe such set times, fasting or festival, the fasts and holy days of our Calender: thirdly, that Copes and Surplices are Sacramental: Fourthly, that we preach such doctrine as our first fore-fathers (i. e. the Apostles) sent us not to preach: Fifthly, that we imbue tender minds with tainted doctrine] are all equally fictions; and Sixthly, that our prayer and praises is almost all out of their Mass and Breviary, if, being taken out of the ancient Liturgies of the more Universal Church, it can yet be truly said to be taken from them, that have varied from the ancient form, yet sure it cannot be argumentative against us; for why must we that are blamed for receding from them, be blamed also for this act of not receding?

9. Seventhly, then, As for ceremonies, of which saith he, we accepted from the Primitive Church only what we thought convenient, the same authority that recommended them, recommending more to us] I answer, that 'tis sufficient that what we took from the Roman Church, was such as they had from the practice of the Primitive Church, no obligation lying on us from thence to adhere to that Roman order in all other ceremonies, which we find not to be Primitive, or to observe every other rite, which the Primitives did: For as to those which we do retain, what need we own any other authority for retaining them, than that of the Primitive practice? and then why should the same, i. e. the Roman authority, from which we had them immediately, oblige us to receive all other that the Romanists use, but the Primitive Church did not use? and for those which the Primitive used, and we retain not, why are we more guilty therein than the Romanists are, who certainly do the same thing, either in the same, or other instances, retain not all ceremonies which the Primitive Church observed, witness the standing, not kneeling in the service of God betwixt Easter and Whitsuntide, and on every Sunday in the year, which sure was of ancient Primitive, but is not of Modern Roman, any more than of English use, and so proclaims the liberty of the Churches in retaining or not retaining, i. e. of chusing and culling out some ceremonies that are most salubrious, without burthening the Church with the greater weight and number of all, that have at any time been used.

10. As for our discipline, which he saith is too weak to hold us together in unity, profest fallibility being, saith he, too weak for that] The answer is obvious, First, that pretension to infallibility is not discipline. Secondly, that the censures of the Church, which we are wont to understand by that phrase, are the same both with them and us, the weapons of our, as well as of their spiritual warfare, and the Apostle tells us, they are mighty through God, for the bringing down of strong holds, but with neither of us have that force, when sons of the Church rebel against, or cast off their Parents. And this is all that our experience tells us, that the censures have lost their force, since the Governours of the Church have been cast off, and I suppose the Church of Rome hath no fence against that; when any members of their Church renounce obedience to them, what force is there in respect of them, that do so, in all their thunderbolts?

11. In this place p. 257. after his answers to three particulars of the plea concerning our not being guilty of this Schism against external Communion, here is a very excellent prize played; My fourth particular concerned all that under any of those three former heads, the Romanist requires us to add farther to that which we voluntarily receive. And before he will proceed to that fourth, he must once more look back and take a second survey of these three, like him that after once saying grace could not fall to his meat, till he had exercised his gifts in praising God better. And what was the design of this? Why that in this review he might tell his Reader one great mystery, which yet he had once revealed to him before, that D. H. who mentioned some things wherein he was no Schismatick, omitted others wherein he was. But why did he not stay, till to the other three particulars these were added? The reason is evident; for then his exception, as far as there was any colour for it, had been prevented, the very next that follows, taking notice of the Principal, and of all that are material of those, which he saith are omitted.

And

And then what doth this special enterprize of his amount to? But this in effect, that D. H. having mentioned six things, he had yet gone through but three of them, which is most true, because S. W. at his Welchmans bait, would needs stand still in the midst, when the very next step or line, had else certainly given him a view of the rest of them. And was not this a fair reason why he should thus glean after himself, review and pick over his clusters again, and mind his Reader, beside those answers that were already given (and already proved to have no force in them) first that we had cast out the Popes authority, and secondly, had been guilty of Sacriledge, and again, denied obedience to their Churches, i. e. the Popes authority, and ruin'd religious houses, i. e. committed sacriledge? Where, as sacriledge is certainly (as hath been said long since) neither schism nor any branch or part of it (or if it were, the Romanists would find good store of schismaticks among their own subjects) and as this is not the fault but the misery, not the guilt but the pest of our Church, so the other is particularly named, and spoken to by me, in the fourth particular, and can no more be said to be omitted by me, than the former three which he hath surveyed, might be said to be omitted, before he entred on the survey of them. 12.

One thing indeed he mentions more, that we left out all the most sacred parts of their service books, the Canon Missæ, and whatever concern'd the heaven-propitiating sacrifice, and highest and soul-elevating act of religion; and again, that we took out of their Masse book only the slighter things which were enough to serve us to cry Lord, Lord.] From this I acknowledge to learn two things to be affirmed by S. W. first, that we which retain in our services the prayers to the holy blessed and glorious Trinity, but do not take in prayers to Saints and Angels, are by S. W. judged to retain only the slighter things. Secondly, that the sacramental partaking of the real sacrifice of Christ's body and blood, commemorative of that sacrifice once offered upon the Cross, and applying to us the propitiation of that, if it be not yet farther, the same sacrifice offered now by the Priests, which was once offered on the Cross, and that by means of his stupendious transubstantiating the Elements into that very body (one of which S. Augustine tells us is a savage thing; and S. Chrysostome, that what the Priest there doth, is rather ἀνάμνησις than θυσία, a commemoration of the sacrifice of Christ, than the sacrifice it self; and of the other, our reason assures us, that it implies many contradictions, and so impossibilities in it) is none of the most sacred parts, none of the soul-elevating acts of our religion. In all this I acknowledge we are not of S. W. his mind, nor have as yet discern'd in his temper any great effects of that soul-elevating act of religion, who yet I doubt not, hath been at Mass in his days; and if our not opening with him in these particulars (to which our not practising is but consequent) must be schism after all, and we irremediably cast out from the Romanists peace and mercy, there is no help for it, that I know of, but by appealing to a more equal Judge, than is our profest enemy in this matter. 13.

At length he is perswaded to proceed to the fourth head, which was the consideration of the particulars, which the Romanist requires us, but we deny to receive, viz. the Popes Monarchick power over us, and the whole world, and the use of more ceremonies and festivals, of both which I affirmed that they were without precedent of the ancient Primitive Church, usurpations or impositions of the present Romanists. To these he hath nothing to say, but that the supremacy of the Pope was brought in 900. years ago, (and they that now live were not alive then) proving it only from our granting of it, and that ceremonies and festivals are indifferent things, which 'tis lawful for them to recommend to their Subjects. 14.

To these I answer, First, that I said not of the Popes supremacy, that it was an imposition of the present Romanists, but that that, and the other things mentioned, were usurpation or imposition of the present Romanist; and if it were usurpation (though of some former Popes before this last age) this will suffice to verifie my speech, and 'twas truly all that I meant by it, and he may have heard of him, that had a Legacy given him either of the black horse, or cow, and suing the Executor first for one, then for the other of them, was twice non-suted, till he laid his plea exactly by the words of the will, either for one or other. The same is S. W. his portion at this time. Secondly, That we in no wise grant, that for 900. years the Pope hath been possest of the universal supremacy, nor indeed acknowledged to have it in this Island of ours, witness the treatise of schism C. 6. throughout. And therefore this must be better proved than by our confession, and so needs no refutation from me, but that of denying it. Thirdly, That if the Popes power over us, were usurped only, and so we none of his Legal Subjects, he may then retain and exercise his power of multiplying ceremonies and holy-days over his own subjects, without our being at all concern'd in the obligation to observe them. And so much for his third Section. 15.

SECT.

SECT. VI.

Unsincere professors admitted to Communion, and such as may turn Schismaticks. No paternal relation of Rome to us. The foundation. Tradition. Denying Romish Infallibility the great Schism.

1. HIS fourth Section sets out with a full cry, wilfully misunderstanding my words, concerning our excluding no Christian from our Communion. By Christian he will understand all nominal Christians, who though, by all the World else call'd hereticks, and which though they deny all the points of Christ's doctrine, yet profeß Christs name.]

2. But first, when I spake of Christians, it were hard that my words should indeed be understood of the quite contrary, of hereticks, and assumers of the name, without any of the reality of the Christian faith, that the word Christian must signifie, and be understood in the notion of unchristian, to enable S. W. to dispute, or confute me.

3. Secondly, when I expounded Christian, by such as hold the foundation, &c. must it still be suggested, that all the no-Christians are such, that Simon Magus himself (whom he here names in rank with my Christians) do indeed acknowledge the foundation laid by Christ and his Apostles? I wish it were now considered, who is the hospitable friendly person, the most charitable to hereticks. 'Tis true indeed our Communion is such, that hypocrites who are not uprightly what they profeß to be, may find reception among us, (but 'tis as true that hereticks continuing such, are cast out by us) Our judgment truly is not so inerrable, that we can search mens hearts, or look into those closets by any other perspective, than that which their actions and professions allow us. And I have not yet been assured that S. W. his infallible Church hath assumed to be scrutatrix cordium to have any sure test, to descry and purge out of its bowels all unsincere professors, that are not really what they pretend to be. I am sure S. Peter himself, to whom they pretend to owe their infallible chair, did baptize Simon Magus, when he had not γνησίαν πρόθεσιν the genuine purpose, as S. Cyril saith of him, and so ἐβαπτίσθη ἀλλὰ οὐκ ἐφωτίσθη, had his body baptized, but not his mind illuminated, which he did not long dissemble, but demonstrated it to all by very early actions, Act. 8. 23. and after proved the πρωτότοκον τῦ Σατανᾶ the first-born of Satan, and beyond all the world beside, set himself against S. Peter, who had thus baptized, i. e. admitted him into his Church. And unless the modern glasses have helpt the Church of Rome to means of profounder inspection than S. Peter had then met with, I doubt not but they will upon consideration acknowledge, that hypocrites may impose on them, as well as us, and that those who are baptized into a Church, may heretically and schismatically oppose it, and that this is but common to men, and cannot hope to be remedied, until Rome Christian, as well as Rome heathen assume to be deified, and to communicate the same divine nature to their frailer brethren. And now let S. W. say, if this be not the full importance of his first answer.

Cyr. Hieros. Catech. p. 2.

4. Next he is to please himself with my phrase of excluding none from Communion, that will either filially or fraternally embrace it with us, i. e. in plain terms, that the Governors of our Church do not causlesly excommunicate the sons of this Church, nor any true son of any other true Church, for all such they look on as brethren. And here he hath great Ovations, that we can admit none that will paternally communicate with us, that we have as much courtesie as may be, but not a dram of humility nor subjection to superiors.] But the matter is clear, we do not acknowledge the Bishop of Rome our superior. All that are so, we obediently live under, as many of us as are under authority, but do not exact from our English Primate that he should acknowledge another foreign supreme over him and us. And that is all the news S. W. hath told us in that Paragraph.

5. Next when I say we acknowledge the foundation laid by Christ and his Apostles, he must first perswade his Reader, that I call him fool, and then ask Mr. D. what he means by acknowledging the foundation laid by Christ and his Apostles? And who knows but I may again be accused of calling my Catechist fool, if I answer this question? But I shall do it in as secure a stile as I can, and assure him I mean, what I have written an intire treatise on, the Depositum both in the scriptures and by Oral tradition of the Apostles committed to the Churches which they planted, of which the Church of Rome was one, and but one. And this supersedes all the force of this Paragraph. For certainly more than this S. W. will not pretend himself to mean by the foundation (as p. 266. he confesses) only he hath a reserve, I know, that his Church must have the incloßure of the priviledge to expound to us infallibly, and tell us what this is, first to interpret Scripture, and then to testifie of tradition. And herein I do not oblige my self to comply with him, as upon many other reasons, so upon this, because I have no infallible proof offered, nor any other indeed, besides their own affirming it, that they are infallible in either of these.

6. When the remainder of his displeasure falls on me for talking of fundamentals, and not naming what they are, I again answer, that I wrote a treatise of that subject, which was too big to come in by way of parentheßis in that place, and therefore stay'd for the Preß, till that of schism was printed off. But saith he, if we thus interpret the foundation, we must admit only Catholicks, since only they (i. e. in his stile, only the Romanists) hold this foundation.] For this I must not demand any proof or reason, but am to look on it, as one of S. W. his indemonstrable principles, which are to be confirm'd only à posteriori, by his saying it, or by some such like irrefutable Topick, and howsoever severe an exacter he is of probations from others, I shall not so much as expect from him, that he shall afford that any probation.

But it seems his heart misgave him, after the delivery of those words, for fear we should grant 7.
him his position, and according to his argument oblige our selves to admit the Romanists to our Communion (which yet he knows we never refused them, if they would sincerely come to it) and therefore he presently retracts again, we must not, saith he, admit them neither, being it seems resolved, that the ball of contention shall be held up for ever; otherwise I assure him we should not yet break with him upon those terms, which alone here he mentions. Since, saith he, you deny this way of bringing down faith to be sufficient, it follows that you must not admit Catholicks neither] But what is this way, which he saith we acknowledge not to be sufficient? why he had before set down that, the solid sense of Christs law written and planted in the tables of mens hearts by the Apostles, and thence by a well linkt chain of universal tradition derived to our times] This being all, and tradition, or planting in mens hearts, no way excluding written traditions, which we ordinarily call Scripture (for 'twere hard that a thing should be the less delivered by the Apostles, because it was written by them) I shall yet continue my hospitable humor, and resolving this solid sense of Christs law derived from the Apostles to our times by universal tradition to be perfectly sufficient. (say S. W. what he please) to all that thus receive it, and live by it, I shall admit S. W. upon this profession to our Communion, and then I hope, if he be not one of those nominal Christians, which even now he talkt of, there might be an end of this controversie.

But the fit of railing seiseth him again in the next paragraph, and the mention of our earnest de- 8.
